It has also been stated that the army of Scinde should not have a double base of operation, but be made dependent either on Bombay or on Bengal exclusively. The communication between Scinde and Bombay by sea, is greatly interrupted during two or three months of the year, while a steady intercourse may be kept up at all seasons with Ferozepore, by way of the Indus. Sukkur, we believe, may always be reached in less time from that station than from Kerachee, and it will be easier to improve the boats at Ferozepore, and to attain a greater degree of speed in moving down the stream, than to facilitate and shorten the communication up the river from the sea. In all respects, there will be more convenience and certainty in looking to the northern station for supplies and succour, than in depending on the southern port.

That intelligence will probably be received with some dissatisfaction at Bombay, where the public mind has become in a great measure reconciled to the occupation of Scinde, by the prospects of employment and distinction which it opened. But as the abstraction of so large a body of troops from the army of this Presidency will render it necessary to relinquish some of the stations which lie on the frontiers of the Bombay and Madras Presidencies, a new distribution of military duty will probably be made, by which the disappointment of the Bombay Officers will be in a great measure compensated. Some of our cotemporaries have talked of an augmentation of the army to meet the drain occasioned by this new demand ; but we are inclined to think the Court of Directors will not lend an ear to any such advice. They will probably judge that as there is peace in Asia and tranquillity in India, this period of repose should be improved for the husbanding of their resources. They will persuade themselves without much difficulty that the abandonment of Affghanistan by England, and of Khiva by Russia, has made central Asia neutral ground, and that no provision is necessary against any combination which its tribes may form against us. They will probably look at the sum total of the troops now borne on the roll, and compare it with the numerical strength of the army before we resolved to march into Affghanistan ; and they may find that the augmentations which have been gradually made, have so far increased the size of the army, that, notwithstanding recent reductions, it is still larger than the army of 1838, to the full extent of all the troops required for Scinde.

The unhealthiness of the country and the risk which the troops may run, have been largely dwelt on. It is evident that Sukkur and its neighbourhood have proved detrimental to the health of the troops, though the deaths have been comparatively few. But Hydrabad and Kerachee have been found more salubrious than was expected, and the country, altogether, has not proved so fatal to Europeans and Natives, unaccustomed to its novel climate, as we were led to apprehend. One thing at least is certain, that nothing will tend more to create salubrity, which must be the work of time, than the location of our troops in the province. The country has become unhealthy because it was neglected by the oppressive Ameers, who seem to have considered that there were but two objects of Government ; that of screwing money out of the people, and that of creating hunting grounds for their own pastime. A scientific system of drainage will soon alter the face of the country and remove all cause of complaint on the score of unhealthiness. The first season will probably prove the most insalubrious ; but every succeeding year will undoubtedly present a sensible amelioration. The miracle we have performed in Arracan within fifteen years, at little or no expense, is sufficient to encourage exertion in every other locality. Long after we obtained possession of that country, the annual victims of the climate exhibited a terrific list. Those whom death spared, talked for the rest of their lives of the Arracan fever, as having penetrated their bones. The encampment of the Regiment was a perfect charnel house; it is now a sanatarium. Why should not Scinde present results equally gratifying with that superior attention which is likely to be bestowed on it?

The allotment of Scinde to the troops of Bengal, gives to the army of this Presidency the high trust of guarding the entire frontier of the Empire by land, with the exception of the single and detached province of Tenasserim. The frontiers of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies, either lie on the sea coast, or abut on protected states. The boundary line entrusted to the Bengal troops extends in the form of a magnificent arc, from Sandoway in Arracan to Kerachee in Scinde, through an extent of more than three thousand miles; to this vast size has the Empire grown in eighty-six years, since Clive, having recovered the Factory to which we had been confined, said, "you cannot stop here." At successive distances, the Army of the Frontiers, as that of Bengal may now be called, finds itself marshalled in front of the Belochee, the Affghan, the Sikh, the Nepalese, and the Burmese. Since the fall of the Roman empire, no army has ever been placed in so responsible a position, and never has an army earned the post of danger by higher devotion and valour. In these observations we trust we shall not be considered as casting any slight on the merits of the armies at the sister Presidencies. They are equally a portion of that Army of India which has spread the renown of England through Asia. The one has recently had its day of triumph in China, the other in Scinde, and they have only to meet the foe again, on whatever soil, to acquire fresh laurels.

These remarks were penned last week, but we were obliged to omit them on the arrival of the Mail, which brings a rumour that Scinde will probably be restored to the Ameers. However defective may have been our right to dispossess the Ameers, it is allowed by all, even by those who most violently impugn Lord Ellenborough's policy, that we cannot relinquish the country without committing an act of unparalleled madness. To restore it to its former Rulers and thus establish a new and independent, perhaps a hostile, power on the frontiers of India, would bring in question our capacity for governing the rest of the country. If the Indus is to be regarded as the natural limit of our empire, we cannot spare a foot of land within that boundary; and the sooner the anomalous independence of the various chiefs, whom our forbearance has spared, ceases, and the whole country is brought under the same scheme of administration, the better for the interests of the people, and the better also for the consolidation of our empire. But when by any combination of circumstances, any portion of native independence has been absorbed in our power, to give it a new and distinct existence, would be an act of folly similar to that of building up a wall to knock one's head against.

HUMAN SACRIFICES AMONG THE KHOONDS.—We publish a letter on this subject from an Enemy to Procrastination, which enables us also to thank our Contemporaries at Madras and Bombay for the interest which they have been so kind as to take in the subject, on the strength of our representation. Our correspondent speaks of the sister Presidency as having an "apathetic," a "slumbering" Government. We made some distant allusion of the same kind in our article, and were taken severely to task by the Madras journals. We must therefore offer some apology for having admitted a letter into our columns, in which that Government is treated with so little respect. Still, however, it is a fact known throughout India, that Madras has hitherto been the strong hold of antiquated prejudices; and that the liberal views which have been gradually gaining an ascendancy in our administration since the days of Lord Hastings have no where encountered so protracted and inveterate a resistance as at the Presidency of Madras. Within the last four years it has required the reiterated commands, almost the threats, of the Court of Directors, to induce the Authorities at Madras to relinquish their official connection with idolatrous institutions. At the same time we acknowledge with pleasure that there has been of late a manifest improvement in this respect at the sister Presidency; and there can be little doubt that when a few more retiring pensions have been accepted, those liberal principles of government which first obtained a footing at Bengal and Bombay, will be equally triumphant in the Peninsula.

Our Madras contemporaries are inclined to think that the application for the rescued children never came officially before the Madras Government. In this more satisfactory view of the case, we are anxious to coincide. It is more agreeable to believe that the generous offer of the Missionaries was unknown at head quarters, than that it was neglected. It was delivered to the Khoond Agent to be forwarded to his superiors. It is for him to explain whether it was ever transmitted to Madras or not, and whether the subsequent distribution of the victims among the Hindoos or Mahomedans, was his own individual act, or that of the Government to which he is subordinate. We have done our duty in bringing the subject forward, and exciting public attention. It remains for the Government of Madras to give the Agent in the Khoond territory such positive instructions on this subject, as shall obviate the necessity of any future reference to the seat of Government.

Our correspondent seems to think that the Madras Government was not bound "to have made Christians of the hundred victims," because it was not bound to Christianize any other hundred children. The comparison does not however hold good. To take a hundred children from their Hindoo or Mahomedan parents, and deliver them to Christian Missionaries, to be trained up in the doctrines of Christianity, would be a violation of liberty of conscience and of public faith. But when these victims of superstition had thus been cast upon the protection of a benevolent Government, it was morally bound to place them in that position in which their prospects in life would be most effectually benefited. And no man we believe will venture to affirm that they were likely to receive the same advantages of example and instruction, or that their social, intellectual and spiritual improvement would have been equally promoted in the society of Hindoos or Mahomedans, as in the seminaries of Christian Missionaries. He insinuates that the Missionaries wanted a Government allowance for the children; and that this may have led to the rejection of their request. But this is not possible, for the application, though it stated that the usual allowance for the board and tuition of these orphans would be acceptable, yet offered to take charge of and educate them without any allowance whatever.

As to the entire suppression of the rite, it can be accomplished only by the entire occupation of the country by British Officers, or the universal prevalence of civilization, rather we should say of Christianity, among them. We question whether Government is prepared to extend its power throughout the insalubrious Khoond mountains, and place these tribes in a state of complete subjection to our laws; and many years must elapse before this revolting but national propensity is extinguished by the light of knowledge and divine truth; but it will be the duty of Government to bring all its influence to bear on the extinction of the practice; to abolish it altogether in the Tributary Mehals in Cuttack; and to omit no means of rescuing the victims of this superstition elsewhere, and, when they are rescued, to place them in situations in which they are likely to obtain the best moral and intellectual training.

COOLY EMIGRATION.—At the time when the system of Cooly Emigration was revived and legalized last year, great fears were entertained by those who had watched the progress of what was not unaptly called the "Cooly trade," that many abuses would gradually creep into the new system. It was feared that as public vigilance became slack, the checks on abuse would dwindle into a mere matter of form, and become altogether inefficient. We are happy to observe that these fears have not hitherto been realized, though the changes which have been made in the system laid down by Her Majesty's Ministers, seem to create facilities for the revival of the old abuses. It was generally understood that the Government of the Mauritius would appoint an agent of its own at each port, who should receive the applications of natives, and provide them a passage to the island; and that on their arrival they would be free to form an engagement with any planter. No such agent has been appointed at all. On the contrary, precisely the same system appears to be pursued at present which was in vogue during the days of abuse. Private merchants are engaged in shipping Coolies, and they employ Duffadars, or Crimps, to scour the country and collect labourers, and then pass them through the Emigration office and ship them to the Mauritius. For whom do these Agency Houses act; and who pays them their charges and their commission? Are they employed and paid solely by the Government of the Mauritius, and are the Coolies on their arrival transferred to a Government Agent, and left at liberty to choose their own master? If not, the Calcutta Agents are acting for private individuals at the Mauritius, and the expenses incurred in procuring, feeding and conveying Coolies to the Island are borne by them. In that case, how are they repaid, if the Cooly on his arrival in the island is a perfectly free agent? And if the planter has no prospect of repayment by being able to look forward with a degree of certainty to the services of the Coolies imported at his expense, upon what principle does he thus lay out his capital? There hangs a degree of mystery over the transaction, which has never been explained, but which it is important the public should understand.

The Duffadars, or Crimps, employed here, have of late been detected in resorting to their old practices to make up a supply of labourers. Some of these villains inveigled some men from the Hooghly district to Calcutta, under the pretence of procuring them employment under Government, and then endeavoured to force them on board a vessel bound to the Mauritius; but their resistance and outcries brought the Police to their aid, and led to their release. Other instances have also occurred lately of poor men brought down by fraud to Calcutta and detained by force till an opportunity offered of sending them on board. In every case in which the crime has been brought home to the offenders, they have been punished with severity. It is but a matter of justice also to acknowledge that the vigilance of the Protector of Coolies and his Assistant is so unremitted as effectually to prevent the clandestine shipment of Coolies. The machinery for the prevention of abuses at the port of embarkation, appears to be complete and efficient, and we think it scarcely possible for any man to leave the port who has not been personally examined at the office, and has not declared his willingness to embark.

It was therefore with no little surprise we read the following statements in the Star: "The occasion offers to mention a circumstance connected with the management of the emigration that we think deserving of public notice. We allude to the issue to the Duffadars of printed documents signed by the Emigration Agent, addressed to the Police Authorities and others in the interior, and requesting that no interference or hindrance be offered to the bearers who are stated to be in search of parties desirous of emigrating to Mauritius." To the issue of any such printed document, signed by the Emigration agent, there is the greatest possible objection. It is precisely the same as though the Crimps had received a public purwannah, or writ, authorising them to proceed through the country and bring down to Calcutta every man, woman and child they could lay their hands on. To say that such a document, and the power which it gives to the holder among an illiterate and timid population, is liable to be abused, is to talk idly. It is impossible that it should not be turned into an instrument of oppression. Any paper with an official signature in the hands of men employed on such an errand, would be highly dangerous; but a writ, such as the Star describes, forbidding any officer, European or Native, to interfere with their labours, must be a fortune to any man who is so happy as to possess it. He has only to enter a village at a sufficient distance from the Magistrate's station, and, upon the strength of this order, to seize every man who is able to pay for his liberation; and he may retire from business in a twelve month. It is not for the men whom the Duffadars may inveigle or seize, and bring down to Calcutta, and endeavour clandestinely to ship off, that we are in dread. The Emigration agent will effectually see that none are deported against their will. But we tremble for the poor creatures whom the Duffadar may succeed in seizing and confining in Calcutta and then let off on the payment of a heavy douceur. Who can calculate the extortion he will thus be enabled to practise on the inhabitants of any village on which he may fix his eye? The Emigration Agent is paid for the prevention of abuses; and it seems inconceivable that he should issue proclamations which are sure to become the most fertile source of abuse. Besides, what necessity is there for the Emigration Agent to interfere at all in the matter of procuring Coolies? The number of Coolies already shipped to the Mauritius from the three Presidencies since the Act passed, amounts to, if it does not exceed, 15,000, and as not more than 3,000 of the 30,000 emigrants formerly sent, have returned, that Island will soon enjoy the benefit of a servile population, almost equal in number to the slaves who were emancipated by the British Parliament. We are fully aware of the extreme anxiety of the Government of Bengal to free the system of emigration from all possibility of abuse; and we therefore entertain a confident hope that as soon as the issue of these Proclamations, under the official signature of a Government officer, is brought to notice, an order will be immediately given to recal those which have been already granted, and to prevent their farther issue.

THE JURISDICTION OF THE 24-PERGUNNAHS.—The Legislative Council has just published the draft of an Act which will remove an anomaly of fifty years standing, and give a character of uniformity and equity to our jurisprudence. It may be in the readers' recollection, that there was some discussion a few weeks ago in the papers, relative to the difficulty of suing for a personal debt in the Court of the suburbs of Calcutta. The law of 1793 very absurdly ordained that if a defendant became a resident in Calcutta, after a suit had been instituted against him in that Court, the action must forthwith cease and determine. This was in fact to afford the most ample opportunity of evading the payment of debts, and defeating the ends of justice. A defendant, on receiving a summon to answer a complaint, had only to cross the boundary and take up his abode in Calcutta, and he was enabled effectually to set his creditors at defiance. It is needless to remark that the facility which the law thus afforded for evading the payment of claims, has been eagerly improved. The matter was repeatedly brought to the notice of the public authorities, and the great inconvenience which the state of the law occasioned, was forcibly pointed out by the press; and we have now the pleasure of seeing the draft of an Act which takes away this privilege of sanctuary from the defendant, and repeals the enactment which forbade the Court of the 24-Pergunnahs to entertain the suit when the bird had flown out of its jurisdiction. The defendant will no longer be permitted to evade his creditors by moving into Calcutta, and the Court will be enabled to grant the same redress to suitors, which is given by all other Courts in Bengal.

SLAVERY IN CEYLON.—The Columbo Observer of the 24th of August has an article on Slavery in Ceylon, which is deserving of much attention. It appears that the old Candyan laws allowed of personal slavery. All slaves in the Candyan Provinces are personal property, and are liable to perform any service the owner may think proper to require of them. They are attached to the soil, but may be disposed of in any way the proprietor may think proper. It is true, that a slave may acquire and possess landed and moveable property, independently of his master, and dispose of it by will or otherwise; but if he dies intestate, his owner becomes his heir at law. But as if to countervail this privilege of acquiring independent property, the master has the power of punishing his slave in any way short of the deprivation of life and limb, and he may even subject him to torture by a red hot iron. These barbarous laws of a barbarous age, were confirmed by our Government in a Proclamation, dated the 31st of May 1816, which announced that the ancient laws of Candy should be administered till His Majesty's pleasure as to their general or partial adoption or their supersession was known. But it seems that neither George the III. nor George the IV. nor William the IV. nor even our present gracious Queen, has found leisure to signify any pleasure whatsoever upon the subject, and so these laws continue to be in force, and we suppose to be administered to this day. Our contemporary calls upon the Legislative Council of the Island to remove so deep a stain from British rule in Ceylon. If we thought there would be any benefit from our suffrage, we would very cordially second the proposal; and that for the following considerations.

Because the Legislative Council of India abolished all Slavery, personal as well as predial, absolutely and for ever, six months ago, namely on the 7th day of April, in the year of Redemption, One thousand Eight hundred and Forty-three, and it will by no means redound to the credit of the Legislative Council of Ceylon to place themselves in a disadvantageous contrast with their fellow labourers in Calcutta, by hesitating forthwith to manumit all the slaves in the island.

Secondly, because it is the duty of the Ceylon Legislative to abrogate all those local laws which are repugnant to the principles of humanity, not only for the sake of its own character, but for the general amelioration of Native society. In this country, the Legislative Council, in abolishing Slavery, was obliged at once to overturn the venerable Hindoo Legislation of two thousand years, and the positive injunctions of Mahomedan law. With the same readiness ought the Ceylon Council to abrogate all the slave laws of the Candyan Code under whatever sanction they may exist.

Lastly, because until Slavery is abolished in Ceylon, it cannot be said, that a slave is not to be found in the British dominions in Europe, Asia, Africa or America, neither can we lay claim to the proud distinction, that wherever the British flag waves, it waves over freemen. We owe it to our own national character to perfect the glorious work of emancipation which we have been maturing for half a century. We owe it to our children in the United States of America, to leave them absolutely without excuse for holding three millions of their fellow creatures in Slavery. They must not be permitted to point to a single nook or corner of our wide spread empire, and say "there toils a British slave."

While on this subject, we may as well notice the remarkable ignorance of events in the East, exhibited by Lord Brougham, in the House of Lords, on the 21st of July, when he expressed a hope, that the time was not far hence, when, as Lord Ellenborough had abolished Slavery in Scinde, so it would be abolished throughout our East Indian possessions. His Lordship seemed to think, that his noble friend, the Governor General, had set the example of emancipation in Scinde, instead of which, he has only followed the example set by the Supreme Council. Lord Auckland on this rose and said that an Act had already been passed by which Slavery was abolished throughout the British dominions in India. Lord Brougham asked when it was abolished. Our late Governor General replied, eight or ten months ago, on which the Ex-Chancellor, replied: "No one had the least idea until the noble Earl made the statement that any Act of a final nature had passed for the abolition of Slavery in India." Is it a fact that every member of the House of Lords, the hereditary Legislators of the British Empire, was totally ignorant of so important an event as the abolition of Slavery throughout the territories administered by the Company, three months after it had been passed? The abolition was noticed in all the leading journals in London; it was lauded in the Tory papers, with which Lord Brougham is now most familiar; it was mentioned with satisfaction at the meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society, in which Lord Brougham once took an interest. Can it be possible that his Lordship has been so entirely absorbed in the party politics of the hour; that his mind has been so exclusively engaged in discovering the means of spiting his former colleagues, that he has entirely overlooked the emancipation of slaves through an eighth of the family of man? If such a fact has failed to attract his notice; if it has been overlooked generally by the House of Lords, what is the value of the opinion which his Lordship, which any of their Lordships, may pass on Indian affairs?

THE DUTY OF PUBLIC SERVANTS.—There are few bodies of men to whom Society is more indebted than to the various officers of the Company's service, who have given to the public the benefit of that knowledge of the various countries in Asia, and more particularly of our own provinces in India, which they had accumulated during their official career. The acquaintance of the civilized world with India may indeed be considered to have been drawn almost entirely from this source. The two latest works which have appeared on the geography, history and statistics of Eastern countries, are Capt. Abbott's account of Khiva, and Capt. Postans' Personal Observations on Scinde. But we are sorry to remark that this source of information will now be dried up; the Governor General's late Notification effectually bars the communication not only of official documents but of all information acquired in the course of professional duty; and the value of the two works we have mentioned, consists in the information, derived from the official position of the writers, which they furnish. No public officer, however novel or interesting the scenes in which he may be placed, will hereafter be at liberty to use his own discretion in communicating to the public the result of his researches, till after he has resigned the public service, and placed himself beyond the reach of official displeasure. It is on no far fetched construction of the notice that we draw this conclusion. Any officer who may publish a work, without the imprimatur of Government, —which would destroy all confidence in the completeness, and therefore the accuracy, of its details,—would justly render himself liable to punishment by the terms of the Notification. The inconsistency of founding a general enactment on a solitary transgression, was never more palpably exhibited than in this instance. Because Col. Sleeman attempted to beat off the hornets which were endeavouring to sting him, with an official weapon, the publication of valuable statistical information gathered in the course of official duty is to be withheld from the public, and the stream of knowledge is to be dried up at its source. The sooner this notification becomes a dead letter the better, for the reputation of Government as well as for the cause of truth and improvement.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21.

—The Steamer which brought the last Mail to Bombay announced the total loss, with all the Mails, of the Memnon steamer, one of the finest vessels in our steam flotilla. Misfortunes are said seldom to come single, and here are a couple of the sharpest disappointments at once. The mails sent from Bombay in July went to the bottom; those of August were brought back; and thus for two months there will be no communication between Bombay and London. Fortunately the bulk of our August Mails were sent on by the Hindoostan, and will probably reach England in good time. The account of the loss of the Memnon was happily received in Calcutta in time to enable those who had sent remittances by her to send duplicates by the Express which leaves Calcutta this morning.

— Man Singh, the raja of Joudhpore, the last of the Rajpoot princes, who belonged to the days of independence and misrule, has just paid the debt of nature. His death will probably make the government of his principality more easy.

— Sir John Norton, the puisne Judge of Madras, has been obliged from ill health to proceed on a voyage to the Straits.

— The Government of India has made a requisition on the Madras Government for a Régiment of Cavalry, two Regiments of Infantry, and a battery of guns to be moved into the Sagur district. This may arise from a new disposition of military duty, by which the station of Sagur will be made over to the Madras army, or it may be connected with some arrangement for an attack on the independent chiefs in Bundlekund, who we are told have harboured the fugitive insurgents. The assemblage of a large army in the neighbourhood of Agra seems to point to something more than mere parade, to some political changes in Gwalior or Bundlekund, which the presence or the advance of that army will serve to facilitate.

— The latest accounts regarding Lahore given in the Hurkaru, represent the jealousies between the Minister and his King as not healed, and the country itself as in a very unsettled state. With two independent interests in the same state, backed by powerful armies, and mutually jealous of each other, it is impossible that there should be tranquillity. Matters must come to a speedy and a bloody issue.

— The Hurkaru gives a list of every Indigo factory at the Presidency, with the quantity of Indigo which each one is likely to supply this season. The sum total is 140,000 maunds; and we believe it is generally supposed that the crop will not fall short of that amount, and may possibly reach 150,000.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22.

— The Delhi Gazette of the 13th gives news from Sukkur to the 3d of September, which state that the sickness had not diminished. On the 1st of September, the 53d N. I. had upwards of 500 in hospital. There were three officers at muster and 200 rank and file. Dr. Menzies of the 55th had to perform the entire Medical duties of the Brigade, and, to make matters worse, scarcely a house was approachable in a buggy. The Correspondent of the Gazette throws little light on the dismissal of the three young Civilians. He merely says that Sir Charles Napier had written to Lord Ellenborough to say he did not want them, and to request three good working soldiers in their place. It would appear therefore that the severe and degrading punishment to which they have been subject has been brought on by idleness and not contumacy. If we mistake not, this is the first time in which indolence has been considered a penal offence in the Covenanted service.

— The Hurkaru has heard a whisper that the reason why there has been so little apparent equity shown in the last relief of the army, by which three Regiments have been transferred from one half batta station to another, is that Lord Ellenborough expects to obtain the repeal of that obnoxious order. We have heard indeed that the Friend of the Army has made it a personal question with the Court of Directors; which is all very right and proper. Should the Directors grant it, they will afford the example of a triumph over their own prejudices, deserving of immortal record; for the tenacity with which they have clung to the order has been exceeded only by its injustice.

— The London Correspondent of the Hurkaru states that the London Booksellers have held a meeting with the view of concocting a plan for supplying India with cheap books. They think of printing cheap editions expressly for our benefit. We certainly ought to be exceedingly obliged to them for so great an act of generosity; and we hope they will not fail to carry their views into effect. It is but a truism that the cheaper books can be made, the wider will be their circulation, and the larger will be the appetite created for reading.

— The Delhi Gazette states that the Press recently established by Rao Raja of Alwur is now in full operation. Two Hundred Copies of the Goolistan have been already struck off, and other works are in progress.

— Our contemporaries have all received parts of the Scinde Blue Book and are publishing one document after another. Our limited space does not allow us to reprint these papers, but as soon as we can obtain a copy of the work we intend to present an analysis of its contents to our readers similar to the analysis of the Affghanistan Blue Book.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23.

— General Avitabile, with a numerous retinue of Seikhs, crossed the Sutledge on the 31st of August, at Ferozepore. His arrival being announced, to Col. Tulloch, commanding the station, who had partaken of his splendid hospitality at Peshawur, that officer immediately proposed to give him an entertainment on a grand scale; but the General declined it, pleading the shortness of his leave of absence, a single month, and that on sick certificate, which is of course moonshine, for he cannot have more than ten days at Simlah, which would be too short for the recovery of his health, but long enough for negotiation, with the Lieut. Governor. He left Ferozepore on the 2d and reached Loodiana on the 7th, the Agra Ukhbar says "to arrange some political matter connected with the Punjab." General Avitabile travels en prince, his establishment consists of "numberless beautiful horses, elephants and mules, besides his travelling carriage," and, as it appears a regiment commanded by Col. Le Vant.

— The Assam Steamer which has been fitted up for towing in the same manner as the public steamers, advertises for freight at the very moderate rate of two Rupees a cubic foot or 10*l*. the ton of 50 cubic feet. Now, a case of merchandize may be brought from Liverpool to Calcutta for one-fifth the price of its conveyance, eight hundred miles from Calcutta to Allahabad by this steamer. It is true the Government freight when put up to auction sometimes sells for double this sum; but the regular charge of the cargo boats is only one-half that charged by the Assam Company.

— There was a rather numerous assembly of ladies and gentlemen yesterday to witness the examination of the boys in Seal's College. The Englishman says, the young gentleman who opened the business of the day was one Master Mounoth Doss Dutt, who acquitted himself with great credit, and made his exit amid a hearty round of applause. The classes were then examined in the History of Bengal, in English and English Grammar and Geography, &c.; the questions were searching; the answers, as usual, satisfactory. The examination we are farther told was interspersed with short dramatic soliloquies, and dialogues, and the little actors acquitted themselves well. The worthy Baboo, the founder of this "noble Institute" was present,—and says the Englishman "if he were only as well pleased as he appeared to be * * * why he has received the reward—which amply repays him for the trouble and expense necessary to support the School."

— The Hurkaru states, that Dr. R. H. Kennedy, who recently retired from the Bombay Medical Service, and who accompanied the Bombay division of the Army to Cabul and wrote a funny narrative of its doings which greatly delighted the Bombay Times, aspires to be one of our Honourable Masters, one of the Cabinet Council of the President of the Board of Control. He is about in short to stand for the Direction, and the Hurkaru calls upon all the Medical service to stand by him; and pronounces them not worth their salt if they do not.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 25.

— The transgression noticed by the Star, which we committed in our last number, in quoting part only of an article from his columns, without saying that it was not the whole, arose from inadvertence. We should have given the whole article, but were obliged to omit the first part of it and several other extracts when the printers came to make up the form late in the evening, in consequence of the influx of European matter brought by the Mail. We endeavoured to remember not to forget to make a distinct mention of this fact, having before our eyes the chastisement the Hurkaru had received for a similar transgression; but in the hurry of ordering the form, we forgot our duty, and nothing is now left for us but to acknowledge the justice of the Star's condemnation. Yet who that remembers the heat of that awful night, Wednesday, the 20th Instant, at 10 P. M. when even the topmost leaf of the tall Casuwarina was unmoved with a breath of air, but would forgive such a lapse of memory?

— Mr. Anthony Desouza, a respectable Portuguese merchant of Calcutta, some time since paid his respects to the Pope at Rome, and was made Count of the Holy Roman Empire and Knight of the Golden Spur. The last Mail has brought intelligence that he has received from the Portuguese Government the rank of Portuguese Consul at Calcutta. Though there has not, we believe, been a vessel with a Portuguese flag in the Port for the last twenty years, yet the appointment of a Consul may possibly be the precursor of a rich fleet of Portuguese Argosies.

— Yesterday's Star publishes some farther information regarding the Steam Navigation of the American rivers, which seems strongly to confirm the hope that if our vessels can be improved on the model of the American vessels, we shall be able to obtain greater speed, with a smaller charge for freight on our own rivers.

— The Bombay Courier gives a full account of the loss of the Memnon Steamer, and of the sufferings of the passengers and crew before they were relieved. We have placed the melancholy narrative among our extracts. It appears that the Capt. had experienced very foul weather for two days, and was quite unaware of his proximity to Cape Guardafui when the vessel rolled in upon the breakers. Our Bombay contemporary speaks of him as an officer of great merit.

— The Delhi Gazette under the head of Lahore news states, that Dewan Sawun Mull had written to Shere Singh to ask whether he should seize on that portion of the Scinde territory which bordered on his Government, and was told that such a step would be very advisable, but that he would receive his orders after the Dusserah festival. This looks strange. If the Lahore Cabinet attempts to appropriate to itself any portion of Scinde, it will of course be tantamount to a declaration of war with the English.

— The sickness at Delhi does not appear to have abated. The number of invalids in the hospital on the 15th of September was 1396!

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26.

— The Bombay Times received this morning, gives farther particulars of the loss of the Memnon Steamer, which was one of the largest, and most powerful in the Indian Navy, and cost Government eight lakhs of Rupees. It would appear as though the chief blame rested with the chief officer. The Commander had been knocked up by two days' fatigue, and had laid down to rest, giving strict orders to be waked the moment land was sighted, as the head land of Cape Guardafui was known to be near. The land was soon after plainly visible. The officer nudged the Captain without waking him, and then continued to steer for an hour and a half right in upon the shore. The Captain was not waked till the unfortunate vessel was among the breakers.

— A Correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that on the morning of the 23d of September, a daring dacoity was committed at Muneerampore, near Barrackpore. An old man who obstructed the passage was cut down, and property to the extent of 1000 Rupees taken. On the return of the thieves there was a dispute about the division of the booty, which led to the discovery of the villains, among whom it is said, there were nine sepoys of the 68th. But we have reason to believe that this latter part of the story is altogether fabulous. There has been no evidence as yet to connect any men of the 68th with the robbery.

— A pamphlet has just been published in London, by Capt. Grover, entitled, An Appeal to the British Nation on behalf of Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly, whom the writer affirms to be still in confinement at Bokhara. We fear there is very little hope of their existence; the account of their death came from more than one quarter, and was given with so many circumstantial details, that there is too much reason to believe in its correctness.

— The Bombay papers of the 13th, received yesterday in Calcutta, announced the departure of the Queen Steamer on the previous day. She arrived yesterday in Calcutta, having thus made the passage by sea round the Peninsula in nearly the same time which has been occupied by the Post in coming across the country.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27.

— The Star states, that the Civil Ball to be given to Lord Ellenborough, is to take place on the 13th, and that a fancy Ball on a grand scale is to be given at Government House on the 20th.

— A proposal has recently been submitted to the army, to the effect that no widow who, previous to her marriage with an officer has lived with him as his mistress or has led an incontinent life, shall be permitted to come upon the Military Fund for a Pension. 783 have voted against the proposition and 658 in favor of it. The proposal is therefore lost. It may be hard to exclude from the benefit of a pension, a female who has returned to the path of virtue by a lawful marriage with her paramour, but the effect of this resolution, will be to admit a host of native women to the benefit of the fund, who may go through the ceremony of a marriage with the officer under whose protection they have lived.

— The Star speaks of some probable changes in office in the Western Provinces. Col. Speirs to succeed Col. Sutherland, Mr. R. N. C. Hamilton to succeed Col. Speirs, at Gwalior, Mr. H. M. Elliott to succeed Mr. Hamilton as Secretary to Government, and Mr. Edmonstone to take Mr. Elliott's place at the Sudder Board of Revenue at Agra.

— Intelligence has just arrived that Shere Sing, the ruler of the Punjab, and all his family were murdered on the 15th Instant.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

SLAVERY IN THE KANDIAN PROVINCES.

We lately pointed out, and we trust satisfactorily, how little the local Government had done towards the abolition of Slavery within the Maritime Provinces of this Island; we will now shew, in a very few words, not only that it has done nothing towards effecting that object within the Kandian Provinces, but that laws revolting to humanity are still allowed to remain there in force.

Although the Kandian Provinces came into our possession in 1815 yet no legislative enactment in respect to Slavery was made till 1837 (nearly a quarter of a century) when an Ordinance (No. 7 of 1837) was passed, requiring all persons in charge of Slaves to earegister them; but the ancient Candian laws regarding slaves, were left untouched. What those ancient laws are will appear by the following extracts from the Notes of Sir John D'Oyly and Mr. Sawers on Kandian laws, with the perusal of which we have been favoured.

"All slaves in the Kandian Provinces are personal property, and liable to perform any service the owner may think proper to require of them."

"Slaves are personal property,—none are attached to the soil, but can be disposed of in any way the proprietor may think proper."

"The title to a Slave is established by its being proved that he or she was the issue of a woman known and acknowledged to be a slave of the claimant, or that he or she had been presented by the King from his stock of slaves or captives of a low condition (no other persons were made slaves) taken in war, or by a person selling her or himself to slavery, or by parents selling their children for slaves."

"It was the practice for a Creditor, when of superior rank, to seize and retain as his slave, his debtor or a child or children of his debtor, according to the amount of the debt; and if the debt was not discharged, or the person seized released by superior authority, the person so seized became absolutely a slave."

"A creditor of inferior caste or rank to his debtor cannot seize such debtor as a slave, nor was it allowed for persons of an inferior caste to possess slaves of superior caste; but with the above qualification no caste was exempted from being made slaves, excepting Rhodias whose vileness would render them useless as slaves."

It is true, Mr. Sawer says that slaves "are competent to acquire and possess landed and moveable property independent of their masters, and dispose of it by will or otherwise;" but with this qualification, that "a slave dying intestate, his owner becomes his heir at law, and inherits all his lands and effects."—

But we are surprized that he should say "in no part of the world is slavery in a milder form than here," when in a few pages afterwards he tells us that "a master may drive out his slave, and while the slave is in absolute destitution he may abandon him to starvation, but it would not be creditable to do so unless he had given his "master great and notorious cause of offence."

And again that "short of the deprivation of life or limb the master has the power to punish his slave, and could put him to torture, even by the red hot iron" ! ! !

That such laws as those quoted should have existed amongst a Nation in a state of semi-barbarism may not, perhaps, be very surprizing ; but it is a matter both of astonishment and regret that not only should they be tolerated so long by the English Government but expressly reserved ; for by a Proclamation dated the 31st May 1816 it is declared

"That the ancient laws of Kandy are to be administered till His Majesty's pleasure shall be known as to their adoption in toto as to all persons within those Provinces, or their partial adoption as to the Natives, and the substitution of new laws and tribunals for the trial and punishment of His Majesty's European subjects, for offences committed therein."

"Now if the Kandian Laws do extend to all, what is to prevent a European Creditor from seizing his own countryman who may be his Debtor, and making him a Slave ?

We now quit this subject for the present without further observation, but with a repetition of the hope expressed on a former occasion, that there may be found amongst our Legislators one possessing sufficient philanthropy and jealousy for his country's honour, to bring the matter forward in the present Session of the Council, in order that steps may be taken to remove so deep a stain from British rule in Ceylon.—Colombo Observer.

THE MEMNON.

A very full and interesting account of the loss of the Memnon, and of the sufferings of her crew and passengers, has been kindly handed to us for publication—it is from the pen of Lieut. Crawford of the Bombay Engineers and will serve we hope, to exonerate from unworthy imputations, the hitherto fair character of poor Powell, whose bodily and mental sufferings demand our warmest sympathy. We learn from other sources, that so long as there was danger to the crew and passengers, and in fact until they were all safely landed on the beach, Lieutenant Powell was unceasing in his exertions for the common good—but that, when he found himself no longer called upon, and had leisure to reflect upon the calamity that had befallen him, he sank under the responsibility of his situation, and the latest account of his bodily and mental sufferings are such as seriously, to alarm his many and attached friends in this Presidency. We hope sincerely that the fears on his account, to which we have alluded, are exaggerated, and that he will soon return to Bombay, when we have no doubt he will be triumphantly acquitted of all blame or censure in this most untoward affair.

We do not hesitate to say, that there is not a more efficient or deservedly popular officer in the service than Lieut. Powell—if we had any doubts upon this subject they would have been removed by the affectionate sympathy towards him which we this day witnessed. We are assured by a Commander in the Service, himself a tried and experienced Sailor, that Powell, is surpassed by no man, in the Indian Navy, in love for his profession, and close attention to its duties, and we learn from good authority, that on the night of the loss of the Memnon, he had retired to rest after two days and nights unremitting exertion, well aware of his proximity to the land, and after having given all the orders which he deemed necessary for the sailing of his ship. His experience of the Coast must be great from the fact of his having been for a long time employed in surveying it.

WRECK OF THE H. C. Steam Ship Memnon.

July 20th. 1843. Left our moorings in Bombay harbour at 4½ P. M. 22d Sunday. At noon the course was altered to the Southward instead of standing direct across against the monsoon as was at first intended. From this date to the 31st nothing particular occurred the weather and sea which were heavy on leaving harbour getting easier as we drew to the Southward.

July 31st. Off the East Coast of Africa blowing a strong gale with a heavy Sea all the morning at 4 P. M. Sea and wind went down very suddenly, supposed to be on account of our drawing in under the lee of the land. The Ship was kept away N. by E. during the night.

Tuesday—August 1st. At 4 A. M. blowing a strong gale with a heavy Sea and at 11 A. M. the tiller which was fitted on some new principle with a slide working in a transverse ground got jammed hard a starboard and could only be cleared at last by breaking up the deck over the head of the rudder and cutting away all the slide groove, &c. matters were got to rights again about 1½ P. M. during the whole of this time the ship had been rolling about almost a helpless log on the water fore top gallant yard was sent down and fore and main top masts struck. The delay occasioned by this accident in all probability was in some measure the cause of the loss of the ship that night as otherwise the high land of Guardafui would have been sighted early in the evening I do not recollect the Lat. and Long. at noon this day precisely but as well as I can remember Cape Guardafui bore N. 83 W. dist. 84 miles and a small island midway between Socotra and the Cape bore on the Chart about N. W. dist. 36 miles but we did not sight it. Ship steering west until 3 P. M. when by observation we had made 13 miles of Westing since noon. Ship was then kept away W. by N. Heavy Sea with a stiff gale all the afternoon. There seems some truth in the line that "coming events cast their shadows before" from what cause it arose I cannot say but it was remarked at dinner at 4 o'clock how dull and out of sorts we all appeared ; the Captain was completely done up, he had been on deck the best part of two days and a night and he was not in his usual spirits—went on deck after dinner. The sun set dull and waterly in a thick haze ; remained on deck until the moon set about 10 P. M. it disappeared behind a sharp bank which I thought was a cloud, the Officer of the watch said "there is the land." I observed "if that is the land it must be very high or exceedingly near ;" he went below to the Captain to report but did not rouse him and returned upon deck. I turned in and had been in bed about an hour when I was roused by hearing him again come below and reporting to the Captain in a hurried tone that the ship was close ashore. I turned out and commenced dressing immediately ; heard the Captain who had got on deck give some hurried orders and turn the hands up : I roused the other passengers and went on deck and on looking over the lee side found the ship in the midst of a boiling mass of breakers the high land of Guardafui distant about 8 miles on the larboard quarter. I had just time to make these observations when a heavy sea struck us and the Ship went on shore with a tremendous crash broadside on. The Engines were instantly shattered, her back broken, and the engine room swamped. The ship then fell over on her starboard side which was then to windward and the deck thus became fully exposed to every sea that struck us—The lee fore rigging which was taught from the laying over of the ship was cut and the foremast immediately went over to windward the same was done with the main mast but it was a beautiful spar and would not go until the body of the mast had been cut into about 8 inches, it then went carrying with it the starboard cutter and the funnel followed immediately afterwards—The ship then forged rather nearer the shore. Mr. Leeds and a few hands lowered away the larboard cutter but the line they carried paid out so fast that it was lost and with it that hope of establishing a communication with the shore, the boat and party however landed under the lee of the ship all safe. The seas now came sweeping over us ! bitterly cold, the ship rolling and striking so heavily that it was hardly possible to keep our legs, little could be done but wait patiently for daylight. All kit that could be got at such as beds, trunks, &c. were thrown overboard for the chance of their being washed on shore ; we got blankets and clothes on deck and made ourselves as comfortable as possible under the lee of the companion, and about 1 A. M. got up a bottle of Port wine which put a little life in us.

Wednesday 2nd.—About 3 A. M. She began to give very unpleasant signs of breaking up, the frame work was evidently loosening, as during her heavy lurches instead of rolling altogether we felt her bending and twisting and the deck planks were opening and closing under us. At daybreak commenced endeavours to establish a communication with the party on shore and after failing to do so by means of a rocket and kite succeeded in veering a line ashore made fast to a spar which the party there got hold of, a hawser was soon stretched and communication established by hauling the cutter to and fro, under the lee of the Ship. Passengers, idlers and sick were first despatched as much provision as could be got at (about 12 days biscuit) some preserved meats with arms and ammunition also sent off. About midday the cutter was unfortunately stove in but the people on shore managed to patch her up so that with constant baling she managed two more trips and brought off the last of the Crew and Captain.

We now found ourselves on a desert shore without a drop of water but at night some small quantity was brought in by the Somalies which they sold at the moderate price of 2 Rupees per skin rather expensive work for 160 mouths. From this until Friday 4th we took up our quarters on the sand under a hurricane house composed of planking from the wreck. At 11 A. M. on the 4th the whole party with the exception of the Capt. 1st Lieut. and a few men marched for a watering place about 7 miles distant the route lay over a plain of burning sand and the sufferings of the whole party from thirst were very great ; a large portion of the men fell before reaching the water and one died of apoplexy—water was sent back to those who had dropped and about 3 P. M. the whole had come up. In the evening the Capt. came with all the remaining sick that could be landed, on the Camels which had been procured from the Somalies—It was determined that no more day marches should be attempted.

Saturday 5th.—Marched at sunset to a watering place or road to Hulloolah 7 miles dist. Found water by digging holes in the nullah but it had a strong alkaline taste.

Sunday 6th.—In the morning found the place to be infested with hornets with whom we had to fight for the water : about 12 o'clock the Shurreef of Hulloolah came into Camp and recommended us instead of marching on to Hulloolah which we should find very distressing to march again down to the Coast to a place not above 7 miles distant from the wreck where he had boats all ready to take us on to Hulloolah with plenty of water—from Hulloolah, he would provide us with buggalas to carry the whole party to Aden—He would ask no price for his services but trusted to the English Government for remuneration this of course was eagerly closed with. In the evening we marched to the beach to a spot called Bunder Lug and found one small boat of about 20 tons and four small fishing boats but not a drop of water.

Monday 7th.—Found ourselves regularly taken in a trap, nothing could be done until one way or another the Shurreef had got 800 rupees out of us, nearly our whole stock of Cash—In this way he kept us under a burning sun without a drop of water until 3 o'clock P. M. when he allowed us to go on board the boats which we had to wade to, and then sit like herrings in a barrel for 24 hours in our wet clothes.

Tuesday 8th, at 3 P. M. we came to an anchor at a watering place called Boa about 7 miles from Hulloolah, where the Nacoodah of the boat advised us to make our Camp, but the Shurreef much wanted to get us to the Town, however, we had had enough of his advice, and refused to have any thing to do with him and lucky it was for us. The water has to be brought to the town from some distance, and had he got us there he would have made us pay finely for it.—On coming to an Anchor we had to swim ashore through the surf. Our encamping ground was a beach of fine white sand which made a most comfortable bed, plenty of water to be had by scooping out the sand about 2 feet deep with your hands, we slept every night in the open air, and were always soaking wet through in the morning, but from low living and having no liquor whatever we all kept our healths, there was not even a cold amongst the whole of us. Our daily allowance was at first half a handful of biscuits and two handfuls of dates ; when the biscuit fell short we had to take to Jowaary ; rather bitter fare at first with a little too much sand but we soon got used to it. Our life was pretty much the same now, day after day during the heat we stretched a blanket to protect ourselves from the sun and in the morning and evening we bathed and caught crabs, the crew being employed in cutting boards and stockading the camp. Saturday 12th.—A Brig passed within sight standing to the Westward ; she was some 12 or 14 miles distance, we could see down to her fore yard but could not communicate with her. The Shurreef and rascals about him kept us feeding from hand to mouth, and it was with the greatest difficulty that any provisions whatever were procured, in my opinion there was too much of the lenient system of dealing, we might have done what we pleased and made our own terms—however, we only had to obey orders—but every town and boat on the coast was at our mercy had we resorted to force, and this before long it must have come to, but a day of reckoning will yet come I hope with the Shurreef.

On the 16th—Rubeah ben Sallem an Arab Merchant at Fetuk came into Camp, and changed the face of affairs by offering to supply every thing that was required, on credit ; orders were therefore given to him to complete a month's supply for the whole party—Some days previous to this, after a long discussion, an arrangement had been made with the Nacoodah of the boat we came to Hulloolah in, to take a party to Aden, to obtain assistance, this after some time he agreed to do for 300 dollars to be paid on reaching Aden. On the morning of the 17th at 8 A. M. a party consisting of Lieut. Balfour, Mr. Stradling and three seamen of the Memnon with myself and four other passengers embarked on board her and up sail, cleuch, the Earl of Harrowby, Lord Francis Egerton, the Hon. Sidney Herbert, Mr. Abel Smith, and Mr. Holford, 500*l.* each. There are also two contributors of 300*l.* each; nine, of 250*l.* each; twenty-eight, of 200*l.* each; and 115, of 100*l.* each. No doubt is entertained that at least 50.000*l.* will be raised;—the total will probably far exceed that sum.—Record.

ANTI-PUSEYITE MEETING.—Lord Ashley presided over a very large meeting on the 19th, called for the purpose of preparing a memorial for presentation to his Grace the Duke of Wellington, Chancellor of the University of Oxford, directing the noble Duke's attention to the fearfully rapid spread of heretical opinions in that seat of learning, and praying that his Grace would use his influence in counteracting their dangerous tendencies. The meeting was composed exclusively of laymen, and is expected to be the first of a series. The noble chairman, in opening the proceedings, spoke at some length on the critical position in which the Established Church of England had been placed by the spread of the pestilential doctrines of Tractarianism, and urged upon the meeting the necessity of adopting immediate measures for their suppression. Several gentlemen addressed the meeting, when a memorial to the Duke of Wellington was unanimously agreed to, and will be presented in the course of a few days. The Protestant Association has also prepared a memorial to the right rev. the primate and the prelates of the Church; it has already been numerously signed.—London Mail.

THE FREE CHURCH.—The following are the professors appointed to the College of the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland—the Rev. Dr. Chalmers, principal; Rev. Dr. Walsh, Rev. Dr. Cunningham, and Rev. Dr. Duncan.

RECEPTION OF THE REV. J. W. C. PENNINGTON (A COLOURED MINISTER, AND PASTOR OF THE COLOURED CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AT HARTFORD, IN CONNECTICUT U.S., ON HIS VISIT TO ENGLAND), AT SURREY CHAPEL.

To the Editor of the Patriot.

SIR,—The kind remarks contained in a former Number of the Patriot, in reference to the coloured preacher from America, the Rev. J. Pennington, induce the friends connected with Surrey Chapel to request your publication of the following information, which they doubt not will be interesting to many of your readers. On the first Sabbath in June, Mr. Pennington assisted the esteemed pastor of Surrey Chapel in distributing the elements of the Saviour's dying love to the numerous members of the church. On the following evening he met the church, and delivered to them a simple but scriptural and earnest address. In the course of his remarks, he stated that he had enjoyed a privilege in England which would not be granted to him in his own country; he had worshipped in the Christian sanctuary, and had united with the white man at the table of the Lord, without being the marked and despised brother. "In America," he added, "if I were disposed to do so, I could go either to the Roman Catholic or Socinian places of worship, and be kindly received; but I could not go either to the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregational, or Baptist churches, without being reminded that I was the coloured man, and therefore not permitted to enjoy the privilege of worshipping God with them as I have done with you." This statement produced in the minds of hundreds a tender and sympathising spirit, and earnest prayer was offered up, that the time might soon come to pass, when this blot might be removed from the fair name of the American Christians, and that their practice to the coloured man might not continue to be at variance with the very charter of their independence.

The esteemed pastor of Surrey Chapel, anxious to show his American brethren "a more excellent way," invited Mr. Pennington to his pulpit; and on the morning of the second Sabbath in June, he preached an admirable sermon to a large and attentive audience, from "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." The scene was a truly interesting one, and much good was doubtless done. This service has been followed by another, equally, if not even more interesting. The members of the church invited Mr. Pennington to a large meeting for tea on the first Monday in July. Nearly 500 assembled on the occasion. The esteemed pastor presided, and appeared to be "in the crown of his glory," when in the midst of his people, with the black preacher on his right hand. After tea, suitable hymns were sung, and prayer offered up to the Lord. The Chairman and Mr. Pennington addressed the members of the church, the latter assuring the friends that he spoke to them under "the power of embarrassment" produced by their great kindness. The Religious Tract Society's Commentary from Henry and Scott, and the valuable Commentaries on Ezekiel, Hosea, the Philippians, Colossians, James, First of Peter, and Jude, edited by the Chairman, all elegantly bound, were publicly presented to Mr. Pennington, in the name of the pastor, elders, and members of Surrey Chapel. A letter to him was then read, and resolutions passed; suitable addresses being delivered by the elders and other members of the church. After the meeting, upwards of 600 names were appended to the letter.—Pat.

ANGLO-GALLICAN CHURCH IN PARIS.—A meeting to promote the above object was held at the National School-rooms on Monday, July 17, the Rev. T. Brock in the chair. The following members of the clergy were also present:—The Revds. R. Potenger, William Guille, E. G Carr, C. C. Mulloy, and Edward Guille.—The Rev. F. B. Gourrier said, the object in which he was engaged was, the building of a church in Paris for the celebration of the Church services in the French language. There never had been a Church of this kind; and the only place at present was a small oratoire in his own residence, where he celebrated Divine worship in French when he was in Paris. This church was destined for the use of the Anglo-Gallicans, by which term were designated the offspring of intermarriages between English and French parents, where one of the parents being of the Anglican Church, the children are educated in those principles; but as they grow up, and reside in the country as Frenchmen, they are exposed to fall away from their principles, and their children after them, from there being no service of the Church in French, by attending which they would be kept in communion with the Church of England. Those who were acquainted with France knew how numerous those intermarriages had been during nearly thirty years' intercourse, which, by the blessing of peace being continued, had been going on between the two countries. The Rev. gentleman entered into the details of the particular classes to be benefited by such an institution. Wherever there is any machinery or mining, or manufactory of any kind, there English engineers and workmen are found directing them. Even agriculturists had of late been invited to go over and settle. It had been said by men of extreme views, which unhappily were held by some in our own Church at the present day, that we ought not to build this church in France, because there existed already a branch of the Church Catholic in that country. So, then, said the speaker, we are to neglect and abandon our own people, because, in plain terms, there is the Romish Church existing in France! If our Anglicans in France, said he, can no longer worship in the English language, we are bound to afford them the means of worshipping in the French, so as thereby to keep them in connexion with their own bishops; and this is what we are now occupied in doing, seeing there is not, unhappily, any Gallican Church with which the prelates of our Church are in communion. Some persons are astonished we should want to establish a French service in Paris, and ask, "Is not the Protestant Church there like our own? Is it not Episcopal?" The Rev. gentleman then described briefly the Eglise Réformée, as founded on the Presbyterian, or rather the Independent model—each separate congregation or church being composed of laymen, and all the pastors on an equality. They have, therefore, no superiors to maintain ecclesiastical discipline—no primitive liturgy; articles of faith are not, as with us, used as a test of doctrine, but each pasteur teaches what he pleases, so that the baneful heresy of Socinianism is become very prevalent. But some may ask, Are there not men who have come out both in France and Switzerland, who preach the Gospel faithfully, and are not Socinians? We are not called upon to judge individuals: but this separation has originated the most wild dissent; has fostered, for instance, the "Plymouth Brethren"—gives encouragement to the theory of separating Church and State, which their newspapers uphold—and nurtures a violent hatred against our Church. The Rev. gentleman, in conclusion, appealed to them as Churchmen; if the building of this church was to be promoted by any place in particular, he thought it might be from this island, which had been so privileged and blessed. More than a third of the amount required had been already raised, and, under God's favour, they would proceed to its accomplishment.—The Rev. Chairman, in taking a cursory view of the state of religion in France, said, that not only was one church required in Paris, but many. It had been objected by some persons that Tractarianism was at the bottom of the plan which they were met to support; but he had made a careful examination of the matter, and he was perfectly satisfied that it was altogether free from that detestable heresy, which was nothing less than Romanism in disguise. If this had been a Tractarian project, the church would long ago have been built and endowed.—Guernsey Star.

MONEY MARKET. CITY, THURSDAY, AUGUST 3D. TWELVE O'CLOCK.—The commercial advices from the East Indies are generally acknowledged to possess more grounds for satisfaction than any for some months past; for although in some departments of trade there is cause for despondency, still, the activity existing in other branches more than counterbalances the evil. War was at an end throughout the Eastern territories, and once again both European and native traders pursued their occupations with alacrity. Trade in China was brisk, with a good demand for all manufactured goods, whilst there were none in the market. This circumstance will produce activity here; but it should be borne in mind, and allowed for by those who take advantage of this prospect of increased business, that the merchants at the several Presidencies will have availed themselves of the opening for the absorption of superfluous stock, the market for which may with them be dull.

Favourable as are the accounts from the East, politically as well as commercially, they have not had any effect upon the Market for our home Securities; or if it has, the operations of several leading brokers for the fall has completely neutralized it. Instead of advancing in value, yesterday the price of Consols declined, consequent upon the sales referred to, and are the same this morning, the Money and Account price being marked $93\frac{5}{8}$ to $93\frac{3}{4}$; Reduced 3 per Cents., $94\frac{5}{8}$ to $94\frac{7}{8}$; ditto $3\frac{1}{2}$ per Cents., $102\frac{1}{8}$ to $102\frac{1}{4}$; New $3\frac{1}{2}$ per Cents., $101\frac{1}{4}$ to $101\frac{3}{8}$; Bank Stock, $180\frac{1}{2}$ to $181\frac{1}{2}$; and Exchequer Bills, 55s. to 57s. prem.

Notwithstanding the adverse state of affairs throughout Spain against Espartero, there are indications of a re-action towards his resumption of the reins of Government, if he should not, in the mean time, be persuaded by Van Halen to accede to the commands of the New Government, respecting his abdication. Report affirms, that the Exaltados and Moderados are on the eve of a quarrel. Nothing is more likely—three parties are at loggerheads in Spain—two of which have together overturned the old Government, but who will now most assuredly fight amongst themselves for the supremacy. The unsuccessful party will then side, most likely, with Espartero, and thus a perfectly different order of things will take place again. But all will depend upon the concessions the strongest will make to their assistant revolutionists. The state of affairs at the present time, instead of producing heaviness in the Spanish Market, which, judging from the doubtful payment of the next half-year's dividend upon the 3 per Cent. Stock might naturally be supposed to create, has, nevertheless, been productive of no effect whatever.—Pat.

WELLS CATHEDRAL.—The Dean and Chapter of Wells have just concluded arrangements for the immediate and thorough repair of this beautiful edifice at an expense of about 70,000*l.*

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND has been appointed Constable of the Castle of Launceston in the County of Cornwall.—Ibid.

A curious rumour is current of a misunderstanding between the Duke of Wellington and the King of Hanover. The foundation on which it rests is the apparently studied avoidance of each other's company by both these illustrious personages. The King, it is observed, was not present at the Waterloo banquet, though it has usually been the custom to invite Royal visitants; and this absence was the more marked as Prince Albert was one of the guests. But it was said that the Duke would give a grand dinner to his Majesty, and that was fixed for Saturday. On the previous afternoon the King stumbled over a pebble, and was too indisposed to attend the banquet at Apsley-house. Another occasion presented itself for meeting. A banquet was given to the King on Wednesday in the Temple. The Duke also was invited. His Majesty was sufficiently well to attend, but the Duke was prevented from coming by "public business," though the House of Peers did not sit that evening. Lastly, the Duke gave the grandest fête of the year on Thursday, at which all the rank of England was congregated, and every distinguished visitor to England was present, with the sole exception of the King of Hanover, who passed the evening at Kew.—London Mail.

ACTS OF THE SESSION.—The Session is now nearly at an end. The House of Commons continues to sit by the permission of those few Members still in attendance, who forbear to count out the House. As for the House of Lords, so long as half a dozen Peers can be kept together, that branch of the Legislature can do as much good or as much evil, as though every coroneted noodle in the land were in his place.

What have they done? What will be the result of the labours of the Session? The same questions were put at the end of the Parliamentary Session last year. A Member then declared, that they had done nothing for the relief of the people, and that the distress in the manufacturing districts was such, that riot and insurrection would inevitably break forth, if the Ministry did not take advantage of the last few days of the sittings of the House, to pass some measure that might afford a prospect of alleviating the evils. The Ministry laughed at him, and honourable Members hurried to the Moors, without caring what might become of the people, so long as grouse proved plentiful. Parliament had scarcely risen, when the prediction was fulfilled, and the Government were obliged to send down troops and artillery to silence the complaints of a famishing population. If such was the case last year,—if the cause of the outbreaks which then took place was the unwillingness of the work-people to submit to a reduction in their wages of 6d. per day,—what can be expected now, when the same classes of men are thrown entirely out of work by the bankruptcy of their employers? Such are the results of the second year of the Tory Administration. Sir Robert Peel's Government has placed us in a much more disastrous situation than we were in last year. Another twelvemonth of the same misrule will ruin us entirely.

After the sad experience of the Recess, a Minister of common sense and common humanity would have opened the Session with the immediate proposal of some measures which might have had the effect of mitigating the existing distress, and a tendency eventually to restore a prosperous state of affairs. But what do our Ministers care about the people? The solicitude of our Chancellor of the Exchequer was engrossed with the jobbers of the Stock Exchange, with the distress of swindlers and money-lenders; with the necessity of relieving which, his sensitive mind was so deeply impressed, that his very first act, notwithstanding the frightful state of the Revenue, was to smuggle through a Bill of Indemnity for the accessories after the fact in the affair of the Exchequer Bills Forgery; involving a premium on incaution, if not something worse, amounting to more than a quarter of a million, although, at the same time, he admitted that the parties had no legal claim, nor any means of enforcing their pretended rights. Such was the opinion entertained of this affair by the honest members of the Stock Exchange, that nobody could be induced to take the Bills created in exchange for the forged Bills; and one of the holders was obliged to apply to Mr. Goulburn, for his assurance that interest should be paid upon them at the usual rate. To crown all, Mr. Goulburn engaged to prosecute inquiry into the proceeds of the forged bills, in order to recover a part, and to report to the House the result of his inquiries. That promise, however, has never been redeemed, and to this moment not one Member has claimed the redemption of the pledge. Altogether, this is the most disgraceful,—nay, worse, the most dishonest transaction in which a Chancellor of the Exchequer ever took part. And this is the man who had the face the other day to oppose the Danish Claims, the justice of which has been more than once acknowledged, and to refuse to indemnify parties for losses by which the British Government had profited. This, too, is the man, who, a few days later, declared, that the state of the Revenue would not permit him to remit the duty on Wool, however desirable for the preservation of that great staple, although that duty yields something under 100,000*l.* England can no longer submit to be governed in this fashion, and by such men. This is our firm conviction, and we openly declare it. Not one measure of the least advantage to the people has been proposed from the beginning to the end of the Session. Every measure passed or proposed, has been calculated to strengthen the oligarchy and to enfeeble the people.—Pat.

THE NATIONAL CHURCHES BEFORE PARLIAMENT.—The only proceedings in the House of Lords, this week, of any interest, arose out of the presentation, on Monday, by Earl Fortescue, of a Petition from Lord Oranmore, in favour of a redistribution of the Church property of Ireland, and its application to "the support of the Protestant, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic religions, in proportion to their numbers." The noble Earl said, he by no means desired the spread or increase of the Roman Catholic religion, but he thought it essential to the peace and contentment of the country, that some legal and established provision should be made for the Roman Catholic Priesthood; and he could not, on the best consideration, find any means by which that provision should be made, so much in conformity with the ordinary rules of common justice and common sense, as by appropriating to their use a portion of those funds originally given for the religion of all.

The Duke of Wellington, in a firm and more than usually audible tone, warned their Lordships, that the prayer of the Petition went to neither more nor less than the important question, whether they were to repeal or to maintain the laws by which the Reformation has been established in this United Kingdom. (Loud cheers.)

The Earl of Wicklow expressed his surprise, that the noble Earl should have declared his concurrence in the prayer of a Petition which went to the subversion of the Established Church, the destruction of the Reformation in Ireland. ("Ay, in the United Kingdom," interjected the Duke of Wellington.) Yet, while strongly deprecating the proposal to touch the Church property, he (Earl Wicklow) was most anxious, with the noble Earl, to see a provision made for the Roman Catholic Priesthood and Hierarchy; and whenever the Government came forward with a proper provision, he should be prepared to consider it.

Lord Brougham expressed his entire concurrence in this opinion, though he affirmed it was a mere delusion, to represent the Irish Church as any grievance or burden to the peasantry of Ireland; and he concluded some rambling and scarcely coherent observations, with absurdly denying, that the Regium Donum endowment of the Irish Presbyterian Church could not be called a State provision.

The Marques of Clanricarde entirely agreed in the proposal to pay the Catholic Clergy in Ireland, but could not consent to take from the Established Church for that purpose. The subject was then dropped.

On Tuesday, the Royal Assent was given, by Commission, to another batch of Bills, private and public. The House then adjourned till this day.—Ibid.

The House of Commons were occupied, on Monday, with a discussion of the Church of Scotland Benefices Bill, on the motion for the second reading. Sir James Graham entered into a long statement of the grounds and reasons for the Bill, which he described as a healing measure; and he concluded with expressing his confident hope, that the Church of Scotland, as established by law, would continue to be the honour, blessing, comfort, and pride of the people of that country. "Its elements were still unchanged. It was as the bush that remained unconsumed in the midst of the fire." The right honourable Baronet is very fond of Scriptural similes, but not very happy in the application of them. If the Church of Scotland has been in affliction, the Egyptians by whom that Church has been oppressed, must be taken to be the Civil Government; and Sir James will come in for his share of the blame. But, if the fire has not consumed the bush, it has divided it; and pretty considerable part of it has walked out of the fire; a circumstance which sadly mars the analogy.

Mr. Wallace said, the introduction of the Bill was an affront to the people of Scotland. If it passed, a great many more would leave the Establishment, and cleave to the Free Church. He should, for one, feel it his duty to do so. In this Bill, the rights of the people were only declared, while the rights and powers of the Clergy were exacted out and out. The Bill was, in fact, designed less to prevent disruption in the Church of Scotland, than disruption in the Administration ("Oh!") He moved, as an amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. Hume having seconded the amendment, Mr. B. Cochrane rose to make a speech, which deserves notice only as displaying a degree of religious ignorance, bigotry, and intolerance, extraordinary even in the present day. We find a considerable variation in the reports, but he appears, in substance, to have expressed his opinion, that, when the Act of Union with Scotland was passed Church-of-Englandism ought to have been imposed upon that country; and he referred to the present state of Ireland, as proving the disadvantage of there being different forms of religious worship under one Crown! He would have put down Presbyterianism in Scotland, the growth of which had always been accompanied, he said, by fanaticism and cant, and suppressed Popery in Ireland. "If men suffered for conscience' sake," said this exquisite young Puseyite, "why let their conscience be their reward." But as to the Seceders of the Free Church, "their conduct excited in his mind no other feeling than disgust and regret that the law was not powerful enough to punish them. In the midst of all this anarchy, it was one great consolation, however, that the Protestant Church was daily gaining fresh disciples in Scotland;—the Scotch would now, probably, cleave to Protestantism (meaning Puseyism), and forsake a Church in which, from its first foundation, there had only been anarchy and confusion, and which had always been opposed to the constituted authorities of the State."

Mr. Rutherford then rose and delivered a very powerful speech against the Bill. The Times characterizes the Speech of the honourable and learned gentleman as a compound of the Erastianism of Lords Brougham and Cottenham with the Prebyterian Hildebrandism of the Marques of Breadalbane; but judiciously concocted, and having infused into it a considerable portion of vigour and ability. The plain English of this is, that the Ex-Solicitor of Scotland said, they (the Government) were taking certain rights and powers out of the hands of the Patrons, and were about to give them to the Priesthood,—to that body which, by common consent, was declared to be the very worst depository in which it could be placed. (Cheers.) Milton had well said, that "Presbyter was but old priest writ large." Ministers were acting blindly, if they thought to make the Residuary Church more popular by such a Bill: on the contrary, it would deprive it of the small share of affection it yet possessed, and hasten a still larger secession.

The Solicitor-General defended the Bill as necessary to remove doubts, and as having the approval of the General Assembly. Lord John Russell strongly opposed it, as overturning the judgment of the highest appellate jurisdiction in the Kingdom, by the decision of a political majority; he supposed, by way of compliment to the noble Earl at the head of foreign affairs, and as a testimony to the admirable manner in which he had conducted those affairs. (Ironical cheers.) Sir George Clerk spoke in favour of the Bill. Mr. Fox Maule, as one of the Seceders, who had quitted the Church with regret, viewed the Bill with indifference: it would lead only to further secessions. Mr. Campbell opposed the measure as grossly Erastian, and as unworthy of a conservative Government. Sir Robert Peel endeavoured to repel the several objections brought against it, and expressed his belief that it would be acceptable to a large portion of the Church of Scotland. The House then divided—For the second reading, 98; against it, 80; majority, 18. A very small majority for a strong Government! After disposing of some other business, the House adjourned at a quarter to two till noon the next day.

On Tuesday, accordingly, the Speaker took the chair at twelve o'clock, and some routine business was disposed of. At five, the House resumed, and a debate of some importance took place upon Lord John Manner's motion to repeal the law of Mortmain, avowedly with a view to favour the re-establishment of religious houses. Such a proposal is quite in character with the ultra-Puseyite principles of this well-meaning, though not very strong-minded young nobleman; but who would have expected to find Mr. Charles Buller supporting it? Sir James Graham called upon the House to reject the motion, as the more dangerous on account of the opinions avowed by the noble mover. Sir Robert Inglis could not go all the way with the Resolution proposed by the noble Lord, but was not wholly opposed to it; he would, however, make no relaxation of the law in favour of Roman Catholics and Dissenters. The Church to which the Queen had sworn to adhere, was never to be confounded with the 500 various sects which existed in this country, and which were registered at quarter sessions, and recorded in every dictionary. Such is the twaddle this worthy representative of the English Bo-nares habitually deals forth, when any subject connected with "the Church" is started. Mr. Bernal urged upon Lord John Manners not to press his motion to a division; and it was ultimately withdrawn.

Mr. Ward then brought forward his motion for an Address to the Queen, affirming the Irish Church Establishment to be among the most prominent grievances of the Irish people, and pledging the House to co-operate with Her Majesty in effecting such a settlement of Church property in Ireland as will remove all just ground of complaint. The honourable Member proposed boldly to break up the existing Establishment of Protestant Archbishops and Bishops, to legalize the titles of the Roman Catholic Bishops, and, in fact, to endow and establish Popery in Ireland, as being, in fact, "the elder type of our own religion." To the Protestant Episcopalians, he would give, out of the Church property, about 78,000*l.* a-year; to the Presbyterians and the Wesleyans each a similar amount; and the remaining 400,000*l.* a year he proposed to devote to the Catholics.

Mr. Carew seconded the motion. Lord Eliot opposed it in a speech very strong and decided, so far as the advocate spoliation of the Irish Church was concerned, but which cautiously evaded the question, whether it be practicable or not, to make a provision for the Roman Catholic Clergy. When he concluded, the debate was adjourned.

Yesterday, Mr. TRELAWNEY opened the resumed debate with a sensible and straightforward speech, in which he deprecated the principle of a Church Establishment as unjust towards those who, dissenting from it, were compelled to contribute to the propagation of principles they disallowed; and he contended, that the abolition of the Established Church could alone avert a civil war in Ireland. Sir Robert Inglis spoke at great length in defence of the Irish Church Establishment; and remarked, that "it certainly did look singular, that Mr. Ward, himself a member of the Established Church, should be anxious to strip her naked, so as not to leave a rag to cover her, and, in that state, placing a halter round her neck, should put one end of it into the hands of her enemies." Lord Listowel supported the motion; affirming, that the Protestant Church was forced upon the Catholic people of Ireland, and that this was at the root of all the heart-burnings in that country. Lord Bernard contended, that the Church now established in Ireland is the Church of the ancient Irish people, and entered into historical statements to show, that the Reformation had received the assent of the chiefs and laity in the time of Henry VIII. Mr. B. Cochrane made a violent and foolish speech, in the course of which he lectured the Government on its want of firmness and decision. Mr. V. Stuart spoke in favour of the motion; and said, the Church question was an affair, not of religion, but of money. Mr. Hardy followed, and had made some way in a long harangue, when it was unluckily observed, that forty members were not present, and the House was adjourned!—Pat.

WHAT IS THOUGHT OF MR. WARD'S MOTION IN IRELAND.—We have received the following communication from a friend in Ireland, whose means and opportunities of acquiring information are more than ordinarily good, and in whose freedom from partiality and prejudice, and from every sentiment except that of desiring the welfare of his adopted country, we have the fullest confidence:—

"The turn which the debate on Irish affairs has taken in the House, has naturally excited the alarm of the friends of the Church of England on this side of the water. The impression is gaining ground, that this monstrous injustice cannot be permitted to exist much longer. But those who talk of endowing the Clergy of the Romish Church, as a measure which will put down agitation, and silence the outcry for Repeal, are totally ignorant of the state of things here. However such a measure might 'soothe the pride' of the Irish, it will not reduce exorbitant rents, find employment, or give food to the poor. We have the best reason for knowing, that a very large number of the Clergy would accept such a provision, and be glad of such an arrangement; as it would give them that social status which they do not now possess, and the want of which they feel. But the people would not let them take it. Much as the people are under the power of the priests in spiritual things, yet, in some matters, the people are the priests' masters. The priests are now heading on the Repeal cry, because they are forced to do so, or else lose their influence. At heart, they are no lovers of freedom: how can they be, when they so strenuously require passive obedience on the most important of all questions, and where personal freedom is most necessary, and personal responsibility most obvious? Most Romanists, out of Ireland, are rather high Tories; and we have met with Romish priests who refused, on every public question, political or ecclesiastical, to act with the Liberal party, and generally united with their opponents! No, as many of the more intelligent have said to us: 'If they were paid by the State, they would not come to us when sick or dying, at all hours and in all weathers, as they do now.' Of course, there are exceptions to this general statement; as there are many in so large a body, who make their duties a matter of conscience.

"An excellent man, a friar, said to us, not long since: 'Why, Sir, in all alliances of the State with the Church, both have been injured;—the State has neither corrupted the Church, or the Church has enslaved the State.' And again, in another part of our conversation, he observed: 'Had you Protestants, instead of relying on an arm of flesh, put your trust in the God of truth, you would not now be in the position you are.' To be sure not. It is high time for Dissenters to understand this, and to seek the overthrow of such souldestroying systems, as a duty they owe to Christ and to perishing men. We have one grand evil established here. We must not have two. Let us remove the existing one, and we may then fairly grapple with the Man of Sin."—Pat.

On the 27th, the Hibernia arrived at Liverpool after the shortest passage ever made from port to port between the United States and Great Britain, the voyage from Boston having been completed in eleven days, and from Halifax in nine days only.

We learn from the Schoharie (New York) Patriot, that a mad dog recently bit several individuals in that vicinity, and some of them soon after evinced symptoms of the disease. File copper was speedily administered—about one-third of a dose given at intermissions of eight hours. This was repeated from time to time. The effect is, that the patients are evidently recovering. The dog bit several brutes, and a cow, a hog, and three dogs have died of the disease. The remedy, copper alone, has proved a complete antidote in other cases of this terrible disease.—London Mail.

DEPARTURE OF THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR. —In our last Number, we terminated our reflections on the means of reviving the Iron-trade, by saying, were a man of sense and resolution now at the head of affairs, he would instantly send for Count St. Aulaire, and would tell him to go forthwith, and report to his Royal master (the fourth he has obsequiously served), that if, within fifteen days, the French Government should not have taken the necessary measures for repealing the Iron duty in particular, with all other duties (varying from 30 to 1,500 per cent. ad valorem) on English produce, the British Government would regard the refusal as a declaration of commercial war, and would call Parliament together to impose an indiscriminate duty of 1,000 per cent. ad valorem on the whole produce of France.

The papers of this morning announce, that "the French Ambassador and the Countess de St. Aulaire left Manchester-house yesterday afternoon, and proceeded by the four o'clock train to Folkstone, and thence they proceed to Dover, to embark for France." Now, we are not quite bold enough to affirm, that our advice has been taken, or even that the departure of the French Ambassador is a proof of Lord Aberdeen's attention having been at last attracted by the state of affairs in Spain to the intrigues of France. We hope, however, that Sir Robert Peel will not be so negligent of his duty, as to lose so favourable an opportunity of acquainting the French Government, that no Ambassador from Paris will be received at this Court, who shall not bring with him formal assurances of his Master's readiness to conclude a Commercial Treaty upon an equitable basis.—Pat.

FRANCE.—The Moniteur publishes a Royal ordinance, promoting the Prince of Joinville to the rank of Rear-Admiral. This ordinance is followed by the Marriage Act of the Prince with the Princess of Brazils, which was signed on the 31st ult. in the Palace of Neuilly, in presence of the Royal family, Marshal Soult, M. Guizot, the Minister of Brazils, Baron Pasquier (Chancellor of France), and the Duke De Cazes (Grand Referendary of the Chamber of Peers), acting as the civil officers.

The Journal des Débats states, that the Princess of Brazils brought to her husband for her dower—1st., 1,000,000f. in specie; 2nd, a revenue of 180,000f. arising from Brazilian 6 per Cent. Stock; 3rd, twenty-five leagues of territory in the province of Santa Catharina, at the choice of the Prince; 4th, the Princess possesses in her own right a yearly income of 26,000f., together with diamonds and jewels to an amount of 200,000f.; 5th, the Emperor of Brazils made a present to his sister of 300,000f. for her outfit. Besides these, "the right of succession to the throne of Brazils is expressly reserved to the Princess de Joinville. She is to become Empress of Brazils to the exclusion even of her eldest sister, the Queen of Portugal, if the Emperor Don Pedro II., and the Princess Januria, the presumptive heiress of the throne, die without issue. This clause has been inserted in the marriage act of the Princess.—Ibid.

SPAIN.—The Regent and Van Halen were on the 21st before Seville, bombarding that city. A suburb had been almost entirely destroyed. It was reported in Paris on Tuesday, that the Regent continued to bombard Seville on the 22nd ult. and that on the morning of the 23rd, the people having sent out a deputation to request him to cease firing, a capitulation was concluded, by an article of which an extraordinary contribution of two or three millions of francs was to be levied on the city. In Paris the universal impression was, that within a very brief space of time the Exaltados and Moderados will quarrel. Of the movements or intentions of the Carlist party, neither journals nor letters contain any information.

The news of the bombardment of Seville has produced a great sensation at Madrid. The Government has taken extraordinary measures to oppose Espartero, who has at present assembled an army of from 7,000 to 8,000 men. Three divisions have been directed upon Andalusia. On the 22nd there was a great discouragement among the inhabitants, of whom a considerable number had escaped from the town. During the 21st and the 22nd, the town was cannonaded. General Concha, who has not more than 3,000 men, dares not oppose the operations of the Regent.

The Eco de Arragon of the 26th states, that General Carratala, who had left Cadiz with 3,000 infantry, 300 cavalry, and 2,000 militia mobilized at Xeres de la Frontera, had effected his junction with General Van Halen. The Juntas of Malaga, Granada, Alicant, and Castellon de la Plana, had refused to recognise the Christino generals.

In a circular addressed by the new Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs to the members of the corps diplomatique, it is stated that "the government of the Queen has deemed it expedient to direct its attention to the relations which her Majesty is anxious to maintain with the monarchs her friends and allies. The government will accordingly exert itself to draw closer with all those sovereigns political and commercial ties compatible with the welfare and interests of its own Spain and the Spanish people, and will neglect nothing to procure for foreigners that protection and consideration which are assured to them by the national character, and all the guarantees they enjoy in virtue of treaties and special laws."

On the 24th, General Narvaez, with all his staff and the ministers, had proceeded to the Palace, and were admitted to the honour of kissing the young Queen's hand. In the evening, her Majesty drove out amidst marks of great enthusiasm from the population, all evidently delighted at being relieved from their late anxiety.

It was with Aspiroz, and not with Narvaez, that the convention for the surrender of Madrid was concluded.

Considerable surprise is felt in Paris at the readiness with which Narvaez and Aspiroz had conducted themselves towards the Regent's partisans. It would appear, however, that it had been expressly stipulated for, with Aspiroz, that full security should be granted to every person in Madrid no matter what his opinion might have been.

Mendizabal is at the English Embassy. Several members of the late Ministry have quitted Madrid.

The Eco de Vesoul states, that "the French Government is already occupied with making arrangements for the generals and officers attached to Espartero who may enter France in consequence of the late events in Spain. Orders have been given that all general officers who shall hereafter emigrate from Spain are to be located in the department of the Dordogne."

The Journal des Débats states that on the 25th ult. a reaction took place at Barcelona against the Moderado party. The Junta had ordered a new election of the officers of the National Militia, who were to be chosen from among the Exaltado party. This reaction was, however condemned by several cities, and amongst others by Valencia, Palma, Vich, and Manresa, whose Juntas had addressed remonstrances to that of Barcelona.

The Foreign Consuls at Barcelona had succeeded in prevailing on the Governor of Montjuich not to fire upon the city, but await the instructions of the new Government of Madrid. Accordingly, and with the assent of the Junta, the Deputy-commander of the fort and an officer of the garrison left on the 27th ult. for the capital.

General Seoane and Brigadier Simmery, ex-governor of Madrid, had been arrested by the junta of Burgos. Orders were given to arrest Zurbano, but he had two day's start. He left on the morning of the 23rd, before the entrance of the troops into Madrid. He owes his safety to the Duchess of Vittoria, who soon as he arrived at Madrid, disguised as a muleteer, had him brought to her house, and proposed to him to quit Madrid with her. The calèche was ready, and they left "en poste," Zurbano taking the name of a servant named in the passport of the duchess, which enabled him to escape. One letter states that, previous to his departure from Madrid, General Zurbano had an interview with Mr. Aston, who, on being told by him that he would endeavour to join the Regent, recommended him to advise the latter to abdicate.

The Duke de Baylen is named tutor to the Queen ad interim.

Letters received in Paris from Madrid state, that already Madame Mina had been removed from her place of First Lady of Honour to the Queen. Her successor is the Marchioness of Santa Cruz, who had already filled that high situation.—Pat.

PRUSSIA.—The Gazette of Aix-la-Chapelle states that the Diet of the Prussian provinces sitting at Dusseldorf, had resolved, by a majority of 40 to 20, to address his Majesty to abrogate the laws interfering with the liberty of the press, and to introduce a law to abolish the existing censorship, a measure demanded by the necessities of the epoch.—Ibid.

THE undersigned will be happy to execute orders in the way of Supplies for gentlemen in the Mofussil, free of any Commission Charge; the only remuneration he looks for, is the usual discount allowed on the purchase of goods for Cash, desirable of course, from the Seller.

To enable him to obtain this remuneration, a remittance must accompany each order to the full extent of the Articles required; of which on the despatch of the goods, a correct account will be rendered. The undersigned pledges himself to execute all orders received, with punctuality, and despatch, as far as practicable; and to supply Articles of the best quality. He would also be glad to know if any Indian Planter would enter into an arrangement to supply Gram and Oats, of the best quality, at stated periods, what quantity could be supplied yearly, and at what rate per maund, including all expenses, attending its transmission to Calcutta.

N. B. All letters must be Post paid.

TO THE PRINTERS OF INDIA.

MESSRS. W. THOROWGOOD AND CO. beg to call the attention of the Trade, to the annexed reduced list of the prices of Printing Types, and to add, that they have made a corresponding reduction in the prices of every article connected with a Printing Office. Their specimen book may be seen at all times, by applying to Messrs. Allan, Paton and Co. Calcutta, who have generally an assortment on sale, for the supply of immediate demands. Although a great reduction has been made in the prices, no pains will be spared to preserve the reputation for elegance and durability, which Messrs. T. and Co.'s Types have so long enjoyed.

L. I. H. GREY,
Offg. Post Master General.

Fort William, Genl. Post Office,
The 2d October, 1843.

The Holidays.—Our friends, who are for the most part themselves luxuriating in indolence for the week, will excuse our freedom in taking a small snatch at the same enjoyment. If we send them little of our own lucubrations, our paper is yet full of facts and thoughts of the deepest import, which leisure may be well employed in digesting.

Native Education.—The discussion of this important subject having been opened again, we republish this week, a letter from Mr. Hodgson of Nipal, which appeared in the Report of the Church Missionary Society. It is addressed to the Rev. W. Smith of Benares; and, with brevity and force, explains the ideas which the benevolent writer wishes to see realized, in the normal College he has proposed for advancing education in the country.

Reforms.—We have the pleasure to lay before our readers, a Memorandum on the improvements in our administration, which experience has suggested as desirable to an intelligent and able member of the public service: and the practical nature of his observations cannot but recommend them to the attention of the younger officers of Government in particular; whilst the correct sense of our responsibilities, and the benevolent recognition of the claims of our Native population, pervading the proposals of the writer, will command the regard of all who care for the interests of humanity.

The Tragedies of the Punjab.—Our Holiday is made serious enough by the intelligence from Lahore. It is fearful to think of the scenes enacted there within the last month. They recal the conviction, in general so willingly laid asleep, that the moral world, like the physical, has its elements of violence universally diffused, and ready to burst out both in old and new localities, we know not when. Let the war of strife and passion once be roused, and difference of civilization appears to be of little account. The barriers against revolutionary excesses may be very different in Europe and in Asia. There they may be many and strong, and here the reverse. But when they have been swept away, the deluge rages every where, with similar horrors and results. We cannot help feeling, therefore, that the tragedies of Lahore throw a deeper gloom on the troubled prospects of Europe, as presented by our late intelligence. We trust however, that, in the mercy of God, the darkness gathering there may yet be dispelled, without the mingling of heaven and earth in storm and convulsion.

We are indebted to the Delhi Gazette for nearly all the information yet received from Lahore; and the value of our Cotemporary's position, and the ability and diligence with which he is improving its advantages, are in the present instance singularly exemplified. Amongst our selections will be found the most important statements which have yet appeared; and to make them the more intelligible we have borrowed from the Hurkaru, his gleanings from Captain Osborne's Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, respecting the chief actors in the late tragedy—if indeed it is yet played out. Another description of the same parties, by one who appears to have had good opportunities of observation, has been given by the Star; but that we must reserve for the selections of next week. It is a very valuable and interesting paper.

Previous accounts had made it plain, that the reconciliation between Dhyan Singh and his master the Maharaja Shere Singh was altogether hollow. Whether the debauched and worthless monarch, or his ambitious and indignant minister was the first to renew their feud it is impossible to say. Drunken threats of resorting to violence are spoken of, on the part of the former; and provision for treason had certainly been made by the latter, by keeping in his own hands at Jumboo the rival prince Dhuleep Singh. By the end of August his schemes were so matured, that he brought this youth to Lahore, to take his part in the Drama. And, as if he courted an opportunity of provocation and violence, he openly announced the prince's arrival to the Maharaja, and demanded for him the honours due to his rank. Rapid progress was then made in conspiracy by Dhyan Singh, Soochet Singh, Lena Singh and Ajeet Singh; and on the 8th of September Goolab Singh arrived from Jumboo to help on the plot. In the meantime Shere Singh and his Son Pertab Singh were sufficiently informed of what was going on, to suspect the whole of these Chiefs, and to know, what appears to have been the truth, that Ajeet Singh was the most violent of them all; and probably their vain threats against him individually whetted his hostility, and made the execution of the plot so much the more quick and bloody.

On the 10th September, both Dhyan Singh and Goolab Singh are said to have taken the most solemn oaths of fidelity to the King, placing their hands upon his head as they swore to maintain their loyalty. Yet, on the 14th, Dhyan Singh laid the trap for his master's destruction, by persuading him to review Ajeet Singh's troops, and seek their good will by bestowing honours and rewards on the officers. On the following day he fell into the snare. As soon as he approached the troops, provocation was offered him. On the expression of his displeasure, Ajeet Singh insulted him by the taunt, that he was no son of Runjeet Singh, but a purchased slave. It is said he sought to revenge the insult by discharging an arrow at the Sirdar, who immediately shot him with his pistol, and cut off his head. General Ventura was on the ground, and drew out his troops against those of Ajeet Singh; but they were so out-numbered as to be obliged immediately to flee. Ventura hastened then to Pertab Singh to inform him of what had occurred; and the Prince called out his own two regiments, and issued from the gate. He was soon met by Ajeet Singh, and himself murdered and beheaded by the same hand as his father. The murderer proceeded on to the palace, and slew between thirty and forty of the Ranees, and the infant Prince, who had been born on the previous evening. Dhuleep Singh was then sent for and placed upon the throne, and the other conspirators appeared to acknowledge their allegiance.

Next day the new sovereign was formally proclaimed; and on this attainment of its immediate object the conspiracy split. Ajeet Singh had done so much of its foul work, as either to have been unwilling to bear a division, much less a supercession, in the power which had been grasped, or to have become alarmed, lest, on any revulsion of feeling, he should be made the first sacrifice, if one remained sufficiently powerful to lay hands on him. He proceeded from the Durbar to the Camp; and having summoned Dhyan Singh to accompany him, they went in the same carriage to consult the other chiefs on what was farther to be done. On the way, Ajeet Singh suddenly stabbed his companion with his dagger. Heera Singh, being informed of his father's death, with Soochet Singh collected a large body of troops, surrounded Ajeet Singh and his partisan Lena Singh, and slew them both. The latest victors then presented themselves before the Maharaja, and assumed the office of his Prime Ministers.

There is no likelihood however of their retaining the post they have acquired. Though Ajeet Singh be dead, the powerful party to which he belonged will soon collect their strength anew, and make common cause with all the dissatisfied, against the party now in the ascendant. And Heera Singh has not his father's ability and influence, either to controul his own adherents, or to subdue his opponents: whilst Goolab Singh, the military chief of the family, notwithstanding his wealth and fastnesses, has been too arbitrary in his government to be now a tower of strength. On the contrary, the personal ill-will he has excited will most probably be extended to those whom he supports. The Punjab, therefore, has before it a fearful prospect of anarchy and violence. Confusion is to be anticipated not less from the nature of its population, than the strife of its politicians.

The interference of the Government of India cannot long be avoided. Either the internal commotion of the Seikhs will boil over upon our dominions, so as to require our taking the field in our own defence: or the more legitimate may become the weaker party, and seek a support from us, which it would be difficult to resist the temptation of affording. Or, in some way or other, the door will soon be opened for our Armies into that wretched country. No one could regret such an event—nor even the entire subjection of the country to British dominion. The people would suffer in nothing; and in much they would be gainers.

Had England been faithful in what has been already committed to her, we might have taken pleasure in the thought of her power being extended, without the commission of any political wrong. But it is far otherwise. Politically much has been done to benefit the nations about a treasure party, of which Lieut. Parker had the command; and they were got hold of chiefly by the instrumentality of Ajeet Singh an ex-Budhuk, of whom our cotemporary has just published an interesting memoir. The capture is one of great importance to the peace of the country, and highly deserving of praise.

— A correspondent of the Bombay Courier says, that Raja Mansingh of Jotepore having died there at midnight on Monday the 4th Sept. his remains were burnt, with his Seven Ranees. Are these inhuman practices never to be interfered with amongst our tributary states?

— The Bombay Sumachar says that Government have unexpectedly raised the duty on Opium from Rs. 123 to 200 per chest—against which the Native Merchants have appealed.

— The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court at Bombay in Parsee marriages has been maintained by the Judges there, and is expected to have a salutary effect upon Parsee morals.

— The Englishman has been informed, that permission has been granted to ten men per Company of the Barrackpore Battalions to visit Juggunnath, and that this indulgence is owing to the consideration of the Governor General. We cannot believe it. There is nothing to draw the Sipahees to Juggunnath at this season of the year, nor till the Snan and Ruth Jattra next hot season. Besides, we had thought that Barrackpore and the duties of the metropolis were sufficiently hard upon the health of the poor men, without calling in the aid of pilgrimage—certainly one of the most destructive things both to health and morals which the country offers. If the indulgence has been given, and spontaneously—as a solicitation to idolatry it will furnish a striking trait in that excellent Christian character, so warmly vouched for by Lord Brougham.

THE INTRIGUES AND MURDERS AT LAHORE.

But to leave conjectures for facts, and the eventful occurrences of the last few days. Our Extra of the 20th will have placed all our readers in possession of the main features of the first act of the dreadful tragedy enacted at Lahore on the morning of the 15th instant, when Maharajah Shere Singh fell a victim to a concerted plot, in which the three brothers, Goolab Singh, Dhyan Singh and Soochet Singh, with Sirdars Ajeet Singh and Lena Singh, were the chief instigators. By our recent accounts it does not appear that Fakeer Azeez-ood-deen was in any way mixed up in the affair. On the afternoon of the 21st we received further intelligence of an almost still more astounding character, which we hastened to issue in a very small second Extra to our station subscribers, and of which we had just time to send a copy to the Staff Officers of the principal stations to the south and east; an obliging friend took a few copies over to Meerut for distribution there, and yesterday we sent a copy to each station in the Meerut Division, for which we were much too late on Thursday, so that we have no doubt the intelligence got pretty general circulation. We have to apologize for having sent the copies bearing to the Officers on the Staff above mentioned, which was not our intention or direction, but we trust they will excuse the oversight made in the hurry of the moment. The following were the contents of this second Extra:—

Ajeet Sing after having killed Shere Singh was returning to the fort and met Dhyan Singh; he told him he had done the deed, and asked him to return, he got into Dhyan Singh's carriage, and when they got near the gate of the fort, Ajeet Singh stabbed Dhyan Singh, and sent his body to his brother, Soochet Singh, and his son, Heera Singh. These two individuals surrounded the city with their troops, the people inside continued plundering all night.

In the morning, 16th, Heerah Singh having entered the fort, seized Ajeet Singh, Lena Singh, and others, and having put them to death, exposed their heads in the plain and threw their bodies into the bazar. Dhuleep Singh has been put on the guddee, and Heera Singh made Vuzeer. Six hundred men were slaughtered on both sides.

Later still in the evening we received the subjoined more detailed accounts from our own news-writer, forwarded by two Hurkarus from Lahore, who were only FIVE days on the road. We have given the whole of the contents of the letter in order to connect his relation of the tragedy with the events last recorded by him, under date 30th August, (see Gaz. 16th inst.,) and it appears beyond a doubt to us that the advices on which we founded our observations above quoted of the 6th instant, were written with the full knowledge of the arrival of Dhuleep Singh at Lahore on the 1st. and with a very shrewd guess at the object which the Jumboo brothers had in view in so bringing him. His presence in Lahore seems to have created great alarm in the mind of the unfortunate Shere Singh, but he was so thoroughly powerless that he could not offer any effective opposition. The death of Dhyan Singh has given the final blow to the independence of the Punjaub, and we may, without any great pretensions to sagacity, look forward to its entire disorganization. Dewan Sawun Mull in the south, and Rajah Goolab Singh in the north, with an enemy ready to grasp at Peshawur in the west, will hasten its dismemberment, and circumstances may now occur to allow of our Government coming in, as has long been expected, for the lion's share of the spoil. It is to be seen whether Lord Ellenborough will expose himself to the same reproach, as was certainly incurred by Lord Auckland for not having availed himself of the splendid opportunity which the tragical end of Now Nehal Singh and his father afforded, of adding the territories of Lahore to those of British India, and it must be confessed that, should a plausible opportunity occur, such as a government in a state of utter disorganization will perhaps not be long in affording, it would be highly desirable, now that the Indus is our frontier in the southern part of its course, to make its northern banks our boundary as far as Attock. But these are again mere speculations, so we will return to the narrative of our news-writer, which developes, as far as his means would allow of his doing so, the progress and consummation of the conspiracy which ended in the death of Maharajah Shere Singh. Ajeet Singh being a collateral member of the family of Runjeet Singh, thought to make the death of Dhyan Singh and of Dhuleep Singh, had he not been stopped in his career, the stepping stone for his own accession to the throne:—

LAHORE, 31st Aug.—The Durbar was held at Shah Bolawul, and Rajahs Dhyan Singh, Soochet Singh and Heera Singh, with Sirdars Ajeet Singh, Lena Singh Majeeteea and Hukeem Azeez-ood-deen were present. The troops were inspected until midday. Dewan Ajoodheea Nath was ordered to present the accounts of his government of Bunnoo Tauk for inspection. Rajah Dhyan Singh informed the Maharajah that he had sent for Prince Dhuleep Singh, son of Maharajah Runjeet Singh, from Jumboo, and that he had arrived in Lahore. He also begged that a salute might be fired on the occasion; the Maharajah replied there was no necessity for so doing, enquired why he had been brought from Jumboo, and desired he might not be brought to the Durbar. The Rajah explained that the boy's mother was sick and had expressed a wish to see him.

Sept. 1st.—The Maharajah directed a perwannah to be addressed to Rajah Goolab Singh at Jumboo, enquiring why he had sent Dhuleep Singh to Lahore, and had not acquainted him, the Maharajah, of his having done so. He afterwards directed that some of his own attendants should replace those of Dhyan Singh in the care of the person of Dhuleep Singh, an arrangement which Dhyan Singh opposed. Rajah Dhyan Singh reminded the Maharajah that a perwannah had been addressed several days ago to Dewan Sawun Mull, to send 10,000 men to assist at the festival of the Dusserah, but that he had paid no attention to this order. Another perwannah was ordered to be written forthwith.

Sept. 2d.—Ram Chund reported that the number of troops now in the vicinity of Lahore amounted to 100,000 men. The Maharajah answered that orders for their dispersion should be issued immediately after the Dusserah. His Highness then went to inspect the Treasury, and was informed the contents amounted to five Krores of Rupees. Misser Belee Ram was instructed to send two Krores to Govind Ghur. General Ventura was admitted to a private audience after the durbar.

Sept. 2d.—A draft for 50,000 Rupees, with some packages of shawls, was received from Ghoolam Mohee-ood-deen, Nazim of Kashmeer. The Collectors of Customs were directed to account to His Highness for their daily receipts.

Sept. 4th.—A Durbar was held in the morning, and a letter received from Rajah Goolab Singh at Jumboo, stating that as he was anxious to see his Highness he should shortly present himself at the Durbar. The Maharajah having gone into the fort was privately informed that Dhyan Singh, Soochet Singh, Heera Singh, Lena Singh, and Ajeet Singh, had met privately at the house of the mother of Dhuleep Singh and been in consultation for three hours. Foujdar Khan was immediately directed by the Maharajah to depute a Hurkarah to watch the movements of each of the Sirdars and report their proceedings.

Sept. 5th.—A Durbar was held, at which the Sirdars with General Ventura presented themselves. H. H. took an account of the number of the troops. On the dismissal of the durbar General Ventura solicited a private audience of his Highness, who took him aside and having enquired what he wanted, the General then informed him that the Sirdars above named had certainly conspired against his Highness, to which end they had sent for Dhuleep Singh and that Goolab Singh was coming from Jumboo to aid them. He recommended the Maharajah to use every precaution. The Maharajah replied he could not believe this of Dhyan Singh as it was to him he certainly owed his elevation.

Sept. 6th.—His Highness being indisposed held no durbar but took some medicine from Bhugwandass. He then sent for Saheb Singh, the Gooroo, and mentioned the report of the conspiracy. The priest said it could not be, as Ajeet Singh was bound by blood to the Maharajah; he at the same time enquired who had informed him of this. The Maharajah would not tell, but added that if he found out that Ajeet Singh was conspiring against him, he would certainly put him to death as he had done with Ranee Chund Kowr.

Sept. 7th.—A perwannah was sent off to Tej Singh, Nazim of Peshawur, ordering him to send ten mule loads of fresh rice to Lahore. Another to Ameer Singh, Aloowalla, demanding the amount due by him, 2,00,000 Rs. Prince Purtaub Singh was present at this morning's durbar, spoke much on behalf of General Ventura, and suggested an increase of rank. The Maharajah said he should have five regiments in addition to the ten he already commanded. The Goorcharas were subsequently reviewed by his Highness who picked out and discharged 100 ill-conditioned men.

Sept. 8th.—Prince Bukhshish Singh reported his having organized two Regiments of Goorkhas according to his Highness's direction. He also said they were ready for inspection and hoped a Jagheer would be provided to pay them. A hurkaru announced the arrival of Rajah Goolab Singh at Lahore from Jumboo. An order was sent him to present himself at the durbar on the morrow. Ramchund reported that he had observed some signs of enmity between General Ventura and Sirdar Ajeet Singh. The latter was stated to have collected 20,000 of his own men, Ramchund was directed particularly to enquire into and report the occurrences in camp.

Sept. 9th.—Rajah Goolab Singh presented himself at the Durbar and offered 25 banghees of gold as a Nuzzur. The Rajah was most kindly received by the Maharajah and assured him in return that both himself and his brother were most devotedly attached to His Highness's person. The Maharajah said he should require an oath at his hands on his head that he entertained no evil intention against him. Goolab Singh excused himself for two or three days on the plea of hearing what was doing in Lahore. General Ventura was sent for to the Durbar, and directed to keep all his Regiments in a state of preparation ready for service at a moment's warning. The guards were strengthened at each gate. Prince Purtaub Singh presented himself to his father and told him he did not believe there was any necessity to mistrust the Sirdars, except Ajeet Singh who was a man not to be depended on. After some conversation orders were given to exclude Ajeet Singh from the Durbar pending his Highness's pleasure.

Sept. 10th.—A Durbar was held after dismissing which the Maharajah took aside Rajahs Goolab Singh and Dhyan Singh and having assured them that he felt it was to them he owed his elevation, asked them what they were about. They both placed their hands on the Maharajah's head and swore they were and would continue good servants; they added that as far as Ajeet Singh and his troops were concerned there was no fear of them.

Sept. 11th.—A petition was received from Dagh Singh news-writer at Loodhianah. Lalla Kishenchund Vakeel begged for leave of absence to Loodhianah and received a handsome Khelut.

Sept. 12th.—Lavee Deal, nephew to Dewan Sawun Mull, reported that 5000 men had left Mooltan and would soon be at Lahore. The Maharajah said he must have 5000 more. A petition was received from Chunnee Lall, Jemadar of Hurkarus, who was on his way to Kashmeer with Mr. John Brightman. It stated that they had been robbed. A perwannah was sent with an order to the Zemindar of the village to make good the loss.

Sept. 13th.—The Maharajah sent this morning for his two sons and General Ventura. The nature of their consultation did not transpire.

Sept. 14th.—A Durbar was held this morning and Rajah Dhyan Sing suggested to the Maharajah that he ought to review Ajeet Singh's troops and gain their good-will by bestowing some honors and rewards on the officers. His Highness replied that he had no leisure to do so this day but would proceed to the camp the next morning. Ranee Isur Chund gave birth to a son about 9 o'clock at night, which pleased the Maharajah, who ordered a salute to be fired. He then sent for Mutsuddun Pundit to cast the infant's nativity. The Pundit replied that it was not favourable. Ten thousand rupees were ordered to be given to propitiate his destiny.

Sept. 15th.—His Highness proceeded on horseback towards the northern gate of Lahore. His suwaree no sooner approached the ranks of Ajeet Singh's regiments, about 20 in number, than the officers and men became loud in their abuse of his Highness; on which Ajeet Singh came forward and having addressed him in an insolent tone, told him he was no son of Maharajah Runjeet Singh's but a purchased slave, brought up by his supposed mother. The Maharajah was excessively astonished at this address and turned round to look for Rajahs Goolab and Dhyan Singh, but they were not to be seen. He then discharged an arrow at Ajeet Singh but missed him. The Sirdar on this drew his pistol, and shot Shere Singh through the head; he fell and was instantly beheaded by Ajeet Sing. General Ventura having been informed of this event, drew his troops out against those of Ajeet Sing but the numbers of the latter were so greatly superior, (two to one) that he was speedily obliged to retire leaving 200 men on the field. He hurried to Prince Purtaub Singh to inform him of what had happened. The Prince ordered out his own two regiments immediately, and issued from the gate of the town. He very shortly after met Ajeet Singh at the head of his troops, his father's head being borne on a spear. The Sirdar immediately attacked the Prince, and with his own hand put him to death, and also beheaded him. He then went on his way and having entered the Palace, unmercifully slaughtered between thirty and forty of the Ranees. Dhuleep singh was then sent for and placed on the throne so lately occupied by Maharajah Shere Singh. The child born the night before did not escape. About 150 of the personal attendants and friends of the Maharajah were made prisoners and placed in confinement. Immediately afterwards Rajahs Dhyan, Soochet, Heera and Goolab Singh, with other Sirdars presented themselves at the new Durbar and offered nuzzurs. Royal salutes were ordered to be fired.

Sept 16th.—Maharajah Dhuleep Singh held a durbar. Ajeet Singh presented himself and proclamations were issued to the effect that Prince Dhuleep Singh had ascended the throne of Lahore, and that all orders issued by him or in his name were to be duly obeyed. Sirdar Ajeet Singh then proceeded to the camp and having summoned Rajah Dhyan Singh, the two proceeded to sound the chief officers of the army as to the future. As they were proceeding along, Ajeet Singh suddenly drew his dagger and stabbed the Rajah. The news had no sooner reached Heera Singh and Soochet Singh than they assembled a large body of troops (40,000) and completely surrounded Ajeet Singh, who was supported by Sirdar Lena Singh. The young Rajah attacked them with impetuosity, both were, with many other Sirdars, killed in the conflict. Rajah Heera Singh sought his father's body and ordered the funeral rites to be performed. The two then presented themselves before Dhuleep Singh and caused a proclamation to be issued constituting themselves Ministers of the young Maharajah. The troops in the mean time availed themselves of the favorable opportunity presented, for 18 hours plundered the city, and could only be induced to desist on Heera Singh distributing amongst them 10 lakhs of rupees. Some regiments were ordered off to Phuloor, and Kussoor, and at the time this letter goes, quiet has been to a certain extent restored.

The following additional particulars were received, just as we were going to press, from our indefatigable correspondent :—

Ferozepore, 11 A. M., 20*th Sept*, 1843.

The following troops have received orders to turn out at just a moment's warning :—

The 60th N. I. under command of Captain George Cox.

The 3rd Cavalry under command of Major Angelo.

The 5th Troop 1st Brigade Horse Artillery under command of Major Backhouse, C. B.

The picquets at the Ghaut, have orders to be on the qui vive, and report immediately the approach of troops on the opposite bank.

It is reported, that Rajah Golab Singh has arrived at "Kussoor," with troops, information having reached Lahore, that the English were ordering up troops to Ferozepore. The town of Umritser has been plundered by the Akhalees, and the Sirdars at Lahore are in a regular stew from fear of the English forces advancing. The 7th Cavalry and some Artillery are hourly expected here. The guard over the treasure at the fort has been increased to one hundred rank and file, and furnished with the full complement of pouch ammunition, besides two boxes of spare ball ammunition.

An express has come in from Colonel Richmond, and it is generally surmised by all officers, that the troops will be employed in some secret service to-night, or marched off to the ghaut this evening. Boats are being pressed by Mr. Greathed for the use of the troops expected to go down to Scinde. The services of another Medical Officer being urgently required at Sukkur, Doctor Pollard, H. A., has been ordered to proceed there with all expedition.

A letter received from Loodhianah also of the 20th says, " We are all in a state of preparation at this place to cut up all the Sikhs who may cross to attack cantonments some fine night when the moon's up ; but this morning's news is that all is quiet at Lahore. Ventura we hear has fallen in the skrimmage. The 7th Cavalry are under orders to march at a moment's warning."—Delhi Gaz., Sep. 23.

THE ACTORS IN THE TRAGEDY.

The affairs of the Punjaub being now the engrossing topic of conversation, we think, that we cannot do better, than afford such of our uninitiated readers as have not a library within their reach, or the inclination to ransack one, a little interesting information regarding the chief actors and sufferers in the terrible tragedy of Lahore. In resorting, for this purpose, to Captain Osborne's work on the Court and Camp of Runjeet Sing, we wish it to be understood that we do so, not because we consider him the best authority, but because he is the most recent one ; and therefore, his sketches, though now some five years old, are, at all events, the nearest approach to portraits of the men, as they were, on the eve of the extraordinary revolution, which has cut off all the foremost men of the State, and plunged the country into inextricable confusion. The group, which this bloody picture presents, is, indeed, an extraordinary one ; Shere Singh—the adopted son of old Runjeet—a man, whose finer qualities were destroyed by debasing sensuality ; Pertaub Singh, his son, an intelligent and high-spirited youth ; Dhyan Singh, " the great rajah," the Chief Minister of State, under Runjeet and under his successors ; Heera Singh, the son of Dhyan, and the minion of Runjeet ; Ajeet Singh the Minister of Chund Koonwar ; the faqir Azeez-ood-deen and others—all remarkable in the annals of the Punjaub ; and all, with two exceptions, hurried to a bloody grave within a few hours of each other. Nay, perhaps, exceptions there are none, for the tragedy is not yet ended. Let us view all these men singly, as described by Capt Osborne. We wish, that we could give also the engraved portraits, which accompany the sketches. First, we have

SHERE SINGH.

Shere Singh is also a fine, manly-looking fellow, and was richly dressed after the same fashion. He is a supposed son of the Maharajah, though the latter strongly denies the paternity. He, however, grants him the privilege of a chair in his presence—an honour he shares with Kurruck Singh, the heir apparent to the throne, and Heera Singh, the son of the Minister the only individuals of the court who are so distinguished.

I have before adverted to Runjeet's jealousy of Europeans, and Shere Singh has, unfortunately for himself, shewn so much attention to them, and such attachment to their manners and customs, as effectually to rouse his master's vigilance ; and whilst in his presence he hardly dared openly to accost us, which we all saw with much regret, as, when removed from observation, he, of all the Sikh chiefs, appeared most inclined to be on friendly and intimate terms with us. He is supposed to be in rather more than usual mauvaise odeur at this moment, in consequence of an occurrence which took place at this morning's Durbar. It appears that Runjeet, anxious that the deputation sent to meet the mission from the Governor General should do credit to his court by the splendour of their dress and appearance, ordered them all to attend him in the morning previous to their setting off to meet us. After complimenting Soochet Singh upon the beauty of his dress and jewels, he addressed Shere Singh, and asked the reason why he was without his usual magnificent ornaments ; who replied, touching the hilt of his sword, " I am a soldier, and this is the only jewel I value." Runjeet angrily insisted upon knowing what had become of them, and at last elicited the truth from Shere Singh, that they were in his own treasury, having been presented to him as a nuzzur, or complimentary gift, by Shere Singh, on the occasion of his paying him a friendly visit at his palace some months previous. Runjeet pretended to be very much annoyed, and immediately offered to restore them ; but Shere Singh, soldier as he is, was much too clever and politic to accept them.

The sketch is somewhat scanty. Of Shere Singh's later life, our readers have had a tolerably faithful picture in the Lahore Akhars, which we and some of our cotemporaries have recently given ; and from which it appears, but too plainly, that the Maharajah was cut off "in the very blossom of his sin"—a degraded and heartless sensualist. The picture of Pertaub Singh is somewhat better. The young prince appears to have promised well ; but five years may have done much to ruin him—

PERTAUB SINGH.

Two marches from Adeenanuggur. Here we met Pertaub Singh, a boy of seven years of age, son of Shere Singh, and grand son of the Maharajah. He had been sent by his father to accompany us on our march through his district. This was the first instance we noticed of Runjeet's jealousy of European influence over his chiefs. According to all precedent and custom, Shere Singh himself, and not his son, should have been sent to meet us ; and the excuse for this apparent breach of etiquette was highly characteristic of the customs of the court of Lahore—namely, that the Shah Zadah Shere Singh had been a little overcome at a drinking party with the Maharajah the evening before, and was, in consequence, unable to travel.

Pertaub Singh was handsomely dressed, armed with a small ornamented shield, sword, and matchlock, all in miniature, covered with jewels, and escorted by a small party of Sikh cavalry and some guns. His horse was naturally of a white colour, but dyed with henna to a deep scarlet.

He is one of the most intelligent boys I ever met with, very good looking, with singularly large and expressive eyes. His manners are in the highest degree attractive, polished, and gentlemanlike, and totally free from all the mauvaise honte and awkwardness so generally found in European children of that age.

In the course of conversation I asked him if his matchlock was a real one, and if he ever shot with it. He jumped off his chair, highly indignant at the question, and after rapidly loading his musket, exclaimed, " Now, what shall I shoot ?" I replied that I saw nothing in the camp at present it would be safe to shoot at, and asked him if he thought he could hit a man at a hundred yard's distance ; to which he replied, without a moment's hesitation, pointing to the crowd of Sikh chiefs and soldiers that surrounded the tent, " These are all your friends ; but shew me an enemy to the British government, and you shall soon see what I can do."

His father is said to be dotingly fond of this boy ; and when he was deputed last year by the Maharajah to escort Sir Henry Fane to the frontiers of the Punjab, took him with him ; but such is Runjeet's jealousy of Europeans, that before they had got three marches, a regiment of cavalry was sent after them, with orders from the Maharajah to bring Pertaub Singh back with them, in order that he might remain as a hostage until his father's return to the court. During the whole of our march through Shere Singh's district, all our servants, camp followers, escort, and cattle, were found in supplies at his expense.

27*th May*.—One march from Adeenaunggur. Here we took leave of our young and very interesting friend, Pertaub Singh, after presenting him with a gold watch and chain as a token of remembrance on the part of the Governor General. He expressed his thanks in graceful terms, and concluded by saying, " You may tell Lord Auckland that the British government will always find a friend in the son of Shere Singh." Then mounting his horse, covered with plumes and jewels, he gracefully raised his hand to his forehead and galloped off with his escort, curvetting and caracoling round him in circles till he was out of sight.

The next sketch is that of the father and son, Dhyan and Heera Singh. These gentlemanly and effeminate individuals wear a somewhat different aspect in Capt. Osborne's picture from what they do, on the stage of real life when, cutting one another's throats. Our readers will suspect the accuracy of some portion of the annexed. Capt. O. says, that in 1838, Dhyan Singh was thirty, and Heera Singh eighteen years old. Either the father was older or the son younger than is stated—we believe the latter—

DHYAN SINGH AND HEERA SINGH.

Rajah Dhyan Singh is a noble specimen of the human race ; rather above the usual height of natives, with a quick and intelligent eye, high handsome forehead, and acquiline features, dressed in a magnificent helmet and cuirass of polished steel, embossed with gold, a present from King Louis Philippe of France, he looked a model of manly beauty and intelligence. He is about thirty years of age, and is very high, and by all accounts justly so, in his master's confidence. He is active, clever, and intelligent, possessed of great influence over the Sikh people, and in all probability will be one, and not the least powerful or deserving candidate for the throne of the Punjab on Runjeet's decease. With enormous wealth and property, and a large tract of country, which he rules with mildness and justice, he presents a singular instance of a favourite and a man in power, whose talents and virtues are more appreciated than his power and influence are envied. Gentlemanlike, manly, and unassuming in his manners, he is still cold and repulsive to Europeans, whom he both fears and hates with more than common rancour, and against whom he loses no opportunity of exerting his influence with the Maharajah.

Rajah Heera Singh, the son of the Minister, a boy of eighteen years of age, is a greater favourite with Runjeet Singh than any other of his chiefs, not even excepting his father. His influence over Runjeet is extraordinary; and though acquired in a manner which in any other country would render him infamous for ever, here he is universally looked up to and respected.

He is the only individual who ever ventures to address Runjeet Singh without being spoken to, and whilst his father stands behind his master's chair, and never presumes to answer him with unclasped hands, this boy does not hesitate to interrupt and contradict him in the rudest manner. One instance of the way in which he presumes upon the kindness of Runjeet Singh was the subject of public conversation at Adenanuggur upon our arrival. The yearly tribute from Cashemire had arrived, and was, as usual, opened and spread upon the floor in the Durbar for the inspection of the Maharajah. It consisted of shawls, arms, jewels, &c., to the amount of upwards of thirty thousand pounds. Young Heera Singh without the slightest hesitation, addressed Runjeet and said, "Your Highness cannot require all these things; let me have them." The answer was, "You may take them."

Heera Singh is strikingly handsome, though rather effeminate in appearance. He was magnificently dressed, and almost entirely covered from the waist upwards with strings of pearls, diamonds, emeralds, and rubies; he is intelligent and clever, and has taken a fancy to learn English, which he has already made considerable progress, being perhaps the only individual who would venture to do such a thing openly. Good-tempered, gentlemanlike, and amusing, he is certainly one of the most amiable and popular persons at the court of Lahore.

Of Ajeet Singh and Ameer-ood-deen, in the volume before us, we have engraved portraits; but the written accounts are but brief. Of the Fuqir, it is said—

Ameer-ood-deen is, with Dheean Singh, supposed to possess more influence over Runjeet Singh than any other of the Sikh chiefs. He is a fine-looking man, of about five and forty, not over clean in his person, but with a pleasant and good-humoured, though crafty-looking countenance, and his manners are so kind and unassuming that it is impossible not to like him.—Hurkaru, September 30.

An Agra Ukhbar extra of the 21st, conveying the rumour which was first abroad regarding the Lahore tragedy, adds that he has heard that Khanjee is going to make a stand at Gwalior, which agrees with our native intelligence. More authentic news from that part of the world, dated the 19th, assures us in further confirmation, that the Residency which has been nominally kept up, is to be wholly abandoned, until the Durbar comes to its senses, so that opposition may certainly be anticipated.—Delhi Gaz., Sept. 23.

BAPTISM OF A BRAHMIN CONVERT.

We had the pleasure on Wednesday evening the 13th inst., of witnessing this interesting event at the Mission-House of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland's Mission Ambrolie. The young man, Narrayan Sheshadri, who was then baptized, is a Hindoo of the Brahmin caste, and has been for about five years a pupil in the school connected with the General Assembly's Mission. He has for a long time been esteemed one of the most distinguished pupils of the institution, and on the occasion of a competition, upwards of a year ago, for scholarships instituted in commemoration of the Hon. Mr. Farish on his leaving Bombay for England, Narrayan was the successful competitor for the most valuable of these. Like most of the Hindoo youths who have had the advantage of liberal education, he had long ceased to believe in Hindooism. Thanks to the rational and christian system of the Assembly's schools, his mind, cast loose for the degrading superstitions of heathenism, had not been left for want of religious instruction to go adrift, as seems to be invariably the case where secular instruction alone is imparted, into the even grosser darkness of infidelity or atheism. For upwards of two years, growing convictions of the truth of Christianity, and of it alone, have impressed his mind. The ties of worldly interest, and still more of family affection, have until of late however restrained him from acting on the convictions of a very clear understanding, and a very guileless heart, and it is only within two months that the deepening power of religious impressions appear to have compelled him to the resolve "of counting all things as lost, that he might win Christ and be found in him." Upon Thursday week, his relatives having been led to suspect his intention of making an open profession of those opinions they were in part aware he entertained, put into confinement his younger brother, who was a fellow pupil at the Assembly's schools, and who they feared would follow Narrayan in whatever steps he should take. The consequence of this proceeding was the boy's leaving home in company with one of the masters of the institution, who, at Narrayan's request, visited him in his confinement, and along with his brother taking refuge in the Mission House, where they both now are. Narrayan having thus decidedly cast in his lot with Christians, has claim for admittance by baptism to the Church of Christ, in respect of full instruction, as well as, we trust, in respect of the sincerity and truth of his convictions, intimation was given at the Free Presbyterian Church on Sunday last, after divine service, that on Wednesday evening his baptism would take place at Ambrolie. Accordingly on Wednesday evening the Chapel there was crowded at an early hour —a large proportion of the religious European community of Bombay being present, as well as a considerable number of natives, mostly young men educated in, or connected with, the various schools. The services of the evening were commenced by singing praise, followed by a most earnest prayer by the Revd. J. M. Mitchell, who proceeded to address the Assembly, choosing for his subject the 37th verse of the X. chapter of Mathew—"He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me." In addressing more particularly the natives present, Mr. Mitchell took occasion from these words to defend Narrayan from all the accusations of want of natural affection, or imputations of interested motives, which bad men would undoubtedly love to heap upon him, and to press upon them the enquiry "whence had Narrayan been induced and strengthened to so bold and seemingly profitless a step?" He reminded them that about two years ago, when in the same place two Parsee converts to Christianity were baptized, Narrayan himself had been one of the spectators, perhaps the most strongly opposed to such a step as regarded himself, and most firmly persuaded that he at least would never be caught—and concluded by entreating their earnest attention to what was about to be done.

The Rev. Robert Nesbit followed Mr. Mitchell, and after again praying, and a few remarks in pursuance of what had been said, proceeded to examine the convert as to his reasons for desiring baptism, and his understanding of the solemn obligations which its administration involved? The replies were calm, distinct, and satisfactory. It was evident that Narrayan's mind was indeed made up to the sacrifice of all most dear to him in this world, and that on no vague impulse, nor hastily considered resolve. Having renounced the various gods of his heathen creed,—more especially that,—the mark of which he had used to bear on his forehead, and having divested himself of, and thrown aside, the sacred cord—the mark of his caste—professing his faith in the various doctrines of our holy religion, and his resolve in humble dependance of Divine grace to practise its duties through life, and hold its hopes for eternity, he was then baptized in the usual form, by the sprinkling of water on his uncovered head. After administering the ordinance by which he became a member of the visible church of Christ, Mr. Nesbit addressed Narrayan at some length in a most solemn and impressive discourse, reminding him of the duties undertaken, warning him of the temptations and trials before him, and cheering him with the sure prospect of being "in all these things more than conqueror." Dismissing the newly baptized convert, Mr. Nesbit turned to the heathen lookers-on, and, in a few sentences, which could not fail to arrest and interest their attention most profoundly, bid them think on what they had seen, and challenged any one among them to feel himself indifferent and unconvicted by conscience on contemplating the part their companion had taken. He concluded by addressing the thoughtless amongst his nominally Christian hearers, and by recommending Narrayan to the prayers of those among them who might be Christians in deed as well as in profession. After joining in prayer, and in singing, the congregation separated about nine o'clock.

During the whole of this interesting and impressive proceeding, the conduct of the Natives present was most earnestly attentive, and, as far as we observed, most respectful. Narrayan is well known and much liked among them. His natural talents and abilities are acknowledged, and his having thus come forward to bare reproach, disgrace, and the loss of all for Christianity, cannot but arrest the attention, and interest the thoughts, of a class of young men who are naturally thoughtful and of no mean intelligence. We would fain hope that Narrayan, although the first thoroughly educated Brahmin who has been here converted, is only the first fruits of that richer harvest which, let Heathenism in its ignorance, and worldly prudence in its wisdom, do their worst to oppose, we know surely shall ere long be gathered in this dark land. Few and far between as such examples seem to be, let not good men be discouraged. Let but one green leaf bud and blossom on what seems the withered plant of the garden, and we know that life is there: water it with your best wishes, your most zealous efforts, your most earnest prayers,—and another blossom, and another will appear until it spreads into a great and a green tree of grateful shelter and abundant fruit. We most earnestly desire that such may be our experience here, and that, too, ere many years shall have passed.

The system on which the missionaries of the Church of Scotland in this place in a great measure rest their hopes of eventual good to India, is that of securing a number of young native converts to Christianity, thoroughly and liberally educated, who shall hereafter go abroad amongst their heathen countrymen—the most suitable by constitution, information and habit of mind of any class of missionaries. The development of such a system is of necessity slow: even to those who plan and conduct it, its progress may often seem discouragingly tardy, and its obstacles insurmountable. Much more do men of hasty judgment, with little real interest in the spread of civilization at all, and perhaps totally opposed to the spread of vital religion (the only real civilized in the history of mankind) along with it—find apparent grounds of objection to, or contemptuous mention of, missionary exertions in their small obvious results. But if the work proceeds but slowly, we know that it goes on surely. Eighteen hundred and forty-three years may well have taught us, in the midst of delay and discouragement, of complaints and reproaches—to look forward to look upward.—Bombay Times, Sept. 16.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

MEMORANDUM.

On the expediency of adopting certain practical amendments, in the internal administration of the Bengal Presidency.

1. Many useful reforms have lately been considered, and some of them effected, as regards the internal administration of the Indian territories generally, and of the Bengal Presidency especially. Amongst the former the abolition of Slavery; Registration; the discontinuance in the Courts of a language totally unintelligible to the generality of Mofussil Suitors; Education in the Metropolitan, and the Provincial Capitals; &c. &c. Amongst the latter, endeavours to improve the local police; the appointment of Deputy Magistrates; the raising the qualifications of, and the encouragement of honourable ambition amongst the Native Judges.

2. But many reforms are still wanting, and of these the following are not the least prominent:

1st. The existing necessity for a constant and practical use of the vernacular language, by all the Civil Officers of the Government.

2nd. An improved bearing towards, and a better treatment of the Native Officers of Mofussil Courts.

3rd. The better distribution in the Mofussil properly so called, and the periodical examination, of Civil Employees, during the first 10 years of service, with pecuniary and other prizes.

4th. The greater encouragement of the means of more frequent and rapid intercommunication.

5th. The better education in the Mofussil of the oppressing and oppressed classes.

6th. The better prevention of perjury, fraud, and of the suborning thereto.

3. (1) The power of interchanging thoughts between the Governers and the governed directly, in a common language, will be a main aid towards destroying the two most notorious evils of the present system—the oppression exercised by those who have the opportunity and power to oppress, and the bad influence of Omlah; while as regards the latter, when the presiding Officer has both practical and colloquial ability, so to speak, for the conduct of his duties, the power and the temptation for ill, are thus greatly removed from the Omlah. (2) Kind and considerate treatment towards them, discreetly regulated, will tend to raise their character from evil towards good. The next step will be to extend the range of that good thus created, by not confining it to one spot, and one 60th portion of the population of a district; but (3) by distributing Civil Employees more generally in the interior properly so called—all claims to superior merit being brought forward by the proposed periodical examination, in addition to the ordinary practical test afforded by the general supervision, provided by the present system—all instances of demerit being by the same means incapable of concealment to the detriment of the interests of the state. (4) Better means of intercommunication for all parties by improved public works, will render such location in the interior less distasteful to the Europeans so located, and invaluable to the Natives, in a political, commercial, and, in fact, in every view. (5) A practical plan of simple, but sound education, in the interior of districts, will combine with all the above for the moralization, and amelioration of the oppressing and oppressed classes—and the ignorant masses generally; especially if the better prevention of the still unmitigated tendency to perjury and falsehood, is provided for by the collateral aid of more certain, more severe, and better defined punishment.

4. An experience acquired by my residence in a Bengal district, has convinced me, that the above are the radical points of the present system requiring amendment: and the same has convinced me, that I can do no harm, even if I do no good, by pointing out remedies. The style and method in which these remedies are submitted, are probably redundant with many an error, arising from ignorance, want of materials, and natural inability; indeed all that the writer can claim credit for, is disinterestedness, and anxiety to do good, in his vocation.

5. It is not to be avoided in such a paper that the dry details of it should weary, but, as far as possible, brief leading principles, capable of practical application shall be the main objects kept in view.

The existing necessity for a constant and practical use of the vernacular language, by all the Civil Officers of Government.

6. I will take for my purposes, Bengal—mutatis mutandis, it will apply to all provincial dialects.

7. Every European gentleman employed in Civil duties in Bengal, should be able to read and write Bengalee. But few can now do it! The reason is this. They are without examples: and they are ashamed or apathetic about starting a new practice, even though they know it in their consciences to be a good one, or, even to go further, one essentially necessary for the proper discharge of their duties. It only requires spirit and perseverance to overcome this weakness. No one can conceive, until they have tried, how much public confidence it imparts in regard to an Officer's decisions, in regard to his freedom from the control of Omlah, and, last not least, how far it goes towards rendering the transaction of business easy, to speak even bad Bengalee in a Cutcherry instead of bastard Hindoostanee. How much greater will be that confidence, and how heartfelt the satisfaction of the Officer when he can speak, read, and write in the language of the PEOPLE without the necessity for any third party intervening; without leaning upon his Omlah, those crutches as it were to officials in Bengal, which the longer used, the more lame and impotent will the person using them be.

8. The young writer when he is in College, should always speak Bengalee, not Hindoostanee, with his Pundit, and with all his servants. If he will not then, from false shame, let him do it from the first instant he enters his first Cutcherry. Supposing him to have passed in Bengalee, however badly or ridiculously, he may suppose, he will speak that neglected dialect, he may be assured that it will not be more laughable even to his Omlah, than the Hindoostanee in which he has not passed, and of which he has no shame, though equal reason for it.

9. Let the young Assistant on his arrival in the Mofussil, besides entirely dropping the Hindoostanee till after he shall have acquired Bengalee, and constantly speaking only in the latter language, devote two hours a day in the following manner. In the first place let no false shame stop him from asking questions, when he is in doubt of the meaning of any single term. Let him send for a record of case, commonly called a Nutthee, (a word I dare say not one of those young men reported "qualified for the public service" understands,) and begin with the first page, which contains a list of the papers composing the record—from that he will learn the Bengalee Numbers and the definition of the papers. The first paper will probably be a petition: from a perusal of that, he will learn the usual run of such documents, the outlines of the case, and probably the Attorney who has drawn up the petition, will quote Regulations, Chapter and verse, which have or have not something to do with the case. He should refer to a Bengalee copy of the Regulation quoted, and see how far it does apply. He may then proceed to the orders written on the back of the petition, and trace their execution throughout, viz. by the issue and returns of processes, the presentation and depositions of witnesses, the variety of documentary proofs tendered, and filed with the record, until he comes to the final proceeding, which will contain a short review of the whole, and a statement of the judgment of the deciding Officer, and the reasons of it. Wherever a Regulation or Circular Order is mentioned, he should invariably ask for and read the Bengalee version of it. The first three Nutthees which the Assistant takes up in this way, he should read three times each, and only diminish this frequent perusal of the same papers, when he feels perfectly master of the whole; which he will very shortly do, if he perseveres in the course here indicated.

10. He will by this means, and by seeking as much intercourse in the vernacular with the Natives as he can command, soon acquire a full mastery of the language, and with it, of the duties of his office, of the power of doing good, and affording protection and comfort in and out of that office, to the oppressed masses. It will be his, Parcere subjectis et debellare superbos; and deep pride and pleasure will be felt in the power; a power few have now sufficient command of the vernacular to be able to exercise, but which command once acquired, need never be lost, and will ever be a constant source of pleasure and profit to himself and his fellow creatures.

EDUCATION.

"Nipal, April 16, 1843.

"MY DEAR SIR,

* * * * * * * * *

"With regard to the general subject—from much experience of the sentiments and habits of natives I conclude, that the real uses of book learning are unknown to them, and that they dream not of the great object of arousing the many to think purpose-like on the actual business of life, or of making a facile bridge from theory to practice, so that millions shall have a chance of producing a Bacon or a Newton from among their vast number, whilst every practical farmer, trader, and craftsman is placed within reach of the principles lying at the bottom of his daily toil; and men following letters as a craft are made to come under the wholesome influence of common sense. I say, I think these, the real objects of national education, are undreamt of in India, as they were till lately in Europe; and thus I account for the deplorable, as indisputable, fact, that natives are habitually and scornfully neglectful of their mother tongue, and are eager to acquire English, or Sanscrit, or Persian, solely for the power or pelf thence directly derivable by the individual acquirer of one or the other.

"Now I consider that, if we would really benefit India by book education, it must be as we benefit her by our Government and our laws; that is, by reaching the many—by dis-casting book lore, or enfranchising it in fact; and that, with the objects above spoken of as the only real and sound ones, we should make their realization our primary end and aim. Mitte studia in mores, in vitam; make knowledge the handmaid of every day utility; and give its acquisition the utmost possible facilities. Such are my wishes; and therefore I give an unlimited preference to a vernacular medium, both for its facility, and for its aptitude to make the knowledge conveyed through it practically effective in a beneficial way; and also for its diffusible quality—book knowledge itself being so apt to pass away from utility, or to be abused as a mere engine of selfish aggrandisement. But, though I give the mother tongues the first and second place, I give English the third; and in my normal college, which is not so much an educational establishment as an indirect means of making all such establishments efficient, I would have the alumni equally versed in both tongues—their own and ours. Again, I think that, to indigenate a sound literature in India, to kindle a wholesome spirit of knowledge, and to fit the spoken tongues of the land for being its organs, are mighty projects, that call for express, systematic measures, subsidiary to education ordinarily so called, but which alone can make such education valuable and effective; and in my college I want to establish and fix these measures: I want to locate therein a set of able men of the West, who shall be competent to choose the books and parts of books best fitted to give to India the essence of our INDISPUTABLE knowledge; and to associate them with other men of this land, English and native, who, together with them, shall transfuse that essence into the vulgar tongues of India, in the most attractive and efficient manner; while both classes, as professors, and originators of the great change, shall have under them a set of alumni, chosen from the best pupils of all our seminaries, for the express and perpetual purpose of diffusing the labours of the professors, in the capacities of teachers and of translators, and of replacing those professors gradually as heads of the college; these alumni to have scholarships, and to be devoted for their lives as the pioneers of a new literature; bound to translating within the college, and to teaching abroad; giving their whole talents to indigenate European lore; and being to the usual educational establishments a perpetual fount for the supply of good books and good teachers. Well begun is half done, emphatically: let us once set the people of India in the right path, and they will follow it; but to succeed in this we must produce the essence of our knowledge in the most attractive form, and spread it with systematic skill: the books and the teachers should be excellent; and yet we have in India now, not only not either of the desiderata, but no adequate means of reaching them, except through a wasteful series of failures, and of time. No man among us is competent to select the very best books and parts of books: no man among us, or institution, can furnish the best translation that might be had soon, on system: no man among us can set a foot in India, without system, the splendid methods of teaching now in use in Europe. As for the alumni we now raise, 'tis passing absurd to suppose that they will, or can, put their shoulders to the wheel of a radical change in knowledge and education; we must devote a set of select instruments to that work—make them the pioneers of the new literature—provide for them for life, and bind them to teaching for life: we must also give them living exemplars of what is wanted, and how to remedy the defects, in the professors of the central college; and we must choose these professors from among the really able of England and of India, so that their books and their teaching shall be first rate, and fitted to inchoate and set ageing the vast and noble project of the Europeanization of the Indian mind. 'Tis stuff for any of us in India to fancy we are masters of any one branch of science, or that not being so, we can transfuse its essence into Indian tongues; and 'tis greater stuff to suppose that our random pupils will ever, voluntarily and unpaid, devote themselves to the painful and profitless walk of literature and instruction, as book-makers, or book-expounders.* Yet we must have the best books, best translated; we must have a set of native pioneers of the new knowledge; and the professors and alumni of my normal college are to furnish and be these; the alumni being provided for well for life, and bound for life to letters as their vocation and glory—and the professors, picked men of England and India, European and native, masters of the most essential branches of knowledge, and capable of transfusing its vital spirit into the spoken tongues of India, through their books, and through their alumni, fully trained by them in the art and science of teaching, one of the noblest and most difficult of arts. Ecce totum! Behold my college in its professors and its professees, or alumni—the latter the normal teachers of any and every school that may want them, and the heirs of the first and original European professors, so soon as fit to take their places. Abroad, these alumni are to teach in English, or in the vernaculars, as the institution that sends for them, and for the time pays them, shall please; at home, they are to study the genius of both our and the eastern tongues, and to labour, subordinately, as translators, or transfusers, (in original works as they may be able,) whilst they resume their scholarship allowance, suspended so long as they were abroad.† Let us then, systematically and adequately, set to work, and we shall lay a solid foundation: let us fiddle faddle, as at present, and fifty years hence that foundation will have to be laid, with a nearly sheer loss of all ad interim labours.

"But I must pause; though, my heart being full, I could write for ever.

"Believe me,

"Very truly yours,

"S. H. HENDSON.

* These avocations are never remunerative, till the public has become their patron; and the public will never become so, until close reference to life and its business govern education and letters—a result we are just now reaching in Europe, slowly and painfully: but yesterday, there, men of letters and teachers were poor and despised! Can you read my riddle now? I want to make literature and education such that the Indian native public will become their patrons, and thus to anticipate the work of time—of ages lost in India, as in Europe, unless the remedy be adequately applied.

† Their constant duties, as teachers or translators, will prevent idleness; and they are liable to lose their perpetual endowment for proven incapacity, or indolence and bad conduct.

BOALIA GOVERNMENT SCHOOL.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—As neither you nor any of your contemporaries have published the account of a very interesting examination of the above named Institution—I beg to send you one, trusting you will give it an early insertion.

The annual distribution of prizes to the students of the School, took place on the School Premises on Tuesday, the 12th instant, at 11 A. M. before a very large and respectable audience, consisting of G. C. Cheap, R. B. Garrett, and T. C. Loch, Esqrs. Dr. A. Wilson and Mr. Perrong: among the ladies were seen, Mrs. Garrett, Mrs. Loch, Mrs. Wilson, and Mrs. Perrong. There were also present several respectable Hindoos and Mahomedans, among the latter were Moulvee Abdool Ali Khan Behadoor, the Principal Sudder Ameen, Moulvees Sadut Ali and Museurlhuck, the Sudder Ameen and Law Officer, &c. &c.

Mr. Garrett, the present senior member of the Committee presided. The junior classes were examined by him, in Reading, Explanation, Geography and Arithmetic; the students of the third and second classes, underwent an examination in History and Geography. The first class in a passage from Shakespear.

Their answers to the several questions put to them, were very correct; and on the whole, they acquitted themselves in a style which reflected great credit on themselves and their respective teachers.

The above part of the business being over, the successful students of each class, whose proficiency had been critically tested in a private examination, conducted a few days before by Messrs. Garrett and Loch, were called by name and presented with the Prizes composed of appropriate Books with an exhortative address from the chair. Next was called the Student who had been ordered by Government to be awarded with the scholarship. It was here, that Mr. Cheap,* the Judge of the District, manifested the great interest which he took in the cause of native education: he rose up, and spoke in a short but very able speech in allusion to the grant of scholarships, and the great concern which British Government feels for the enlightenment of its subjects. The speech was in Hindoostanee, being intended for the comprehension of the audience as well of the students. He also gave a prize of 20 Rs. to the other pupils of the first class. I am further given to understand, that he has promised to bestow a prize of 50 Rs. for the best English Essay at the next examination.

The President Mr. Garrett, has also offered a reward of 25 Rs. for the best Bengalee Essay† and Mr. Loch, one of 16 for the best translation from vernacular into English.

I cannot conclude the subject without returning my heartfelt thanks to the present members of the Local Committee here, for their unremitting zeal and attention to promote the prosperity of this Institution. The Meeting dissolved at 2 P. M.; the thanks of the Committee being voted to the Head Master, Baboo Sharodapersad Bose.

Yours obediently,

MUTIUS, a young Hindoo.

* He has not as yet been appointed a member of the Committee.

† Would it not be better to give the prize for a best translation from English into vernacular?

By no means.—Ed. Friend of India.

RELIGIOUS.

RELIGIOUS STATISTICS OF LANCASHIRE.—Mr. Edward Baines's Letters "on the Social, Educational, and Religious State of the Manufacturing Districts," with the important Statistical Returns, originally inserted in the Leeds Mercury, are now republished in a thin octavo volume. In this shape, they claim a place in every library, as presenting, in an authenticated form, the most splendid demonstration of the power of voluntary zeal to provide the means of Education and Religious Instruction for a rapidly increasing population, that was ever exhibited; such a demonstration as, Mr. Baines remarks, "will give new confidence to those who have most implicitly relied upon Christian principle, and may lead the statesman to doubt the necessity, advantage, and even propriety of that interference to which rulers and legislators have always been so prone."

The Dissenters of England have continually been accused by their political friends—we say nothing of their enemies—of over-rating their strength and numerical importance: the progress of inquiry has uniformly resulted in showing that these have always been under-rated. We do not believe there existed an individual in the Kingdom sanguine enough to have anticipated the satisfactory results which these statistical inquiries have brought out. They show that, in the Manufacturing Districts in which the population has so rapidly increased,—although, during the last two-and-forty years, there have been erected only 57 churches by Parliamentary grants, and 148 other churches and chapels connected with the State church,—together, 205, with 200,852 sittings;—there have been built by Voluntary contributions no fewer than 1,030 places of worship not connected with the Establishment, with 482,443 sittings. Added to those churches and other places of worship built before 1800, the totals will stand thus:—

|---|---|---|
| Churches and Chapels of the Establishment, .......... | 383 | 377,104 |
| Other places of worship, | 1,258 | 617,479 |
| | 1,641 | 994,583 |

The increase in the Church sittings has been 113 per cent.; the increase in the sittings in other places of worship, 357 per cent. But, while Parliament has provided only 70,611 sittings in these districts, the people have provided for themselves nearly nine times as many in the Episcopal and other places built by Voluntary zeal. And yet, there are those who affect to doubt the power of the Voluntary principle!

So far as regards Lancashire, we have the means of comparing the Returns obtained by Mr. Baines with the Parliamentary Return of 1830; which, however, embraces, not the Manufacturing Districts of Lancashire only, but the whole County of Lancaster. This circumstance must be taken into account, as well as the fact, that twelve years have elapsed since the Return was made:—

| Return of 1830. | Church of England. | Other Places. |
|---|---|---|
| Hundred of Amounderness, | 16 | 60 |
| " Blackburn, ...... | 36 | 117 |
| " Leyland, .... | 18 | 34 |
| " Lonsdale, North of the Sands, | 30 | 12 |
| " Lonsdale, South of the Sands, | 30 | 17 |
| " Salford, ....... | 83 | 206 |
| " West Derby, .. | 68 | 144 |
| | 281 | 590 |
| Mr. Baines's Returns from the Manufacturing Districts. | | |
| Built before 1800 ......... | 83 | 96 |
| Built since 1800 ......... | 117 | 472 |
| | 200 | 568 |

It may be inferred pretty confidently, that, in this County, as in most parts of the Kingdom, churches have been planted most thickly where the population is the thinnest. Thus, taking the whole County, the disparity in respect of churchroom, between the State Church and the other denominations, would seem not to be so great as in the Manufacturing Districts; but, in point of attendance, the State Church would gain nothing by extending the comparison to the Agricultural Districts.

It is one important feature of these Statistical Tables, that they show not only the increase of spiritual provision, but also what denominations chiefly have extended themselves. Mr. Edward Baines has, in his "County Denominational Summaries," somewhat needlessly multiplied the subdivisions: we shall throw them into a more convenient arrangement, similar to that which is followed in the last Report of the Registrar-General:—

| | Built before 1800 | Built Since 1800 |
|---|---|---|
| Presbyterians, Scotch, ....... | 2 | 8 |
| " Unitarians, ... | 18 | 11 |
| Independents, ............ | 17 | 77 |
| Baptists, ............... | 13 | 55 |
| Wesleyan Methodist, ...... | 16 | 99 |
| Ditto, other Connexions, .... | 3 | 134 |
| Calvinistic Methodists, ...... | 3 | 12 |
| Moravian, ............... | — | 2 |
| Roman Catholic, .......... | 11 | 25 |
| Friends, ............... | 7 | 6 |
| New Jerusalem, .......... | 2 | 10 |
| Miscellaneous, .......... | 4 | 33 |
| | 96 | 472 |

From this it will be seen, that nearly half the increase (233) has been owing to the expansive force of Methodism. The Congregationalists (Independents and Baptists) have, during the last forty years, more than quadrupled the number of their places of worship, which was only 30 in 1800, and is now 132. Of these, 52 Independent and 19 Baptist have been registered for the solemnization of marriages. Strange to say, however, only 8 Wesleyan Methodist Chapels have hitherto been registered for that purpose in the whole County, and only 187 places of worship of all descriptions. The increase of Roman Catholics has been larger than appears from the Returns, which, upon this point, must be defective; no fewer than 63 Roman Catholic buildings in Lancashire are registered for the solemnization of marriage; and, though many private chapels, probably, are included, the discrepancy can scarcely be explained by this circumstance. Upon the whole, however, it is satisfactory to find, that what has chiefly been extended in the shape of a provision for religious instruction, has been Popular Protestantism; that is, substantially, Evangelical Truth. Presbyterianism has been almost at a stand-still; and Congregationalism has, it must be confessed, not advanced in the degree required by the wide field which called for occupation: still, in harmony with Methodism as regards the main doctrines of the Gospel, it has done much to extend the knowledge and profession of the Christian faith,—far more, indeed, than the Church of England. But there are peculiarities in the condition of a large proportion of the population of this County, to which Methodism has been able more successfully to adapt itself; and it is attributable to these same causes, that the Wesleyan body has seen itself outstripped by some of the new "Connexions" which have branched from it.

With regard to the Miscellaneous sects or denominations, when it is considered that Lancashire has always been more especially the birthplace and nursery of sectarian anomalies, the very officina hereticorum,—that Manchester is the head-quarters of Swedenborgism, that Anne Lee there commenced her mission, and that some varieties of existing denominations are confined to the county palatine,—when these things are taken into consideration, it must be deemed to afford ground for satisfaction, that the increase under Miscellaneous should be so trivial. Of the thirty-three undescribed places of worship, those of the Stephensites might have been classed under Methodists; and the Inghamites are quiet Mystics allied to the Moravians. There is a congregation styling itself "Christian Israelites;" and five are registered as belonging to no specific denomination. A sneering "Catholic" might make a large display of the titles of these half-score nondescript varieties of Protestantism, although, in fact, varieties far more numerous and discordant exist within the Romish pale. But what does all our Sectarianism amount to? Strike off from the 568 places of worship the odd number, and the 500 left will be found to comprise no other distinctions than arise either from a difference of Church government, or of ritual, or of theological tenet upon points confessedly non-essential; while, in all the grand articles of the Protestant faith, these six or seven religious bodies are all found agreeing, and recognising their mutual agreement. Surely this is, on the whole, a satisfactory view of things

We have confined our attention, in these remarks, to the Statistics of Lancashire, because the Parliamentary Returns of 1830 relate to no other county. Whether the result of those Returns disappointed the parties who had moved for them, by showing the Church to be weaker, and Dissent stronger, than had been anticipated, or whether the specimen was deemed sufficient for its purpose, we know not: it is certainly much to be regretted, that the inquiry was pushed no further, and that it did not embrace the means of Education. The Returns obtained by Mr Edward Baines are far more comprehensive as to the object of inquiry, and more trustworthy, minute, and accurate, than any which the House of Commons have hitherto been fortunate enough to procure. The religious public are under deep obligations to him for his assiduity and the pains which he has taken in the preparation of this important document. But, why should not the inquiry be prosecuted by other public-spirited gentlemen in other counties, in reference to their own localities? The expense, if so divided, would be inconsiderable. All parties are deeply interested in ascertaining the actual state of the population, in respect to the means of elementary training and religious instruction; and it is deplorable that, for want of a fund for such objects, those who might be looked to as best qualified to undertake the labour, are deterred from setting about it.—Pat.

WESTERN ACADEMY.—The anniversary of the above institution was held at Exeter on the 27th and 28th ult., on which occasion a respectable body of friends to an educated ministry attended. The students were examined on Ethical Science, Logic, General Grammar, and Divinity; classes having been conducted by the Theological Tutor through an extensive series of lectures on mental and moral science, Rhetoric, Elements of Language, and General Grammar, Natural Science, Mathematics, and Theology. In Hebrew, they read the Messianic Psalms; in Syriac, parts of the Book of Revelation; in the Classics, in Homer's Iliad, Lucian's Dialogues, and Sallust. The classes having read portions of the Apocrypha, in Greek, with a special view to the history of the Jews, in the times immediately preceding the advent of Messiah, the Epistles to the Corinthians, and the Epistles of Clemens Romanus, the entire Chaldee of the Old Testament, and the Satires, and some of the Epistles of Horace. Four of the students prepared Essays:—1. On the History of the Doctrine of Transubstantiation. 2. The Messianic Interpretation of the Psalms. 3. The History of the Septuagint Version. 4. The Hellennisms of the New Testament. The examination afforded ample proof of the effective manner in which the respected tutors had attended to their important duties; and as it respects the students, while varying degrees of talent and acquirement were evinced, the impression was, that commendable and successful diligence had been exhibited in pursuit of their various studies. At the general meeting, the friends and subscribers derived great pleasure from the fact, that, in consequence of the active exertions of friends who know the value of the institution, and of some new arrangements made by the committee, the financial state of the institution presents an improved aspect, which, it is hoped, its friends will continue to sustain. A sermon was delivered on the occasion, in the chapel in Castle-street, by the Rev. G. Smith, of Popular, London.—Pat.

"WHAT IS PUSEYISM?—This is a question which has often been asked, and almost as variously answered. Unhappily it is our lot this week to be enabled to supply a less equivocal answer than is generally given. On Sunday last, the Rev. J. Moore, Roman Catholic priest, read to his congregation, in the mass-house in Bath-street, the sermon for preaching which Dr. Pusey has been suspended; and, commenting on the said sermon, described it as a pure exposition of (Roman) Catholic doctrine. We will not weaken this fact by any extended observations. If the broad fact itself is not sufficient to command attention, a broad page full of animadversions would be utterly thrown away."—Birmingham Advertiser.

THE WAR OF INTERDICTS, which, it was hoped, had ceased by the abandonment, on the part of those so long subjected to them, of the benefits of the Establishment, has been renewed in a more oppressive form than ever. The Rev. Mr. M'Leod, of Snizort, whose ministrations have been so signally blessed in the island of Skye, and who has been denied the accommodation necessary for the erection of a place of worship, has further been interdicted, at the instance of M'Leod of M'Leod, from holding "any meeting for the purpose of preaching or lecturing," on any part of the extensive district belonging to M'Leod in that island, "including the roads or highways therein."—Edinburgh Witness.

THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—Mr. Wallace gave notice, last night, that he would this evening put the following questions:—

"To inquire of the Solicitor-General whether in his opinion, the passing of the Church of Scotland Benefices Bill is compatible with the oath which the Queen took, on her accession to the throne, to maintain inviolate the rights and privileges of the Scotch Church, as they were passed in the Parliament of Scotland.

"To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if it is the intention of her Majesty's advisers, with a majority of only 18, to endeavour to carry the Church of Scotland Benefices Bill in the present Session."

The oath which the Queen took at her accession is the following:—

"I, Victoria, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, defender of the faith, do faithfully promise and swear that I shall inviolably maintain and preserve the settlement of the true Protestant religion, with the government, worship, discipline, rights, and privileges of the Church of Scotland, as established by the laws made there in prosecution of the claim of right, and particularly by an act intituled 'An Act for securing the Protestant Religion, and Presbyterian Church Government,' and by the acts passed in the Parliament of both kingdoms, for the union of the two kingdoms."

From this it would appear that the Sovereign swears to maintain the Church according to the laws of Scotland as they stood at the period when the Act of Union passed. How, then, can the Queen give her assent to Lord Aberdeen's bill?—Pat.

BICENTENARY OF THE WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY.—A series of meetings to commemorate the Assembly of Divines, which was held at Westminster 200 years ago, was held in Edinburgh last week. They were attended by deputations from the various Dissenting Presbyterian Bodies in Scotland, including the Secession, Relief, Free Church, Reformed Presbyterian Church, Original Seceders, and others. The proceedings extended over three days, and were of a most interesting nature. A spirit of brotherhood seemed to actuate all who took part in the proceedings; minor differences were forgotten, or admitted to be things of comparatively small importance; and, at the conclusion of the meeting on Thursday, a resolution was proposed and carried, in which it was recommended that the various Presbyterian Churches in Scotland should have frequent meetings of the same nature. The following extracts from speeches and papers which were read at the meetings, will give some idea of their spirit and nature.

After papers had been read by the Rev. Mr. M'Crie and Mr. Hetherington, by the first upon the leading character and incidents of the Westminster Assembly, and by the second on the character and bearing of that Assembly.

Dr. Cunningham made a severe attack upon Popery. He said: "The friends of Christ ought to be ever observing what Popery was doing—they ought to be seeking to fathom her schemes and machinations, and they ought to be apprehending danger from that quarter. All other churches may be reformed—they had no reason for concluding that they would not be reformed—but this was one of the grand and distinguishing peculiarities of the Church of Rome, that it could not be reformed; but that it was to be destroyed by the breath of Jehovah, and consumed by the brightness of his coming. Popery must be regarded as the corruption of everything about Christianity—its doctrines, government, worship, and discipline; and almost all the errors and heresies which have arisen were just parts and branches of Popery, except in some cases where we, in place of adopting Popish errors, have run into what may be regarded as the opposite extremes, such as Socinianism and Erastianism."

Dr. Bremer, who appeared as one of a deputation from the English Secession body, said, he had come up with very modified expectations of the advantages that were to flow from this meeting, and expected undiscriminate eulogy upon the Westminster divines; but he had been most agreeably disappointed, and he trusted that the meeting would not separate without fixing the time for a future meeting. (Cheers.) He did not think the different Presbyterian bodies in Scotland were yet ripe for incorporation; but if they were to co-operate in the things in which they are agreed, they would come to incorporation in due time. He would deprecate one General Assembly for England and Scotland; he thought that would be too unwieldy a body; but he would suggest that they should have a kind of joint committee, representing all the different denominations, that might frame regulations for their mutual intercourse; and especially to provide that one denomination should not encroach upon another in the formation of new churches. (Applause.)

But the grand curiosity of these meetings was a speech upon the Voluntary question by Dr. Chalmers at the last day's meeting. "We," said the doctor, "we of the Free Church stand hopelessly dissevered from the party in question (the State)—(great laughter)—and we have as little hope of restoring the connexion as if there had sprung up between us an immovable wall of brass a thousand cubits high. (Laughter and cheers.) I am so delighted with this question that I take a kind of scientific interest in it; I am quite on edge about it. (Laughter.) Voluntaryism is now upon its trial, and I want to give it a fair trial; and I am sure I shall do it all the justice in my power, by drawing forth its resources and its capacities to the utmost. (Laughter and cheers.) The way to give it a fair trial is to try how much it will yield, when all fair influences are brought to bear upon it, and in justice to the question—in justice to Voluntaryism—I must say that for a good many years we knocked at the door of Government with a view to receive aid from them to carry forth the Gospel to the humblest and lowest classes of the country; and were there exposed to all the higglings with which we are so familiar in the market. We were cheapened down to the lowest possible amount—we were asked, would 10,000*l.* do you? and *the result is, that we got no*thing at all. (Laughter.) We have since tried the Voluntary principle; and, in as few months as we before negotiated years with the Government, Voluntaryism has made this demonstration, that it has given us 300,000*l.*—(loud cheers)—so that she has begun well; and it is my fervent hope that she will end well. This reminds me of the story of the well-digger, who succeeded so amply in obtaining water, that he made a narrow escape from drowning in the abundant rushing of the streams which he had evolved from their hidden places—(laughter)—and so I say in perfect honesty, that if my favourite system, the Establishment system, which I advocate—if it should incur it may be the semblance, nay, even the reality of defeat and refutation, I should heartily rejoice: if Voluntaryism should play upon us in all directions. I would be heartily glad, even though it should make such a demonstration of its excellence and power as well nigh to submerge myself, and utterly to overwhelm my arguments. (Laughter and cheering.) I say of Voluntaryism, bring it to the test—try if it can overtake the wants of the thousands and tens of thousands who are now utterly beyond the pale of the ordinances of the Gospel, and strangers to the habits and decencies of a Christian land. To this test we appeal; and I shall be happy if the appeal prove so successful that you could overtake this destitution."

Professor Harper, of the United Secession, read a paper on the value and uses of subordinate standards and confessions; but he urged the importance of submitting such standards to a calm review; at periods favourable to the undertaking—a review not in the spirit of men given to change, but in the spirit of men who know, and are forward to acknowledge, that no work of human prudence, learning, or piety, is perfect, so as to be unimprovable.

Dr. Candlish, in winding up the proceedings, expressed a hope that members of the congregational denomination would be found at their future meetings.—Pat.

OXFORDISM IN NEW YORK.—Eleven young men were on Sunday, the 2nd July, ordained at St. Stephen's Church, by Rev. Bishop Onderdonk. The service was read by Rev. Dr. Berrian, and the sermon was preached by the Bishop. After he had concluded, the eleven candidates stood around the altar, when he announced, as is customary, that he was about to ordain them, and requested that if there were any person or persons who had any objections to make, or knew aught against them, they would now announce the same. A moment of silence ensued, when the Rev. Hugh Smith (of St. Peter's) rose in the middle aisle, and stated that he had by letter yesterday informed the Bishop that he should protest against the ordination of one of the candidates, Mr. Carey, in consequence of his holding opinions favourable to Romanism; and he did now accordingly protest. When he sat down, Rev. Mr. Anthon, of St. Mark's Church, who had been sitting in the same pew with Mr. Smith, also rose, and in like manner protested against the ordination of Mr. Carey, for the same reason. The Churchman of the following week censured with great severity the conduct of Drs. Anthon and Smith, in consequence of which these clergymen, who are men of great piety, we understand, and of eminent abilities, have published in the papers a card in which they say that they shall soon give to the public "a full disclosure from the beginning of all the matters connected with this most painful occurrence in the Church."—Boston Christian Watchman.

JAMAICA.—Jamaica papers furnish nothing worthy of remark, with the exception of a little matter of clerical importance. It appears that Puseyism, or Tractarianism,—Popery, rank Popery, in fact,—has shown its ugly face amongst the Established,—the Protestant clergy of the Island. It is stated, that a Meeting of the Clergy was lately held in Kingston when three of that body (two of them, we believe, had been Chaplains to the late Bishop) proposed that prayers should be offered up for the repose of the Bishop's soul. The unscriptural suggestion was, however, indignantly scouted by the consistent professors of Protestant Christianity.—Barbadoes Paper.

We understand (says the Dublin Newsman) that two nuns, ladies of most exemplary conduct, and for upwards of twenty years members of an eminent convent in the suburbs of Dublin, have, from frequent acts of constraint practised on them by the deputy mother abbess, for self-preservation of life and health, recently made their escape from the establishment. They are of respectable connexions in Dublin, who intend to appeal to the laws of their country for redress.—Record.

ROMISH MIRACLES.—The Univers publishes the following extraordinary relation on the authority of a letter from Rome, and states that the same information has reached it from various sources:—"For the last week nothing has been talked of at Rome but miracles. On St. Peter's day a journeyman mason, whose legs had been broken in several places by a fall from a scaffold, and who for some time past had dragged himself from Madonna to Madonna on his crutches, to implore a cure, stopped before the image of the Virgin which is placed under a sort of shed serving as a passage, not far from the Jews' quarter. He prayed before it with his usual fervour. At length, rising, he said, 'This is enough, Madonna; I have been addressing to you on all sides my prayers long enough; take my crutches, I will have no more of them; I leave them to you; you cannot be hard hearted enough to abandon me in the middle of my road; you are too good not to assist me and furnish me with strength to return home.' Hardly had he thrown his crutches at the feet of the Virgin, when he felt a commotion in all his limbs, and was in an instant cured, as well and as sound as before his accident. He began immediately to shout, 'A miracle!' and the people, who were acquainted with his previous infirmity and his daily prayers, carried him to his home in triumph. The news of this prodigy spread rapidly, and all the lame, blind, and infirm rushed to the compassionating Madonna. In a few moments the adjoining streets were thronged, and it was who should pray most fervently. In order, to thank the good Madonna, and conciliate her the more, carpets and hangings were brought, and an altar was set up with wax candles, magnificent decorations, and splendid transparencies, with the cipher of Mary. It is said that new miracles were operated on the following days. On Tuesday there were so many wax candles burning at the foot of the Madonna that the drapery of the altar was set on fire. The consternation was now general. The people, dreading lest the Madonna should be burnt, put up prayers for her safety in accents of despair. Happily they succeeded in extinguishing the fire. To prevent new accidents, and the tumult which the collection of such crowds would occasion, orders were given to remove the venerated image to the neighbouring church. A priest was charged with this task, and although the removal took place at two in the morning, escorted by a detachment of Dragoons, it was effected with great difficulty, the people being opposed to the removal. Since Wednesday the image is in the church of Santa-Maria-del-Pianto. The crowd remains the same, but order has been established, and troops are stationed in the neighbourhood. The infirm, large and small, are ranged in front of the sanctuary before the crowd, which only gives way to allow the sick, who are brought from time to time, to pass." Another letter of the 3rd, in the same journal, says—"I write to you under the impression of an event sufficiently striking for me to communicate. Yesterday evening I was with Monseigneur and Mademoiselle, when Dorothea entered in great agitation, exclaiming, 'A great miracle has just been performed by the Madonna, who, four days ago, cured the lame mason; the little girl of a washer-woman, who lives below, has walked.' You must have remarked that child always before the palace, resting on two crutches; she was born without the use of her feet, the bones of which, like those of the legs, were as soft as a rag, and would not support her; whilst sitting on the staircase the servant said to her, 'Go and pray to the Madonna who cured the mason.' She went slowly on her crutches, and arriving before the Madonna, began to pray. Hardly had she finished, when a voice said to her, 'Leave your crutches and go home; she then walked for the first time. This she has herself related to us."—Pat.

SLAVERY.—We beg to call the special attention of our readers to the admirable address which follows, agreed to by the late General Anti-slavery Convention. We think it cannot fail to carry conviction to the consciences of those to whom it is addressed. In matter and style it is perfectly unexceptionable. We trust our friends everywhere will feel it to be their duty to give it a wide circulation:—

TO THE MEMBERS OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES IN THE SEVERAL STATES OF THE AMERICAN UNION, AND THROUGHOUT THE WORLD, WHERE THE SIN OF SLAVERY STILL CONTINUES.

It has been the most painful duty of this Convention to be compelled to reiterate the protests of former Conventions against the practice of Christian churches in the United States of America, who openly countenance, or abstain from denouncing, the crime of slavery.

The sin of slavery is now so generally admitted, even by men who do not take the Word of God as their guide, that it appears superfluous to this Convention to sustain their convictions by lengthened arguments.

It should suffice to state the simple fact, that where slavery exists, man necessarily becomes the property of his fellow man, and is thus accounted by him and dealt with as part of his goods and chattels. Consequent upon this is the amount of physical and mental suffering inflicted upon slaves, in the aggravated cruelties which are perpetrated in order to render that property more valuable and safe; and the mental pangs which are produced by the arbitrary disruption of the most sacred and endearing of earthly ties.

But far more fearful is that guilt which the slaveholder incurs in the moral degradation of the slave, so inseparable from a state of bondage, whereby he is kept in ignorance of that Gospel which is emphatically declared to be "good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people,"—"to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet in the way of peace."

Man not only thus becomes the owner of the blood and sinews of his fellow man, but he assumes a property in his soul, which he unhesitatingly consigns to all the miseries which await the unrenewed and the depraved in another state. To slaveholders are addressed the solemn words of Jehovah, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground."

Yet greater must be the condemnation when such crimes are sanctioned and committed by those who profess and call themselves Christians, who are acting against the light of knowledge—against those remonstrances which have in former years been addressed to you by the friends of humanity in this and other lands—and especially against those convictions which this Convention must believe have again and again been produced on your minds by the Spirit of God in giving efficacy to the word of his grace.

Brethren, we tremble for your responsibility when you shall stand before the tribunal of the God of justice in the day of judgment. We pray for you that you may see the great inconsistency of your conduct with your profession as members of Christ; and that with true repentance you may turn unto the Lord and forsake this evil, which calls for the vengeance of the most high God.

Let no excuses be made for the continuance of this sin a single hour. We believe that the immediate emancipation of your slaves should be attended with the happiest results to them and to yourselves; but the consequences, whatever they be, we must leave with God, who has made the duty of every Christian in this matter plain, and requires implicit obedience to those great truths which he has promulgated for the government of his creatures, and which are designed to secure their temporal and eternal welfare.

There is another sin which must be charged against the churches of America; one which this Convention cannot name without feeling that its sanction and countenance by professing Christians calls for its special denouncement.

The distinctions which are upheld between free men of colour—the men whose shackles have been broken—and the white population, are distinctions which must be abhorrent to the mind of God, who "has made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." God is no respecter of persons; but you are of another spirit, and sanction the degradation of a portion of your fellow men. You thus countenance and perpetuate prejudices in the minds of those who do not profess to act upon Christian principles, and you stand out from among the men of all nations, as violating the golden rule: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." We may well be astonished at the fact, and ask, is it possible that even in the Church of Christ his disciples draw lines of demarcation to continue on the earth, but which shall be unknown in Heaven?

To you especially, the ministers of the Cross, who are commissioned to proclaim the rectitude of God's laws, and to make known his salvation, we would affectionately address ourselves. How fearful will be your guilt, if you countenance by your practice or by your silence so great a crime! If you give forth an uncertain sound, will you be clear from the blood of all men? Will not rather the people of your charge be guided in their conduct by you? and will they not witness against you in the great day of the Lord, that you failed to make known to them the whole counsel of God?

Oh! descendants of the men who left their father land for conscience sake—Oh! fathers of the children who as they grow up are taught to proclaim the country of their birth as the land of liberty and of freedom; shake off the double inconsistency of which you are guilty, as Christians and as men! Let us hail you as brethren in Christ, and as possessing that freedom wherewith he makes his people free.

Let another Convention have the pain which we have experienced this day, whilst we affectionately, but with all fidelity, condemn you for evils which are great in the sight of God, and abhorrent to the minds and hearts of his true disciples.

(Signed) THOMAS CLARKSON,
President of the Convention.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SIR R. PEEL AND MR. J. S. BUCKINGHAM.—At the recent examination of the young gentlemen educated at the celebrated establishment called Bruce Castle, near London, kept by Mr. Hill (father of Mr. Rowland Hill, of Post-office celebrity, and his son, Mr. Arther Hill,) Mr. J. S. Buckingham related an anecdote respecting his own son, who had been educated at Bruce Castle. Sir Robert Peel, meeting him (Mr. Buckingham) in the lobby of the House of Commons, told him that he had some good news for him: Sir Robert proceeded to say, that a situation in the West Indies having fallen vacant, it became his duty to fill it up, when he found there were 200 applicants for it. He, upon that, remarked he could do nothing with such a list, and sent it to the department with which the appointment was connected (the Customs), and requested the Commissioners would decide who was fittest to fill it. My son, said Mr. Buckingham, was not on the list. The situation was too good for him to think of applying for; but such had been his conduct, from the habits he had acquired at Bruce Castle, that his name was sent to Sir Robert Peel as the fittest person in the establishment to fill the vacant post; and, said Sir Robert, I have much pleasure in proving that political differences would not cause me to oppose the advancement of a son of yours, who has been recommended by his merit alone.—Ibid.

POLICY OF THE WHIGS.—On Tuesday s'unight, a large meeting of the Liberal members of the House of Commons was held at the Reform Club, convened by a circular of Lord John Russell, being the first meeting so called by the leader of the Opposition in the present Session. As many incorrect reports have been circulated as to the origin and result of this assembly, I will shortly state the facts. The Irish

Liberal members sent a requisition to Lord John Russell, requesting him to summon a general meeting of the Liberal members of Parliament of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to consider some appeal to the constituencies on the present critical position of Ireland. The substance of their views was embodied in the following extracts of the address:—

"The undersigned Irish representatives being deeply impressed with a sense of the dangers which may arise, not only to Ireland, but to the empire at large, if the present session should be allowed to close without some manifestation of a disposition to conduct the government of Ireland in a manner acceptable to its inhabitants, feel it their duty to exhaust every effort to avert the consequences incidental to perseverance in the course of policy now enforced against their country.

"They have applied to Parliament for redress of those grievances which have excited the discontent and called forth the complaints of the Irish people. Such redress has been denied by a large majority of the House of Commons. Their sole remaining hope now rests in the belief that the Sovereign and the people of Great Britain will not ratify that decision. They, therefore, desire to appeal to public opinion, and they still cling to the hope that there is amongst all classes in this country, without distinction of party, sufficient foresight, as well as kindly feeling towards Ireland, to induce them to prefer the adoption of just and conciliatory measures to the consequences—uncertain in their nature, but in any event lamentable—which may arise from a collision of the sister kingdoms in a struggle for the national rights of Ireland."

About a hundred members attended—Lord John Russell in the chair. His lordship stated the object of the meeting, without indicating any particular course on his own part. Much general discussion ensued, during which Mr. Byng, Mr. Bernal, Mr. C. Wood, Mr. Wyse, Lord Palmerston, and others, questioned the policy of the particular plans for an action on public opinion. The ultimate decision seemed to be against any public manifesto of Irish grievances being singly or prematurely put forward by the meeting as a body; but it was understood that the Irish members themselves would prepare such a document for future consideration. It appeared, however, to be the prevalent impression that Ministers should be, for the time, left to their own course, and to fill up the cup of their own bitterness on Irish and general policy.—London Correspondent of the Scotsman.

THE CUSTOM-HOUSE FRAUDS.—The Report of the Commissioners of Revenue Inquiry on Custom Frauds, dated the 22nd May, 1843, and presented to both Houses of Parliament, has just been published. The Commissioners were Lord Granville Somerset, Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Mr. W. B. Baring, Mr. J. Milnes Gaskill, and Mr. A Pringle. Their report is a voluminous document of about 50 folio pages. It is confessedly incomplete; the commissioners having principally directed their inquiry to frauds in the "fancy-trade," and especially in the silk, lace, and glove trades; but it necessarily embraces a general view of the Customs department and its management. The chief faults of the report are diffuseness and bad arrangement, which have the effect of confusing the statements of existing defects, the suggestion of remedies, and what may be termed the reflections of the commissioners. It serves, however, to disclose a mass of fraud and official negligence inconceivable to the uninitiated. In November, 1841, Mr. Burnby, a landing-waiter,—urged, it appears, by an uneasy conscience and the advice of a friend,—made a statement at a personal interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Dean, the Chairman of the Board of Customs, alleging the prevalence of fraud in the Custom-house, and inculpating twenty-one landing-waiters. He wished traps to be laid for the guilty parties, but that unworthy suggestion was not adopted. It was not until July, 1842, that Mr. Dean had any opportunity of prosecuting his researches into the frauds. Attention was then called to the conduct of Mr. Robert Homersham, a landing-waiter of the first class, who confessed that, first under the influence of Mr. Burnby, and latterly from habitual resort to such means of profit, he had been engaged since 1837 in the commission of frauds. Mr. Homersham has since died, from the effect of ill health, aggravated, if not caused, by anguish of mind under his exposure. The commissioners describe the following kinds of fraud respecting which they had received specific information:—

1. The granting of false certificates by the export-officers, permitting the export of one article under the name of another; as in the case of machinery, the exportation of which is prohibited.

2. Granting a false certificate of the quality, or of the existence of goods for exportation, to obtain an amount of drawback-duty far exceeding what is legally due, or a drawback for an imaginary exportation of articles which are not exported.

3. The "dummy" system, or the substitution of a package of low duty goods for a package of high-duty goods.

4. The negligent or wilful undervaluation of goods, where they are subject to ad valorem duties; and the dishonest, or careless and faulty, enumeration of the goods, where there amount is to be stated.

5. The improper computation of tare in packages.

6. A more complicated method of undervaluing goods. The landing-waiter entered an account of the goods in his "rough book;" the goods were permitted to pass under the inspection of the landing-surveyor, which was even invited; if they were actually examined by the superior officers, no fraud was attempted; but if they passed without hindrance, the entry in the rough book was obliterated, and a false entry was made in the "blue book" of the landing-waiter; the importer paid a duty tallying with the entry in the blue book; and thus the whole transaction acquired an appearance of correctness.

7. The removal of leaves from the landing-waiter's blue book, and the substitution of others with fraudulent entries, as described by Mr. Burnby, at some recent trials.

8. The obliteration of the entry in the blue book by a chemical process, and the substitution of a fraudulent entry. [This fraud rests solely on the doubtful authority of Mr. Burnby, who did not pretend that he knew any instance of it within his own practice.]

Goods entered by "sight entries" appear to have been those in which the most systematic and extensive frauds have been carried on: the extent may be guessed from the single fact that a table, compiled by Mr. Porter of the Board of Trade, shows that of late years "less than one-half of the silk goods exported from France to England pay duty on their importation into this country;" and the Commissioners believe the conclusion to be an approximation to the truth! The long continuance and wide extent of these systematic frauds would have been impossible but for the greatest laxity in the practice of the department. The instructions issued to the subordinate officers by the Commissioners of Customs are systematically and habitually disregarded. Important examples are given. Each landing-waiting, on being appointed, provides two sureties, under penalties of 500*l.* each: there is a "clerk of the securities," one of whose duties, specifically paid for by a sum of 40*l.*, is to prepare an annual report of the continued solvency of all those sureties: since the appointment of Mr. Pemberton, the present clerk of the securities, in 1834, the insufficiency of the sureties has in no instance been reported—not even in the flagrant instance of Dennin, one of Mr. Homersham's sureties, who was convicted in 1840 of a serious fraud upon the revenue, and imprisoned in Whitecross-street from the 28th Dec., 1840, to the 22nd Aug., 1841, at the suit of the Crown. The "jerquer" receives 350*l.* a-year salary, and has fifteen clerks; it is his business to check the landing-waiters' books,—or, in the words of Mr. Rowe, a jerquer, to "see that every package contained in the shipmaster's report is properly brought to account, and to see that the contents of each package have been properly assessed for the duty, or have been conveyed under the bonding system to the warehouse:" the arrear of several months in jerquing the books has been allowed to take place; and that arrear was only recently known to the Commissioners of Customs! Each blue book issued to the landing-waiters ought to be registered when it is given it is given: the books issued early in the day have been registered, but not those issued later. It is probable that those unregistered blue books furnished the leaves for fraud 7th in the list above. The Inquiry Commissioners remark, "The little importance which the officers themselves attach to an observance of their orders," is clearly manifested by the way in which they state their own irregularity, almost invariably mentioning it as the result of inevitable necessity." At the same time the commissioners express strong disapprobation of a system which throws duties upon officers that they are acknowledged to be unable to perform. The report, in as delicate terms as possible, charges the Board of Commissioners of Customs (consisting of a Chairman, Deputy Chairman, and seven other commissioners) with being remiss in their attendance, remiss in the supervision of subordinates, insufficiently informed in the practical business of the department, difficult of access to subordinate officers, and difficult of access even to persons not in the department—such as mercantile men. Scattered through the report are a variety of recommendations, which allowed to be "experimental," and a doubt escapes whether they are not altogether inadequate to the exigency. The chief are—a thorough and sweeping revision of the instructions to the officers, the avoidance of compromises of actions, a more stringent enforcement of the right to seize and sell goods which are supposed to be under-valued, a better-arranged and better-defined method of valuing goods, more diligent attendance on the part of the Board of Commissioners, with a variety of other details.—Pat.

THE FALL OF ESPARTERO.—The fall of Espartero seems, by its apparent suddenness, to have taken everybody in this country by surprise. He has suffered himself to be driven from power without striking a blow, without even making an effort to secure the capital. It had been believed, that he had only to put forth his arm, to crush the revolt at any moment. The correctness of this opinion must now be doubted. It is now evident, that he is not the man he was taken to be by our Contemporaries. The Journal des Debats represents him as having deceived both the hopes of his friends and the apprehensions of his enemies. But what was there in the history of his elevation, or in the character of his government, to inspire those hopes, or to excite any great apprehensions on the part of those opposed to him? He had not achieved greatness, but had had greatness thrust upon him. He had been indebted for his elevation to the agitation of the times, the indirect support of France, while it suited the crooked policy of Louis Philippe to play him off against the Liberals, and a caprice of Queen Christina. He was head of no party, not even the soul of a faction, but merely the man of the army. He represented personally nothing that was national,—was allied to nothing constitutional in Spain; and therefore, when he placed himself in permanent opposition to the Cortes, he found himself without moral support, without the materials for a Government, and his weakness became manifest as soon as he threw himself upon the country, his only adherents being his own officers. Rarely has the world seen so signal a miscalculation of the strength and powers of a Government, than that of Espartero, when he resolved a second time to dissolve the Cortes, and to reject the Lopez Ministry. But the miscalculation has not been on his own part alone; for, almost to the last, it was anticipated that he would be able to defeat his opponents, and maintain his high position. The immediate causes of his signal failure are not yet clearly ascertained; but it is evident that he had only his army to depend upon, and that that dependence was fallacious. We are now told, that the army has fallen into bad condition, has become demoralized, corrupted by French gold, and so forth. The army has always been in bad condition; and there is no reason to have recourse to the romantic supposition, that it has been on this occasion "bribed not to fight." The fact is, that the Times, like the rest of the Daily Journals, and perhaps more than any other, has egregiously blundered in its estimate of Espartero and in all its anticipations; so that its Spanish Correspondent has to exert all his ingenuity in order to put the best face upon matters, and to cover his own blunders. Narvaez is now nominally at the head of affairs,—a man of very moderate talents, and in whom violence is mistaken for courage. The Lopez Ministry, which he has restored, is ostensibly Liberal; at least, it was created by a Liberal Opposition; and, among the principal supporters of Narvaez in the present movement, are some of the most determined Republicans. Nothing can be more incongruous than the elements of the existing combination of parties, or more precarious than their union. So far as confusion and anarchy may tend to serve the ultimate purpose of the French Court, M. Guizot and his Master may be considered as having cause for the satisfaction they evince; but they are as far from carrying their main point as ever.

THE IRON TRADE.—The lot of the Sheffield cutlers, deplorable as it may be, is not to be compared with that of the iron-masters, who, compelled to blow out their furnaces, are about to deliver over a great portion of the country to those agitations and convulsions which invariably result from the constrained idleness and consequent misery of a numerous population. A hundred thousand forge-men are on the point of being thrown out of work; and the Government will have no other choice but either to maintain or to destroy them. They must either be satisfied with bread or silenced with bullets.

The Iron-founders have appealed to Sir Robert Peel, who replies, that he can do nothing, that there is no remedy. We tell him it is not true. The ruin of this branch of our industry might be easily prevented. The remedy is both obvious and simple, requiring only men of sense and resolution. But where are these to be found?

More than a year ago, the French Chambers voted the construction of eight hundred miles of railway. A Minister possessing common sense might, at that moment, have foreseen the decline of the rail-manufacture in England, for all our own great lines were then on the point of completion; and he might have prepared the way for the consumption of the produce of our furnaces upon the French lines, by procuring the remission of the duty of 10*l.* per ton on English iron.

The rails required for all those railways cannot possibly be manufactured in France at less than from 19*l.* to 20*l.* per ton, which, at 800 tons to the mile, the minimum ratio, amounts to 12,000,000*l.* The same rails, manufactured in England, might be delivered in France at 7*l.* per ton, or even less; which would occasion an outlay of not more than 4,480,000*l.* It results, therefore, that the same duty which deprives our artisans of work, dooms the French to pay

7,520,000*l.* more than they ought to do for this single article.

It is absurd to think and to say, that such a state of things is attributable to the prejudices of the French people. They condemn this mode of legislation as loudly as ourselves; but neither is it their doing, nor is it in their power to get rid of it. This enormous surplus is drawn into the coffers of the proprietors of forests, at the head of whom stands Louis Philippe, who carries off the lion's share, and of the proprietors of founderies, at the head of whom are Soult, Decaze's creditors, Count Jaubert, and the principal members of the two Chambers. The Iron-duty is the Corn-law of these mushroom aristocrats, and nothing but force or fear can make them repeal it.

All this, a Minister of sense could see with half an eye; and if, in addition, he were a man of resolution, it would be equally easy to him to provide the remedy. Were such a man now at the head of affairs, he would instantly send for Count St. Aulaire, and would tell him to go forthwith and report to his Royal Master (the fourth he has obsequiously served) that if, within fifteen days, the French Government should not have taken the necessary measures for repealing the Iron-duty in particular, with all other duties (varying from 30 to 1,500 per cent. ad valorem) on English produce, the British Government would regard the refusal as a declaration of commercial war, and would call Parliament together again, to impose an indiscriminate duty 1,000 per cent. ad valorem, on the whole produce of France. Lord Cowley would be instructed to make the same declaration to M. Guizot, and to conclude by apprising him that he had obtained leave of absence. This is the only way of wringing from Louis Philippe and his creatures the necessary concessions. Our retaliation would quickly be followed with movements directed by the vine-growers of the South, and the manufacturers of fancy articles in Paris: and the French Government would soon have to pay the penalty of its selfish and avaricious policy. But our own Ministers, with their laissez-faire ideas of getting through a crisis, will prefer dooming our fellow-citizens to continued idleness and eventual famine. They have no energy except against our poor and defenceless mechanics; and they lick the dust off the shoes of every foreigner.—Pat.

THE WELSH RIOTS.—LLANDILO FAWR, JULY 21.—Since my last communication I have been almost constantly in the saddle. Instead of being awed by the presence of the military, the doings of Rebecca become more daring, and the disorganization of society here more apparent: except where the outrages are actually being committed, an apparently profound peace reigns. The assizes at Carmarthen terminated yesterday by the discharge of 60 of the Rebeccaites, against whom no bills have been presented, and by the bail of 12 persons being enlarged in consequence of the writs of certiorari. His lordship, in discharging the grand jury, stated that, although the writs of certiorari had removed the trials into the Court of Queen's Bench, it was probable that the parties would not be tried in England, but that a special commission would be issued for their trial here. Additional troops are being poured into the country. The opinion of the whole country is, that the new Poor-law is most arbitrary, partial, and cruel in its operation. In the course of my ride to-day I saw many instances of the destruction of gates by Rebecca and her followers. At Llanvihangel there are, or rather were, four gates and a toll-house. This place is situate within 150 yards of Golden-grove, the seat of Earl Cawdor; yet a few nights since they were all destroyed, the toll-houses pulled down, and the toll keepers' furniture broken to pieces with the utmost daring, and the most perfect impunity, although the family and servants were all at home at Golden-grove. While I was in Llandilo last evening, I obtained some information that there was to be a secret meeting of the Rebeccaites somewhere between this place and Llandovery, and although told it would be most dangerous for me to do so, I resolved, if possible, to be present at it, and personally observe their proceedings. I accordingly had a horse saddled, and having proceeded for some few miles on the road, (it was by this time about eight o'clock at night,) I learned that the intended meeting was to be held at a place about a mile off the main road, called Cwm Ivor, or Ivor's Dingle; and having left my horse at a road side public-house, I walked to the spot. At that time there was only one person present, who was walking in the burying-ground of the chapel of the little hamlet. As the evening closed in, however, the farmers, &c. could be seen approaching by the various bridlepaths, and down the mountain sides, until, at length, I should say, 300 persons were present. I was naturally looked upon as an object of suspicion and mistrust; but, having entered into conversation with one of these persons, I informed him fairly that my whole object was to obtain correct information as to the state of the country and the various proceedings now going on; that I represented one of the London newspapers, and that, if they had grievances, the very best course would be their publication, by which means every one would be able to judge of the justice of their complaints. At my suggestion he agreed to communicate this to the meeting in Welsh, and hear what they said to it. While I remained at a distance, a debate ensued between them for some minutes; and at length I was informed that they intended adjourning to the adjoining school-room, where I should be expected implicitly to state what I had told him, and they would then judge whether I might or might not be present. They adjourned accordingly; two candles were lit, and the school room was filled to suffocation, besides the steps leading to it, and the ground out side. A chairman was chosen and I stated fairly that I had no other object than to gain information correctly, and pledged my word of honour that I came there with no other purpose than that of reporting to the paper with which I was connected. The chairman then, after some objections had been made, put it to the meeting, and the show of hands decided that I should be present. The proceedings of the meeting then commenced, and speeches which had been reduced to writing were read in the Welsh language. They all told the same tale of the poverty of the people, and of the grievances which they suffered. Rents, it was declared, should be lowered, the tolls altered, and the infamous Poor-law abolished, and for these purposes it was proposed that they form unions or lodges.

The following is briefly the substance of one of those speeches:—"It was well known to every one that there were many and enormous grievances existing in the country. Both the farmers, the labourers, and the mechanics were now reduced to poverty by the great rents, and tithes, and the poor rates, compared with the low prices. There was no work for the poor, and if they applied for relief they were torn from their families; but it was their own faults that these grievances were allowed to exist; it arose from there being no union or brotherhood among them." The speaker then complained of the locusts who received the tithes and took the money of the parishes, and that with regard to the poor-law, "through their devilish ideas and practices," they took the money of the farmers, pretending to relieve the poor, while they only distributed 5s. out of every pound to the poor, but kept the other 15s. to pay their grasping officers and others. Another speaker then addressed them, and read the following document in Welsh and English. I procured a copy of his English translation, and subjoin it verbatim. It should be remembered that although ungrammatical, and apparently unintelligible, in some parts, it might have been perfectly correct in the original Welsh, but that its author was not sufficiently acquainted with English to translate it properly:—

"To the conductors of the Convention appointed to be held at Cwm Ivor, in the parish of Llandi, in the county of Carmarthen, on Thursday, the 20th day of July, in the first year of Rebecca's exploits, A.D. 1843.

"To concur and inquire into the grievances complained of by the people, and to adopt the best method of avoiding the surprising deprivations that exist, and the eternal vigilance of our superintendents which is the price of our liberty.

"We wish to reduce the prices (taxes), and secure our blessings. An army of principles will penetrate where an army of soldiers cannot.

"Power usurped is weak when opposed. The public interest depends upon our compliance to examine the cause of the calamity, and unveil the corruptions to Rebecca, &c.

"The following resolutions agreed, and intend to recommend to your future aspect by us whose names are here subscribed at foot, being householders within the above heretofore mentioned parish.

"1. To levelling all petty gates and gate post connected with by-ways and bridle-roads, or any roads repaired by the parishioners.

"Also coals, lime, and grains taken to market be exempted from tolls.

"2. The motive is the abolition of heavy tithe and rent-charge in lieu of tithe.

"3. The abolition of Church-rates.

"4. A total alteration of the present Poor-law.

"5. An equitable adjustment of landlord's rent.

"6. Not to allow or grant any Englishman to have the privilege of a steward or governor in South Wales.

"7. If any man rents his neighbour's farm treacherously, we must acquaint the lady, and endeavour to encourage her exertions wherever she wishes for us to execute our phenomena and combat.

"8. To request the farmers not to borrow any money on purpose to pay unlawful demands; and if the result be that some person or persons will annoy any one by plundering and sacrifice their goods in respect to such charge, we must protect them and diminish their exploits of agonism.

"9. That a committee of privy council must be held when necessary, and all persons under the age of eighteen years are not admitted into it. Neither women nor any of the female sex shall be introduced into this selected assembly, except Rebecca and Miss Cromwell."

This document was received with great applause, and it appeared to meet the universal feeling of the meeting. It was then agreed that a committee should be formed, and that no farmer in the country should be allowed to take the farm which had been vacated by another without the sanction of the committee; and that if any did so he must take the consequences. Four persons, also, were appointed to make rules to carry out these objects, to be agreed to at a future meeting to be held at another place; and the meeting separated at about a quarter past eleven at night.

The work of gate destruction is still carried on with perfect impunity and the utmost daring. On Wednesday night, or rather early yesterday morning, the Rebeccaites assembled in large numbers at Bolgoed-gate, near Pontardulais, between Carmarthen and Swansea, and, arousing the toll-keeper, but without allowing him time to dress himself beyond putting on a great-coat and slippers, on his making his appearance they placed tools in his hands, held a gun to his head, and forced him to destroy the gate. When the work of destruction was complete, they locked the toll-keeper up in a stable close by, where he was kept a prisoner until the morning. There was a policeman who lived in the neighbourhood, whom they also made a prisoner for the night.—Times

DUELS.—The late unnatural and fatal duel has called the attention of the country to the practice of duelling to an unusual extent, and it seems most desirable that the popular excitement should, if possible, be turned to good account by those who, on Christian principle, are determinately opposed to this monstrous infraction of the law of God, and cruel perversion of justice and common sense.

The real defence of it by the votaries of the world resolves itself into this, that practically it works well; that no doubt in this, as in other conventional arrangements, as also in statute law, cases of great hardship, the just subjects of general regret, will occur; but that those, comparatively speaking, are of rare occurrence, while the practice preserves among the higher ranks of society, and especially in the army and navy, where it is indispensable, that polished and gentlemanly deportment in every day life which probably no other arrangement could accomplish, and which is a chief safeguard of the well-being and social health of that leading class of the community. And, no doubt, exclude from the account, God and his law, and our primary objections to revere and obey him; and there is some potency in the view. In this imperfect world, established practices, working beneficially, often rest on what is absurd or evil. Not that they would not work better without the absurdity or the evil, but that they work so far well to popular perception, notwithstanding the rottenness of their foundation.

That national wars are not under all circumstances inconsistent with Christian obligations, is obvious from the fact, that both under the Jewish and Christian dispensations murder is directed in every case to be punished by taking away the life of the murderer, while national war remains uncondemned. To argue, then, as is frequently done, from the evils inflicted by war, back to the lesser evils inflicted by duelling, as a vindication of the latter, is taking ground inconsistent with Scripture, and confounding things that differ. The quarrels of nations are one thing, and the responsibilities connected with them will be variously distributed. The differences which occur in the social body is another and distinct thing, and its peace and well-being are provided for by God and man by distinct and more specific enactments.

By the practice of duelling the life of one man is sacrificed, in private life, by the hand of another, in opposition to the established law of the land, and still more flagrantly by the opposition to the ever paramount law of God. For, let it be observed, the spirit and temper of mind in which these quarrels originate are in diametrical opposition to the spirit and temper of mind enforced upon us by the most solemn sanctions of the word of God. Two men, then, meet and sin against heaven by indulging in a temper of mind in relation to each other by which they involve themselves in deep guilt, and then go forward, in virtue of this original quarrel to perpetrate one of the most daring offences that can be committed by man against man,—by man against God.

This is the nature of the practice. We defy any man to show, on solid grounds, that its essential nature is any other than that we have described. Its genuine character is written as in lines of light in the revelation of God to man. And yet, forsooth, men find it convenient to go on with it, and so it is tolerated and cherished in this professedly Christian country to the present hour.

As we have intimated on former occasions, a Court of Honour subsists in Denmark, before which all offences against the Code of Honour are brought, as other offences are submitted to the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law. Some such jurisdiction in this country, and in our more important colonies, would probably meet the difficulty. And while under its jurisdiction the polish of the higher classes of society would be maintained, the ruffian and the man of honour the offender and the insulted, would not, as now, stand on the same ground; and at the same time the Law of the country would be observed, and the Law of the Most High would no longer, in this particular, be insulted or dishonoured.—Record.

Opening of a Roman Tumulus.—A most interesting discovery, illustrative of the funeral customs of the Anglo-Romans, has been made in the parish of Rougham, on the estate of Mr. Philip Bennet. At the corner of the two roads leading to Hesset and Bradfield Manger, and within a few feet of the highway, stands the half of a hill, called Eastlow-hill; and a slight distance therefrom were two semicircular mounds, about fifty or sixty feet in diameter, covered with herbage and shrubs. The men belonging to Mr. Levett's farm were engaged in clearing away one of these mounds, to lay the soil upon the land, when, on Friday week, having come to the centre, the pick of the workmen broke into an oven-shaped cist or cavern, containing sepulchral remains. A hole, between three and four feet square, appears to have been first dug about three feet below the general level of the country. Four rows of red hollow tile bricks, each eleven inches long, about six inches wide, and seven inches deep, and nearly an inch thick, and having a circular hole in the middle of each end, were then placed on the soil, and covered over with large flat tiles. The whole was arched over with tiles, forming a chamber of about two and a-half feet square and two feet deep; open at one end. Each tile was ornamented with two striated bands, placed diagonally from angle to angle, and crossing in the centre. In this chamber was a large square canister-shaped urn of emerald green glass, with a handle on one side. It was nearly sixteen inches high, and eight inches wide; and was about half-full of burnt bones. By the side of the urn was a large plain iron lamp, of the accustomed form in length, from the wick-chamber to the handle nearly a foot. Unfortunately, from the ignorance of the man who made the discovery, the cist was opened so carelessly, that the fine and curious urn was broken. This part of the country must have been extensively occupied by the Romans, for pateræ, and pieces of pottery, swords, spurs, and other articles of iron, have been frequently and for many years discovered within two feet of the surface in this part of Rougham, and within the adjoining parish of Whelnetham. The Bird was common till within the last thirty years; and so many human bones were found, it is said, on removing part of the Eastlow-hill, that the then owner of the estate (Mr. Kedington) refused to let any more of the hill to be cleared. Adjoining to the tumulus which has been opened is another, as yet quite undisturbed; and near to them are the pits or trenches, whence it is probable the soil was procured to heap up these simple and long-enduring resting-places.—Suffolk Herald

Father Mathew at Leeds.—Many persons will willingly admit that the moral revolution which Father Mathew has wrought in Ireland is, from its character and magnitude, more entitled to the appellation of miracle than many other things which have been dubbed with the title. Until yesterday, however, we never heard that the wonder-working apostle of temperance was gifted with really miraculous powers. Whilst the administration of the pledge was going on in the grounds of St. Anthony's Chapel, it was confidently rumoured that the respected father had in the morning restored to a child about fourteen years of age the use of his limbs, of which he had been deprived for several months. The mother of the boy (so the story went) brought him in her arms to Father Mathew, who, after having inquired into the nature of his ailments, made upon him the sign of the cross, and repeated a few words, whereupon his limbs suddenly acquired their long-lost vigour, and the boy actually walked home! This story might have been looked upon as the clumsy invention of some superstitious and ardent admirer of the father, anxious to add to his well-earned renown, and as such it might have been smiled at, had it obtained credence only amongst the poor and uneducated; but it was actually repeated as indubitably true by persons in the middle class of life; and one individual, who ought not easily to be deceived, and much less lend himself to a deceit, declared that he himself was a witness of the performance of the miracle.—Leeds Mercury.

Popery.—The walls of Liverpool have been covered with large placards, intimating that an authentic account of a miracle, performed through the prayers and intercession of the pious father Mathew, with other reminiscences of the same kind, will be published immediately by a man of the name of John Marsh, of that town. The miracle here referred to, and of which the promised catchpenny publication is to contain an "authentic" account, is said to have been performed on the person of a boy, about fourteen years of age, who had been for months deprived of the use of his limbs, but who, upon being taken to the "pious father," and having the sign of the cross made on him, and a few prayers repeated over him, regained all his physical strength, and walked home perfectly cured. Absurd and incredible as the story is one of the Liverpool newspapers, respectable not only in character but circulation, tells it with a good deal of circumstantiality, and says that it is currently reported and believed, not by the ignorant and superstitious natives of the sister kingdom merely, but by persons of judgment, not easily to be imposed upon. The statement, however, is wholly untrue, so far as the "persons of judgment" are concerned, and of course, so far as the story itself goes. The only two individuals to whom miraculous powers were attributed in recent days were Father Mathew and Bernard Cavanagh. The latter was proved to have been a noted imposter, and the former has invariably denied that he ever possessed any power of the kind. In the early part of his career in Ireland, his miracle-working qualities were said to be of an astonishing description, and multitudes of "the lame, the halt, and the blind" were conveyed scores of miles to him for the purpose of getting cured; but he told them then, as he tells others now, that he was not possessed of any powers beyond those possessed by other men. His assertion was, nevertheless, disbelieved; nolens volens, he must be possessed of miraculous powers; and what were then attributed to him in Ireland are now being attributed to him in England, also.—Record.

The Peace Convention and King Louis Philippe.—The Memorial to the Governments of the civilized world, adopted at the General Peace Convention lately held in London, on the importance of nations agreeing by treaty stipulations to settle their disputes by a reference to umpires, mutually chosen, was presented to the King of the French on the 20th inst., by a deputation consisting of Messrs. G. C. Beckwith, T. Cock, A. Walker, and J. R. Willis from the United States of America, and the Rev. W. Toase, of Paris, one of the officers of the Society of Christian Morals, the Marquis de la Rochefoucauld Liancourt being unavoidably absent. His Majesty gave the deputation a most gracious audience, and assured them he was very happy to receive such a communication. He said, he felt a great interest in the subject, and had certainly done all he could to preserve peace in Europe. "Peace," said His Majesty, "is what we all want. War now costs too much to be often waged; and I trust the day is coming when we shall get rid of it entirely in the civilized world." His Majesty spoke of arbitration as an excellent substitute for war; alluded to several instances of its successful application; and remarked how perfectly consistent it was in those cases with the dignity of the parties concerned. On other points relative to the subject of peace the King expressed himself very freely, in terms highly gratifying to the deputation, and promised to take the subject of the Memorial into favourable consideration.—Ibid.

The French at Tahiti.—The following is an extract from a letter received from an officer of her Majesty's ship Vindictive, under date Tahiti, the 26th of February last:—"After a passage of five weeks from Sydney, we arrived here yesterday, having the Consul on board, together with a coach, dresses, and other things, presents from Queen Victoria to Queen Pomare. We found the French had been threatening Queen Pomare to destroy the town, and had demanded 10,000 dollars if she did not consent to sign a petition to the French to take her country under their protection. This document they got some Roman Catholics, Americans, and others, of little or no consequence, to sign; and they have appointed a governor, and one or two more, to regulate the affairs of the island, and if they find any one talking against them, they continue threatening to blow down the town. I sincerely hope that our Ministry will never allow the French to stay. I was ashore this morning, and saw the missionary school, and attended the Divine service of the natives. Nothing could be more orderly and decent; and considering that a few years since these very people were living in the greatest state of barbarism, destroying their own children, fighting with each other in perpetually vindictive warfare, offering up human sacrifices, and other things as shocking to human feelings, great credit is due to the missionaries. From such a state the missionaries have brought it to a state of civilization, the women wearing gowns and caps instead of being naked, and good houses built, cattle introduced, and a number of other benefits. Now the French come, bring Roman Catholic priests, and subvert every good thing. I was introduced to Pomare last evening. She is a very fine, lusty, copper-coloured woman, of about forty years of age. She had on a loose silk gown that reached to her feet, and you could not see that she had any other article of clothing on. February 27.—Pomare hoisted her flag yesterday at her palace for the first time since the French have had possession of the island. We gave it a Royal salute of 21 guns; the French captain came on board to complain of it. Our captain told him that we did not acknowledge the French Government here. The dispute first arose from a French dog being overcome by a dog belonging to one of the natives, from which the French complained of a want of order. The fact is, that the French want this island because the harbour is so very good, it being surrounded by a reef of rocks, with only two small entrances, which can be defended by a few guns from the opposite mountains. Mr. Pritchard, the consul, is also a missionary, who has been here eighteen years. We may come home the end of next month. We find this place very warm, though not so oppressive as Hongkong. What will happen in respect of our future proceedings, we cannot say; but the present outline is—stop here one month, say five weeks; go to Valparaiso, passage five weeks; stay at Valparaiso three; passage to Rio five weeks; stay at Rio two weeks, passage to England seven weeks; total, 27 weeks, or half a year, and we shall be in England in September."—Devonport Journal.

Rome, July.—The events in Spain have by no means produced a favourable impression here, because it is certain that Espartero, quite recently, has made sincere promises to exert himself to the utmost for the purpose of restoring peace and good feeling between Spain and the Papal See, but by his fall these hopes, of course, would vanish.

A letter from Rome, published in the Cologne Gazette, says:—"From the discourse of the Polish priests who have arrived here, there is little doubt that the Czar persists in his intention of substituting the Greek Church for the Catholic in Poland. We also hear repeated complaints of the oppressions to which the Catholics in Poland are subjected."—Record.

The Augsburg Gazette, of the 22d instant, states, that the Greek Government, having addressed observations to the Ambassadors of the three protecting Powers relative to the concentration of a Turkish army under the walls of Adrianople, those Ambassadors had applied to the Ottoman Porte to know what was the object of the concentration of such a force in that quarter. The Divan replied, that the Sultan, wishing to profit by the peace to improve the discipline of his army, had thought proper to order the establishment of a camp of manœuvres near Adrianople, and that he had no other object in view.—Ibid.

The first judgment of the Supreme Board of Censorship was published at Berlin on the 19th. A bookseller, previous to publishing a biography of Staps, who was shot in 1809 for an attempt to assassinate Napoleon, submitted the manuscript to a censor, who struck out two passages, in one of which the biographer, Staps's own father, denounced in opprobrious terms the conduct of Marshal Ney, who had threatened him with the fate of his son. In the other, after blaming in strong terms political assassination, he observed that Heaven in its wisdom sometimes permitted it, in order to punish tyranny. The bookseller having appealed to the Supreme Board of Censorship, that tribunal condemned the Censor for erasing those passages, and directed that the biography should be published in its original form.—Ibid.

Lieutenant S. R. Tickell, of the 31st Regiment N. I., Junior Assistant to the Commissioner of Chota Nagpore, obtained from the Government of Bengal leave of absence, from the 1st June to 1st December 1843, to proceed to Darjeeling, on Medical Certificate.

Captain J. T. Gordon, of the 18th Regiment N. I., Junior Assistant to the Commissioner in Assam, obtained leave of absence from the Government of Bengal, under date the 19th June last, for four months, on private affairs.

Captain F. C. Elwall, of the 49th Regiment N. I., Assistant to General Superintendent of Operations for the Suppression of Thuggee, obtained leave, in the Foreign department, under date the 4th July last, to proceed to Darjeeling, on Medical Certificate, until the 7th June 1844.

Brevet Captain J. Stubbs, of the 49th Regiment N. I., 2d in command of the Joudpore Legion, was, at his own request, placed in the Foreign Department, under date the 4th July last, at the disposal of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, on the expiration of his present leave of absence.

Lieutenant P. A. P. Bouverie, of the 35th Regt. Light Infantry, was appointed, in the General Department, North Western Provinces, under date the 24th June last, Aide-de-Camp on the Staff of the Honourable Lieutenant Governor North Western Provinces.

The undermentioned Officers were appointed by the Government of Bengal, under date the 13th July last to be Aides-de-Camp to the Deputy Governor of Bengal:

Lieutenant C. A. Nicolson, of the 28th Regiment Native Infantry.

Lieutenant J. G. Stephen, of the 8th Regiment Native Infantry.

Brevet Captain H. L. Bigge, of the 66th Regiment Native Infantry, Principal Assistant to the Commissioner of Assam at Tezpore, obtained from the Government of Bengal, under date the 10th July last, leave of absence to proceed to the Presidency on Medical Certificate, preparatory to making application to go to Sea.

Captain J. T. Gordon, of the 15th Regiment Native Infantry, to officiate as Principal Assistant to the Commissioner of Assam at Tezpore, vice Captain Biggs. This cancels the Order of the 19th June last, granting leave of absence to the former Officer.

The Right Honourable the Governor General was pleased, in the Judicial department, under date the 27th July last, to sanction Assistant Surgeon O. Mangurs, M. D., performing the Civil Medical duties of Seonee, from 3d April last, the date of his receiving charge from Assistant Surgeon Cheyne.

Hindostan 13th February, 1844.
Bentinck 15th March, .. 1844.
Hindostan 12th May,.. .. 1844.

To parties proceeding to Europe, the advantages offered by the Overland route need no comment as independently of the certainty of arriving in England within two months, they are saved both the trouble and expense of fitting up Cabins and providing a large outfit of clothing which on their arrival at home is quite useless. Any further information can be obtained by applying at the Co.'s Office, No. 11, Strand.

J. R. ENGLEDUE,
Superintendent and Agent.

24th August, 1843.

PARCELS OVERLAND.

AS many persons have complained of delay in the delivery of their parcels, and as such delay arises from the parcels not being sent through the proper office. J. R. Engledue requests the Indian Community desirous of availing themselves of the Overland route to send their packages direct to his office in Calcutta, Captain Biden, Madras and to Captain Twynham, Point de Galle, and to instruct their Booksellers, Tradesmen and friends in England to send them to the following offices in London, viz—

James Hartly and Co. 16, John St. Crutched Friars and 44 Regent Street, Piccadilly.

James Barbar and Co. 17, St. Mary Axe.

All orders accompanied by a remittance will be promptly attended to.

J. R. Engledue will receive dividends and remit by order payable at sight upon Jas. Hartly and Co. London.

J. R. ENGLEDUE,

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ST. ANDREW'S LIBRARY.

MESSRS. THACKER AND CO. have the pleasure to state, that by the Hindostan expected to arrive off Calcutta on or about the 20th of October, they will be enabled to circulate to Subscribers, Periodicals for the months of JUNE, JULY, AUGUST, and SEPTEMBER. Arrangements will be made for the despatch of these within a few hours of their arrival, and the least possible delay will take place, in the exposing on the Library tables, the largest Selection of New Works, that has ever by one opportunity, been imported into India.

MESSRS. T. AND Co. beg to remind their constituents that this is the only opportunity that has presented itself, since the last return of the Hindostan in June, by which Periodicals or Works of any description could be received in a body by the Overland Route, the delay which has taken place since the last supply was therefore unavoidable. Periodicals for MAY and JUNE have just been received per Mary Barbara from Suez.

THE undersigned will be happy to execute orders in the way of Supplies for gentlemen in the Mofussil, free of any Commission Charge; the only remuneration he looks for, is the usual discount allowed on the purchase of goods for Cash, desirable of course, from the Seller.

To enable him to obtain this remuneration, a remittance must accompany each order to the full extent of the Articles required; of which on the despatch of the goods, a correct account will be rendered. The undersigned pledges himself to execute all orders received, with punctuality, and despatch, as far as practicable; and to supply Articles of the best quality. He would also be glad to know if any Indian Planter would enter into an arrangement to supply Gram and Oats, of the best quality, at stated periods, what quantity could be supplied yearly, and at what rate per maund, including all expenses, attending its transmission to Calcutta.

N. B. All letters must be Post paid.

THE PUNJAB.—The past week has brought us very little addition to our knowledge of the late intrigues at Lahore, and their horrible issue. Various corrections, (the chief of which will be found amongst our selections), have been given, of the story as told by the Lahore news-writer of the Delhi Gazette: but, though he appears to have committed not a few circumstantial errors, upon the whole, we believe his tale to be essentially true. His most singular misstatement is the introduction of Goolab Singh at Lahore, and his participation in the plot and its treachery, when we know that now, up to the date of our latest communications, he had not yet arrived there. Still even that inaccuracy scarcely affects the state of parties either before or after the convulsion. It cannot be doubted, that he was in the confidence of his brother Dhyan Singh in the outset, or that he will now adhere to the interests of his nephew Heera Singh.

After the most diligent comparison of all our intelligence, public and private, we believe the history of the case to be this. As the Dussera festival drew near, Rajah Dhyan Singh clearly saw, that his Master meditated emancipation from the thraldom of his nominal service but virtual rule. The Maharajah was collecting troops around the Capital, taking the muster of them himself, and distributing amongst them rewards and donations—things quite unusual when his Minister was in the height of his power. Dhyan Singh therefore determined to anticipate his intentions, and strike a blow. Looking round him for a fit instrument, he fixed upon Ajeet Singh Sindhanwala, one of a brotherhood, whose property lies in the neighbourhood of Umritsir. This man, and his relatives Uttur Singh and Lena Singh, had all stood high in the favour of old Runjeet; who, in rewards for certain services in his Affghan wars, had given Ajeet one of his own Ranees in marriage. But these Sindhanwalas took the part of Mace Chundkoer, when, on the death of Kurruck Singh, and Now Nihal Singh, she seized the guddee to the exclusion of Shere Singh. When, therefore, another revolution brought him to the throne, these men were banished to their jagheer beyond the Sutlege, near Thaneswur, and otherwise disgraced. They had been afterwards permitted, through the interposition of Dhyan Singh to return to court, but had never been received into favour, and were at this time thirsting for revenge. Of them, therefore, the artful Minister determined to avail himself as tools. General Ventura is understood to have had full information of the plot, and to have warned Shere Singh of his approaching fate: but he was incredulous. On the fatal morning of the 15th September, he was entrapped beyond the city walls, to be present at the review of part of the Sindhanwala Levies. He placed himself on a raised platform to see the troops defile. A small body of them was brought near to him and his attendants; and one of Ajeet Singh's Sirdars attracted his attention, by pretending to show him a curious double barrelled musquet. Then creeping up to him, he discharged both barrels through his body. He then fell on his face; and the chosen company of assassins fired a volley into the crowd on the platform. Pertab Singh, son of Shere Singh, and two favourite Sirdars, fell with many others under this fire. On his return towards the city, after this exploit of butchery, Ajeet met the Minister Dhyan Singh. They agreed on their measures; and Dhuleep Singh, the son of a stable keeper by one of Runjeet's Ranees, was proclaimed Maharajah, and Dhyan Singh Minister. All seemed to be going on smoothly, when, by the perfidious counsel of Bhaee Gooroomookh, the spiritual guide of old Runjeet Singh, Ajeet determined to destroy Dhyan Singh, and stabbed him with his own hand. Heera Singh and the Rajpoot family, enraged at this, collected the troops; who, under the command of Ventura and Court, breached and stormed the fort, and massacred the Sindhanwalas: and so Dhuleep Singh continues on the throne, and Heera Singh is Prime Minister.

What our Government will do in the case is still a perfect secret. It cannot however long remain so; and we must be content to wait a week or two for its disclosure.

THE UNCOVENANTED SERVICE FAMILY PENSION FUND.—We have perused the Sixth Report of this Institution with very great satisfaction. As an Apostle tells us, that he who provides not for his own is worse than an infidel, and domestic improvidence is therefore a sure evidence of prevailing irreligion; so we may take the contrary, or the growth of providence in the community, or in any portion of it, as a proof of the growth not only of pure domestic affections, but of the sense of religious obligation. There are forms of provision for a family, on which suspicion may justly rest; as when the provision is invested in lands or funds, which may serve as much to gratify the pride and self-indulgence of him who acquires them, as to secure the comfort of his wife and children when he is dead. The most indeed are laying up treasures for themselves upon earth, when they talk only of providing against the destitution of their families. But no such danger is incurred in a Fund of this sort. Here a man, prompted by affection and duty, refrains from expending a portion of his income, voluntarily deprives himself of some of his means of show or indulgence, and stores it up in such a way for the use of those he loves, that he can never himself enjoy a farthing of it. At least he will never share in its expenditure. Enjoyment from it he will have doubtless. He will live in the midst of his little circle at home, in the peaceful assurance, that their comfort, which is now the reward of his toil, and the joy of his heart, will continue even if his head be laid in the grave. All through his life, the assurance will throw a light of gladness over his humble board; and it will smooth his pillow in death, and make it so much the easier to leave his wife and children in the care of the God of their lives. It will not be, that he has taken the provision for them out of God's hand, and accomplished it himself; but that he has done what he could, to fulfil the obligations to them which God imposed upon him, and therefore he has courage to trust to God for all the rest.

With these views, we cannot but rejoice in the confirmed security, which the prosperity of the Family Pension Fund gives, to the expectations of those who are contributors to it. But thence, likewise, we regret whatever limits the extent to which the Fund becomes available. We must join therefore with the Englishman, and the Star, in regretting, that, whilst, during the past year so much has been gained in the consolidation of the Fund, so small an addition has been made to the number of subscribers; and we would, with them, recommend the rescinding of Rule Twenty, which, from the 1st of May 1842, exacts a bonus of three month's subscription, in addition to the usual entrance subscription and fee, from every new subscriber who was married and in the service of Government prior to that date. Such a bonus can be of no value for the strength of the fund, which is secured without reference to such a source of profit. It must, however, very materially interfere with the increase of subscriptions. A chief benefit of the Fund is, that it enables those whose incomes allow of no large savings, to make provision for their families by small deductions, which may be borne but cannot be exceeded. Now to make a large payment necessary at the beginning, is to make subscription a great difficulty to many, and an absolute impossibility to some; whilst, to all it affords a dangerous plea for procrastination, and procrastination in too many instances will be fatal to subscription altogether. Besides, the Rule has a churlish appearance. It seems to say, that the first subscribers are determined to have some pecuniary advantage from their priority, or to take a little revenge upon those who have been slow in joining their ranks. And nothing about the Fund should wear an appearance of the kind. Though there is nothing gratuitous in the Fund, it is most truly an affair of charity altogether. And it should be remembered, that in every case in which the Rule defers or prevents a subscription, widows and orphans are the only sufferers: and the combination of the existing subscribers for the purposes of their Fund, is proof sufficient that they are men who cannot trifle with the interest of such sufferers.

The Directors have received a set of Tables computed by a London Actuary, who, from their results, feels himself warranted to recommend a reduction in the rates of subscription. In their report, however, the Directors have not supported the recommendation, partly that a reserve capital may be formed to provide against any extraordinary season of mortality; and partly because the Actuary, in calculating his Tables, has assumed the rate of mortality among the Civil Servants in Bengal, as the nearest index to be found to the mortality among those who compose the Uncovenanted body; and it is assumed as indubitable, that his conclusions are therefore too favourable to be confirmed by experience. The decision of the Directors was also adopted at the General Meeting of the Subscribers, on the 18th August last. And we cannot but approve of the decision; since, if it be an error, it is one on the safe side: for in matters of Assurance what can be of more moment than safety?

Yet we are very much disposed to question, whether the rate of mortality in the Civil Service is too favourable, to allow of accurate calculations for the Uncovenanted Fund. We shall hold the contrary, until we see a sufficient accumulation of facts to overthrow our opinion. Our conviction is, that, in comparing Europeans and East Indians generally, whilst stronger constitution will give to the former a larger number of instances of longevity, better adaptation to the climate will give to the latter a longer average life: that, in comparing Europeans in the Civil, with Europeans in the Uncovenanted Service, you take, in the former class, a body formed without any experience of the adaptation of their constitution to life in India, and a portion of whom will arrive only to die, or be sent back to Europe, whilst in the latter you have a collection of individuals, of all of whom it has been ascertained, that they have a reasonable prospect of being able to bear the climate: and consequently, we believe, that the lives of both branches of the Uncovenanted Service are naturally better than the lives of the Civilians.

It may be said, that the Uncovenanted Service having far lower salaries than the Civilians, have their lives deteriorated by the want of the accommodations and generous living which the others can command: and moreover that inferiority in station also exposes to inferiority in moral habits, and the endangering of life by more destructive dissoluteness. But we believe the truth to be, that the Uncovenanted Service have generally the means of wholesome living; and that their high incomes do the Civilians as much harm, as the means of indulgence in fashionable dissipation, as the Uncovenanted suffer from any privations to which they are subjected. Should the danger from morals be as the objection supposes, the Pension Fund will be guarded from its influence by the principle of selection, both according to health and character, on which admission to its benefits is allowed.

These views we have not taken up on conjecture. They are the result of long and close observation in an analogous case—the comparative value of the lives of Missionaries direct from Europe, and of those admitted in this Country whether Europeans or East Indians. We knew the advantage to be greatly on the side of the latter. We anticipate, therefore, that the Actuary's Tables will eventually be found perfectly within bounds. At the same time, we heartily approve of the caution which prevents their being immediately adopted.

THE CALCUTTA POPULARITY OF LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—The Bombay Times is full of virtuous indignation at the sycophancy of Calcutta Society, in the welcome they have given to Lord Ellenborough. First, let him bless his stars, that his Lordship did not take it into his head, when at Ferozepore, to run down the Indus and have a peep at Bombay. The temptation to do a spite to the Ditchers, by honouring the object of their dislike, would have been so great, that we question whether any virtue in the West could have resisted it. Our worthy Brother, we fear, would have been driven into his own cell, overwhelmed with shame for the degeneracy of his fellow citizens: and Calcutta would have had the opportunity of swelling and strutting in the consciousness of her moral superiority. But alas! it is otherwise. Ours is the shame, and his the boast. Patience! however; the turn will go round, as sure as we are all sons of mother Eve. Indeed the Hurkaru has shewn, that Bombay has been before us, and we are now but following her in the dance of folly. They have befooled themselves with Sir James Carnac, if we have with his Lordship: and there is a little more excuse for people having their heads turned with a Lord, than with a mere Knight, or even a Baronet.

Nevertheless Calcutta deserves a flogging; and let her have it. We have not looked on without some disgust at the turning tide of popularity—although it has hitherto been sufficiently feeble and uncertain to create a laugh likewise. How does the case stand? Lord Ellenborough had in all his progress over India been soft-sawdering the Army—he had stuffed them with maunds of goor and lollypops of every sort—and he had done more; he had been liberal and just in dispensing his Military patronage, with the single drawback of his black looks on all who could be considered nominees of Lord Auckland: and the army were happy and grateful. It became the rule therefore for him to be feasted and toasted, and saluted, at we know not what cost of John Company's gunpowder, at every Military Station he came to. Of course, it was not to be expected that Barrackpore should be an exception to the rule. Our neighbours here kindled the fire of ball-room hospitality, and a pretty blaze they made of it. All the world went jigging; and it seemed as if they could not have enough of it. The strife appeared to be, who could do most in inventing occasions for a ball and supper; and as to whether it was connected with the Governor General, Sir Hugh Gough, Lady Gough, or any one else, that seemed no concern to any one. Dum-Dum, always on hospitable thoughts intent, followed the lead of the Head Quarters of the Presidency Division—but not before like honour had been shewn to Pottinger, Macgregor and others of similar fame—though possibly in disfavour with his Lordship. Then the Military Staff of Fort William seemed to think it would look strange, if they did not do as others of their cloth did. So they concerted a ball and supper too. But apparently they felt that his Lordship's claims were confined to their own order. They do not seem to have known on what ground to ask civilians to join them; and when taken by surprise by an application to admit of such a partnership, they shewed their sense of its unreasonableness by a short refusal. They seemed to say to the applicants—Why, you have no reason to do what we are doing. However, a movement having been made amongst the Civilians, on the simple principle of being neighbour-like, the movers appear to have thought they should look very sheepish if the movement came to nothing. So they screwed their courage up to proposing a Civilians' entertainment for his Lordship—all the while afraid the great Man might throw back their proffered civility in disdain. But he did not do that. Only he would not have the honour then; and he has not had it yet; and who knows whether he will ever have it at all?

Now what is there in all this to be so very angry about? The officers of the Army have danced and drunk wine before his Lordship, for as good reasons as people ordinarily have to engage in these wise and dignified performances: and the Civilians can plead in excuse for their proceedings, that they have followed the rule which governs more than nine-tenths of the race—they have done as others did. Poor souls, pity in them the weakness of human nature: but, oh most virtuous Times, be merciful in your condemnation.

Perhaps the offenders might even take heart to say, Good Sir, the fact is, much of the dislike we formerly expressed towards his Lordship, was occasioned by personal offence. We thought him rude and insolent. We had opportunities of seeing something of the kind in his behaviour; and we heard of a great deal more. But we are inclined at last to think, that Lord Ellenborough, as well as others, should have the benefit of the maxim, that we ought to believe only half of what we see, and not a fourth of what we hear. We verily believe we heard very much that never occurred, or for which there was no better foundation, than for the story of the three black crows. And for what did occur, and was bad enough, we think some considerable palliation may be found in the fact, now perfectly certain, that when his Lordship first arrived in Calcutta, he was thrown into something of a conglomeration—was a little demented, so to speak, by the crisis of affairs in Affghanistan—and so he was too much flurried to appear the very pink of politeness. Then it is a fact, that, after he had shewn us his rough side, and, seeing things in a train for adjustment, he began to settle into some degree of quietness—if his nature is capable of any thing of that sort—he did actually turn a kind side, in a manner, to the folks up the country: and we have thought it but decent to let him have an opportunity now, of putting on his best face here too. You talk indeed of the faults of his administration, his balderdash proclamations, and so forth: but, be assured we have nothing to do with these matters. Not a soul in Calcutta will have any Address to his Lordship, for the purpose of lauding his Government, or those special Acts of any thing but grace, by which he has gained a reputation, such as it is, through the known world. Though if he will now be neighbourly with decent people, would it not be desirable they should be neighbourly with him? Who knows how much common sense might thus find its way to his ear, so as imperceptibly to restrain the vagaries to which his own nature is prone. It would be something gained, could we by a civil, not a cringing or fawning deportment, convey to his mind the impression, that he has no natural opponents to his authority and measures in any part of the European community—that there exists no such cause of irritation to provoke him to partialities or caprices; but that, on the contrary, submitting to him as our lawful Ruler, we are ready to let the evil that can't be mended be forgotten, and, as much as may be, look with hope rather than suspicion to the future. Even if he cannot now be dignified in his intercourse with us, it concerns us to be dignified in our intercourse with him.

SIXTH REPORT OF THE DUM-DUM TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.—We are happy to observe that this very useful Society is prosperously maintaining its ground. The number of its Members in April last, to which period the Report extends, was One Hundred and Twenty-seven which shews an increase of nineteen above the number of the previous year at the same season, in addition to all that have gone up the country in the various drafts of the year. The funds, too, are maintained in a healthy condition, chiefly through the patronage of a portion of the Officers, who take pleasure in the comfort and good conduct of their men. It speaks strongly for the beneficial influence of the Society, that Brigadier Frith stands at the head of these patrons; and that in their ranks are both the Chaplains who have been doing duty at the station during the year, and two of the Surgeons, Doctors Row and Clark. Thus the natural Guardian of the troops in every respect, but whose special care is the maintenance of their military discipline; those who are peculiarly interested in the improvement of their moral and religious character; and the benevolent guardians of their life and health—all testify, that, in their several departments, the Society is an Agent of whose help they are glad to avail themselves. The testimony is at once honourable to their judgment and benevolence, and creditable to the Society that receives it.

The Report notices very gratefully, the obligations of the Society to Dr. Duff, whose visit and address brought an accession of forty members to its ranks at once. At the same time it urgently solicits similar favours from other friends of the cause of Temperance in Calcutta; and we hope it will not solicit in vain. The plan has been adopted of having tea meetings three or four times a year, in order to bind together in greater intimacy the members of the Society; and we should think that on these occasions a sufficient number of speakers from Calcutta might easily be induced to attend, to render them exceedingly interesting and profitable. Personal application however must be made to those whose company would be acceptable; for no one would think of obtruding himself unasked. Dr. Duff has doubtless felt himself well rewarded for his visit, and would consider it a happy addition to his usefulness, to be the means of bringing forty individuals on the list of temperate men every year of his life; and his example is well calculated to encourage others.

We rejoice to see, by the daily papers, that Brigadier Frith has just closed the Dum Dum Canteen as a retail drinking shop, and confined its operations to the mere issuing of the regulated allowance of spirits or beer which every man is permitted to draw. If we recollect right, it is quite optional with every man to have this allowance, or a pecuniary compensation instead; so that the only purpose of the Canteen now is, that those who will take their customary quantity of liquor may have it of the best—that is the least noxious—quality that can be procured for their money. Previously each man, in addition to the regulated allowance, was permitted to drink at his own expence to a certain extent daily: and that license was enough to ruin many a man, whilst it was not very difficult to get beyond it, either by collusion with other applicants who did not wish to drink themselves, or by inattention or unfaithfulness on the part of the Canteen Serjeant. This however is now ended at Dum-Dum; and a most dangerous temptation is taken out of the way of the men.

METROPOLITICAL CHARGE OF THE BISHOP OF CALCUTTA.—This Charge was delivered in Calcutta in August last year, and afterwards, in the course of his Lordship's Metropolitical Visitation, at Madras, Colombo, Palamcotta, and Bombay. When first heard, it excited some dissatisfaction: so easy is it for much excellence to be overlooked, because of a few blemishes. It was thought his Lordship's reference to the Plymouth Brethren was uncalled for, and might be considered an effusion of spleen against a Lady, whom all Christians must esteem and admire. It was likewise thought, that the Tractarians were complimented rather too highly for their learning, and ability and temper in controversy; so much so, that those of the party in Calcutta were said to consider the acknowledgment thus freely made, of superiority on their side, as more than a compensation for all his Lordship's decision and severity of argument against them. Either, however, the language of the Charge must have been considerably modified in preparation for the press; or the Tractarians are gentlemen with whom compliments have very great weight, and reason very little; and the orthodox, who were stumbled by the praises bestowed on them, were little better. By one thing the Tractarians were certainly gratified, and the opposite party as certainly mortified. This was his Lordship's authoritative imposition of silence; which remains in the charge, in terms sufficiently strong to justify the effects attributed to it.

The injunction runs thus: "Indeed I would venture to impose SILENCE in India so far as I have the power, both as to personal controversy and as to the discussion of the question generally, on all my Reverend brethren, unless when an evident necessity may urge. Enough has been said and written. Stand still now, and see the salvation of God." Now this does sound strange after the earnestness of his Lordship's own argument, and the paramount importance he has shewn to belong to the subjects in disputs. On the one side, he exhibits radical and destructive error, and, on the other, divine and saving truth: and then he commands silence respecting them from his clergy, at the very time when all men in their congregations, who have minds to think, are debating them, and possibly doubting of them. The command was surely injudicious. It suited admirably the Tractarian party; who, knowing with whom they have to deal in their ecclesiastical superior, have here chosen silence before the public, as essential to their success, and have been content to work in private, and by means which could be met with no direct resistance. The silence commanded by the Bishop relieved them also from indirect resistance, and so left their peculiar course of operation without obstruction at all. No wonder they were pleased with his Lordship's orders, or that their opponents should be equally displeased.

These considerations were evidently lost sight of by his Lordship, from an amiable aversion to the asperities and collisions of controversy. And, especially, he may have felt for the honour of that Church, of which he is so distinguished an ornament, and been anxious to prevent a continued exposure before the world, of the mass of false doctrine and superstition now gaining ground in it. But although controversy is a great evil, yet, whenever essential truth is assailed or undermined, it is a necessary one: and we must even reconcile ourselves to its deformities. And, as to the honour of the Anglican Church, as a great branch of Protestantism, an Assertor of the life-giving Truth, "the Gospel according to God," in place of "the Gospel according to man"—and consequently, as a friend to the spiritual liberty, the moral and intellectual elevation of our race—the truth is, her fallen condition cannot be hid by any commands that may be given. The principles of spiritual bondage, of human degradation and oppression, are eating into her very heart, and indicating themselves in fearful and innumerable symptoms of future mischief. The only course now left to those who love her, and yet also love the truth, is to seek the full exposure, that they may gain the full eradication, of the fatal evil. It is no longer a question of honour or dishonour, but one of life or death.

His Lordship seems to be rather misled by the advantages of his own position. Delivering his argument ex cathedra, with scarce a possibility of reply from those against whom he contends, he is liable to be deceived by the silence with which he is heard. It appears as if his point had been gained—"enough has been said and written." This power of arguing without reply is translated into the power of arguing effectively and irrefutably; and from appearing as the attribute of a single Bishop, it is generalized into an endowment of the whole Episcopal order. Hence his Lordship comes to talk in such a style as this: "Our episcopal form of Church Government affords us the best means, under God, of preserving the faith. Had Protestant Germany retained her Episcopacy, the Neology of the last hundred years might have been averted. Had Reformed France kept her Episcopacy, the Arianism of the eighteenth century might never have prevailed. Had Geneva preserved the primitive order of Church Government, she never might have apostatized from the principles of her great founder. If the Church of England is to be saved peaceably and in an orderly manner now, it is her bishops who under God must save her. Should deliverance come in from other quarters, we know not what consequences may follow."

This is a piece of claptrap unworthy of his Lordship's knowledge and piety. The actual substance of his own charge before us, is, that Arianism, Socinianism, Neology, and every other departure from the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel may be avoided, and orthodoxy on every essential point be maintained, and yet Puseyism be as fatal and destructive as error can be. Its poison is virulent enough to nullify all truths it may acknowledge, and do the mischief of all errors it may repudiate. Moreover Puseyism, His Lordship maintains, is but Popery under another name. And what is Popery, but Diocesan Episcopacy unrestrained by Scripture authority and truth—or Episcopacy run mad! But still it is Episcopacy: and the Churches of Rome, of Greece and Russia, of Armenia, Syria and Abyssinia have all the benefits of Episcopacy; and yet they might as well be Neologians of Germany as what they are. And could his Lordship look on the Presbyterian, Wesleyan, Congregational and Baptist communions of England, Scotland, Ireland and America, and say, that, from want of Episcopacy, they are as Christian men and ministers more deficient in pure, evangelical truth, than any Episcopal Churches in existence? And what may be, can only be augured from what is, or has been.

As to the Church of England, Puseyism has brought her to such a pass, that, if deliverance comes to her from any quarter, her friends should be satisfied to think it is deliverance, and be too grateful for the substantial good to scruple about the source or mode from which it is derived. As a matter of fact, the Church is the least possible indebted to her Bishops for any measure of deliverance, or any prospect of it, yet obtained. If, without being of his flock at all, we might speak of him so, we should say, perhaps with a feeling of pride, that our own Bishop, as a defender of the truth in the present danger, is worth the whole Bench at home. Not one of them has protested against the errors of the day with his religious earnestness, and maintained the protest with such an array of sound, protestant, scriptural argument. Only three or four have expressed themselves with similar straightforward decision: the majority, and the highest in rank and place, have blown hot and cold, and done more harm perhaps by their interference than if they had left the matter alone; whilst a number have said nothing, or worse, and are counted on as favourers of their cause by the adversaries of the truth. Even the clergy have been wanting—though it must be gratifying to his Lordship, that one of the first and most influential stands against the introduction of Puseyite fooleries was made in his old parish of Islington, and by its clergy, with his worthy son at their head. The stand was successful; and it immediately became a precedent for other parishes, which vindicated their liberty from its example. But stronger than either the Bishops or clergy, in checking the tide of innovation and superstition, have been the Laity—that massive body of living Christianity, which Episcopacy is too apt to put out of sight as a component part of the Church at all. The best hope of the Church of England, under God, is, that the Christian people in her communion will not suffer themselves to be hoodwinked, like their forefathers of old, by the artifices of priestcraft. Puseyism does not flatter them. If they will be silly, it will let them have gewgaws: if superstitiously worldly and immoral, they shall have easy penances, confessions, and absolutions; and if religiously superstitious, they shall have exclusively efficient ordinances, a demi-god priesthood alternately to serve and rule them, and bodily service of every sort and measure they can wish. But if they will be men, Puseyism insults and degrades them. It requires not their necks to trample on, but their minds. And there is sufficiency of manhood in England, to refute the subjection, if the danger be clearly exposed now in its first approaches.

It was not wisdom, then, in his Lordship to cry SILENCE! Let him revoke it. Let every clergyman rather be urged, fully to possess himself of the truth on the great question of the day, and of all its bearings and tendencies, and to be diligent and faithful in exhibiting and maintaining the truth. It will be no loss of time—no turning aside from proper duty. The truth, in this case, is the essential truth of God's holy Gospel—and its enforcement is the urgent delivery of God's message of grace to sinners. This controversy, wisely conducted, is but the ministry of salvation. It ought to be as productive of conversion and spiritual piety, as were the struggles of the great Reformation.

In the progress of his Lordship's visitation such sentiments and convictions appear to have grown upon him. Hence the charge is introduced by a Dedication to the Bishops of Madras and Bombay, the truth, eloquence and force of which must strike every reader. Though first in order it was of course last in composition. It is the final out-pouring of a devout mind, that has been long pondering over the evils of the time, and at last loses sight of every inferior consideration, in holy anxiety for the grand interests of salvation and godliness, and its reliance upon the word and Spirit of God for their defence and support. It is a noble confession of genuine Protestantism. And Protestantism is human liberty. It restores to man THE WORD, which makes him free indeed.

The first part of the Charge itself is devoted to some statistic and incidental matters, and a few general but wise and scriptural suggestions to the clergy, respecting the ordinary discharge of their ministry. From this division, and a paragraph of the Dedication, we gather the following facts concerning the present state of the Episcopal Church in India. The number of the Clergy allowed by the Honourable Company, on the Bengal Establishment and the Straits, is 53. Of these, in August 1842, there were 34 in active duty, 11 absent on Sick leave, 2 announced, and 4 to be immediately appointed. The Missionaries, and other Clergy not on the Company's Establishment, were 37, with 3 absent on account of health, and 2 occasionally labouring though not yet licensed: in all 42, or 13 more than in 1838, and chiefly through the zeal of the Church Missionary Society in supplying the demand, for Agra and Krishnaghur. The Bengal Clergy amount therefore to 95, instead of 69 in 1838, and 15 in the episcopate of Bishop Middleton. On the Madras Establishment, there were 29 Chaplains of the Company, and (including Ceylon, we suppose) 63 Missionaries and others: in all, 92. On the Bombay Establishment, there were 25 Company's Chaplains, and 7 Missionaries: in all, 32. Thus the number of Clergy in all the three dioceses is 219. For other interesting facts on this subject, we must refer to the charge itself.

The second, and, by far, the larger and more important division of the charge, is devoted to the Tractarian system. His Lordship concedes to its advocates, that they hold all the fundamental facts of Redemption, and are free from heresies, as the word has hitherto been applied: they are not Arians, Socinians, Pelagians or Neologians. And, although the value of the concession is reduced to a mere nothing afterwards, it would, perhaps, have been better to have expressed it more guardedly at first. The Tractarians, we know, are exceedingly apt at unfair quotation; and it would be an easy thing for them to say to those they wished to mislead, that even the Bishop of Calcutta allowed them to be perfectly orthodox on all the fundamental points of the gospel, and therefore, even if on other points they were wrong, it could be of no great consequence; whilst the probability was, that if they were right in their foundation, they were so also in their superstructure. They should not be allowed the opportunity of taking such an advantage. They have no such candour as to notice what follows the concession of his Lordship. "I arraign their entire system of a tendency to sap the Gospel of Christ." The fact is, the chief part of their orthodoxy is but verbal: it is essential heresy after all. No one can honestly read his Lordship's startling examination without being convinced of this. The sum total of their system is the substitution of mechanical religion for spiritual: and, by no possibility, can it be in fundamental agreement with the system of Him, who proclaimed as his fundamental principle, "GOD IS A SPIRIT."

His Lordship supports his arraignment by shewing first, how the Tractarian system, in its general features, differs from the Gospel of the New Testament; secondly, how it not only differs from the Gospel, but is destructive, by implication, of its sacred doctrines; and lastly, the certain event to which it is tending from its assimilation to the principles and proceedings of Popery.—The event to which it tends is thus described. "The question, then is, what will be the character of our clergy twenty or thirty years hence? What the remaining vitality and efficiency of our Church, when the system is fully developed? The more insidious it is at present, the more fatal will be the poison infused into the very soul and substance of the divinity of the next age; till our English 'Council of Trent' is convened, our Liturgy 'catholicised,' our Thirty-nine Articles altered, our Homilies 'unprotestantized,' our canons and Rubrics inlaid with the practices and customs of the fourth and fifth centuries, and the faithful members of our Protestant Church excluded by the imposition of sinful terms of communion from the Anglican Church, as they were at the Reformation from the corrupt and idolatrous Church of Rome." True, his Lordship does not anticipate this apostacy: but it is none the less the issue to which Tractarianism tends.

We should be glad to lead our Readers, step by step, through the whole course of his Lordship's argument: but our limits forbid. We beg they will travel through it by themselves. They will find it no weary journey. The reasoning is instinct with life and vigour. It is most cautiously based on undeniable premises. It has every beauty of sound and honourable argumentation, and is full of what most interests intellectual and immortal man.

We can only add, that, appended to the charge, are independent Dissertations of great value on Tradition and Justification, and various articles of information, of interest to every one who is concerned about Christianity in India.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 5.

— The Hurkaru is surprised at our delay in taking up the question of Education again. It cannot be helped. He must bide our time; and may be assured, that the subject is one we shall neglect only when we cease to be.

— Colonel Hughes, against whom, from the proceedings on the late Court Martial, there seemed to be some pique in high quarters at Bombay, has been appointed to the Command at Deesa, and so replaced in honour and confidence.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 6.

— In noticing the remarks of the Bombay Times on the sycophancy of our Calcutta Society to Lord Ellenborough, the Hurkaru justly maintains that whatever it may have been, the Press has had no concern in it. Nor is it likely to have. His Lordship is so much its friend as effectually to take care he shall not spoil it, by any of the means by which independence is usually corrupted. It has therefore reason to be grateful. The preservation of its integrity is worth infinitely more than the smiles and patronage it may miss.

— The Star informs us that the Asiatic Society has determined to address the Government upon the expediency of immediately deputing a properly qualified person to examine and report upon the sub-marine volcano which lately broke out amongst the islands near Cheduba, on the coast of Arracan. We hope the application will be successful.

— The Delhi Gazette of the 27th ult. gives two letters, signed T. on the relations between the British Government and the Royal House of Delhi, which may be taken, we suppose, as the opening of Mr. Thompson's war on behalf of the Shah.

— The same paper contains farther statements on the Lahore tragedy, which we have placed amongst our selections.

— Extensive flights of locusts are still spoken of at most of the Stations in the Upper Provinces.

— Our Delhi Contemporary has an interesting letter from a Correspondent, describing the advantages likely to arise from the navigation of the Nerbudda, and a plan of accomplishing it by wrought iron pontoons to be run out on the shore by wheels, attached for the time, at every insuperable obstruction in the river: proposing too the formation of a Joint Stock Company to carry the project into effect, under the countenance of Government.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7.

— Another cargo of ice, said to extend to five hundred tons, is off Calcutta, in the Dorchester.

— The Assam Steamer and her cargo-boat get on swimmingly. They were at Berhampore at half past nine A. M. on the 2d, having left Calcutta at 7 A. M. of the 29th ult.

— It is explained, in to-day's Hurkaru, that the Governor General has had nothing to do with the leave given to ten men in each company of the Barrackpore Regiments to go on pilgrimage to Juggunnath. It seems the speedy removal of many of the Regiments from the neighbourhood of Orissa, by the approaching Relief, had occasioned an unusual number of applications for leave to visit Pooree; and the extraordinary indulgence was granted by the General Commanding the station, at the request of the Commanding Officers of the Regiments. This is a very different story from the original version of the Englishman.

— The Berenice, which was to leave Bombay with the Mail, on the 2d inst. had about sixteen passengers, besides children, engaged.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 9.

— It is reported from Gwalior that a second deputation was to be despatched to Dholepore, to endeavour to prevail on Col. Spiers to return to the Capital—of course to no purpose.

— Moulmein papers have been received to the 20th September—in which we see nothing worthy of note, except a report that the Governor General has directed Sir William Norris, Recorder of Penang to proceed to Moulmein, to investigate the charges that have been brought against the late local authorities. We think the report very likely to be true: and we trust the investigation will tend to bring all the parties concerned to a right mind, and to heal the discords or discontents that have prevailed through the Provinces generally. In the mean time, we regret to see a disposition to scoff at serious piety, and to make those who make conscience of fearing God the subjects of silly ridicule.

— Last Friday, the Bishop of Calcutta preached in the Cathedral and ordained three Deacons and one Priest. According to the report in to-day's Hurkaru, His Lordship's sermon was in great part a reiteration of some of the points of his late charge; but we are sorry to see the following statement: "The Bishop advertod to three instances in which false or exaggerated charges had been brought against his Clergy, in the newspapers of England and India;—the first of which was sufficiently falsified by a sub-committee's (of the S. P. G.) report;—the second was refuted by the facts of the day, since of the four candidates before him for holy orders, three had been entirely educated in Bishop's College, and one had resided there a few months;—the third was unanswerably convicted of falsehood, by a letter addressed to himself and since given to the public." Of the sub-committee we shall have to speak hereafter, and the case of the Rev. Krishna Mohun Banerjea we do not mean to touch: but if his Lordship is so satisfied with the state and character of Bishop's College, as a seat of theological education, what, in the name of wonder, has been inspiring his Charges and Sermons for these five years past with their earnest protestation against the pernicious errors of the Tractarians? Has his Lordship been frightening himself and the community with an imaginary danger—or a merely possible contingency? We believe not—and deeply grieve that the kindliness of his disposition—his unwillingness to acknowledge the existence of a spot upon his flock—should lead him to such inconsistencies with himself and with plain fact.

— The Gentleman's Gazette says, that the Parsees of Bombay are going to appeal to the Privy Council against the late decision, which has brought their marriages under the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 10.

— The Assam Steamer reached Rajmuhal on the 5th instant at 9 A. M., continuing to do admirably.

— The Englishman says, that the Arab Ship Atiet Riman from Muscat, was boarded by the Castle Eden on the 24th September, which reported the death of Sir John Norton, of the Madras Bench, on that day.

— The meeting of the Subscribers to the Medical Retiring Fund, yesterday afternoon, was, we understand, rather stormy. At least the reception of the Report was opposed; and at last, the Accounts were passed only on condition that a Committee of Investigation should be appointed, on the continuance of the maximum rate of subscription, and the Reserve Fund. The Committee was appointed, and will proceed to its task immediately.

— From the Hurkaru we learn, that Mr. Frederick Currie, of the Sudder Court of the N. W. Provinces, is to succeed Mr. Thomason as Secretary to Government, on his proceeding to assume the Lieut. Governorship at Agra; and that the Secretaryship being given to a much younger officer than the present incumbent, Mr. Hamilton, a saving will be made in the salaries of both Governor and Secretary.

— From the Singapore Free Press, we learn that H. M. Ship Samarang had been got up again, after nine days hard work, and was found to be but little injured in her hull.

— Lieut. Col. Butterworth arrived at Singapore, on the 27th August, and was immediately sworn in Governor of the Straits Settlements, and a Judge of the Court of Judicature, under the customary salute.

— In the Friend of China of the 3d August, there is a Proclamation from his Excellency the Governor, which states, that it has been brought to his notice, that such a step had been contemplated as sending vessels with Opium to the Chinese Ports opened by treaty to Foreign trade, and demanding that it be admitted in virtue of the concluding clause of the New Tariff, which provides for all articles not actually enumerated in that Tariff, passing at an ad valorem duty of five per cent. But his Excellency makes known to all concerned, that, as Opium is an article the traffic in which is declared to be illegal and contraband by the Laws and Imperial Edicts, they will take such a step at their own risk, and, if British subjects, will meet with no support or protection from Her Majesty's Consuls, or other Officers."

— The Authorities at Formosa connected with the massacre of the crews of the Nerbudda and Anne, have been found guilty of deceiving the Emperor by lies, and been handed over to the Board of Punishments. The Imperial Order closes with this remarkable language: "In cherishing Chinese and Foreigners, we look upon each with the same equal benevolence. And, the General and Intendant aforesaid, having become amenable by their crime to punishment, we will not allow, that because the representation came from outside foreigners, it should be carelessly cast aside without investigation. Our own subjects and foreigners, ministers and people, should all alike understand, that it is our high desire to act with even handed and perfect justice—Respect this."

— A letter in the Hurkaru, from Chandernagore, describes a melancholy accident by which many lives appear to have been lost. Four boats full of young and old pushed off, to throw a large image of Doorga into the water, and one of them listed on one side, filled and sunk. The people jumping helter skelter into the other boats, which all went down too; and before others could reach the spot all had disappeared.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 11.

The Hurkaru of yesterday gave a startling report of an investigation at the Police Office, which shows how fast the dufadars are making the Cooly Exportation scheme work out the worst evils that were ever anticipated from it. And his columns today contain a letter from Mr. J. H. Miller, explaining how the case came to be discovered. That gentleman, being at the Botanical Gardens holiday keeping, last Saturday week, observed a human being floating down the river, and made off to save him, after first learning that it was a cooly who had jumped overboard from a ship anchored close by, to escape from emigration to the Mauritius. The man was picked up by a fishing boat, before Mr. Miller could reach him; but though greatly exhausted he crawled into his boat, clung to his feet and besought his protection—which was readily given him. When he was claimed by the people of the Ship, (what was her name?) Mr. Miller very properly refused to deliver him up, but on the contrary immediately dispatched a note to Mr. Paton, the Chief Magistrate, by a bearer, informing him of the circumstance. With great promptitude, that gentleman sent two Police constables to the spot, with instructions to institute inquiries, and liberate such of the Coolies as were unwilling to proceed with the ship on her voyage. About forty or fifty availed themselves of the opportunity; and the poor creatures generally were found to be in a wretched condition. One was an insane woman; who, at the Police office, said, the dufadars had prevailed on her to go on board, on the pretence that she was to go to Allahabad for her health. The depositions of all shew, that they were inveigled on the falsest representations, kept in rigorous confinement and cruelly treated. We trust the investigation will be followed up as it ought to be.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

AGRA.

There is a very extraordinary story going about the station, which, under the circumstances, we consider it proper to refrain from giving, till we hear from one of our Cawnpore Correspondents, for whose communication we have been anxiously looking out, regarding the death of Dr. Rose of the 11th N. I. If the story is true, we envy not the feelings of those who, by their insinuations, caused the death of an innocent man. By our next issue we hope to be in possession of the facts of the case.

Our Lieutenant Governor is said to be in considerable anxiety regarding the late events in the Punjab, and to have expressed a wish that the Governor General were on the spot, at Agra, where he could have joined him by dawk, to consult with him on the subject.

"The Army of Exercise," it is said, will assemble at the Poya Ghat, and, as the Gwalior affair appears likely to be 'nogo,' it will march towards the North west frontier; unless, indeed, some fresh orders come for 'the gathering' to take place farther up, probably at Delhi.

It is confidently stated, that the Governor General and the Council of India are to proceed to the upper provinces, and that the Hon. Mr. Bird is to be left alone in his glory, at Calcutta, as Governor of Bengal. It is not, however said, whether Agra or Allahabad is to be the seat of the Supreme Government; any how, the move would be a good one.—Agra Ukhbar, Sept. 30.

GWALIOR.

Symptoms of drawing back! A council was held in one of the inner apartments of the Palace, at which were present the Tara Baee, the Rookma Baee, Bapoo Sitoleea, Tantees Phaukreea, the favourite Huzooriah, who was imprisoned by the Mama, the Khasgee, Moolajee and Autma Ram. The first question discussed is said to have been "How far it would be adviaable to send the Khásgee to Dholpore in the character of a Penitent" but this proposition was negatived owing to the violent opposition of the Ranees. The next point raised was to call in the aid of the individuals, who were officials, before the Khasgee's usurpation of power, and this suggestion having been approved, arrangements were made to send Ram Rao Phalkeea, the ex-Residency Vakeel, Bajee Rao, his Secretary, as well as Cheemun Rao, and other Sirdars, to the Resident at Dholpore, and these Chiefs have left the Lushkur, carrying with them all kinds of professions of peace and amity from the Ranees, and no few promises in the bargain from the Sirdars.

Such is one account, which we have received from a Correspondent in the capital—another is:

"A number of the Chiefs of the Durbar had been chosen to proceed to Dholpore, to reconcile matters with the Resident, and having sent off their tents, were to start on the 25th. However, the previous evening, the Baee observed two young crows, seemingly fond of each other, enter her apartment, when all of a sudden they disappeared; on which, in great alarm, she related the circumstances to the Ladies of the Zenana, who asserted that it was a most inauspicious omen. The astrologer was hereupon called, and he (perhaps from the aspect of affairs, more than any thing else) gave the same opinion and that some impending calamity was threatened. On this account, the deputation was deferred and another [the same as given by our Correspondent above] substituted. The report current here is that should the Resident refuse to recognise the Khasgee and allow him to hold the reins of government, the latter will at all events prepare for a struggle. But the Troops are likely to hang back, and indeed it is said that a plot had been laid to apprehend the Khasgee and to expel the Baee to Ojeyn, which was detected, and some of the conspirators are now in confinement. Khasgee, however, is in momentary dread of his life."

"A swarm of locusts visited this on the 18th and 19th and again on the 23rd and 24th committing great devastation in this and the surrounding districts."—Agra Ukhbar, 30th September.

LAHORE INTELLIGENCE.

Our latest news from this quarter is not so copious or so interesting as we could wish; but it is sufficiently important. A party of Akalees had, it is said, crossed the Sutlege with the intention of creating a disturbance at Khytul. Should this prove true and the chief, Gunda Singh, be proved to have acted by order of the Durbar, or even at the request of any of the influential Chiefs at Lahore, it furnishes our Government with the wished-for opportunity to interfere.

There are as before some new versions of the grand tragedy; but differing only in minor points of detail. The Army which, it was said, was coming to guard the ghats and frontier stations, turns out to have been a Regiment of Cavalry 600 strong, which, on the first outbreak of the conspiracy, Dhyan Singh ordered to proceed to Kussoor, a few miles from Ferozepore, on the opposite side of the river, for the purpose of watching the motions of the force at that Station. It is reported that Goolab Singh, who was on the march from Jumboo with 40,000 men to be present at the Dusserah, had, on hearing of the fate of his brother Dhyan Singh, pushed on with the determination to exact a terrible revenge, so much so indeed as to have threatened to burn and sack Lahore. The gates of the city have been closed for days and not a soul allowed ingress or egress, and both it and Umritsir, have been plundered by the various marauding bands of Soldiers. All discipline is at an end, and all accounts agree that the sacrifice of life must have been some thousands and most likely Goolab Singh will swell the list to some purpose.—Agra Ukhbar, 30th September.

THE PUNJAUB.

The state of Lahore and the policy likely to be adopted in regard to the Punjaub, when the Government will have been apprized of the late events, continue naturally to engross the attention of the public, and we shall not be long in suspense on this subject, as Lord Ellenborough must, ere this, be in possession of the earlier facts of the tragedy. We have received numerous accounts from different quarters detailing the late occurrences, all coinciding as to the main features, but almost every one differing in details, the variations diverging more or less from the theme according to the source of the writer's information, and we think it will become a matter of no small difficulty to collate from the various narratives any thing like a true account of what has happened. It seems even doubtful, according to one of the two translations which we subjoin, whether Shere Singh fell by the hand of Ajeet Singh or not. That he was the moving cause is of course beyond a doubt. The following facts may be considered as established:—That a conspiracy was formed to murder Shere Singh; that Dhyan Singh was chief member of this conspiracy and employed Ajeet Singh to carry it into execution; that Shere Singh was murdered, and subsequently Purtaub Singh his son; that Ajeet Singh, as a collateral member of the family, thought the opportunity a good one to advance his claims to the throne; that Dhyan Singh opposed this arrangement, as the accession of Ajeet Singh might have deprived him of much power, and that he fell a victim to the irritated feelings of the Sirdar; further that Ajeet Singh took possession of the fort of Lahore, and was forthwith besieged by Heera Singh and his uncle Suchet Singh, Goolab Singh not being present as at first so circumstantially reported, with the assistance of General Ventura or that of his troops. The whole of those events occurred on the 15th. On the following day Sirdars Ajeet Singh and Lena Singh, finding themselves unequal to the contest, made an attempt to escape, which was frustrated, and both of them taken and put to death. The gates were opened to Heera Singh, and he proceeded at once to place the boy Dhuleep Singh on the throne of his late uncle, (in compliance with his father's previously declared intention,) succeeded in preserving order amongst the soldiers, and proceeded to take steps for establishing a Government. It is now affirmed, and the authority from which we derive our information is good, that far from evincing any hostile intentions towards us, he has, with the concurrence of his uncle, solicited the assistance of the British Government in punishing the disturbers of the peace (the adherents of Ajeet Singh) and in consolidating the Government which he has formed, a step to which he must have been incited by the consideration that it was preferable to solicit our interference at once to seeing us adopt hostile measures which must end in the overthrow of his power. It is certain that an official notification of the accession of the "Maharajah Dhuleep Singh to the throne of Lahore" has been communicated to the British Government, but we cannot reconcile Heera Singh's call for assistance with the fact of his sending so many troops to the frontier, unless he has only done so with the object of getting them away from Lahore.

It gives us sincere gratification to find that our earlier information regarding the participation of perhaps the only worthy Seikh Sirdar of high rank, Sirdar Lena Singh, Majeeteea, was incorrect; the guilty party was Lena Singh Sindhanwallah, a very different character, who has met his deserts. It will also, we are sure, give the public general satisfaction to find that the report regarding the death of General Ventura was unfounded, and that he is likely to keep his place at the new durbar. As is always the case on such occasions, many of the facts, and especially the atrocities of Ajeet Singh, seem to have been greatly magnified, particularly as regards the murder of the wives of Shere Singh and his son. His fury was only directed against the children, to cut off all chance of a dispute about a succession which he wished to secure to himself.

The official intelligence of the catastrophe at Lahore did not reach Simla until the 19th, and of course created a great sensation there. Col. Richmond has proceeded to Simla to consult with the Lieutenant-Governor, and in the mean time the whole of the troops in the Sirhind Division have been warned to prepare for service. The 8th Irregular Cavalry at Hansi to move up forthwith to the frontier.

Lahore, 15th Sept.—This morning, being Friday, His Highness Maharajah Shere Singh, proceeded to the River (Ravee) and amused himself in rowing up and down for some time. He then mounted on horseback, and proceeded to the garden of Shah Belaval, where Sirdar Lena Singh, Sindhanwallah, and Ajeet Singh represented that their troops were drawn out for His Highness's inspection. The Maharajah rode in the direction of the troops, when Sirdar Ajeet Singh on his arriving in front of the line, handed a case containing a rifle for the Maharajah to look at. While the Maharajah was inspecting it, he was surprized at seeing an arrow, and hearing a ball pass him; he looked around him, quite bewildered, and in the discharge of a considerable number of musquets, fell dead with serveral of his followers. Dewan Deenanath and others escaped and fled to their homes. Ajeet Singh having thus put the Maharajah to death, was proceeding at the head of his detachment towards the town, when he met Dhyan Singh, who was about to join the cortége of the Maharajah. Sirdar Ajeet Singh stopped him, and taking his hand, asked him where he was going to? Adding that he had done the deed, and put the Maharajah to death, "now come and see me" (Ajeet Singh loquitur) "on the guddee of Lahore." On this Rajah Dhyan Singh said neither of them had any right to the throne, but that it belonged to a son of Runjeet Singh, when Ajeet Singh became enraged, and having watched his opportunity, took out a pistol and shot Dhyan Singh. He then proceeded to the fort, and ordered the gates to be shut; murdered Purtaub Singh and seven of his attendants; then proceeded to the private apartments of Maharajah Shere Singh, where he took a son of the Maharajah, nine months old, and stamped him to death. Two women on witnessing this barbarous deed, stabbed themselves on the spot. Heera Singh, encamped outside the city, on hearing of these events, proceeded to the camp of General Ventura, ordered out his troops, besieged the town of Lahore, and established a battery on the small fort called Killa Badshahee. A smart fire was kept up from 3 P. M. of the 15th to 3 P. M. of the 16th, when Ajeet Singh, having mounted the wall of the town, let himself down by some ropes. He had been seen, and was forthwith taken prisoner by a regiment of Nujeebs with Lena Singh and some followers, and immediately put to death. The Fort surrendered, and Dhuleep Singh, son of the late Maharajah Runjeet Singh, was placed on the throne. He is now eleven years old. Heerah Singh was appointed to the office lately held by Dhyan Singh, and a proclamation was issued that life and property should be fully respected. A detachment of troops was immediately dispatched to the residence of Ajeet Singh, about 5 koss from Umritser, with orders not to leave a soul alive. Another detachment was sent off to Kussor, and a third to Phuloor. Many lives were lost in the city of Lahore during these occurrences, and Rajah Goolab Singh is hourly expected at Lahore from Jumboo. A report prevails at Loodhianah that Rajah Heerah Singh had sent some soldiers to seize the person of Ittur Singh, brother of Ajeet Singh, who had taken refuge with his Gooroo; and it was an express direction to the men to put the priest to death if he refused to give up Ittur Singh.

Another account is to the following effect:—

After the death of the Maharajah, of Purtaub Singh, and of Dhyan Singh, Raja Heera Singh laid siege to the fort of Lahore, and began firing on the city. While these operations were going on, a paharee sepoy brought the head of Ajeet Singh to Heera Singh, for which he received a very large reward. The body was also brought, and having been severed into pieces, was ordered to be exposed on the different gates of the city. Troops were sent to seize and destroy Ajeet Singh's house, and to order that his lands should thenceforward be ploughed with asses, and no longer with bullocks. A detachment was also sent to Ooni to seize Sirdar Ittur Singh. The city is in peace, proclamations have been issued holding forth severe punishment to plunderers, and directing that any property which had been plundered should be restored. The Bunneeahs and others have commenced dealing. Rajah Goolab Singh has arrived with a large army and many guns from Jumboo, and has acceded to all the arrangements made by Rajah Heera Singh. Sirdar Lena Singh, Majeeteea, having heard of his arrival, waited upon him to exonerate himself from all share in the conspiracy, and also General Ventura. Bhaee Goormook Singh and Misr Beleo Ram were ordered to be closely imprisoned, and put in chains; being accused as the chief agents in the late affairs. An army was ordered to the banks of the Sutlege and a Khureeta addressed to the British authorities requesting their assistance in punishing the conspirators, and in bringing the kingdom into order.—Delhi Gazette.

Lahore.—Some anxiety is felt on account of Baron Sheinbach (?) who some time since passed through the city and proceeded towards Kashment, but has not been since heard of. Seven travellers were murdered in a thick dhak jungle between the villages of Puckwarra and Jallinder. The first named village was subsequently attacked, 9 or 10 of the inhabitants killed, and every thing of value carried off.* It is said that Heera Singh has put to death Bhaee Ram Singh and Jemadar Khooshyal Singh, on account of a former enmity subsisting between them; also Misr Belee Ram, treasurer, on pretence of his having delivered the key of the public treasure to Ajeet Singh. Twenty-one pieces of cannon have reached Phuloor, and also a very considerable body of troops. Since the 20th, numerous detachments have been marched from Lahore to the different Ghats on the Sutlege. The head of Sirdar Lena Singh has been exposed on the Kashmeeree gate and that of Ajeet Singh on the Lahoree gate; other gates were similarlge decorated with the heads of men of inferior note. Their bodies were exposed on the plain until some of the Sirdars begged the Maharajah might order their bodies to be burnt, which was done accordingly. The ashes of Maharajah Shere Singh, of Purtaub Singh, and of Rajah Dhyan Singh were ordered to be carried to the Ganges on the 19th September.—Delhi Gazette, Sept. 27.

The many accounts we have received of the details of the Lahore tragedy, and which it would be needless repetition to lay before our readers, though as we have before observed differing in particulars, prove to us that our view of the principal events as given in the last Delhi Gazette, were quite correct. Our intelligence from Ferozepore extends to the 27th inst., on the morning of which day General Vincent had returned to his post. The 19th N. I. was preparing, in compliance with the General Order, to move upon Sinde, (we have been obliged to defer some observations on the choice of Regiments for this service to our next,) the special Cavalry guard stationed at the Ghat had been withdrawn, and Mr. Greathed, who reached Ferozepore on the 22d, was about to remove the Treasure from the fort to a "lockup" just completed in the Magazine compound. It was believed that Prince Timoor Shah, the eldest son of the late Shah Soojah, would occupy the fort with his suite.

From Lahore itself we have little of news to communicate; every thing is represented as being "quiet," and "the Court" are most anxiously awaiting the reply to the letters to the Governor-General, announcing the accession of Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, uncertain whether he will be recognized or not. Troops had been despatched towards Peshawur and Mooltan. At Peshawur it was thought the Affghans, and especially the Afreedees, would not be slow in taking advantage of the late events, and it was generally believed in the capital that Dewan Sawun Mull would embrace the present favourable opportunity for declaring himself independent. A collision may therefore be looked for in that quarter with considerable certainty. A deputation had been sent to Colonel Richmond to solicit permission for the ashes of the Maharajah, and the other Sirdars who were lately murdered, to cross the river Sutlege, and proceed through our territories to Hurdwar. Eighteen women, wives and concubines of Rajah Dhyan Singh are said to have burnt themselves at the Suttee, and only one (a fortunate who had escaped) ascended Maharajah Shere Singh's funeral pile. General Ventura and the present Maharajah and Minister are stated to be on good terms together. We may by our next expect to be in possession of the resolution to which the Supreme Government may have come. —Delhi Gazette, Sept. 30.

The following is an extract from a letter written by a native correspondent at Lahore :—

Lahore, 22d Sept. 1843.—"Heera Singh and Soochait Singh have settled the state of the country far and near. When Golaub Singh heard of the intelligence of his brother's death, he immediately commenced his march from Jumboo with 10,000 of the bravest fighting men in the Khalso. When he got two stages he received news from his nephew, that he need not now hurry himself to Lahore as he had got every thing as he could wish; but before leaving that part of the country to put every thing in a correct safe state, as well at Jumboo as at Sirhut Pahar, Cashmere, Ladakh, &c. &c.

Heera Singh also despatched perwannahs and orders to Sawun Mull at Mooltan, to Sirdar Tej Singh Nasim of Peshawur and to the Killedar of Govindghur to keep every thing right and quiet to cajole the soldiery in every way by sweet words, promises, &c., that each foot soldier should have Rs. 12, and mounted ones Rs. 30 per mensem as pay; the whole army to have one month's pay in a present, besides from Heera Singh each regiment Rs. 500 to incite them to revenge the death of Raja Dhyan Singh. The Boy Koonwur Dhuleep Singh, 6 or 7 years old placed on the Guddee and to have it explained to the whole army that on the day of the Dusserah the whole of the army should be drawn up in full dress, when Dhuleep Singh, the son of the founder of the Khalso, should be presented to them all in state as the legitimate inheritor of the unsurpassed dignity of "Maharajah of the Punjaub."

Heera Singh has been pretty successful in getting a large sum of money, jewels, property, &c, from the late treasurer Misr Bailee, and keeper of the toshuk-khana Bhaee Goormuk Singh; but whether these people are dead yet or not is a secret, as their zenanahs are strictly guarded by soldiers who have helped themselves, to many valuables out of the toshuk-khana. All the Seikhs are soldiers and all love plunder; at present near Lahore things look tolerably quiet.—Englishman, Oct. 6.

PESHAWUR.—Prince Mahomed Alum Kubeer Kuzeer, son of Shah Kamran, lately arrived from Herat, having addressed a letter to the Governor General of India, soliciting permission to proceed to Hindoostan and pay his respects to his Lordship, and also some assistance, has received a reply from his Lordship to the effect that he will not receive him, and will not afford assistance of any kind whatsoever.—Delhi Gazette, Sept. 27.

CABUL.—Sirdar Dost Mahomed Khan has succeeded in organizing a Regiment of Infantry, composed of Hazarahs; they are made to resemble the European soldiers in dress and accoutrements as much as possible. They are men of fair complexions and light eyes. He has established grades of Jemadars and Koomedans, and appointed men of the Regiment to fill them, but placed the entire Regiment under command of a member of his family.—Ibid.

THE LAHORE CHIEFS. X

We publish the following sketches of the most remarkable personages who figured in, and about the Court of Maharajah Runjeet Singh, and of his short-lived and ill-fated successors. Much regarding these individuals has been and is misstated, and, as the memory of them will soon die away, we have endeavoured to secure from one, who knew many of them personally, some brief notice of what men they were. The land they dwelt in, will in all human probability come ere many years are over under the domination of the British Government. There is no vates sacer to write a record in that barbarous country of their ephemeral existence, and as every little in such a case is yet something worth, we have succeeded in extracting from the memory of a friend, the following items:

"You wish for information respecting the Chiefs and Notables of the Seikh durbar. If you will take them written in haste, and from mere recollection, I will give you such notes of the men, as time has left me means of doing. Mine, of course remember, are mere personal impressions.

The general opinion which some intercourse induced me to form respecting the Seikh court was unfavourable. The Sirdars were almost to a man grossly ignorant, they were with few exceptions given to gross sensuality, and their style and manners were not what would in the East be considered gentlemanlike or in good taste. Sirdar Lena Singh recently put to death at Lahore, and Sirdar Ajeet Singh, the arch-murderer, who has experienced a similar deserved fate, were the only two chiefs who professed any education. The former had a turn for mechanics, and astronomy (on the Ptolomician principle), and had some knowledge of the principles of Gunnery. He was Runjeet's Master of the Ordnance, and had shown considerable ingenuity in casting shells, adopting a carriage to Howitzers which fitted them for vertical fire, &c. &c. He was fond of talking on abstract subjects: he would for instance strenuously resist the doctrine of the earth's motion, and bring instances to support his argument, saying, "If the earth moves, and you are moving on its surface in a ship, the stick you throw into the water should move parallel with you, but it remains behind, therefore, &c &c. &c." Ajeet Singh had, I believe, read some of the Goolistan, and on occasions when the Spruch Sprechur "the sayer of fine sayings," of the court, Fuqeer Azeez-ood-deen had talked himself hoarse or dry, this Chief used in a clumsy way to "make the rose of friendship bloom in the garden of esteem, and connect the hearts of inclination with the chain of fidelity." War, women, hunting, money, power, drink and horses were the objects in life of nearly all these men; they talked, and thought of nothing else: they knew nothing else, they cared for nothing else—except perhaps dress, in the art of which I must do them the justice to say, they were profoundly versed, and highly accomplished. They always struck me, with some very few exceptions, as a set of savages with fine clothes on, and I often thought I could make as good a durbar out of an equal number of the Jaut villagers of the plains about them after a very small amount of training. Their manners generally bespoke that freedom which is the result, not of frankness, and confidence, but of coarseness, and unculture. The soldier-like bearing, and physical advantages of these men proposessed at first sight, but I think no one who set steadily to a close observation of them, could arrive at any conclusion essentially different from the one above sketched. On the question of national bravery at one time attributed to the Seikhs, their admirers have been of late years undeceived; the Seikhs like all men of all nations are on occasion personally brave; but I can conceive no nation, compelled as the Seikhs are, to maintain a set of desperadoes (the Akalees) to head them in war, to be nationally brave. The insolence, violence and extortion of the Akalees is unbounded, and the people who can submit to it in peace for the sake of their aid and service in wartime must have strong reasons for admitting the necessity of the sufferance of these desperate men. Runjeet on disciplining his troops contrived to break up the larger masses of the Akalees and distribute them among the Ghorchurra levies of his army.

The Seikhs, as they have been, were coerced into order and union, by the influence of one extraordinary man. His death has dissolved the sole bond that connected them; for on the loss of his personal influence as a governing power, the nation had nothing in the shape of law, or established order upon which to fall back. The old confederacy of independent Chiefs, the Gooroomata, or council of the nation had all been swept away in the absolutism of Runjeet, and he was succeeded by Khuruk Singh, an idiot and Shere Singh, a vulgar-minded sensualist.

This last named person has been called by Captain Osborne "a fine, manly looking fellow." He dressed well, rode well, and looked well on horseback. These I think are his only merits. His features bespoke the man. They were not unpleasing when he smiled, and many thought them handsome; but the eye expressed nothing but violence, and imperiousness, and the form of the lower part of the face [illegible] sensuality. His manners affected ease, but were often marked by unbecoming freedom. He seemed little loved, or cared for. His attendants, and retainers were all of low grade, Hindostanees, or the yeomanry who filled the ranks of his Ghorchurras. His confidential servant, and humble friend was a low Mussulman from Cawnpore, with the manners, and style that these people pick up in a cantonment with European troops. This man termed himself, I think "Adjutant," by way of distinctive title, and was fond of appearing in a cast full dress lieutenant's uniform. Shere Singh never could have ruled but by sufferance, nor save as long as he consented to remain subject to the influence of Raja Dhyan Singh.

This remarkable man, whom I observe some writers call "effeminate," was the ablest by far of the Seikh Sirdars. He was the second brother of the three Chiefs of Jumboo, and served Runjeet Singh in the capacity of first Minister. He was devotedly attached to his master whom he treated by a degree of respect that was singular, and even affecting. While his son, Heera Singh, occupied a silver chair near the Maharaja, Dhyan Singh either stood, or sat on the ground somewhat behind Runjeet with his shield at his back, and his sword across his knee like a soldier as he was. I never saw him without them. The shield was an ordinary one of rhinoceros hide, the sword a plain close handled tulwar. His dress was plain, and manly, consisting of a green silk slightly quilted chupkun, except on state occasions, when he dressed very splendidly in armour. His features were highly intellectual and expressive, of a thoughtful cast, but bearing a look of strong determination: he seldom smiled, and when he did, it was sadly: he spoke little, but always well and to the purpose. As may be supposed, he was shy and reserved with Europeans; but no one could be long with him without perceiving his superiority to those about him. He was about the middle height, well made, save in the singular deformity of a double thumb on both hands, from above the second joint. In his habits of business he was indefatigable. Orders were given to wake him at all hours of the night in the event of important despatches arriving. I need hardly add that he was a happy exception at the Seikh Court as respects excess, nor that he was notorious by personal intrepidity.

He was the sole man capable of ruling the Seikhs, had they been content to be ruled by any one. He must have been about forty-five or more when he was killed: Captain Osborne makes him much too young.

His elder brother Goolab Singh, is a heavy sinister looking man, who is said to have all his brother's determination with little of his talent. He betrayed the Seikh weakness for finery by decking himself with a tasteless profusion of jewels. He was sulky, and reserved to an excess with Europeans, whom he seemed to look on with jealousy and dislike. He is notorious for the savage cruelty of his administration of the territories under him. As an instance I may note that a British Officer travelling through part of them in 1839 arrived at a village where one hundred of the inhabitants had recently been flayed alive for non-payment of all demands of revenue. Such is Seikh government in its simplicity. This man must exercise considerable weight in determining the future destinies of the Punjab.

The third brother, Soocheyt Singh, was when I knew him the D'orsay of the Seikh durbar; he was an excessive fop, but certainly he dressed with infinite taste and splendour. This dressing seemed to be the business of his life. He is exceedingly handsome, but his features bespeak no intellect. What he was in intelligence could not be learned from any speech of his, for at the time I saw him he was suffering from some affection of the tongue which rendered him almost dumb. He looked though as if he would have been garrulous, had the power been given him.

Sirdar Ajeet Singh was the son, I think, of Utter Singh, an old and influential chieftain; the old man was still alive when I was at the durbar, He was a violent anti-English partisan, and expressed his sentiments on the subject with bluntness, and energy even in public durbar. Ajeet Singh professed, as has been noted some literary accomplishments, and being a favorite with the Maharaja, and of his own blood, with prepossessing exterior, and tolerable address, he was on several occasions put at the head of political missions, wherein the real agent was Fuqeer Azeez-oo-deen. He always struck me by having an infinite opinion of himself. The little useless knowledge he had, made him of some consequence among his ignorant countrymen, and he certainly conceived that he possessed talents for the conduct of public business, and in particular for deplomatic negotiation. His residence in Calcutta after the death of Runjeet as agent for the Ranee [illegible] his diplomatic talents on that occasion being employed to no purpose, he re-ingratiated himself at the durbar, and his meddling conceited turn of mind made him an easy tool in the hands of those who sought to compass the downfall of Shere Singh. How he turned upon them we all know, and how he got his reward therefore.

Bhy Goormukh Singh, who is said to have instigated Ajeet Singh to the murder of Dhyan Singh, was with Bhy Ram Singh supposed, when I knew the durbar, to have a good deal of influence with Runjeet as respects the internal management of the country. He was a great intriguer about the Court, but rarely appeared in foreign affairs. He was always supposed to be jealous of the influence of the Minister with his master. The instigation to the murder is thus easily accounted for.

Sirdar Lena Singh I have already spoken of as the Vauban, for fault of a better, of the Punjaub. He was in person and manners one of the most gentlemanlike Seikhs I have known. He was dignified, and quiet in his demeanour; he expressed himself clearly, and concisely, and was undoubtedly highest among the Sirdars in the estimation of Runjeet after the Minister. He was not however I think much employed out of his own deportments, save in complimentary missions. There was a jealousy between the minister and him, which accounts for his siding with Ajeet Singh.

One of the ablest man in the Punjaub, and one of the most discreet of those whom I met with, always excepting the minister,—was Misser Belee Ram, the Treasurer of the State. He is now I believe Governor of Govindgurh, or stationed there in charge of the Treasury. His name I observe does not appear in the accounts of the recent troubles. On each previous change of Government, he has contrived to hold his own with all parties ultimately, although for a time disgraced and in danger. He is much respected by all persons, and was a confidential officer of Runjeet's.

There are many names of men who at the time when I knew the durbar were influential about it which do not appear in connection with recent events. General Tej Singh, titular Commander-in-Chief of the disciplined troops, an able, an expert tactician, is now Governor of Peshawur. He never possessed much political influence. General Futteh Sing Màn, Sirdar Urjun Singh son of Hurree Singh who was killed at Jamrood, the last but two of Runjeet's old companions in arms, Sirdars Mungul Singh, Bhoop Singh, Jham Singh, Sabha Singh, Baba Maha Singh and a host more. I have no description to give of them personally beyond the character that marked them in the mass I have already noted, and like Gyas and Cloanthus in the Iliad, I can only individualise them as "strong," and pass on to conclude my hurried sketch. This I cannot do better than by speaking of Heera Singh, and Fuqeer Uzeez-ood-deen.

Heera Singh is not ill described among the distinguished Seikhs noted in Capt. Osborne's book. He was though in appearace more like a Delhi bunker (beau) than a Seikh. He looked as unlike as well could be his father's son in manners, dress, and style; but there was a strong family likeness of feature between them. He was undoubtedly of superior intelligence. Under the cloak of petulance, and frivolity he concealed much shrewdness, and his confident manners, and license of tongue enabled him to say much that had serious meaning in a tone of careless indifference. His father no doubt depended much upon him, and he was early schooled under the most able masters of the East in such science as with them passed for the science of Government. He has been thrown at the age of barely three and twenty into a position of singular difficulty; whether he can prove equal to its exigencies remains for time to show.

Fuqeer Uzeez-ood-deen noted by Capt. Osborne among the Seikh chiefs, is a native of a small town, I think he told me, in the territory of the Raja of Pattiala. He took service at a very early period with Runjeet Singh as his hakeem or physician, and as his private Secretary. He was in truth little more than a barber—surgeon, and report says that he was originally solely professor of the humbler of these two professions. As early as 1080, he was employed confidentially in carrying on negotiations with Sir Charles Metcalfe. This of course vitiates Capt. Osborne's estimate of his age. He must be now upwards of sixty years old. The sketch given of him in Capt. O.'s book is not unlike; though the eye is a little too large, and has too placid an expression. However obscure may be his origin, this remarkable man has played a distinguished part in the affairs of the Punjaub for the last thirty years; add- [illegible] solving, he has played a sort of conjoined character at the court of this Eastern Louis Galeotti and Olliver-le-dain united in one person. He is possessed of considerable literary accomplishments, is well read in Persian history, and poetry, is a good Arabic scholar, and fond of collecting manuscripts in which he is said to drive a private trade. The expression of his countenance is remarkably though not unpleasantly, astutious; his features still handsome; in stature he is short; in figure undignified. He is one of the most agreeable men I ever met with, when not talking for a set object (his talk is never object-less): his full of anecdote, and of quaint and pithy sayings, such as the apologues of eastern wisdom abound with; they are he says "distiches," and "couplets," but as I rarely heard him quote an authority, I suspect these are frequently, like the "old saw" of our great novelist, invented by himself. To give an idea of them, I will cite the following a favourite saying with him, when upon the eternal subject of man's foresight as opposed to the predestination of events—

> Counsel is like the dice; Fate like the mark
> Upon the board; it is within your hand;
> Yet for all that 'tis not within your hand.

He was a very able negotiator; insidious beyond measure, and a complete master of the science of humbug. He was the mouthpiece of the stupid Seikh Sirdars, and as he almost always formed the head usually, of the Missions they were occasionally sent on, he had their full leave to talk, while they sat by and listened in silence and admiration to the voluble flow of his ceaseless harangues. Nightingales of esteem warbled in meadows of attachment, and rivers of devotion rushed into oceans of affection, &c. &c. His other most important duty was interpreting the Maharaja's words. Few beside the Fuqeer, Dhyan Singh, Heera Singh, and a few attendants could readily understand him, so severe had the paralysis of his tongue become lately. A few inarticulate growlings of the old lion were quite enough to vivify the Fuqeer's imagination, and so lengthy often was his paraphrase of the Maharaja's verbal text that one became inclined to wonder with Mons. Jourdain "what one word in Turkish could mean so much." But the Fuqeer knew business; he knew as well what words meant as any man that ever took up the profession of a diplomatist. Sometimes towards the end of an entertainment, the Fuqeer's task of interpretation became very difficult. The Maharaja, adding the paralysis of strong drink to his natural inclination to indistinctness, used to become very inarticulate. The Fuqeer would then "make shots" at the meaning, and got rebuked sometimes. I fancy he was often ashamed to say what he understood well enough, when he would content himself with saying, "Eyah, eyah," (ecstacy); sometimes I have seen him driven to total incomprehension; he would then say in his softest diplomatic tones, (in Arabic for the greater secresy) "Mafahimtoo"—i. e. I did not understand: he would then be taken seriously ill, and disappear for the evening. He was an extraordinary anomaly this man: a titular Mussulman Fuqeer serving the extirpators of his race and the persecutors of his religion, and that faithfully; assisting at their carousals, writing in the name of the Supreme Being as worshipped by them,* and yet a bigoted Mussulman for all that. His brother Noor-ood-deen; was an ingenious person, a good deal trusted and employed by Runjeet about the arsenal, and commissariat matters, and even if I remember right, made Governor of Govindgurh. His sons were also in the service of the state, but none promised to be like the Fuqeer. He is indeed the last of the indigenous diplomatists of Hindoostan, of those men whose skill in the art has been so much and so long belauded. The day for them has gone by: they have done their work, and are gathered to their fathers.

With the Fuqeer, a well known character was usually associated, Raee Govind Jus, the Maharaja's Vakeel with the Agent for the protected states. He was more like a Marwaree merchant than aught else, fat, paunchy, and always in studied good humour. He was a shrewd intelligent man, but never held higher rank than that of a mere secondary agent.

I could go on and on with others; but what boots it? Some since I knew them are dead of peaceful deaths; some are scattered to the four winds: some doubtless have fallen in the recent butcheries. Their place will know them no more: they have struggled their brief hour of existence; another race of men will occupy.

"——— Lahore of great Mogul,"—and the memory of these rude masters of the soil will pass away swallowed in the advance of peace and civilization. Let me before concluding my remarks, note the mistake that seems to have been entertained about the political influence of Runjeet's European Officers. They were in the Punjab mere mechanical tacticians, and were never acknowledged, or themselves pretended to be aught beyond this. Singnor Avitabile, as a civil Governor, was the most powerful among them. The rest did nothing but command their regiments, if even that.—Calcutta Star.

Scotch Church.—Mr. Bannerman asked the Right Hon. Baronet at the head of the Home Department (Sir James Graham), whether it be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to remove from their professorships in the universities of Scotland those gentlemen who have adhered to the Free Presbyterian Church; and also whether he had any objections to lay on the table a copy of any memorial addressed to the Government from the Colleges of St. Andrew's, relative to the removal or disqualification of the Principal of that University, in consequence of his having adhered to the Free Church.

Sir James Graham said, that he would give all the information to the Honourable Gentleman which he possessed. With respect to certain professorships, it appeared that many of the persons who held them had, upon conscientious grounds, and not in consequence of their being removed by Her Majesty's Government, voluntarily surrendered their appointment, thinking that to retain them was inconsistent with their own views and sentiments. He was unable to give a general answer to the question of the Honourable Member, because various professorships were held by peculiar tenures, and particular charters. Some of them could not be held by gentlemen of the established religion: the Right Honourable Gentleman the Rector of the University of Glasgow (Mr. Fox Maule) was aware that the Greek Professorship of that University was held by an Episcopalian. The duty of the Government, in the cases of Dr. Chalmers and Dr. Welsh, had been first to decide whether it was consistent with the charter under which they held their professorships that they should retain them. With respect to the second part of the question, respecting the memorial addressed to the Government from the college of St. Andrew's, relative to the removal or disqualification of the principal of that university, in consequence of his having adhered to the Free Church, he was aware that Sir David Brewster, the gentleman alluded to, had ceased to be a member of the Established Church of Scotland, and it would be a question to determine according to law whether it was, therefore, consistent with the charter of the university that he should continue to hold that office. The matter had recently come under his cognizance, and he had referred it to the law officers of the Crown in Scotland, for them to give their opinions on the subject.—Record.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—On Monday evening, the 24th, a preliminary meeting was held in the Presbyterian Church, Birmingham, for the purpose of hearing addresses from a deputation, explanatory of the principles, position, and prospects of the Free Church. The Rev. Messrs. Davidson, of Edinburgh, and Burns, of London, successively addressed the meeting, and were followed by the Rev. Mr. James, who expressed his strongest sympathy in the cause, and his anxious wish that some effective and united effort should be made in Birmingham, with the view of aiding it. In consequence of the encouragement thus held out by Mr. James, and several other ministers who were present, a conference took place on Thursday evening, at which one of the members of the deputation attended, and to which all the ministers of the town who were thought likely to be favourable were invited. It was then resolved unanimously and most cordially, "That a great public meeting should be held in the Town-hall towards the end of September (the hall being engaged till then by the Musical Festival); that a committee be formed, consisting of all the ministers who are friendly, along with one or two members of each congregation, with the view of making arrangements; that the committee in Edinburgh be requested to favour them by sending a deputation; that a similar request be made to the committee in London; and that James James, Esq., the Mayor, (who had previously intimated his readiness to render any service in his power,) be requested to preside on the occasion. Wednesday, the 27th of September, was fixed on as the day likely to be most suitable, subject to future alteration, if necessary.—Pat.

ST. ANDREW'S SCOTCH CHURCH, LIVERPOOL.—A meeting of the shareholders of this church was held on Friday evening last, when a series of articles, as to a new constitution of the church, was agreed to. The difference between the present articles of constitution and those on which the church was originally founded, in 1824, merely consisted in giving power to the trustees to appoint the ministers from any Presbytery, provided they agree with the doctrines, discipline, and principles of the Kirk of Scotland—the former constitution requiring that they should be in connexion with that establishment. It appears St. Andrew's never was part of the Scotch Establishment, but is under the Presbytery of Lancashire and Synod of England; but the present constitution declares it to be free from the control of any Church out of England whatever, and the object of the present alteration was stated to be, to open a wider field for candidates at the approaching election.—Ibid.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America commenced its sittings at Philadelphia, on the 18th of May, and terminated its annual deliberations, after a harmonious session of two weeks, on the 31st of the same month. The American Assembly, says the Banner of Ulster, thus commenced its sittings on the very day on which the disruption occurred in the Church of Scotland; and though the announcement of that event could not be transmitted to it before its session closed, it has expressed its cordial approval of the proceedings of the Non-intrusionists, and recommended all the congregations under its care to take up collections during the current year, to be transmitted to the Rev. Drs. Chalmers, Gordon, and Candlish, ministers; and Alexander Dunlop, Esq., and Sir David Brewster, elder, "to be appropriated as they may think most subservient to the interests of the Church with which they are connected." We have no doubt that the news from Scotland which has since reached the United States will tend greatly to swell the amount of contributions in behalf of the Free Church.—Witness.

TRIUMPH OF THE VOLUNTARY PRINCIPLE AT BRADFORD, YORKSHIRE.—Our recent numbers have contained some rather remarkable allusions to the "Spiritual Destitution of Bradford." The doings at Salem Chapel furnish a striking and delightful reply to the ill-concealed insinuation, that the majority of the inhabitants of the parish are "totally unprovided with the means of grace and religious instruction." It is little more than seven years ago since Salem Chapel was opened for Divine worship. Its cost, from first to last, amounts to nearly 7,000*l.*, exclusive of annual interest paid upon the outstanding debt. At the anniversary last year, the debt amounted to 2,400*l.* The gentleman who preached on that occasion (Rev. J. Sherman) ventured to suggest that it should be paid off, and exerted himself during his visit to obtain subscriptions towards that object. The suggestion was liberally met, specially by two gentlemen belonging to another congregation, one of whom offered to give 100*l.* to start with, and the second gave 50*l.*; so that, by the return of the season of the year when the anniversary should be held, subscriptions to the amount of 2,000*l.* were realized. Various causes prevented the holding the anniversary at its proper date, and it was only at the beginning of the present month that the managers were able to announce "the Last Anniversary at Salem Chapel." As nearly 400*l.* still had to be raised, it required some faith to make such an announcement. The Rev. James Sherman again consented to preach, and on Friday evening did so, to a rather slender congregation. He preached again on Sunday, both morning and evening; and on the last occasion, to the largest audience we ever saw assembled at a religious service in Bradford. At the close of the service, the preacher announced that the requisite funds were raised, and that henceforth the splendid and commodious edifice would be free from debt. This large sum of money has been raised almost exclusively amongst the people usually worshipping at Salem Chapel; and whilst they have been doing it, other Nonconformist bodies in the town have been actively and generously engaged in providing the means of religious instruction for the increasing population. The Wesleyans have built two chapels, at White Abbey, and in Clayton-lane. The Wesleyan Association, the New Connexion Methodists, and a body seceding from the last-named, have each erected a place of worship. The Baptists have remodelled both their chapels at a great expense, and built two or three school-rooms. The Independents have built two chapels (in High-street and Wibsey), remodelled a third, and built two school-rooms, viz., at Lidget-green and in Horton-lane. All this has been done within the borough: we should have to speak of greater things than these if we included the parish.—Bradford Observer, June 24.

ST. PETER-LE-BAILEY PARISH, OXFORD.—The strongest expressions of surprise and indignation have reached us, on account of the attempt to force Mr. Macmullen, as curate, upon the parish of St. Peter-le-Bailey, in the face of his objection to the orthodox and Protestant theses proposed by Dr. Hampden, and in the midst of the agitation from Dr. Pusey's sermon; it is indeed, as one of our correspondents says, truly "scandalous." We understand that in reply to a memorial signed by the parishioners, the rector urged that Mr. Macmullen had been strongly recommended to him by Archdeacon Clerke! and there is little doubt that the name of the passive (?) bishop was used. With such sanction—with Dr. Pusey ruling the bishop, through the archdeacon and the chaplain of the bishop, what wonder that strange doctrines and the mass are publicly taught in Oxford?—Oxford Chronicle.

THE WHITE SURPLICE.—The relinquishment of the use of the surplice in the pulpit by the Vicar of St. Bride's was not, we are happy to learn, an isolated or casual circumstance, but had connexion with a similar return to the old usage, in another parish. The lately appointed Vicar of St. Sepulchre's had introduced the use of the surplice in preaching, in that large parish, and the consequence, a feeling of dissatisfaction on the part of the people which seemed likely to break out into some undesirable expression of anger. This state of things led to some conference between the two clergymen, and we believe that a reference at last took place to the Bishop. His Lordship explained, as he had previously done on other occasions, that he had never made any point of the use of the surplice in the pulpit, that he had merely suggested it as expedient at certain times, and for certain reasons; and that in the present instance he was of opinion that to persevere in its use would be unwise and undesirable. Upon this declaration of his Lordship, the Vicar of St. Sepulchre's at once resolved to resume the gown, and Mr. Dale decided upon the like step; so that in that division of the city there will now only remain one parish, St. Andrew's, in which the surplice is used.—Record.

PUSEYITE SECRETS LET OUT.—We are anxious to put before our readers the following remonstrance, addressed to the Editor of the Tablet, a Popish journal, by a Correspondent whom we shrewdly suspect to be one of the recent converts from Tractarianism to Popery:—

"Sir,—I have often been pained at the tone which you generally adopt in speaking of the Oxford religious movement, because I think it arises from a mistaken view of the subject, and is likely to give pain, where, had you been acquainted with the real state of the case, you would have been sorry to have caused it. Having, therefore, from circumstances, good means, as I think, of forming a judgment, I will state my own view, which is a very simple one, of what appears, at first sight, strange in the conduct of the Oxford divines. This, if correct, will freely acquit them of the charge of dishonesty, and if not satisfactory to yourself, may appear more so to some of your readers.

"I think, then, that it should be considered that it is not with the Anglicans as with the great body of Protestant Dissenters. These latter, when Catholic truth is placed before them, must either accept it as a whole, or reject it as a whole. . . . . But with the Anglican, the case is widely different. Suppose him to have been brought to believe in the Eucharistic sacrifice or other doctrines that might be named, he finds them by no means forbidden by the formularies of his Church, as he interprets them. In fact, with the exception of believing communion with the Holy See to belong to the essence of the Church, there is scarce any part of the Catholic system which he may not hold and practise.....

"Why, then, should you, by any taunt or imputation of sordid motives, chill one wish to pray for Oxford in the hearts of any of your readers? Surely, if a man of Mr. Newman's astonishing powers of mind wished to have truckled to the world, he might have found something more worth selling his soul for than a paltry vicarage or a poor fellowship; or if his aim were ambition, he might soon find a position in the Catholic Church more worthy of his talents, than any he could possibly attain by remaining within the Established Church, where he and all his party are for ever shut out from every kind of patronage . . . . It is impossible to read the writings of these men and not to see that they are daily feeling the anomalousness of their present position more clearly than we can tell them. The whole constituted authorities of the Establishment are in arms against them, while they continue fearlessly developing their opinions, heedless of all consequences but the vindication of truth. These are not the men to shrink from carrying out their principles: that they have not yet been persecuted into leaving the Establishment is to be ascribed to the utter imbecility and weakness of the governing body, and is certainly not their own fault. I have it on good authority that there is a rising feeling that such a pressure from authority is not far distant, and that such an event is looked forward to with pleasure by men who have all worldly advantages to lose by it; as they say it will then be an indication to them that they have no longer a duty to perform towards that body of which they are at present members."

Thus far the remonstrance of the Correspondent of the Tablet, who subscribes himself "One who Prays for Oxford;" to which the Editor replies:—

"The writer of the above letter seems to be a little in error in the views which he supposes us to entertain in regard to this question, and a little confusion, however well-intentioned, with regard to his own views. There are individuals in Oxford who have given indications, more or less distinct, of fearless independence and honesty, and who are gradually approaching—not unwillingly—towards Rome. True. But have we ever denied it? No: when the point has come in dispute, we have always done our best to maintain it with all our might. Towards Mr. Newman in particular—for very special reasons, which it is needless here to state—we have always entertained warm feelings of respect; but even of Mr. Newman our Correspondent's reasoning is not very sound. Substitute Luther for Newman, and every word of it (mutatis mutandis) might stand without alteration. 'Men of astonishing power of mind' the devil tempts by other baits than money or rank. Luther lived in poverty, prison, and danger; died in poverty; and left his wife and children beggars. Yet if Luther had 'wished to have truckled to the world,' the ablest preacher and best man of business in Germany might, for ought we know, have been made a cardinal. Pray God that Mr. Newman may be honest for all this; we know nothing to the contrary, and have said nothing to the contrary; and so far from wishing to deter any one from praying for him or his friends, we conceive that the best way to induce charitable people to pray for them, is to abstain from glossing over their need. We hope the best, but even with regard to them we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that their state is very much to be prayed for as exposed to subtler temptations than those of wealth and preferment."

We think that our readers will be obliged to us for bringing under their observation the foregoing remarks upon the anomalousness of the position of Mr. Newman and his friends. What "very special reasons" the editor of the Tablet may have for entertaining "warm feelings of respect towards Mr. Newman in particular," it is in vain to conjecture. But we are forcibly reminded by this observation of an unguarded acknowledgment which has been reported to us as having fallen from the lips of one of the most prominent of the Tractarian party—"Of course we are a great deal connected with the Roman Catholics, and have, perhaps, more correspondence with them than our opponents may imagine." Still, the editor's remarks upon Mr. Newman's motives for still clinging to his position and preferment are shrewd enough. The "baits" by which he is tempted to do so are probably these—he is aware that by so doing he can work far more effectually towards the "unprotestantizing the Anglican Church" than if he were at once to join the Church of Rome. Again, at present he is looked up to as the head of a formidable party, supposed to be much more formidable than it really is, and if he were to join the Church of Rome he would be nobody. Lastly, his Fellowship and Vicarage however "poor" and "paltry" as "worldly advantages," afford Mr. Newman a comfortable livelihood, which, as he is not a man of private fortune, he may not be quite so ready to part with as the correspondent of the Tablet may imagine. There is more in what he says about "the imbecility and weakness of the governing body," although somewhat rudely expressed. The bishops of our Church, in the general, do not yet see their way through the Tractarian question, while some of them continue to qualify their censures of Mr. Newman's proceedings by praising him for his zeal and ability. Why, what would have been said of Sir R. Peel or Sir James Graham, if, during the recent discussion upon the Irish Arms Bill, they had talked about the zeal and ability of O'Connell? The truth is that the Church of England is a besieged city, of which a portion of the garrison are in league with the enemy and only watching a favourable opportunity of opening to them the gates.—Record.

THE PUSEYITES AND THE RISING GENERATION.—The Puseyites declare that they do not care about the adult population embracing their doctrines, their main object being to secure the rising generation. Such a remark was publicly made by the present curate of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, and which sentiment has happily caused the authorities to remove the parochial children to another place of worship.—Pat.

TAHITI AND JAMAICA.—A special prayer-meeting on behalf of the threatened Mission at Tahiti was held in the Baptist Chapel, on Monday night. That being the time appointed by the several denominations for uniting at the throne of Grace that the labour of years in that island might not be destroyed in the bud by the foul breath of Popery; notwithstanding the short notice given, about 1,500 persons were present, amongst whom were many of the country people. We hope that in answer to the united prayers of his people, the God of Salvation will appear for the Isles of the Pacific.—Baptist Herald (Jamaica), June 7.

JAMAICA.—We regret to have to announce, that in consequence of long-continued ill health, our esteemed brother missionary, the Rev. T. F. Abbott, is obliged to leave the island for a short time.—Baptist Herald.

GENERAL BAPTIST ASSOCIATION, LOUGHBOROUGH.—The seventy-fourth annual Association of the General Baptist Churches of the New Connexion, was held at Loughborough on Tuesday, June 28, and the three following days. The business of the Association commenced a few minutes after ten o'clock on Tuesday morning. The first business is the reading of letters from the churches. The Rev. E. Stevenson, the minister of the Church, presided at this first meeting. After dinner, which was provided at one of the principal inns, the members of the Association, composed of the ministers and representatives of the churches assembled, the Rev. W. Wallis, of London, was elected chairman; Rev. J. Burns, of Paddington, London, and Rev. W. Bulter, of Heptenstall, near Halifax, were chosen moderators; and the Rev. T. Stevenson, of Leicester, secretary. The reading of the numerous letters occupied the remaining sittings of the day. They were generally of an interesting and encouraging character. On Wednesday morning a very numerous congregation assembled for public worship; the Rev. J. Wallis, of Commercial-road, London, preached from Jude, ver. 3. In the afternoon the annual Missionary meeting was held, at which, as is usual, the report of the Society was read by its respected secretary, the Rev. J. G. Pike, of Derby. The meeting was very numerously attended. The chair was taken by J. Hodgson, Esq., from Yorkshire; and the resolutions were moved and seconded by the Revds. Messrs. Goadby, Bulter, Underwood, Burns, Peggs, and Yates. The report was very interesting. In the evening many brethren were engaged at an important committee of the Academy; but a numerous meeting was held in the chapel for the revival of religion. Messrs. Butters and Anderson, from Lincolnshire, presided. The audience were addressed by Revds. Messrs. Green, Peggs, Winks, Hudson, Fogg, &c. On Thursday very great interest was felt upon the Academy question, relative to its location and tutor. The former tutor having resigned, it was finally decided that the Institution should be located at Leicester. The Rev. W. Wallis was elected tutor, the duties of which office he is to resume without delay. On Thursday evening the Rev. S. Ayrton, of Chesham, preached on the increase of the church, from Acts ix. 31. On this day open-air services were held in and near the Market-place, and also early the following morning. Public tea was provided in the old Chapel, and a bazaar was opened for the Foreign Mission. The increase, by baptism, is nearly 1,600. On Friday, at noon, the Association closed.—Pat.

OPENING OF THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.—The One Hundredth Conference of the Wesleyan Methodists commenced its annual session, in Carver-street Chapel, Sheffield, on Wednesday. The names of the Hundred, constituting the legal Conference, were called over. Ten vacancies were found to have occurred, from death and other causes, during the past year. The following ministers were elected to complete the Hundred; viz. The Revds. Joseph Gostick, Philip Jamieson, William Sleigh, John Wilis, Moses Dunn, William Dalby, John Farrar, Elijah Hoole, John Nealson, and Richard Phillips. The two latter preachers were recommended by the Irish Conference. The following ministers were nominated to the office of President; viz. Richard Reece, 1 vote; Joseph Cusworth, 1; Joseph Taylor, 1; William Vevers, 1; Joseph Fowler, 2; Dr. Alder, 2; Richard Waddy, 3; William Atherton, 4; Robert Wood, 7; Samuel Jackson, 15; Jacob Stanley, 16; John Scott, 150. On an appeal to the Hundred, they confirmed the nomination of the Conference, and the Rev. John Scott was declared to be duly elected. The Rev. Dr. Newton, having 158 votes, was chosen Secretary. The seal of office was then transferred by Dr. Hannah to the Rev. John Scott.—Wesleyan Chronicle.

THE SOCINIANS.—We could hardly credit the intelligence which we some time ago received, that the Socinians of England and Ireland had prevailed on Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham to introduce a Bill into Parliament for the purpose of quieting their possession to those extensive trust estates, of which they have so long held unrighteous possession. The consequences of the solemn affirmation by the House of Lords, assisted by the Judges, of the Lord-Chancellor's decision in Lady Hewley's case, are intended to be neutralized by this monstrous enactment—an enactment so monstrous, that we marvel that either Sir James Graham or Sir Robert Peel could have listened to it for a moment.

We will not pursue the subject to-day, but although we are now too well assured of the existence of an intrigue for the purpose of passing such an Act, although we know the warm interest taken in it by Lord Brougham, and of the services he has rendered to the Government; yet, we are confident, that the opposition to such a Bill will not be confined to the Orthodox Dissenters of England, or to the Presbyterians of Ulster, but will be urged by every consistent member of the Church of England, who entertains a just abhorrence of those Socinian heresies, which the Legislature itself has long pronounced blasphemous.—Record.

MADEIRA.—DR. KALLEY.—To the Editor of the Record.—SIR,—Having recently seen in your paper an account of the persecution to which Dr. Kalley is subjected by the Romanists of Madeira, I beg leave to give you some particulars which may be interesting to your readers, as showing the importance, in a Christian point of view, of that work which he has been so successfully carrying on.

Madeira contains 110,000 inhabitants, the greater part of whom are sunk in the grossest ignorance. In many extensive districts not more than four or five persons can read; few have ever seen the Old Testament, and multitudes do not know that there exists a book in which God has revealed his will. Nor can this be matter of surprise when we find that the priests are truly blind leaders of the blind. Many proofs of their ignorance might be given, but the following remarkable ones will suffice. One priest recently inquired of an English clergyman who Cephas was; and another came to ask Dr. Kalley for a book, with one volume of which he had been much pleased. On examination, the unknown volume proved to be a copy of the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Isaiah, which the priest did not recognise to be a part of the Holy Scriptures. The consequence of this ignorance of God's word has been, that images are not only bowed to as in all Romanist countries, but they are worshipped as "the God of their Church;" Peter is called "the God of us all," and divine honours are paid to the Virgin by those who have not hesitated to say, "As much as I love God, so much I love the Mother of God; as much as I worship God, so much will I worship the Mother of God."

A few years ago the people were satisfied with their ignorance. The better among them considered that the ability to read only gave the ability to be rogues; and, on principle, they were opposed to their children learning such a baneful art. But since they have discovered that there is a book of God, and that reading is a means towards knowing the will of God and the way to heaven, hundreds have become anxious to learn. As their poverty admits of no intermission of their daily labour, many of these poor people are in the habit of carrying in their pockets a book which they pull out, and try to decipher during all chance intervals of leisure. In one place there was a school for girls, who maintain themselves by gathering broom in the mountains, and carrying it on their heads for sale in the town; and the door of this school might be seen surrounded by these loads, while their owners were gone in to get their lesson. In St. Antonio da Serra twenty-five women used to meet every morning at dawn to receive their lessons; and about thirty men came every night to the same place through almost impassable mountain-roads, in the dark, and often through rain and cold, for the same purpose. When the number of men was complete, and the school-room could hold no more, one man, who had been denied admittance, sent his wife to the morning-school, staid at home to nurse their child during her absence, and on her return, made her repeat to him the lesson which she had just learned.* In the locality where this school now stands, there was only one person who could read. He is a boy of seventeen, and was the teacher of the school.

The same eagerness was evinced to hear Dr. Kalley's simple expositions of Scripture. On Sundays and holidays his hearers at Funchal were seldom less than 150; but during the summer of 1842, which he spent in the country, they amounted to 3,000. Many of these came from a distance, some walking three, four, or five miles; and a few occasionally attended who had to walk six hours in coming and as long in returning. Families prepared their cakes, made of Indian corn, on Saturday, and set off in the dark in order to hear the word of God; and then, on the side of a steep hill, multitudes sat drinking in the words of eternal life. There was no restlessness, no sleepiness. They seemed to hang on the lips of the speaker, and often a hand was seen stealing up to wipe away a tear. Often when the freeness of salvation was dwelt upon, and they were shown that Heaven is too valuable to be purchased by the penances and alms and prayers of sinners, one would utter an expression of surprise; another would look in wonder at his neighbour; while not a few nodded their heads in token of assent. When they heard the second Commandment, there appeared on all faces an expression of astonishment, mixed in some with incredulity. When told that the Scriptures contained the history of the life and death of Jesus, and were written by men who were taught of God, they uttered expressions of delight and wonder; and these books were often looked at with wistful eyes. One man, especially, the teacher of a school, took a Bible in his hand, laid it in his bosom, and said, "Would to God that I might have one of these books." But there were none of them to be sold: nor, indeed, are there now. Dr. Kalley had had some copies of the New Testament and the Psalms, and of these, notwithstanding the extreme poverty of the people, seventy-five were sold in one day.

Dr. Kalley thus laboured steadily and unobtrusively above four years, gaining the good opinion of all classes. The fruits of his instruction began at length to appear. In proportion as the word of God became known, the reverence for images diminished; alms were refused to those who went about begging in the name of the saints whose image they bore; it began to be whispered that what they had been taught about making offerings to the saints was a "forte engano," to take money out of their pockets; and still more recently the people refused to subscribe to have a sermon preached in the Cathedral, "because they could hear as good a one from Dr. Kalley gratis." The priests soon took the alarm, and the arbitrary and illegal measures, narrated in the Record of May 18, were adopted by the Government.

Thus, this interesting work has been interrupted. The schools are now closed, the Scripture expositions are proscribed, and we have reason to fear that, ere now, he who thus nobly devoted himself to the service of true religion, has been thrown into prison. The people are about to be once more left under the guardianship of those who so long neglected to feed their flock, and who will not now permit them to receive the bread of life which is offered them by another. The character and practical working of any religious system may fairly be judged by the character of its ministers; for they are brought nearest to its influence, and in them its principles are supposed to be embodied. This consideration may, perhaps, give importance to a few facts illustrative of the character of the Romish priests, as evinced in their mode of combating the principles and example of Dr. Kalley.

The first case which I shall mention is that of the Vicar of Santa. He sent for a poor woman who was in the habit of attending Dr. Kalley's expositions, and asked her why she went to hear "that Jew, that Devil, that Antichrist." He then threatened to lock her up until she could be sent to prison. This she begged him not to do for the sake of her child, who was still in arms. To which he replied, "Bordo da mar"—a metaphor too gross to be translated, and which can only be described as the most indecent expression that ever shocked the ear of woman. The curate, who was present, inquired if he should fetch a Bible to see if she could say the commandments. "A horsewhip would be better," answered the vicar. The woman stated that she could say the commandments which her parents had taught her (alluding to the abbreviated form used by Romanists), but not the commandments of God, meaning as they are found in the Bible. This enraged the priest, who angrily asked if she did not know that all the commandments are included in the precept, "Thou shalt love God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself;" and on her answering in the negative, he struck her three blows. She attempted to escape, but the curate dragged her back, and pinned her with his shoulder to the wall, while he struck her repeatedly; his vicar crying out, "Give it her, give it her, kill her!" Her mouth beginning to bleed, the vicar desired the curate to let her go, but he himself followed her with clenched fists, saying, "Now go, and tell that infernal Englishman what I have done." One fact remains to complete this picture of degradation. The vicar and curate both denied the deed, though the latter acknowledged that a woman had come out of the house, crying out and bleeding at the mouth. He afterwards confessed the unmanly act to one individual, but attempted to justify it by saying, "Did not our Lord drive with a scourge of small cords those who bought and sold in the Temple?"

About the same time an officer in the Portuguese service expressed to a Canon of the cathedral his opinion, that the measures taken by Government against Dr. Kalley were illegal; whereupon the Canon struck him, and taking him at unawares, knocked him down. But no sooner did the Canon see him prostrate on the ground, than, terrified at his own audacity, he took to his heels, and hardly saved himself in the bishop's palace from the hot pursuit of the exasperated officer. The next time that they met, the Canon received the merited chastisement, being knocked down and kicked like a foot-ball in the public Praca.

My account of priestly violence is not yet complete. The Curate of St. A —— and the Vicar of St. —— have each disgraced their holy office by severely pulling the ears of a man who attended Dr. Kalley's expositions. The Vicar of St. —— also refused for a time to bury a man who had occasionally been one of Dr. Kalley's hearers, and told his family, that they might "put the body up the chimney and make smoked meat of it!"

Such are the men to whose pastoral care the sheep of Christ's flock in Madeira are about to be consigned. The facts are so strong that they require no comment. The only hope of Dr. Kalley's being permitted to remain in the island, rests upon the interference of the English Government, and on the strong moral influence exercised by the publicly expressed opinion of the English nation; and my firm conviction that it is so, is my reason for desiring to give publicity to the foregoing narration.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

H. A.

Extract of a letter from Madeira, dated May 11, and just received:—

"Dr. Kalley is very unwell just now. Yesterday his man of business told him that he might expect to be put in gaol immediately, and from other quarters he has had intimations of the same kind; so he is in daily expectation of imprisonment. The worst part of it is, that there is no judge here just now, so they dread his being possibly confined for six months. Even should he escape this, he does not expect that any of his little flock will dare to venture to his house on Sunday; but in the meantime he has daily expositions of Scripture at his Hospital to his patients, and all who choose to go. Yesterday there were upwards of a hundred hearing him. He feels that his time may be short among these poor people who are thirsting for instruction; therefore he devotes himself to these duties with all earnestness. How truly the hand of God is with him in these things, is proved by two more persons, in the midst of this season of anxiety and peril, expressing a wish to join the Scotch communion."—Record.

A letter from Presburg, of July 7, states that the Emperor of Austria, in his quality of King of Hungary, has just decided the long-disputed question of the religion of children sprung up from mixed marriages. In answer to a Petition from the last Diet, praying that parents of different religions might be freed from the obligation of bringing up their children exclusively in the Catholic religion, his Majesty has ordered that children may be brought up as Protestants or Catholics, as may seem fit to the parents, and, in case they cannot agree, the children are to follow the religion of the father. This Resolution, the letter states, caused great satisfaction in the city, and in the evening of the intelligence the houses were illuminated. —Ibid.

THE HAGUE, JULY 22.—A general assembly of the Netherlands Missionary Society was lately held at Rotterdam. It appears from the Report read on this occasion, that the Society have to report the death of three missionaries. The mission in Celebes was in a flourishing condition, as was likewise the Normal School for native teachers in Amboyna. The whole of the missions had 12,000 pupils. In the mother country the Society continues to prosecute its Evangelical labours with the greatest zeal and advantage, and daily receive more and more proofs of the estimation in which it is held by the public.—Pat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Her Majesty the Queen—whose health, by the blessing of Providence, was never better—has had the good sense to break through the cold forms of Court precedent, and set an example to mothers, by nursing the Royal infant whose safe and happy birth has caused such general joy. This is only another proof of those domestic amiabilities and sympathies which pervade the Royal bosom. The sagacity of the step cannot be questioned. It is the opinion of all practical and eminent medical men, that the course which nature dictates is that which is most beneficial to the parent and the child. Many weakly constitutions among the titled and wealthy are, probably, due to the opposite line of conduct; and many, we are assured, are the examples of the future health of parent and infant having been sacrificed to the artificial claims of fashion, or to the frigid laws of etiquette.—Court Gazette.

WITLEY COURT.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager is expected to arrive at this seat at the close of the ensuing week, from Bushy Park, for the autumn. Her Majesty has taken the mansion on lease for three years, and the embellishments, chiefly by tradespeople from Worcester, are in a state of great forwardness. Earl Howe and his family will remain at Gopsal Hall, with occasional visits to Witley during her Majesty's sojourn in Worcestershire.—Record.

ADVANCE IN THE PRICE OF WHEAT.—It will be seen from our Wakefield corn letter, that at the market held yesterday wheat advanced no less than 4s. a quarter on the price of the week preceding. On the two weeks just previous to this, there was an advance altogether of 5s. a quarter, so that the price at this great corn depot has risen no less than 9s. in three weeks. This fact shows that the factors believe the entire stock of wheat in the country to be very small. —Leeds Mercury.

THE DUKE OF SUSSEX'S LIBRARY.—There are doubts whether the valuable collection of Bibles, and collection of rare manuscripts and books, constituting the library of the late Duke of Sussex, will be submitted for public competition or not, the King of Naples having entered into negotiations for the purchase of the entire collection.—Pat.

The Queen has been graciously pleased to confer a Royal charter of incorporation on the school of medicine and surgery at Birmingham, with the privileges, immunities, rank, and title of the "Queen's College, Birmingham."—Record.

The gross revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall for the year ending December 31, 1842, were 32,935*l*. 13s. 4½d., salaries and expenses 12,833*l*. 13s. 4½d., leaving 20,100*l*. for the Prince of Wales.—Ibid.

COST OF ROYALTY.—Mr. Hume, in the course of his speech in opposition to the grant of a marriage portion to the Princess Augusta of Cambridge from the purse of John Bull, said, in the published report, he found the following statement of payments to the Queen and Royal Family in the year ended January 5, 1843:—

QUEEN'S CIVIL LIST.

STANLEY AND PEEL.—It is evident to any one who has watched their conduct towards each other in the House of Commons for the last three or four nights, that Sir Robert Peel and Lord Stanley are on the eve of an open rupture. They hardly look at or speak to each other; and when, with Sir James Graham, they are, as is the case many times during a debate, obliged to hold those extemporary Cabinet Councils to settle who shall reply to any attack made on them by the other side, they do not, like honest and friendly men, look in each other's faces; and at all other times, when they chance to be left by the temporary absence of their colleagues next to each other, they usually sit at a respectful distance, back to back, like a pair of petted and pouting children. The cause of quarrel it requires no great judgment to divine to be Ireland. Sir Robert has succeeded in overcoming the rampant advice of the fiery Tybalt to deal hardly with the Irish repeal movement, for Lord Stanley is, heart and soul, impregnated with a monomaniacal hatred of everything bearing the name of or connected with O'Connell.—Hants Independent.

Earl Grey continues convalescent, and takes daily carriage airings in the parks, and in a few days, it is hoped, he will be sufficiently recovered to bear the fatigue of a journey to Howick-hall.—Record.

"Where there is smoke there is fire," is the motto of a remarkable caricature just published by "H. B." It represents Sir R. Peel and the members of his Cabinet assembled and anxiously watching a bomb-shell, which lies apparently at the point of instant explosion, blazing at their feet, and about to scatter destruction upon all around it. The Premier suggests that "if let alone, it will burn itself out;" while the Duke, with uplifted finger, warns his peace-loving colleague that "it may burn us out too." Lord Stanley, with characteristic impatience, is rushing forward to put it out, but is held back by Sir J. Graham, who hints that he "will only burn his fingers;" while Lord Eliot, drawing the materials from an ominously small vessel, through an insignificant instrument, labelled "Arms Bill," announces that he "is preparing to extinguish it." The Lord Chancellor for Ireland, who occupies the foreground of the print, seems endeavouring to smother the menaced explosion with a writ of supersedeas; while in the background are two figures, one representing Lord de Gray, sorely puzzled to find out which page of the Constitution relates to Repeal Meetings, and the other the burly agitator, with his pockets well filled with "rint," slinking torch in hand, from the consequences of his own treason.—Record.

THE WHIG PANACEA FOR IRELAND.—Why should not the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland, the chosen religious teachers of the majority of the Irish nation, be paid by the State? Because they are Papists? This reason will never satisfy any but the bigot. Have they not as strong a claim as the Presbyterians of Ulster to be made stipendiaries of the State? Are they not as much entitled to expect such liberality at the hands of a Protestant Government, as the Protestant Clergy of France, Belgium, or Austria, are to be included in the budget of a Catholic State? Upon the principle of all Ecclesiastical Establishments, do they not claim to be established? Upon the principle of equity, have they not a claim to a share in the ecclesiastical revenues and endowments which have been alienated from their Church? Upon the ground of policy, do they not require to be conciliated and bound over to good behaviour by State pay and State patronage? So argues the Whig Earl Ebrington; so pleaded the Tory Lord Alvanley, in a pamphlet which appeared a year or two ago; Lord Brougham avows the same opinion; it has been advocated by statesmen of different polities; Lord John Russell holds it out as a tempting reversion to be looked for when next the Whigs succeed to office; and Sir Robert Peel himself, provided the revenues of the Irish Protestant bishops and clergy are not touched, thinks the proposal not unworthy of consideration. That it would be a fine stroke of policy, seems admitted on almost every hand. The opinion is gaining ground, that it is becoming a matter of more than expediency, of State necessity. The coyness of the Irish priests, their professed objections to the scheme, might, it is believed, be without much difficulty vanquished. No objections would be entertained in the highest quarter. There is no obstinate George the Third to deal with. Puseyism would applaud the concession to a Sister Church. What then is to hinder the proposal from being carried, sooner or later, into execution? What can be urged against it, and who would be the objectors?

The only objections to which expression has been given in the House of Commons, have been grounded either upon financial considerations, or upon principles of intolerance. The first class are likely to have infinitely the most weight with our Legislators. As to the latter, the No-Popery objections urged by the opposers of the Maynooth Grant—by such men as Sir Robert Inglis, Mr. Plumpter, Mr. Colquhoun, and Col. Sibthorp—no friend to Religious Liberty can sympathize with the views and feelings which prompt them; and the political validity of such arguments is annulled by the precedents of the Canada settlement, the Maynooth Grant itself, and the Government Grants to the Colonial Roman Catholic establishments. The financial difficulties were rather strongly put by Mr. Colquhoun in a recent debate. He believed, he said, "that 400,000*l*. or 500,000*l*. would more than express the amount of the Established Church revenues in Ireland. The House had been told, that there were about three thousand Roman Catholic priests in Ireland. Then there was the statement of Dr. Doyle, a man of high talent and experience, before the Lords' Committee in 1832, that each parish priest in his diocese drew not less than 300*l*. per annum. Besides this, the curates also drew a large amount. A publication of the Diocesan statutes of the province of Dublin, by Archbishop Murray, contained a statement of the fees to be exacted by the priests from the people: those fees were ten in number, and the lowest of them was 1s. 6d. annually: now two of these annual fees, payable by 1,200,000 Roman Catholic families, would raise 180,000*l*.; and if anything like an equal calculation was made of the other fees, taking them at the lowest, he did not think, according to their own statements, that the annual revenue of the Roman Catholic clergy could be less than from 600,000*l*. to 800,000*l*. The average revenue of the Clergy of the Established Church was 150*l*. each; and this equally divided between Roman Catholic and Protestant would be 75*l*.; and was it to be supposed that, for this small pittance, the Roman Catholic clergy would surrender their fees?"

Supposing this estimate to be correct, it is only a difficulty, not an objection on the ground of principle, that is here raised. As to the clergy surrendering their fees, such a thing was never heard of, and could not be required of the Roman Catholic priests, when it is not exacted from the Anglican. But Mr. Colquhoun, had he known how to make the best use of his own argument, might have urged, that an order of priests must, as such, always be dependent mainly upon fees and perquisites for their maintenance. The services of a public religious teacher may be compensated by a fixed stipend, whether payable by the State or by the people; but the performance of such offices as constitute the main business of the Romish priests, can be remunerated in no other way than by customary fees. And the result of endowing the parochial clergy would simply be, to leave a large number of unendowed priests to monopolize most of the work, and to depend, as now, upon the prescribed fees or freewill offerings of the people. On this account, we believe that the scheme could not answer.

But this is not the broad ground of objection upon which we are prepared to take our stand. We have endeavoured to state the argument in favour of the proposal fairly and strongly; and by those who admit the principle of Ecclesiastical Establishments, we do not see how its force could be evaded. We may doubt the success of the political experiment, but we could not, in that case, oppose its being made. And as any religious objection is likely to be attributed to bigotry, we have been anxious to repudiate all sympathy with those persons who take the ground of intolerance. Our objections apply to Regium Donum grants made to Presbyterians, as decidedly as to Parliamentary grants to Catholic priests. We protest against such an application of public money as essentially unjust; as involving the taxation of the professors of one religious faith for the support and propagation of a faith and worship from which they conscientiously dissent; which, though it may be no grievance to a man without conscience in such matters, is a serious wrong to one who is sincere and earnest in his creed. We protest equally against taxing Papist for the support of a Protestant hierarchy, and Protestants for the support of a Popish priesthood, and Infidels for the support of any form of Christianity. Upon precisely the same grounds, we have never ceased to protest against Church-extension by Parliamentary grants at home, and the subsidizing of either Church of Englandism, Romanism, Wesleyanism, or Presbyterianism in our Colonies, where Congregational Ministers have (we believe uniformly) consistently and honourably declined the liberally intended offer of Government aid. Nor can those Presbyterian or other Protestant ministers who themselves take the public money, with any grace or effect raise their voice against the endowment of Puseyite chaplains and Popish propagandists.—Pat.

New Agitation in England.—The Birmingham Journal says that Mr. Thomas Attwood "has at last matured the plan of another great popular movement, for the purpose of relieving the distress, and restoring the general prosperity and contentment of the people. It is said that his plan is well adapted to the juncture of the times, and calculated to unite the electors and non-electors of the United Kingdom generally, and all the various classes of men who are now seeking different objects by different means, in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, in one great legal confederation; and to concentrate and direct all their exertions upon one single point of vast importance to all of them, and opposed to the objects, interests, and opinions of none of them."—Ibid.

Expected Alteration in the Mode of Paying the Chelsea Pensioners.—It seems that the present method of making the payments quarterly causes such a profligate expenditure of the money in dissipation, that at the end of a few days many of the pensioners have not a farthing left, either having fooled it away, or having been robbed of it. To remedy this, it is said, a plan will be adopted by which the pensions may be received weekly, an alteration which seems likely to put an end to many of the serious robberies and losses which now take place at pension time.—Record.

Consolidation of the General and Twopenny Post-offices. — It is in contemplation by Viscount Lowther, the Postmaster General, and other Post-office officials, to consolidate the General and Twopenny Post-offices. We understand the amalgamation is to take place as soon as the necessary arrangements are completed. The alteration will expedite considerably the delivery of letters in the metropolis, and within the limits of the London district.—Ibid.

Investment of the Repeal Rent.—The money transmitted to the Repeal Association is periodically invested in the Government securities. Last week the sum of 6,000*l.* was invested in the New Three-and-a-Half per Cents., by the broker of the Repeal Association. If the Repealers had any idea of rebellion, or contemplated any of the projects with which they have been charged by Lord Lyndhurst, it is not very likely that they would trust their money in the Government securities.—Chronicle.

Education.—A Committee of the Wesleyan Methodists' Conference has been appointed to consider and report upon the means of diffusing "sound scriptural and useful" knowledge throughout the connexion by the establishment of additional week-day schools. Results of a decided and comprehensive character are expected to follow from this step. The Rev. R. Newstead, J. Dixon, O. Prest, and J. Newton, with Mr. T. Farmer, are among the members of the Committee. The number of children at present educated at the day-schools of the Wesleyan body is 20,804; at the Sunday-schools, 401,383; at an expense for the whole of 24,167*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.*—Record.

The Harvest, &c.—The weather in London and its neighbourhood has been cold with a good deal of rain for some days past. Corn is rising in Mark-lane, and it is understood a good many foreign orders have been sent. The best-informed persons now say, that from the appearance of the crops on the ground, even with the blessing of fine weather, the harvest will not be more than an average one.—Ibid.

The crimes included in the new treaties for the mutual surrender of fugitives from justice are,—with America, murder, attempts to murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, and uttering; with France, murder and attempts to murder, forgery, and fradulent bankruptcy.—Ibid.

The Nelson Monument.—The construction of the Nelson monument, Trafalgar-square, the progress of which was interrupted in consequence of the Corinthian capital not being completed, has, after a suspension of some months, been again proceeded with. Yesterday the workmen began fixing on the leaves and volutes of the capital, which were cast at Woolwich dockyard, and which have been upon the ground in Trafalgar-square some days. Some of the leaves and volutes, which have taken between two and three years for their execution, weigh two or three tons. The statue is nearly finished. It is composed of two solid blocks of stone, and has been formed in a temporary house on the ground by Mr. Bailey, R. A., from a design by Mr. Railton, who daily superintends its formation. It is expected that the monument will be finished by the end of the year.—Ibid.

The Anti-Duelling Association.—Our readers will find in our advertising columns an announcement of a Meeting of the Anti-Duelling Association, to be held on the 4th of August. We rejoice to know that this Association goes on prosperously. It at present consists of 416 members, including twenty-three Noblemen, fifteen sons of Noblemen, eighteen Members of the House of Commons, twenty Baronets, thirty-five Admirals and Generals, thirty-two Colonels, fifty-six Captains, R. N., twenty Majors, forty-two Captains in the Army, twenty-six Lieutenants, twenty-eight Barristers. Recent melancholy events add importance to the objects it has in view, and we trust, under the Divine blessing, its influence may be largely extended.—Ibid.

The Smoke Nuisance.—The Committee of the House of Commons, of which Mr. Mackinnon is Chairman, sat for the first time on Tuesday, and continued their sittings till Friday. During the week Dr. Reid, Dr. Aire, Mr. West, of Leeds, Mr. C. W. Williams, of Liverpool, and many scientific men, engineers, manufacturers, and others were examined. The general opinion expressed by the witnesses was, that the smoke which emanates from the chimneys of the furnaces of the manufacturing establishments was a great evil, and that there were abundant means for its almost if not entire suppression. Mr. West stated that at Leeds, where active measures had been adopted by the corporation, there was a great deal less given off in the atmosphere, and Mr. Smith, a Commissioner of Police, from Bradford, stated, that from the exertions of the Commissioners, aided by a local act, out of 138 mills in the jurisdiction of that town, there were but four in which smoke-burning apparatus of some kind had not been introduced. The effect of all this was that the smoke had been lessened to one-fourth, whilst in the course of a short time there would be no difference between a week-day and Sunday in the atmosphere. The evidence was also very conclusive as regards the influence of smoke upon the personal appearance, social condition, and moral habits of the poorer classes. The sittings of the Committee will probably extend another fortnight, and one part of its objects is the examination of the various patented and other plans that have been brought forward for its suppression. Its members are composed chiefly of the representatives of towns and districts who most complain of the evil, and there is no doubt but that the result of their exertions will be materially beneficial to the comforts and health of the community.—Ibid.

The Sandwich Islands.—Despatches were sent off on Saturday last by Government to the Right Hon. Captain Lord George Paulet, of the Carysfort frigate in the South Pacific, acknowledging the free independence of King Tamehameha III. and the Sandwich Islands from this or any other country.—Pat.

France.—We find the following in the National:—"The courts of law, and all who were connected with them, were thrown into great commotion by the following serious occurrence. M. Garnier, president of the order of advocates of the Cour de Cassation et des Conseils du Rio, tendered, in measured, but very energetic terms, his resignation to the Keeper of the Seals. The Council of the Order, being immediately convoked, unanimously followed this example of independence. This unprecedented incident is founded upon the fact of the Minister of Justice (M. Martin du Nord), having violated certain rules imposing conditions of morality and capacity, as indispensable for the admission of advocates to the supreme court, in having presented the nomination of a candidate for the King's signature in opposition to the unanimous objection of the Council."—Ibid.

French Sympathizers with Ireland.—In the skirts of Mr. O'Connell's "monster" meetings, a French traveller is distinguished by his moustaches; and immediately the Tory press are frightened out of their wits by the idea of Gallic sympathy. As Lord Brougham said of O'Connell, we know one bosom in France to which a civil war in Ireland would bring comfort and satisfaction; we mean Louis Philippe, to whom the intestine broils of other kingdoms are almost equivalent in point of satisfaction to their subjection to his own sway. M. Guizot cannot forgive the affront that was offered him when Lord Palmerston, speaking in an official character, said plainly, "We don't believe you;" nor can his Royal Master overlook a manifestation of distrust which he felt applied more particularly to himself. Hence, although the Minister placed his interdict upon the Anti-Slavery Convention which was to have been held in Paris last year, he suffered the meeting convened to express sympathy with Ireland, to take place without interruption.

But, so far as French sympathy is concerned, the Orange Chiefs have nothing to dread. No one knows better than Mr. O'Connell, that France cannot help him. In truth, it would be about as rational to expect help from the negroes in the United States, as from the slaves of existing French despotism. The real Liberal party have more than enough to do in minding their own affairs. With trial by jury reduced to a mockery, with a National Guard which is like a box of toys turned out and put in at the pleasure of the Government, and a Press enslaved by the threefold bondage of cautionnement, bribes, and private interests, public opinion in France is at the same time gagged, blindfolded, and fettered, and, so far from helping others, cannot even find expression for itself by voice or action. The feeling most likely to be entertained by French Liberals in respect to Ireland, is one of envy, when they see that, while they themselves cannot meet by the score without being seized on by the myrmidons of Guizot and Company, the Irish may assemble by whole counties at once without the breach of any law. Mr. O'Connell complains, and justly, that the elective franchise is much more restricted in Ireland than in England; but there are more electors in Ireland alone than in all France. The Arms Bill now struggling through the Imperial Parliament, is stringent enough; but it is freedom itself, compared with the Arms Bill which has been imposed upon France. Sir Robert Peel does not merit much popularity in Ireland, where the fact of his having been Chief Secretary under the Liverpool Administration is yet in remembrance; but, while France is governed by a man who has passed through all the changes of political sentiment, from best to worst, Ireland has at least the mitigated doom of being under the sway of a man who has never altered his opinions, except for the better. We might instance the advantages which Ireland possesses over France in relation to municipal arrangements and other matters; but sufficient has been said to show, that the sympathy of the latter with the former must be restricted to that fellow-feeling which may, indeed, make one wondrous kind, but not marvellously dangerous.

As to the deputation of M. Ledru-Rollin, we feel sure that Mr. O'Connell will consider twice before he receives him once. Concerned for the honour of an old acquaintance, we beg to inform our readers, that the forthcoming Missionary is no relation to the Author of the "Ancient History." His highest recommendation is, that he comes endorsed by Marrast, who publishes the National, on the principle of lucus a non lucendo, because there is no sympathy between him and the nation. To the true Liberal party in France, Marrast is an object of contempt. Under the Restoration, he was a Jesuit, but was expelled from the College Louis-le-Grand, in which he was Under-Master, for misconduct. This was a sufficient title to admission among the pseudo-Liberals of the time. Since the Revolution of July, he has constantly been plotting and exciting the people to insurrection, always taking care to run away in good time. So completely had he acquired this useful art, that he even escaped from the Prison of St. Pelagie, and thereby avoided the disagreeable process of trial for high treason, on account of a conspiracy, concocted by the Police, of which he was goose enough to be the principal agent,—with the still more disagreeable consequences. In England, his fame had preceded him; and it is to the neglect to which his known cowardice subjected him, and to his consequent hatred to England, that we are to attribute all the sympathy he cherishes for Ireland. Such is the sponsor of M. Ledru-Rollin, who, however, might be of some service at the next Donnybrook Fair, by the exhibition of those tricks of legerdemain with which, for a small consideration, his father, for forty years, amused all the towns in France, "by permission of the authorities." He might, indeed, be of real use in the event of a civil war, provided he has not forgotten the way in which his father used to escamoter the balls from the muskets with which he allowed himself to be fired at every evening. When the Irish heard him exclaim, with uplifted hand, after every fire, "Voila la balle, Messieurs," they would, in gratitude at least, change his name, and send him back to Paris as Le drole Rollin.—Pat.

PORT NATAL.—The settlement at Port Natal is now adopted as a British Colony; a step only too long delayed; and Her Majesty's Government have under consideration the best means by which provision may be made for establishing there a Colonial Government distinct from, if not independent of, that of the Cape. In the mean time, we are happy to find from Governor Napier's Minute, read to the Legislative Council, that three conditions have been laid down as absolutely essential in any future arrangements:—

"1st. That there shall not be, in the eye of the law, any distinction or disqualification whatever, founded on mere distinction of colour, origin, language, or creed.

"2nd. That no aggression upon the natives residing beyond the limits of the Colony, shall be sanctioned under any plea whatever, unless under the immediate orders of the Government.

"3rd. That Slavery in any shape or under any modification is absolutely unlawful, as in every other portion of Her Majesty's dominions."

This last condition is, of course, one that could not be dispensed with; but it is one that will be the least palatable to the Emigrant Boers, who have, it seems, their sympathizers and apologists in this country. The Colonial Gazette, now the organ of the West India party, and the sworn foe to all saints and philanthropists, acknowledges the three principles laid down to be "very just and humane conditions, but"—here the pro-Slavery feeling betrays itself—"it was the enforcing of similar principles that mainly occasioned the disaffection that led to the settlement of Natal." The impossibility of obtaining combined labour in the colony, except by compulsion, "drove the farmers to enslave the natives." How could they help it? And "the emancipation of the negroes, without any measures being adopted to supply the Colony with free labour, drove the farmers to desperation, and hence the emigration to Natal." So that all their commandos, their wars with the border tribes, and their insane project of territorial conquest and independence, were all, we are to be told, attributable to "the indolence and ignorance of the Colonial Office," and to the Emancipation Act! "The headlong, blind, and blundering meddling of officious humanity-mongers drove them into rebellion." The virulence of this language is worthy of the detestable cause, which can support itself only by falsehood. We should not have thought it worth noticing, except as showing that, with respect to Port Natal, as well as every other settlement or colony, there will be need of unslumbering vigilance to prevent the revival of Slavery or the Slave-trade under some specious name or form. In the same Number of this pro-Slavery Gazette, Lord Brougham's pending Bill, to prevent British subjects from holding slaves and engaging in the Slave-trade, is reprobated as "a precious measure," which "must, under every form that can be given to it, remain a standing insult to every country in which the institution of domestic Slavery exists." There can be no mistaking this language. Lord Brougham is represented as "the cat's-paw of Messrs. Scoble and Co." in this business. We only wish that the noble and learned Lord had no worse advisers, and that his Bill more adequately met the views of the Anti-Slavery Committee, who are so politely designated by the name of their indefatigable Secretary. It is evident, however, that their "spirit of meddling" is found sadly to interfere with the schemes of African labour-jobbers, African merchants of a certain description, and Slave-dealers of all sorts. Abuse, is homage from such quarters.—Ibid.

FRANCE.—M. Lacrosse stated in his speech in the Chamber of Deputies on Friday, that during the last war between Great Britain and the United States, Commodore Porter, with two or three vessels, kept in check a number of ships belonging to the English in the Pacific, which he was enabled to effect by the occupation of Nukahiva, in the Marquesas Islands. M. Lacrosse added, that in case of a war France would experience similar advantages, and in time of peace the possession of those islands would be of incontestable utility for French commerce.—Record.

A Correspondent of the Times states that at the conclusion of the Rouen Railway 220 Irish labourers had been induced to volunteer for Africa, and that measures were preparing to obtain more recruits from the same quarter, to supply the waste of life which was making that colony unpopular among all classes of the French.—Ibid.

BRITISH MUSEUM.—The number of visiters during the last week was 32,159, and, with all this large concourse, but one person was removed from the rooms on the grounds of intoxication, whilst no single case of theft occurred. The numbers of visiters were on Monday 13,410, Tuesday 2,439, Wednesday 10,061, Thursday 1,386, and Friday 4,843.—Ibid.

FRANCE.—The French Government experienced on Tuesday a new check in the Chamber of Deputies, in the rejection of their demand of 130,000f. for the service of the French possessions in India. One of our private letters contends that the refusal of the grant was occasioned by "the profligate misapplication of the public money of late years in Pondicherry and elsewhere"

On a division on the vote, there were—

|---|---|
| For the grant,.................... | 103 |
| Against it, .................... | 175 |
| Majority against Ministers, ... | —72 |

Intimidated by this demonstration, Ministers withheld another Bill, relative to inland navigation, which would, it was understood, have been similarly rejected.

"According to the witty expression of Marshal Soult, President of the Council," observes the Siècle, "each of the Ministers has received in succession 'a yellow cartridge' from the Chambers. The Minister of Finance saw his Coinage Bill ejected; the Minister for Public Works, the Bill for completing the Railroad from La Teste to Bordeaux; the Minister of Commerce, the Sugar Bill; the Minister of Marine, the grant to the inhabitants of Pondicherry; the Minister of Justice (in the Chamber of Peers), the Bill for modifying the Penal Code; the Minister for Foreign Affairs remains under the weight of the debates produced by the question of the right of search; the Minister of the Interior may, for his part, claim as a negative success the votes on the inquiry into the conduct of the Government functionaries during the late elections. It is believed that the Ministers of War and of Public Instruction, who at present cause their colleagues some jealousy, will have their turn before the conclusion of the session."

ARTESIAN WELLS.—We understand that it is intended to carry the bore for the Artesian well in the Garden of Plants to the depth of 800 or 900 metres, whereas that at Grenelle is only 550 metres deep. The object of piercing so low is to find water of high temperature. The expectation of doing so is founded on observations made by M. Arago and M. Walferdin, at Grenelle, that the temperature of the water increased in warmth one degree at every 32 metres' depth, and, consequently, at that of 800 or 900 metres must be at from 36 to 39 degrees centigrade (about from 97 to 104 Fahrenheit), with which the hot houses of the equatorial plants, and also the lodges of the animals in the menagerie, and even the hospitals in that quarter, may be warmed in winter.—Paris Paper.

THE STATE OF PRUSSIA.—BERLIN, MAY 30.—The King has set out for Pomerania and western Prussia, and the Queen has departed for Pilnitz. From all points of the Rhenish province addresses are being presented to the Provincial States. The Gazette of Aix-la-Chapelle gives one from the banks of the Moselle, praying—1st, for a constitution; 2d, for a general law relating to the press; 3d, the rejection of the plan for the new penal code; 4th, the suppression of the State lottery; 5th, the introduction of the decimal system in coins, weights, and measures.—Record.

We learn (says the France) that the mortal remains of M. Borie, one of our missionaries decapitated at Tongking, have arrived at Paris. As soon as the Directors of Foreign Missions heard that they had arrived at Bordeaux in a French vessel coming from China, they despatched two of their body to bring the remains to the premises of the Foreign Missions, there to remain until an order of the Holy See authorizes them to be exposed in public."—Ibid.

FRENCH FINANCE.—The national debt of France, which in 1572, under Charles IX., was only 17,000,000f., was, in 1832, 5,417,495,017f. At the present time it is almost 7,000,000,000f. France has already been bankrupt six times, viz.:—Under Sully, who deducted the interest formerly paid on the capital; at the end of Louis XIV.'s reign, under Desmaret, who paid neither capital nor interest; at the fall of the "système Law," under Lepelletier; under the Abbe Terrai, who did not pay the assignments; during the Revolution, after the creation of 45,000,000 of mortgages; lastly in 1800, by the reduction of two-thirds of the debt.—Ibid.

A letter from a Frenchman, dated Nov. 20, 1842, from the Bay of Taiose, at Nouka-Hiva, gives the following particulars of the Kanakes of Isle Christina, forming part of the Marquesas group:—"I was present at one of their fetes, where all our soldiers were invited. Only half repaired there, armed, and with their cartouche-boxes well filled; the rest being left to guard the fort. We found on our way some of their women, who jumped for joy at seeing us. Their heads were adorned with red and white flowers; their skin was rubbed over with certain plants, and shone like varnish. When we arrived, upwards of 500 Kanakes formed a passage to let us pass through. Soon after, the principal warriors, whose bodies were entirely tattooed, formed themselves in a circle to dance to the sound of the tam-tam. By their side were some children, remarkable for their costume. They hold absolute authority over other children of their own age, and are not without some authority over the chiefs; but at a certain age, they are sacrificed to the gods of the country. On the day of the sacrifice they are taken to the appointed place, and cut into pieces, which are distributed, and a dreadful feast is made of them. When the songs, or rather howlings, of the natives had ceased, several Kanakes, preceded by the King, came and placed before us branches of trees, cocoa-nut trees, sugar-canes, and sixteen little pigs. Their funeral ceremonies are worthy of remark. When any one dies, he is suspended from pieces of wood, near his habitation, and covered with the bark of trees. For the first days after his burial food is brought to the place where the body lies, with the idea that the deceased will return during the night and eat."

The French squadron stationed at the Society Islands will provisionally be composed of the frigate Uranie, of 60 guns, two corvettes of brigs, two transport sloops, and the Phaeton, a steamer of 160 horse-power. At the Marquesas there will be only the corvette La Meurthe.—Record.

From the Rhine in July we hear that, in the sitting of the Rhenish Provincial Assembly, on the 7th of this month, it was resolved to reject all proposals respecting the freedom of the press. This Resolution of our Assembly, which certainly cannot be said to want liberality, is very important.—Ibid.

PRINCE ALBERT OF PRUSSIA AND THE SULTAN.—When the Sultan received the Prince, he rose from his seat and placed him to his right hand on the sofa. This was an unheard-of honour, and proves, at least, a considerable advance in the outward forms of what is called civilization. When the Prince left the audience chamber, the Sultan again rose and accompanied him to the door.—Pat.

THE STADE DUTIES.—It appears that the commissioners at Dresden have drawn up a pro formâ tariff, by which certain incidental forms and expense are proposed to be abolished, but which concedes to Hanover a large augmentation of the rates now levied. It is further stated, that the increase of duty is to be directed against those articles of British manufacture which constitute the bulk of our exports to Germany—viz., cottons and woollens. For instance, our correspondent affirms that cotton twist is to be charged at the rate of from one-eighth to a quarter per cent.; whereas, it at present pays only six shillings, or little more than one-sixteenth per cent. per bale. The Government of Hamburgh is understood to have protested against these proceedings of the Elbe commission; but it is apprehended that the new tariff having been framed in concert with a diplomatic agent of the British Government, Lord Aberdeen may feel himself bound to ratify the proceeding. This last supposition, however, is to us incredible.—Chronicle.

MURDER ON THE HIGH SEAS—BLOWING-UP OF A SOUTH SEA WHALER.—Intelligence has been received of the blowing-up of the Diana, South Sea Whaler, while on her homeward voyage, and the death of Captain May, who commanded her, and who there is reason to suspect fell by the hand of an assassin. It was found that he had been shot. The Diana reached St. Helena in safety, and was ordered to sail from St. Helena on Wednesday, the 26th of that month; only a few hours previous to the time appointed for the starting, the powder-magazine blew up, causing the almost total destruction of this fine vessel. The sufferers, one by one, were extricated from the shattered timbers of the vessel. The remains of the poor steward were discovered shockingly mutilated, and in the course of the day were conveyed on shore. The explosion had been caused by the wilful firing of the powder-magazine. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown."—Pat.

REBECCA IN IRELAND.—The Cork Examiner of Wednesday contains the following curious announcement:—"Saturday morning last the followers of Rebecca in this country disturbed the quiet of the little town of Bettegant, by demolishing a branch gate, erected one week since on a by road immediately leading to the town. Since the erection of the gate considerable dissatisfaction was evinced by the farmers to go to market by that road; the consequence was, an immediate rise in the price of provisions, to the great detriment of the poor, who were obliged to pay 4d. and 5d. per weight for potatoes, instead of half that price, which was only demanded before."—Pat.

PREMATURE RISE OF THE NILE.—A very remarkable anomaly has been observed this year in the periodical flux of the Nile. From time immemorial the first day of the rise of the Nile has spotted soon after the summer solstice, and at Cairo the phenomenon has usually taken place some time between the 1st and the 10th of July; this year, however, there was a rise of the river on the night of the 5th of May, consequently two months earlier than usual. This rise continued only four days, after which the water fell, and it still continues falling as it always does until the period of the summer solstice. History affords no example of so early a rise of the river, and only a few instances are recorded of a second rise taking place shortly after the first. One of these instances occurred in the reign of Cleopatra, and the other in the year of 1737.—Cologne Gazette.

LOCUSTS IN AMERICA.—The locusts have made their appearance both at Hartford and New Haven; seventeen years have elapsed since their last visit. In the vicinity of the Hubbard Farm, back of West Rock, New Haven, they are to be seen in immense quantities, covering the leaves and branches to the tops, and flying off in swarms after maturing their wings for a flight. On the 12th inst., at ten o'clock, a. m., says a correspondent of the New Haven Herald, "their singing, when in a state of rest, was heard more than a mile. They commence singing when the sun shines pleasantly. About half-past seven, p. m. when the sun is obscured, they shelter themselves under the leaves of the trees and in the grass. The swarms that have proceeded from this field have taken a northerly direction, flying about forty rods at an effort. As far as I have observed they make but one flight in the same day. They have hatched in this same field at four different periods, at intervals of seventeen years each, according to the memory of one person who lives in the neighbourhood; others can remember for two and three periods."—Record.

In a back township of Upper Canada a magistrate, who kept a tavern, sold liquor to people till they got drunk and fought in his house. He then issued a warrant, apprehended them, and tried them on the spot; and, besides fining them, made them treat each other to make up the quarrel.—Canada Temperance Advocate.

OTAHEITE.—FALMOUTH, JULY 13.—We have this morning advices from Tahiti to February 17, where there was lying a French ship of war. The French were much disliked by the Queen and her subjects, who often expressed the hatred which they felt towards the new comers, and more especially on account of the manner in which they had obtained possession of the island.

Queen Pimarra had signified to the French Commandant that she would never acknowledge them as her ruler, and that if they persisted in retaining possession of her island she would leave it, and take up her residence with one of her relatives who govern some of the neighbouring isles.

On the arrival of Her Majesty's ship Talbot, Sir Thomas Thomson, in January, the Queen claimed his protection, which he offered her, and an affair was likely to have arisen between Sir Thomas and the French Commander.

The French have forced the Tahitians to place their flag as a union in the uppermost corner of theirs—and which they oblige the Queen to have hoisted every day on her fort; but on the arrival of the Talbot she refused doing so, when the French Commander declared if she persisted in her intention, he would fire on the town; whereon Sir Thomas Thomson informed his rival that, if he fired on the town, he would at once open a fire on his ship. Each vessel prepared for action—the Queen still persisting in not hoisting the flag, and at last the matter was ended by the French Commander being obliged to send some of his men to carry out his wish.

Sir Thomas Thomson sailed in the Talbot to receive instructions from his Admiral respecting the course he should pursue, and what answer he should return to the Queen who sought British protection.—Record.

NEW ZEALAND.—The Journal des Débats publishes a letter dated Akaroa (New Zealand), the 22d of February, 1843, stating that the French cutter L'Allier, commanded by M. Lavand, quitted New Zealand to return to France on the 23d of January. She was to touch at Otaheite, the Marquesas, and Lima. Captain Lavand was replaced by Captain Berard, commander of the corvette Le Rhin. On the 9th of February Mr. Shortland, the British Colonial Governor, hoisted the British flag on the French station, against which act M. Berard protested. At the same time the British Governor gave notice that foreign ships were forbidden to fish within three miles of the coast of New Zealand, that French jurisdiction was abolished, and that the French colonists were placed under British law; that French property should be protected; that French ships should be searched by British Custom-house officers, and that merchandize should be subject to the same duties as in the other parts of New Zealand:—five per cent. ad valorem, with the exception of wines and brandies; fifteen per cent. on wines, and 6f. 25c. a gallon on brandies. On the 10th of February the French inhabitants addressed a protest to Commander Berard, declaring that they would not acknowledge any authority but that of France until the French Government should have apprised them officially of the arrangements concluded between the two countries.—Ibid.

The Hindoostan has arrived with intelligence to the 6th of September. We have been peculiarly unfortunate as it regards the receipt of letters and papers. Though the vessel arrived off Calcutta at 11 A. M. on Tuesday, we did not receive a copy of the London Mail, and the Monthly Times, till twenty-four hours afterwards; we have therefore been able to make but scanty extracts from them. It is however some consolation for our disappointment that the Mail is more barren than any of the eight which have preceded it this year. The Queen had prorogued Parliament, taken the three royal children to Brighton, and visited the Coast of France with her royal spouse, where she was received with every demonstration of respect. The agitation in Ireland continues with little abatement, and O'Connel has published the outline of his Parliament, which is to consist of Three Hundred members and to meet in Dublin. Of course, the assemblage of these representatives would be an overt act of treason, and bring the matter to a point. The disturbances created by Rebecca and her daughters in Wales have increased in violence, and it has been necessary to send two additional regiments into the country; but manufactures are in a more flourishing state than they have been in any previous month. This is in fact the sum of the intelligence brought by this mail.

We are happy to be able to subjoin full particulars of the progress of the Oriental Steamer from Southampton to Alexandria, and of the Hindoostan from Suez to Calcutta, with which we have been kindly favoured by a friend who has arrived in her. The Hindoostan has made a splendid passage of twenty-five days. We can scarcely expect the Bombay Express for some days to come.

The Oriental left Southampton at 11 A. M. on the 1st ultimo, with the following passengers:

For Malta.—Major Beckwith; Lieut. Crawford; and Ensign the Honourable Gilbert Elliott, of the Rifle Brigade stationed at Corfu; Assistant Commissioner General Eppes; Pay Master Travers; Messrs. Woodhouse (2), Burrow and Briggs, and Miss Nowell.

For Aden.—Mrs. Thomas (wife of the Superintendent of the Peninsular Company at that station) and infant.

For Bombay.—Lieut. Griffiths Jenkins, I. N.; Mrs. Jenkins, two Misses Jenkins; Monsieur le Baron Loe; Monsieur Gruber, Prussian Consul to China; Mr. Ackland, Honourable Company's Solicitor; Lieut. H. N. Robertson; Cadets Nicholson, H. P. Berlhow, A. Ayrtoun, Outram, Jackson and Campbell.

For Ceylon.—Ensign Groves, H. M. 90th; J. G. Frith, Esq.; Mr. Holdernesse (late of the Ship Eleanor); Mrs. Holdernesse; Dr. Unwin and Mr. C. Dixon.

For Madras.—W. Glover, Esq.; Lieut. H. R. Seymour, H. M. 63d; Lieut. W. J. Cooke, 8th Native Infantry; Lieut. J. M. Rees, 1st European Light Infantry; Lieut. F. Tower, 45th Native Infantry and Mrs. Tower.

For Calcutta.—Major General, Mrs. and Miss Biggs; Mrs H. T. Raikes and child; Madame de Guerin; Mrs. Robinson; Miss Jenkins; E. Deedes, Esq. C. S.; C. St. Quintin, Esq. C. S.; Capt. Larkins; Ensign Wallock, H. M. 9th; Messrs. C. G. Millinan; H. M. Shand; A. Sym; D. T. Pryce; J. L. Bouhote; W. Greenaway; A. Middleton; S. Guppy; G. Newman, G. F. Lackersteen, Brown, Reeves, Hammill, Frederick, Anderson, Belton, P. Pittar, John Jenkins, John Storm and Geo. Parbury, Merchants; H. Brereton and F. Tucker, Esqrs. Writers; Cadets, Sneyd, Cathcart, Robison, Sidebottom and Eckford, and Messrs. Hodges, Vining and Martin.

The Oriental arrived at Falmouth at 5 A. M. on the 2nd, took in the Mails (the last time she will have to call at that station) and left at 4 P. M. reaching Gibraltar on the 7th at 2 P. M., whence she took her departure at 7 P. M. with the undermentioned passengers:

For Malta.—Captain Tulloch, H. M's. 42nd Regiment and

For Bombay.—The Hon Mr. Cushing, Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States to China

Mr. Cushing had arrived at Gibraltar en route to Alexandria in the U. S. Steam Frigate Missouri, but that vessel unfortunately took fire on the evening of the 26th August, and was utterly destroyed. Her bulwarks and one paddle box are alone above water. The Missouri was the largest steam vessel in the U. S. Navy, measuring 2,200 tons, engines of above 500 horse power, and with a crew of 360 men, not one of whom was lost though so many as 70 were swimming in the Bay at one time. Mr. Cushing expects to meet at Bombay a Squadron of the U. S. Navy, with which he proceeds to China.

The Oriental arrived at Malta on the 12th at 5 P. M. and left the next day at 7 P. M., with the following additional passengers:

For Bombay—Capt. S. Parr; Cadet Parr and A. Anderson, Esq.

For Ceylon.—W. Ackland, Esq. and Miss Ackland.

For Calcutta.—Mr. and Mrs. Coleman; Ensign Carey, H. M. 29th; Messrs. Faudon; Aubin; Milani; Morell and Cadet Parish.

(Col. Carmichael, C. B. and his Lady had arrived in Malta by the Mail packet, where they proposed remaining until the departure of the next month's vessel, thence going to Bombay en route to join the Colonel's Regiment, the 4th Light Cavalry, now stationed at Nusseerabad.)

The Oriental reached Alexandria at 2 P. M. on the 17th, immediately disembarking her passengers, who proceeded on to Cairo the same evening, arriving there early on the 19th, whence they started in detachments for Suez, arriving there on the 20th, 21st and 22d. The Mail packet from Bombay not having arrived up to the afternoon of the 22nd, it was deemed advisable to put the whole of the English Mails (111 boxes) on board the Hindoostan, and she left Suez at 5 P. M. of that day carrying all the Oriental's passengers (except Messrs. Cushing, Grubel, A. Anderson, Ackland, Ayrtoun, Parr, Capt. Parr and the Baron Loe, who preferred waiting there in lieu of going to Aden in the Hindoostan as did the others) besides the following:

For Madras.—Fratri John Balma, Louis Griffo, Louis Galle, Italian Missionaries, with five Assistants, ditto.

For Calcutta.—H. Swetenham, Esq. C. S.; Mrs. Swetenham; F. H. Robinson, Esq. C. S.; Cadet Prior and Messrs. Patten and Clark.

The Hindoostan passed close to Cosseir twenty-four hours after leaving Suez, and anchored at Aden at 4 A. M. of the 28th. The whole of the Bombay mails were left there, as well as all those (some 20 boxes) which had come through France, such being unfortunately only marked, "India mail outward" without the actual destination, whereas those made up in London for the dispatch of the 31st August, and marked outside Calcutta, Madras and Ceylon, were allowed to be taken on in the Hindoostan and so will reach those places several days earlier than the letters of the 6th ultimo.

The Hindoostan left Aden at 9 P. M. of the 29th and at 10 A. M. of the 30th, spoke the H. C. Steamer Victoria from Bombay to Aden to convey from the latter place the crew of the Memnon, and on which vessel would be put the mails which had been left there. The Cleopatra with the August India mail only left Aden on the 23d, and so would not arrive at Suez until long after the Oriental had left Alexandria, thus leaving England for two months in succession without mails, and in the case of Madras for three, unless the opportunity afforded by the Hindoostan had been generally taken advantage of.

She anchored at Point de Galle on the 9th October at 9 A. M. and left at 3 P. M. of the 10th, with the following passengers:

For Madras.—Mr. Jackson, Vet. Surg. 8th Madras Light Cavalry.

For Calcutta.—Sir Lawrence Peel; Sir J. P. Grant; W. P. Grant, Esq and Mrs. W. P. Grant; Lieut. F. C. Kene, Bombay Army; M. Shawe, Esq. C. S.; J. S. Stopford, Esq.; J. T. D. Cameron, Esq.; R. Bell, Esq; A. B. Scott, Esq.

She reached Madras at 7 A. M. on the 13th instant, and left again at 2 P. M. with three passengers, viz. Dr. W. C. Macleane, H. M. 40th Regiment; Lieut. H. F. Cust, H. M. 25th and C. J. Braine, Esq.

She reached the Lower Floating Light at 10 A. M. on the 16th, anchoring at Diamond Harbour at 6 in the afternoon; leaving 6 A. M. on the 17th and finally arriving at Garden Reach at 11 o'clock.

The H. C. Steamer Akbar, having on board Col. Malcolm, with dispatches from China, arrived at Suez on the 16th September, and was to remain there for the Colonel's return, or further orders from the Home Government. The P. and O. S. N. Co's. new Steamer Lord William Bentinck, which left Southampton for Calcutta via the Cape, on the 24th August, arrived at Gibraltar on the 1st September, but being disappointed in obtaining coal there, went back to Cadiz on the following day.

Cooly Emigration.—Every week seems to turn up some fresh abuse in the system of Cooly emigration. Within the last five or six weeks, cases have been brought to light of coolies inveigled under false pretences from the interior; of their illegal detention in Calcutta, and even of an attempt to force them on the public wharf to embark against their wills for the Mauritius. Last week the Hurkaru published a letter, which we now republish at length, signed by Mr. Miller, who was witness to the jumping over board of two coolies from a vessel lying off the Botanic Gardens, one of whom he succeeded in rescuing, while the other was picked up by a boat from the ship and carried back. Mr. Miller immediately addressed the Magistrate on the subject, and within four hours afterwards, two constables arrived with orders to make full enquiries on the subject. They proceeded on board to liberate all who were unwilling to proceed to the Mauritius, and between thirty and forty immediately left the ship. Of those who remained behind, and resolved to continue their voyage, several, if not all, complained severely of the harsh treatment they had met with for twenty-five days on board the vessel. Many were diseased, some helpless and even delirious from fever.

It is not improbable that some of the representations made by the Coolies of the fraud and violence practised towards them are exaggerated, and that their reluctance to proceed to the Mauritius may arise from a desire to escape from those obligations which the acceptance of bounty money has imposed on them. But it is impossible to attribute all the complaints which are now so common, to misrepresentation, or to arrive at any other conclusion than that they betoken the rapid growth of abuses in the system of emigration. The opposition which was so strenuously and so effectually made to the Cooly trade, about five years ago, and which one of our contemporaries has erroneously attributed to a pseudo-philanthrophy, was occasioned by the constant exhibition of these scenes before the public eye. Every attempt to prevent them, and to introduce a degree of honesty and fair dealing into the system having signally failed, and the laws passed by Government having become a dead letter, the public voice called for the absolute prohibition of what was in every sense of the word a traffic in human beings. And the objections which were raised to the re-opening of the ports for emigration, were founded on a dread lest the revival of the system should be accompanied by a renewal of abuses. The experience of the last three months demonstrates that these apprehensions were by no means groundless. If the representations which have been made are correct, there is little difference between the system now in operation, and that which was suppressed as being incapable of cure. To all present appearance, the same scenes are re-enacted which roused public indignation both here and at home. We have the same infamous crimps let loose on Native society, the same nefarious exertions to inveigle men from the interior of the country, under false pretences; the same confinement of the Coolies in and about Calcutta, the same scenes of violence to procure their embarkation. Such is the present aspect of things. It appears as if these abuses were altogether inseparable from the system of emigration. Indeed, when we were told that the Crimps who had been sent through the country to beat up for Coolies, had been armed with the tremendous power of a perwannah, or writ, forbidding all official men to interfere with the exercise of their vocation, we found no difficulty in giving credit to the report of those scenes of fraud and violence which have been so repeatedly exposed to view, and our only surprise is that they are not more frequent.

We think these gross abuses arise chiefly from the great change which has been made in the system originally propounded by Lord Stanley, and on the faith of which all objections to emigration were withdrawn. The public was clearly given to understand that the exportation of Coolies would be strictly a Government measure; that the Authorities at the Mauritius would appoint an Agent at the various ports in India, who should receive applications from all who were desirous of emigrating, and provide them with the means of proceeding to the Mauritius, where they would be at liberty to choose their own master. This plan has never been acted upon. On the contrary, from the time when the restrictions on emigration were removed, the whole business of providing Coolies has become quite as much a matter of private speculation, as it was formerly. It is Calcutta Agents who engage to supply Mauritius planters with a certain number of Coolies,—for a consideration. It is Duffadars, or Crimps, who contract with the Agents for Coolies, at so much a head, and proceed through the country beating up for volunteers, whom they bring down to Calcutta and lock up in receiving houses, till they can go through certain formalities, at a public office, and be shipped on board. There appears to be no difference between the two systems except that an officer has been appointed in Calcutta, with a Deputy, to act as the protector of the emigrants, and to prevent their becoming the victims of fraud and violence. The public has a right to demand that the plan proposed by Lord Stanley shall be forthwith acted upon: that the provision of Emigrants shall be entrusted to responsible officers of the state, instead of being left to private cupidity, and that an embargo be laid upon the exit of all farther Coolies till the Government of the Mauritius have deputed an agent to Calcutta. Even then, there will, we fear, be but a slender check on abuse; the Cooly Agents will still endeavour to evade the law and wedge in their services, for the lucre which they may bring; but whatever degree of fair dealing and integrity may be secured by the appointment of an official Agent, the public has a right to demand.

We are confident the Government of Bengal will not sleep over the startling disclosures which have been made. We will not on such an occasion make any allusion to those in our native land who have succeeded in abolishing slavery through the British dominions and whose voice, whenever it is heard, is heard in thunders which no public functionary can be deaf to. Their principles may be stigmatized by whatever term best suits the taste of their opponents, —rant, or cant, or hypocrisy, or false philanthropy,—but their power cannot be despised. They are watching with a jealous eye the progress of this experiment, prepared to extinguish it the moment it appears to take the form of a slave trade. We are perfectly confident that no such appeal to the moral power of England will be necessary. We know that the provisions for emigration were framed with the most honest and anxious desire to prevent the possibility of abuse. We know that no party will more deeply regret the inefficiency of the rules to prevent the abuses which are now growing up, than those who originally framed them. The moment the fact was brought to light that the Protector of Coolies had injudiciously given the crimps Writs of protection in the exercise of their trade, an order was issued to recal and to forbid them. On the present occasion also Government will not be wanting in the performance of the duty which it owes to its own character, to our national honour, and to the interests of the poor Coolies, but will institute the most searching enquiry and adopt the most stringent measures of reform. We are sure the matter may be left in the hands of the local Government with perfect confidence.

After the foregoing remarks were in type, we received information that on the 20th of September, Mr. Fraser, the Assistant to the Protector of Coolies, went on board the Fair Rebang, the vessel from which the Coolies were released, and mustering all the men, identified them with the registers, so that it was impossible for any individual to have been on board who had not been duly examined and passed at the office. At the same time he distinctly informed them that if they chose, they might return on shore immediately; he also requested that any among them who were unwilling to proceed to the Mauritius, should hold up their hands; but not a sign was made by any one of them. This fact, for which we have good authority, appears to exonerate the Protective Officers from blame in this matter. The vessel was afterwards detained in the river for nearly three weeks from the want of a Steamer, and the men were doubtless subjected to very great, and, to them, intolerable inconvenience on board. There can be little doubt that if Mr. Fraser had visited the ship on the day on which the two men jumped overboard, and offered the Coolies their liberty, a very large number would instantly have availed themselves of the offer. We think that in all cases, in which a vessel is detained three weeks after the Coolies had been shipped, within four miles of Calcutta, the Protector of Coolies, or his Deputy, should be required to visit it, once if not oftener, to look to the convenience of the Coolies, and particularly to see that an additional supply of provisions and of water has been sent on board to make up for that which had been consumed in the river.

THE PUNJAB.—After our last number had been sent to Press we received the Delhi Gazette, with the translation of the Perwanna, sent nominally by the minor Rajah, Dhuleep Singh, to his agent at Loodiana, to be communicated to the British Agent on the frontier of the Sutlege. It contains an official account of the murder of the Rajah Shere Singh and his Minister Dhyan Singh, which will, we believe, be found generally correct. It is of course dictated by Heera Singh, the son of Dhyan Singh, in whom all power at Lahore was then concentrated; and it very naturally withholds all notice of the share which the latter took in the assassination of his sovereign. The amusing part of this state paper lies in the cart load of titles heaped on the deceased Dhyan Singh, which are we believe the longest on record in any oriental document. We were accustomed to consider two lines of titles rather redundant even for the Royal family of Delhi; but the stile of Dhyan Singh, actually extends to four lines, and comprises no fewer than thirty-four vocables. Alas that such magnificent titles should have been insufficient to ward off the assassin's blow. But the document is not without instruction; it teaches us that the predominant party in the Punjab deprecates the interference of the British Government in its affairs. It directs the Agent to represent to our Resident that the state remained exactly in the same position in regard to the British Government as before the death of the late Rajah.

This fact is much to be doubted. The administration of Shere Singh was an established Government capable of maintaining its public relations with surrounding states. However distracted by internal jealousies, it presented no cause of immediate apprehension to its neighbours. But his assassination virtually breaks up the strong Government established by Runjeet Singh, and opens a wide field for the ambition of the various chiefs. It is likely therefore to be followed by a degree of anarchy which must end in subverting the independence of the Punjab. The tie which bound together the discordant materials of which the modern kingdom was composed, and which has become feebler and feebler since the master spirit departed, has now been completely broken. When the murder of Shere Singh and the triumph of Dhyan Singh was announced, it was hoped that a vigorous Government would be established in the Punjab, equal in strength and stability to that of Runjeet Singh. That hope lasted only twenty-four hours. It was buried in the grave of Dhyan Singh, who fell a victim to the wretch whom he had instigated to murder his sovereign. Then came the brief rule of Ajeet Singh and Lena Singh, the assassins, but they were soon cut off, and Heera Singh, the pampered child of Dhyan Singh, became Mayor of the palace. Between him and his uncle Soochet Singh, the seeds of strife had long since been sown, and it was foreseen that one or the other must fall. But before their discords had come to a head, Heera Singh,—as a Delhi Gazette extra informs us—has himself been murdered in a personal squabble with another Lena Singh about the disposal of jaygeers and posts. The last accounts from Lahore represent that this Lena Singh had been joined by General Ventura, and that Golab Singh, the second brother of Dhyan Singh, the fighting brother to whom the management of the highland possessions of the family had been committed, was within a few miles of the Capital with an army of 25,000 men. He may possibly overcome all opposition, and sit down Lord of the Punjab; but treachery and assassination are the order of the day, and no man's head is secure. The authority of a fixed and respected Government is gone, and its place will be ill supplied by the wild rule of transient factions.

As long as the effects of this discord are confined to the Punjab, our Government can have little right to interfere. Faction may supplant faction without affording us any colourable pretext for intermeddling in the affairs of the kingdom; but as soon as the security of our own provinces, or of those of our allies is disturbed by actual aggression, self preservation will render it imperative on us to put an end to a state of things incompatible with our own peace, and to occupy a country which has ceased to be a peaceable neighbour. In the anarchy which now prevails in the Punjab, such a contingency is sure, sooner or later, to arise; and Lord Ellenborough is not the man to allow this golden opportunity to slip from him, though it may oblige him to enlarge those limits which nature had assigned to our empire on the 1st of Oct. 1842; and what he undertakes, he will carry through dauntlessly. If it were allowable to anticipate events, we would venture to predict that the extension of our empire to the banks of the Indus, in the north as well as the south, is reserved for his Lordship's administration. Whether he will go further, and occupy Peshawur, and the fort at the mouth of the Khyber, is another question. In a physical sense, the natural limit of India proper is not the Indus, but the termination of the plain beyond it, where it is met by a range of mountains and by a new climate; and it may be questioned whether in a military point of view this river which runs through a plain is the most appropriate boundary of such an empire. Be that as it may, the Affghans, unless awed by a power superior to that which now rules at Lahore, will lose no time in recovering Peshawur, and extending their conquests to the Indus, and possibly a little to the east of it. Stirring scenes are yet before us in the north west and on the Indus, and our connection with Affghanistan, though wisely dissolved after our disasters, may yet be renewed under a different and more auspicious aspect of circumstances.

It is said, and we believe with much truth, that an Army of Observation to the extent of twenty or thirty thousand men is to be assembled immediately on the North West frontier; a precautionary measure which will meet with universal approbation. This assemblage of troops will of course diminish the Army of Exercise which was directed to concentrate in the neighbourhood of Agra, that is of Gwalior. It is manifest that the formation of these two armies has reference to the distracted state of the two Governments of Scindia and the Punjab. While that distraction continues, the armies cannot well be withdrawn. A state of things which requires the presence of so large a proportion of our force cannot however be allowed to remain; and Government will be obliged in its own defence to take military possession of those states if they are not speedily reduced to such a state of tranquillity as to render the continued assemblage of such a force redundant.

INTERNAL CONDITION OF BENGAL.—We have been favoured with a printed copy of the depositions made before Mr. Dampier, the Superintendent of Police, and Capt. Marsh, the Assistant to the General Superintendent for the suppression of Thuggee, by sixteen professional robbers, who have been engaged in the various dacoities which have been perpetrated in this province during the last ten years. Greatly as the efficiency of our Police establishment has been questioned by those who have observed the course of circumstances, there are few, if any, prepared for the astounding disclosures made in these documents. The indefatigable officers to whom we are indebted for them, appear to have gone the right way to work. Having obtained a clue to some cases of dacoity, and succeeded in ferretting out the offenders, they pursued their researches, with unabated vigilance, till the whole system of dacoity, by which the peace and security of these Lower Provinces have been so long disturbed, was unfolded to them. They have obtained details of the most heinous robberies which have been committed, of the mode in which the gang was assembled, of the preliminary arrangements which were made, as well as the names, caste, age, and abode of the dacoits. Every deponent has been called upon to state the various dacoities in which he has been engaged, as well as the name of his accomplices; and the public officers have thus obtained a catalogue of crimes which may rival the descriptions in Johnson's lives of the Highwaymen. That all the declarations thus made,—in some instances by persons who expected to become approvers on a regular salary—are entitled to implicit credit we will not venture to affirm; but there is every reason to believe that the system they describe is at the present moment actually in operation in Bengal. The robberies they allude to are in many cases on record in the Magistrate's Courts; and the amount of property said by them to have been taken, corresponds substantially with that which was reported to the authorities. In one instance, moreover, two of the robbers who had been arrested at Dacca, were ignorant of the fact that their accomplices had been seized and examined in Purneah; the independent depositions of the two parties agree so essentially with each other as to leave no doubt of their fidelity.

These robbers are nearly all of the Kechuck caste, and their profession is Dacoity, into the craft and mystery of which they are duly initiated. Some of them declare that the profession has been hereditary in their families for several generations, and that their fathers and grandfathers followed the trade before them; but it appears that the caste does not reject proselytes. Thus Autoo states that he was originally a Beree by caste, but was converted into a Kechuk by one Jeentee. Another man states that Assaram Mundul, or the head of a village, took him to his house, provided him with a maintenance, and having converted him into a Kechuk, taught him dacoity—and to some purpose, for this convert was it appears one of the forty engaged in the well known dacoity at Guriah near Calcutta. It would seem therefore that the heads of the tribe are at all times ready to admit into the fraternity any likely youth who may fall in their way, and any vagabond who may be willing to take up the profession. But though it appears that the Kechuks, when not engaged in any enterprize, may occasionally turn their hands to the plough, for a temporary subsistence, yet they never give up the trade. Dhurroop was asked whether he had ever known a person who, from disgust or the fear of God, had ever abandoned dacoity, and he replied, "I have never seen such a person; whoever once enters the profession can never abandon it. If an able bodied man were to forsake his profession, he would be turned out of his caste, and none of them would eat, drink or smoke with him, or give him his daughter in marriage. One man Jhoomuk, a Haree, stated that not a single able bodied youth of his caste was to be found who did not commit robbery; that it was the profession of their ancestors, and was designed to be that of their children; and that every orphan in the tribe was cherished by its chiefs and taught dacoity. "In my caste," says he, "if there were honest persons; that is, men not robbers, they would be turned out; indeed they would leave us of their own accord, for fear of their lives." "Are all the Chowkeedars of your tribe" —there are enough of them—"thieves?" "All the Chowkeedars of the Haree cast are robbers and dacoits."

This Kechuk tribe seems to be widely distributed over the country. Apparently not a district is free from its presence. It is perhaps owing to this cause that the robbers pass with such facility from one district to another. In the depositions we find many of them who, after a little repose, had "turned their thoughts on dacoity," engaged in the course of the same year in several atrocious robberies, in different and distant districts. Their organization seems to be very complete. They never act but under the directions of their chief or Jemadar, who on hearing of a favourable opportunity, collects his gang, lays down the plan of operation, assigns his post to each man, provides the weapons and leads his band to the attack. They have a secret language of their own, by which they are enabled to recognize each other, and mutually to communicate their thoughts even in a crowd, without any fear of detection. Every boy who is initiated into the mysteries of the profession is taught this language, and, if naturally sharp, acquires it by the age of 10 or 12; if dull, not before 20.

The mode in which they obtain intelligence is thus described by one of the number: "Two or three of us taking some Gold Mohurs, go to the villages and ask if there is any person who wants to purchase Gold Mohurs, and who will give them change for such, and of course the wealthy men are pointed out to the spies. They go to their houses, produce the Gold Mohurs, and a price is asked. We find out who has cash and where it is by that, but the Mohurs are never disposed of, as our men always demand a higher price than the others are willing to give." At other times intelligence is received from some of their own tribe or from others who hope to share in the plunder; as it is a general rule that the informer is entitled to half the booty. After an expedition has been determined on, the first duty is to render the Gods propitious by acts of worship. "Generally speaking only Dacoits worship Kalee for their own purposes, and for the benefit of their trade." After the Gods have been propitiated, the dacoits proceed to the house they intend to rob, not in stealth, but amidst the glare of torches, and the shouts of Joy Joy Kalee, Victory to Kalee, and overcoming all resistance, carry off whatever they can discover,

Each Sirdar has his own banker, with whom the stolen property is deposited, and who turns the jewels and ornaments into money. The property is subsequently distributed, with a distinct reservation for the females and children of the tribe, whom it appears to be a matter of honour as well as policy to support from the general funds derived from depredations. But we must not omit to mention that it is customary to give the Zemindar on whose lands the dacoits reside, a share of the booty, because he is aware of their secrets. Thus Deola states, "When we go out on expeditions, we have to pay the Zemindar on whose lands we reside, the Gomasta, Mundul and Chowkeedar, to keep them quiet." Koosiah deposes that in a dacoity in which he was concerned, not more than eighteen months ago, 240 Rupees were given to Juroo Sirdar, their landlord. He states further, that 2400 Rs. were given to Sumbhoo Roy, the Zemindar of Hurungotta, and 60 Rs. to Haniff, the Chowkeedar, "because the Zemindar, on whose lands we resided was aware of our profession and always received intimation of our movements, and desired this Chowkeedar to take care of our children during our absence." He also alludes to another sum of 1000 Rs. paid by the Dacoits to their landlord. These statements strengthen the suspicions which have been for some time gaining ground that many Zemindars have a more distinct and guilty knowledge of these transactions than is generally supposed. It isa well known fact that the villains who committed so daring a robbery in the Durrumtolah in Calcutta about eighteen months ago, started from the house of a rich and highly respectable native across the water. And whenever our Police shall have been brought up to the requisite state of efficiency, we believe that disclosures will be made of the participation in these villainous practices by many a man who now sustains a fair character before his superiors.

Such is the system of robbery which has long been practised in Bengal, and is now we believe for the first time dragged to light. The periodical journals have occasionally lifted up the veil, and made known the occurrence of robberies, but seldom without the dread of a prosecution. Our own experience teaches us that it is safer to accuse a Governor General of incapacity than to affirm of any district that it is not in a state of perfect order. But while every thing has appeared smooth and tranquil on the surface of society, and in official reports, a large and well organized confederacy has been preying on the vitals of the country. Every district has been occupied by a well disciplined fraternity of dacoits, whose depredations have never for a moment been checked by any dread of our police. The Chiefs have been continually on the watch for opportunities of plunder; and the subordinates ready to join them in their professional labours on the first call. So admirably have their plans been laid, and so completely do they appear to have overawed the honest portion of the community, that they have been able always to reckon on half a dozen instances of success for one of failure. Seldom have they fallen into the hands of the Magistrates; and when they have been captured and brought to trial, and sentenced to imprisonment, no effort has been made to turn their conviction to account by eliciting a knowledge of their system or associates. Indeed, we question whether the disclosures made in the documents we refer to, will not be quite as new to the Magisterial authorities, as to the public. In one instance a captured dacoit distinctly gave up the names of his associates to the Session Judge and to the Magistrate, but not the slightest attention was paid to the information. In another instance, we find the most important intelligence of the plans of the dacoits disclosed by a man who had been two years in jail, and whom Capt. Marsh caused to be brought out and interrogated before him. We find one of the Keechuks declaring that his tribe has committed from 150 to 200 highway robberies in Bengal. It has long been suspected that nothing could be more fallacious than to consider the Magisterial reports as affording any real knowledge of the statistics of crime; and the confession of these men fully confirms this fact. The reason is plain; no man in his senses will reveal the fact of a robbery. The papers before us state that in one case a Native was robbed of 20,000 Rs. and yet never made his loss known, because, said the dacoit, having suffered so severely from us, he was not willing to suffer a second loss from the Darogah.

It is no imputation on the official character of the Magistrates that this ramified system of robbery should have been so long in full operation without their having obtained the smallest knowledge of it. The fault rests with our system. The Magistrates are not only overworked, but are for the most part stationary, except at a particular season of the year, when they travel about surrounded by their Amlas, and collect little or no information but what those Amlahs think it safe for them to hear. They have no intercourse with the people; and it is the great object of their Native officers to prevent the acquisition of any knowledge which shall interfere with their ease or their profits. What the country has long required is a body of officers whose whole business should consist in ferreting out crime, and in making themselves acquainted with the actual condition of the various classes of society, their hopes and fears; their position and their prospects. The papers now under review show to our shame how lamentably ignorant we are of the real state of the country seventy years after we have had absolute possession of it. The officers of the Thuggee department, have in fact given Government more accurate information of the true condition of the people, in a single year or two, than had been acquired during half a century from its legal officers. We have already trespassed on the patience of the reader to an extent which nothing but the importance of the subject will palliate; and have therefore only room to add that Government cannot act more wisely than by strengthening this department of the public service, and establishing an efficient Police, the business of which shall be to trace out crime, and to prevent it by vigilance. This is by far the most difficult of all the functions of administration. To try the culprit, and determine his guilt by the laws of evidence, and his punishment by the statute book, is an easy task. Yet to this matter has the attention of Government hitherto been chiefly directed, while the duty of discovering crimes and tracing the culprit through every disguise and handing him up to the Courts, has been left to ill paid, inefficient and venial Darogas.

The Reply of the Missionaries of the London Missionary Society.—We have been favoured with a copy of the "Reply of the Calcutta District Committee of the London Missionary Society to the Report of the Sub-Committee of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel's Diocesan Committee, on the subject of Bishop Corrie's Pledge of non-interference as given in 1823," with a very pressing request that we would republish it entire in this journal. The request appeared to us rather hard upon a weekly journal which is obliged to suit so great a variety of tastes in the limited selections, it has room to give; but we resolved notwithstanding to make an effort to meet the wishes of our friends. We set one-third of it in type, but found that if given in a single number, it would demand five entire pages. This quantity of space we found it impossible to devote to a single paper. At the same time we felt that the interest of the paper would be destroyed, and the object of its publication entirely defeated, if it was given in three successive weekly issues. We have resolved therefore, next week, to give a faithful and condensed statement of all the facts and arguments which it contains, placing them in juxta position with the statements they are intended to meet, and reprinting the documents which are necessary to illustrate the subject. We are confident that a greater number will be disposed to read our abstract than could be induced to wade through fifteen columns of closely printed matter, and that of a controversial character.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 12.

— The Englishman of this morning has given a statement of the dates of the dispatch of the overland Mail every month from London, and of its arrival in Calcutta, during the past and present year. The memorandum will be found useful: and we have therefore transcribed it. The mail of the 6th of September last year did not reach Calcutta before the 22d of October; but we had not then the Hindoostan to bring it.

— Mr. C. B. Greenlaw, who has just vacated the office of Coroner, we are told by the English- man, has presented a cup as "a well merited tribute" to Mr. Von Lintzgy for the ability and integrity with which he performed the duty of interpreter to the Coroner's Court for twenty years, and as a testimony of affectionate regard and steem for his private character.

— The Hurkaru states on the authority of a letter from Ferozepore of the 30th ultimo, that Dulleep Singh, who had been placed upon the throne by Dhyan Singh, had taken himself off together with the celebrated diamond, and that it was supposed he had sought refuge in our provinces.—Sawun Mull, the ruler of Mooltan, has been murdered, doubtless for aspiring to independence.—Tej Singh, the nephew of Khoosial Singh, has left the province of Peshawer to take care of itself, and retired to Lahore, for which Dost Mahomed will not be ungrateful to him.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 13.

— The Delhi Gazette states, that a serious disturbance had broken out at Khetree, about 25 miles to the west of Shekamattee, where an old Ranee Bhutteaneejee, had collected a body of 5000 matchlock men and taken possession of a strong hill fort, ejecting the young Ranee, who is the mother and the guardian of the young prince. Major Forster, with a detachment of his brigade, was going to bring the insurgents to reason, and there can be little doubt that he will easily allay this tempest in a teapot.

— The Delhi Gazette has taken up the proposal made by the Rev. Dr. Wolff to proceed to Bokhara in person, and attempt the rescue of Col. Stoddart and Captain Conolly, which is warmly supported by a correspondent of that journal, who assumes the name of Fidelis. The first question is, whether the prisoners are alive or not. A detailed account of their execution was sent by Col. Sheil to our Government; but certain Jews of Bokhara have since declared that they were not put to death, and this has created a hope of their existence; but it is after all very faint. Supposing however that they are happily yet alive, it is much to be doubted whether Dr. Wolff would be successful in his attempt to procure their liberation. The King of Bokhara is now one of the greatest potentates in Central Asia. He has made acquisitions on the right hand and the left within the last three or four years, which have doubled the extent of his kingdom. There has not been so powerful a monarch in those regions since the establishment of the Dooranee empire. His pride and haughtiness will of course increase with his power, and it is much to be questioned whether he would listen to any proposal for the release of his victims. Still the attempt ought to be made, if there be any one willing to undertake it; and we are certain that if Dr. Wolff were to come out here at once, instead of wasting his time in proposals at home, the whole sum required for his journey to Bokhara would be raised in a fortnight, and if necessary, double the sum.

— The Hurkaru states, that all the troops which were under orders for Scinde, have been directed to stand fast at Ferozepore till further orders.

— Another daring robbery has been committed in Calcutta in the shop of a native jeweller in Waterloo street, who was robbed a day or two ago of property to the amount of two thousand Rupees. The Tunnel which runs to the east of Old Court House Street, affords great convenience for the commission of these robberies, which too are now frequent. The vigilance of the Chowkeedars is not at fault on this occasion. Could we not get the agency of the Thug Department into play in Calcutta for a month? Nothing seems to escape its vigilance.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14.

— The Star of this morning states that the only Regiment ordered for Scinde, which is to proceed immediately to that province, is H. M. 13th Light Infantry, which will go down by water, preparatory to embarking for England. We have however heard from more than one quarter that the Regiment does not return home before 1845.

— The military residents at Simlah have testified their gratitude to General Avitabile for his boundless hospitality to the officers going to and returning from Affghanistan, by an entertainment at which General Churchill presided, and proposed the General's health, in a long and eulogistic speech. Sir Jasper Nicolls was not present.

— The Hurkaru states that Government has resolved on posting a strong force on the banks of the Sutlege. The number is stated by our contemporary at 36,000, but the Star brings it within smaller limits. The assemblage of so large a force cannot of course fail to create a heavy drain on the Exchequer, now recovering from the effects of the Affghan War. We should not indeed be surprized to find that the unsettled state of things in the North West, produced a manifest effect on the public funds, more especially on the fice per cents. which have risen to a premium of not less than Eight per cent., since we evacuated Affghanistan. We question whether this description of Securities has ever stood so high.

— The Governor General paid a visit yesterday afternoon to the Ellenborough and the Seringapatam; the former vessel we are told by the Hurkaru was by his Lordship called his godson; we have extracted from our contemporary a brief notice of this interesting event.

— The report that the Half batta order is to be entirely done away and for ever abolished, gains ground. It is affirmed in the most positive manner that the Court of Directors have actually agreed to the measure, and that the good news will be made public on the arrival of the next mail.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 16.

— Another scene in the Punjab Tragedy has just been unfolded. A Delhi Gazette Extra received this morning announces that Lena Singh Majeetea, was sitting with Hera Singh, making arrangements about the disposal of jaygeers and offices, when a dispute arose between them which ended in the murder of Hera Singh. Lena Singh is said to have been joined by General Ventura, and Golab Singh, the fighting brother, is reported to be within forty miles of Lahore with an army of 25,000 men.

— The Semaphore announces the arrival of a whole batch of favourite vessels from England, the Essex, the Bucephalus, the Owen Glendower, and the Northumberland. It is also reported that fourteen vessels were outside waiting for Pilots. The Hindoostan steamer was expected this day. It would be no common misfortune if she were detained a day or two at the Sand Heads for a Pilot.

— Great fears were entertained that the September Mail for Bombay would be delayed at Suez or Aden for want of a Steamer, in consequence of the loss of the Memnon. We are happy therefore to learn from the Bombay Courier of the 3d, that a native boat from Aden had brought intelligence of the arrival of the Akbar Steamer from China, at that port on the 7th. She proceeded immediately to Suez, which she was likely to reach about the 14th, quite in time for the Mails. The Hindoostan was at Aden on the 2d of September; and we may now have a race between her and that first rate Steamer, the Akbar. It will be decided, possibly, before our paper goes to press whether the Mail, by the Hindoostan direct, will reach Calcutta, in less time than the express reaches it from Bombay when brought to that port by the fastest of the Steamers.

— We are happy to find in the Englishman of this morning, a confirmation of the statement which has been some time current, that the lamentable loss of life in the two European Regiments which proceeded up the river last year, through the upsetting of the crazy country boats, had induced the Court of Directors to order the construction of iron vessels, for the transportation of troops. This measure is as much one of economy as of humanity, for the cost of the new vessels will not long remain uncovered by the pecuniary saving which will be effected by the safe conveyance of European troops.

— The papers announce the death of Major Craigie, Deputy Adjutant General of the Army, at Dinapore, at the age of 44, deeply and sincerely regretted. It will be no easy matter to supply his place in the office.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 17.

— The Bishop of Calcutta embarked on one of the River Steamers this morning on his visitation to the various stations at this Presidency, in company with the Rev. J. H. Pratt, Domestic Chaplain, Dr. Bell, Surgeon, and Lieut. Philpotts, escort officer.

— Bombay papers to the 4th reached Calcutta yesterday; they were consequently twelve days on the road. The number of papers and covers despatched by the Berenice on the 3d of October was 44,972; namely, letters 34,480, and covers 10,492. The Calcutta regular post of the 21st arrived in time for the steamer. The September Mail was expected to arrive early at Bombay if sent on by the Akbar Steam frigate; and late, if sent by the slow coach of the Cleopatra. The Hindoostan had not arrived yesterday evening.

— The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states, that the latest article of curiosity which has arrived there is a valuable breakfast service sent by her Majesty Queen Victoria to Shere Singh. The cups and saucers must remain in deposit till the last scene of the tragedy has closed, and it is determined to whom the Punjab belongs.

— A number of the Bunder gang, who, according to the Gentleman's Gazette, had embarked in the most extensive conspiracy ever known in India, have been brought to condign punishment. Eight individuals have been sentenced to transportation as receivers of stolen property. This result is calculated to disappoint those who have been expecting the most astonishing discoveries and the most extensive retribution; but the Gentleman's Gazette, which has been sounding the alarm in the ears of the Bombay public, official, and non official of these crimes against the public interests of society, takes great credit to himself for the conviction. Yet strange to say, the prosecution of this great offence has not been taken up by Government, but left to private individuals. The expense, it is said, has been actually defrayed from private subscriptions.

— The Stag, just arrived from the Mauritius, brings up Mr. Anderson, the Protector of Coolies, on a special Mission to the Right Honourable the Governor General, as well as the Secretary of the Governor of that Island. What have they come for? We can suppose no more appropriate errand than that of making arrangements to carry the provisions of the original plan into effect, by establishing a Government Agent here.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18.

— The Hindoostan anchored off Calcutta yesterday at 10 A. M. She has thus delivered her letters and papers in forty days and eighteen hours.

LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

[FROM THE MONTHLY TIMES, SEPTEMBER 6.]

GENERAL SUMMARY.

Her Majesty prorogued Parliament in person on the 24th of August. The royal speech will be found included in our Parliamentary intelligence. It comments on the most important subjects of discussion during the past season; proclaims, as such documents almost invariably do, the continuance of a "friendly disposition" on the part of foreign powers; dwells feelingly on the recent religious schisms in the church of Scotland; expresses deep concern at the shameful perseverance in the Irish agitation for the repeal of the legislative union, and announces a "firm determination" to maintain it inviolate. It also speaks resolutely with regard to the disturbances in Wales, judiciously observing, as a rider to that senatûs consultum [illegible], that inquiry has been directed to be made into the causes of the late disturbance of peace and destruction of public property. Strange to say, no reference whatever is made in this royal address to any affairs connected with the East.

The Marquis of Clanricarde and Mr. Roebuck having deferred, until the next season, their contemplated investigation of the affairs of Scinde, that topic still rests dormant in Parliament; but on this subject, as in our last number, we maintain that Scinde will be made a tributary province, although the tide of public opinion sets strongly against its permanent occupation. It must be stated, however, that according to Lord Brougham, it is Mr. Roebuck's intention to advocate the occupation of Scinde "on account of its necessity;" and the ex-lord chancellor argues, from the information disclosed to him by the honourable member for Bath, that that country, if well managed, would furnish a large source of surplus revenue.

In our last issue we gave the result of the debate upon the Opium Compensation Question. For the information of those who still cherish the expectation of its revival next session, and feel desirous of being made acquainted with the public opinion upon the subject, we have made several extracts from journals advocating various political tenets, commenting upon the principle of the compensation and the just dues of the claimants. Some sanguine sufferers still entertain a distant hope that by agitation and parliamentary petitioning, a more liberal grant may be secured; but, in our humble opinion, all the mercantile rhetoric in the world will not hereafter commute the fiat of the Government. Those (be it said) who, in the interval, prefer the proverbial bird in the hand to the two in the bush, will find in another column the precise terms on which their respective claims have been paid, and a very large portion remitted by the September mail.

We regret to say that there has been no abatement in the spirit of the Welsh insubordination. Rebecca and her rebel band still continue their midnight depredations, and although emissaries from London have paid official visits to the disaffected country, to investigate the causes of these riotous proceedings, and to remedy the evils complained of, discontent and violence are still rife in the land, and it will require no ordinary tact and prompt healing of indisputable grievances to restore tranquillity.

In Ireland, too, the violent agitations of the burly Agitator continue to disturb the public mind, and to check the progress of national prosperity. "Monster meetings," they are aptly termed, are still held in different parts of the country, and, although they all smack of the endless iteration of the self-same theme, they serve, nevertheless, to feed the flame and pander to the depraved taste of the excited multitude. Manifestly with this intention, the hill of Tara, hallowed by historical traditions and immortalised by the lyre of Erin, was selected for the site of one of the most monstrous of these "monster" demonstrations. Such an opportunity was not, of course, to be lost upon so subtile a prober of the human heart as the honourable member for Cork, and he expatiated accordingly on that occasion upon "the days of the years gone by" with all that impressive eloquence, winning pathos, and emphatic exuberance of patriotism which we should gladly welcome in a better cause. The determined tone of her Majesty's speech upon this subject will, we trust, put a stop to this useless fermentation, and revive that devotion of time to honest labour which is now frittered away by hoarse hurrahings and scramblings after an intangible shadow.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—Our advices from France up to the 3rd instant, state that the Queen's visit monopolised public attention. "This meeting (observes the Journal des Débats) of the two most powerful Sovereigns in the world ought not to be regarded as a vain ceremony. It is more, it is a great act, it is a benefit, because it is a new pledge given to the security of the world." A very general opinion prevailed at Paris that Her Majesty would pay a visit to the French capital, and grand preparations were making there in anticipation of that event. It is even asserted that arrangements are making for a magnificent entertainment in the Grand Gallery at Versailles which will exceed in magnificence anything of the kind yet seen.

WALES.—The Welsh mania for the destruction of the toll-gates rests unabated, and the peerless "Rebecca" has addressed a letter to a paper in Wales, breathing defiance of the civil and military authorities, and alleging that the population of Carmarthen, Cardigan, and Pembroke are with her "to a man."

IRELAND.—The Repeal Association continue their frantic agitations, and "the rint" still flows in pretty abundantly; but it is manifest that some of the heads of the hydra have been crushed by the unflinching course pursued by the Government.

—Father Mathew has taken leave of the Metropolis, and meditates a visit to Norwich, Birmingham, and Liverpool previous to his return to Ireland. The Countess of Clare took the pledge before he left London.

—We regret to announce the total loss of the Queen steamer, off Skokham Island, on the 1st instant. She was one of the Bristol Steam Navigation Company's boats, and plied between that port and Dublin. Only one life was lost.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Her Majesty proceeded in state, on the 24th ultimo, along the Royal line of route, from Buckingham Palace to the Houses of Parliament, for the purpose of closing the session in person. The weather, which had been gloomy all the morning, cleared up at noon, and the sun shone out cheeringly upon her Majesty and the numbers of her loyal and dutiful subjects who thronged the Park and streets leading to the entrance of the House of Lords commanding a view of the Royal procession. New and extensive arrangements had been made for the ceremony; the principal change being, that instead of the usual throne, a spacious platform or dais had been constructed, extending over the entire breadth of the chamber, and advancing considerably into the body of the House; covered with a beautiful Axminster carpet. Three massive chairs, splendidly inlaid with gold and covered with rich crimson velvet, were placed on the platform; the middle one larger, and raised on a pedestal about half a foot high; the right hand one surmounted at the back with a crown, and the Prince of Wales's feathers; the third surmounted by a crown only. Benches were placed on each side of the House before the throne, for the Bishops, Peers, Peeresses, the Corps Diplomatique, and the Ambassadors ladies. The Peers, who were not very numerous, were in their state robes: the Foreign Ministers glittered in gold-laced uniforms and orders; and about four hundred ladies, disposed in various parts of the House, lighted it up with the splendour of their dresses. About half-past one o'clock, the Commander-in-Chief entered, to a flourish of trumpets. It was observed that the Duke of Wellington stepped across, and cordially shook hands with the American Minister. The Lord Chancellor soon after took his place on the woolsack. At two o'clock, the Duke of Wellington and other Officers of State repaired to the robing-room; and the discharge of cannon and the cheers of the people announced the arrival of the Queen.

In a few minutes a flourish of trumpets ushered in the Royal procession, preceded by heralds, and headed by the Duke of Wellington bearing the sword of state; then came the Duke of Buccleuch, bearing the royal crown on a cushion; the Lord President of the Council, and the Earl of Shaftesbury, with the cap of maintenance; next the Queen and Prince Albert; succeeded by trainbearers, the Lord Steward, the Mistress of the Robes, the Lady in Waiting, the Lord in Waiting, and the other officers of the Household. The Queen wore a splendid tiara of pearls and diamonds, a superb diamond necklace, and a stomacher which was literally a blaze of diamonds. Prince Albert wore a Field Marshal's uniform, and a profusion of decorations. Both her Majesty and the Prince looked extremely well.

Her Majesty having robed, entered the House of Lords, and having taken her seat on the throne, directed the House of Commons to be summoned to the bar.

Shortly after the Members of the Lower House, headed by the Speaker, appeared at the bar.

The Right Honourable Gentleman addressed her Majesty on the labours of the session, after which the Royal assent was given to the remaining bills.

Her Majesty then, having received the copy of the speech from the Lord Chancellor, read that document as follows:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The state of public business enables me to close this protracted session, and to release you from farther attendance on your Parliamentary duties.

"I thank you for the measures you have adopted for enabling me to give full effect to the several treaties which I have concluded with Foreign Powers.

"I have given my cordial assent to the Bill which you presented to me for increasing the means of Spiritual Instruction in populous parishes, by making a portion of the revenues of the Church available for the endowment of additional Ministers.

"I confidently trust that the wise and benevolent intentions of the Legislature will be aided by the zeal and liberality of my subjects—and that better provision will thus be made for public worship and for Pastoral superintendence in many districts of the country.

"I view with satisfaction the passing of the Act for removing doubts respecting the jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland in the admission of ministers, and for securing to the people and to the courts of the Church the full exercise of their respective rights.

"It is my earnest hope that this measure will tend to restore religious peace in Scotland, and to avert the dangers which have threatened a Sacred Institution of the utmost importance to the happiness and welfare of that part of my dominions.

"I continue to receive from all Foreign Powers assurances of their friendly disposition, and of their earnest desire for the maintenance of Peace.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I thank you for the readiness and liberality with which you have voted the supplies for the current year. It will be my constant object to combine a strict regard to economy with the consideration which is due to the exigencies of the public service.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"In some districts of Wales the public peace has been interrupted by lawless combinations and disturbances, unconnected with political causes. I have adopted the measures which I deemed best calculated for the repression of outrage, and for the detection and punishment of the offenders.

"I have at the same time directed an inquiry to be made into the circumstances which have led to insubordination and violence in a part of the country usually distinguished for good order and willing obedience to the law.

"I have observed with the deepest concern the persevering efforts which are made to stir up discontent and disaffection among my subjects in Ireland, and to excite them to demand a Repeal of the Legislative Union.

"It has been, and ever will be, my earnest desire to administer the government of that country in a spirit of strict justice and impartiality, and to co-operate with parliament in effecting such amendments in the existing laws as may tend to improve the social condition and to develope the natural resources of Ireland.

"From a deep conviction that the Legislative Union is not less essential to the attainment of these objects than to the strength and stability of the Empire, it is my firm determination, with your support, and under the blessing of Divine Providence, to maintain inviolate that great bond of connection between the two countries.

"I have forborne from requiring any additional powers for the counteraction of designs hostile to the concord and welfare of my dominions, as well from my unwillingness to distrust the efficacy of the ordinary laws, as from my reliance on the good sense and patriotism of my people, and on the solemn declarations of Parliament in support of the Legislative Union.

"I feel assured that those of my faithful subjects who have influence and authority in Ireland will discourage, to the utmost of their power, a system of pernicious agitation, which disturbs the industry and retards the improvement of that country, and excites feelings of mutual distrust and animosity between different classes of my people."

COL. STODDART AND CAPT. CONOLLY.

A correspondent from Constantinople, in a letter dated the 7th of August, observes:—"We have hitherto refrained from repeating any reports of the probable existence of Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly in Bokhara. We have now, however, received from several sources particulars of so authentic a nature, that we feel ourselves authorised in calling upon the government to take some steps to ascertain whether they are still alive; and should such appear to be the case, to endeavour to liberate them from their present most unhappy position. The first reports, contradictory of the details forwarded by Colonel Sheil of their execution, were received simultaneously through Persia and India, from some merchants of Mushed and from a Jew trader in Affghanistan. Since these reports reached us, several Bokhara gentlemen of influence, now on their way to the Hadj, or pilgrimage of Mecca, have confirmed them; and a person upon whose veracity we place the most implicit reliance, has stated that he received a declaration to this effect, a short time ago, from two influential natives of Bokhara, at Damascus. It must be remembered that both the officers in question are government servants, and that their difficulties and dangers arose in the discharge of their duty. We can, therefore, scarcely doubt but that every exertion will be made to procure the release. Should government, however, decline to take the necessary steps, we trust, that the British army, and more particularly the Indian army, of which Captain Arthur Conolly was one of the most able and enlightened officers, will not be backward in raising subscriptions, and in tendering, if required, a sufficient sum for their ransom."

THE DOWAGER LADY ELLENBOROUGH.

We have to record the demise of the above venerable lady, who expired at her mansion in Stratford-place, on the evening of the 16th August, after a protracted illness, her ladyship having never entirely recovered from her serious attack last autumn. The deceased was widow of the late Lord Ellenborough, the learned lord chief justice of the King's Bench, and daughter of the late Mr. George Philips Towey. Her ladyship married Lord Ellenborough, 17th October, 1789, who died in December, 1818, so that deceased had survived her husband nearly 25 years. By her marriage with his lordship she had a family of thirteen children, nine of whom are living, namely, Lord Ellenborough, governor-general of India; the Right Hon. Charles E. Law, M. P. recorder of the City of London; the Hon. Mary, married to Lieutenant Colonel Dynseley, C. B.; the Hon. Elizabeth, Lady Colchester; the Hon. Anne, Lady Colville; the Hon. Henry Law; the Hon. Frederica, married to Mr. Henry James Ramsden; the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Tewry Law, chancellor of the diocese of Wells; and the Hon. Frances, Lady Dallas. The bishop of Bath and Wells, Lord and Lady Kilmaine, Mr. and Lady Elenor Law, Lord and Lady Colchester, Lord and Lady Colville, Sir Robert and Lady Dallas, and several other families of rank are placed in mourning by the death of her ladyship.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S VISIT TO THE "ELLENBOROUGH."

Yesterday afternoon the Governor General, desiring as he said, to "see his Godson," paid a visit to the Ellenborough, (Capt. Close,) where a select party was gathered together on board to meet him. His Lordship arrived a little after four o'clock, and was received with a salute from the guns of the vessel, the band playing, and the yards being manned with as fine a crew as we could ever wish to see on board a merchantman. After inspecting the accommodations of this noble vessel—visiting indeed almost every part of her—the great man was conducted to the cuddy, where a cold collation was laid out for the benefit of the assembled guests. His Lordship was greatly pleased with everything he saw; and, about five o'clock, left the Ellenborough to visit the Seringapatam Everything was in excellent condition; and the only thing we desired was the power to take our passage to England in the interior of the Governor General's Godson.—Hurkaru, October 14.

ILLICIT SHIPMENT OF EMIGRANTS.

To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.

Dear Sir,—There being some inaccuracies, arising no doubt from want of more correct information, in the report furnished in your paper of this day, regarding the "Illicit Shipment of Emigrants to the Mauritius," in the prevention of which, having taken an active part on the occasion referred to, I herewith subjoin a correct statement of the transaction.

On Saturday, the 30th ultimo, at about 10 P. M., while at the Botanical Gardens, where I had proceeded with a pleasure party, my attention was drawn to a human body, rapidly floating down with the stream, in the middle of the river, and observing no attempt made to save the person from an apparent watery grave, I questioned the boatmen of some dinghees luggaoed at the ghat, as to why they did not proceed to rescue, and was told, that there would be no good in doing so, as the body was that of a cooly, who had voluntarily jumped overboard from a ship, which was pointed out to me, anchored off the Gardens, to escape the hardships of an emigration to the Mauritius. On hearing this, I immediately, after a little time unavoidably lost, got into my own dingy, and proceeded to his rescue. This, however, was providentially effected by the crew of a fishing smack, before I could reach him, as he had, by this time, floated down to nearly opposite the Sperintendent's house. The man, or rather lad, was taken up almost exhausted, and on my arrival at the spot crawled into my boat, and fell clinging to my feet, stating, that he had been inveigled, and beseeching for protection, of which he was readily assured. The conduct of the people of the ship appeared heartless in the extreme; besides natives, some Europeans on board were looking on quite unconcernedly, and it is a fact, that it was only when I had neared the body, that the ship's boat was seen proceeding for the purpose of picking it up, or claiming the lad from me, which was repeatedly done by the boatman. On affording him my protection, and ere I had time to step into my pinnace, another cooly was seen throwing himself overboard; but was on this occasion speedily picked up by the men of the ship's dingy. The man, however, was taken up reluctantly and evidently against his inclination, for he dived down three successive times, when the oar was offered to him; but the love of life, natural to man prevailed, and he was ultimately dragged out of the water, placed in the dingy, and forcibly put into the ship. About half an hour after this, while I was employed in addressing a hurried pencil letter to the Chief Magistrate, bringing these circumstances to his notice, two Europeans, one of them a lad, pushed off from the ship and came along side my boat to claim the cooly I had sheltered; but as he imploringly entreated not to be given up, they were informed in answer to their repeated, and even pressing demands, that as the lad was unwilling to go, I would make him over only to the Police, and that I was then engaged writing to Mr. Patton. Finding their endeavors to procure him fruitless, they left me, and I, after having concluded my letter, despatched it a little after 11 o'clock, by a bearer on a fisherman's dingy. About 3 P. M. of the day, while in the Garden, I was accosted by two Police Constables, who informed me, that they had come by Mr. Patton's orders to institute enquiries, and liberate such of the coolies on board the ship, as were unwilling to proceed to the Mauritius. With them I proceeded on board, and witnessed the debarkation of between forty and fifty from their number. Even among those that preferred to emigrate, several, if not almost all, were clamorous of the hardship, and ill usage they had been undergoing, for twenty-five days on board the ship. Many among them were diseased, and some helpless, and delirious from fever; and in the number released, there is actually an insane woman.

In conclusion, too much praise cannot be given, for the promptitude and activity displayed by our worthy Chief Magistrate, Mr. Patton, in the cause of suffering humanity. Immediately on the receipt of my communication, I am told he drove off to the Bankshall, instituted some enquiry there, and ordered the quick despatch of the two constables above referred to, entrusted with stringent orders. Trusting you will give this letter or the substance of it, publication in your next issue, in its present, or a more condensed form, on the principle of rendering to "Cæsar that which belongeth to Cæsar"

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

Bhowanipore, October 10, 1843. J. H. MILLER.

THE COOLEY TRADE.

The crimping practice and forcible detention of labourers for the Mauritius, continue to be carried on by the dufadars with unabating zeal. Another case has just come to light, and is now under investigation before Mr. Blacquiere, the Magistrate. The circumstances are these: A Naeb of Jaunbazar Thannah was passing through Nilmoney Holdar's Lane, and as he was going on some private business he was unaccompanied by any Chowkeedars. As he came up to the old building in that locality known as Nilmoney Holdar's House, he observed two or three persons struggling with one man, who was endeavouring hard to get away, and protesting vociferously that he would not go on ship-board. The Naeb observing this, went up to them, and desired to know what was the subject of disagreement and violence. The three persons on this told the Naeb to go about his business, and not interfere in the matter, while they renewed their endeavours to get the individual they were struggling with, into the house. Seeing this, the Naeb lent his aid to rescue the latter, in which he succeeded after great difficulty, and not before he had put two of the assailants to flight. He then took into custody the third, and with him and the other person whom he had rescued, proceeded to the Thannah. It then came out that the man had fallen into the hands of some dufadars, who had kept him under restraint for several days, and were determined to send him to the Mauritius against his wish. He also stated, that there were about fifty persons confined within the house, and were intended to be put on board. In consequence of this information, the next day the Thannadar obtained a search-warrant from the Magistrate with which he proceeded to the premises in question; where, however, he found a few men only and not fifty, the most part of them having no doubt, been conveyed away to some other place of security, the dufadars taking fright at the transaction of the previous evening. The men found in the house were liberated, and they all gave the same story of having been decoyed away from the interior, under promises of handsome wages, &c. &c. The matter is undergoing careful investigation by Mr. Blacquiere.—Hurk. Oct. 16.

CHURCH AT BHAGULPORE.

At a Meeting of the Christian Community of Bhagulpore, held at the Government School House, on the 27th of September, 1843, for the purpose of consulting on the most eligible site whereon to erect a Church, the following proceedings transpired.

Major Napleton having been unanimously called to the chair, an appropriate prayer was offered up to implore the Divine blessing on the meeting. Mr. G. F. Brown then addressed the meeting to the following effect:—

"Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen.—You are all, I believe, aware how after repeated disappointments, our endeavours to obtain a Clergymen at this station were at last crowned with success, by the appointment of the Rev. Mr. MacCullum, to minister among us; which event took place not quite four months ago. To obtain this object, however, we had to make a pecuniary provision, not required of any other station in India; and the amount of this provision was so large, in comparison with our limited means, as to leave us no rational hope of being able to raise in addition, from among ourselves, sufficient funds for building a Church. The undertaking was indeed suggested to me more than once; but it appeared impracticable. And, besides, I considered that it would be unreasonable to ask any of the residents to contribute towards it, after they had subscribed to the utmost of their means for a Clergyman. Matters were in this state when the Rev. Mr. MacCullum sent me, on the 19th of July, his first surplice fee and asked me to keep it "as a beginning" towards a fund for building a Church. It soon after occurred to me, or rather I should say, it was put into my heart by Him from whom all good thoughts proceed,—that instead of sitting still, idly and despairingly, I might at least try to collect what little I could, from friends at a distance, in furtherance of the undertaking;—hoping that thus, by degrees and in a course of years, a sufficient sum for the purpose might eventually be realized. It was clear that so long as nothing was attempted, nothing would be done; and that it was a duty at least to try,—in reliance on the eternal truth of the promise, "ask and ye shall receive." With these feelings, I circulated the following

"PROSPECTUS FOR BUILDING A CHURCH AT BHAGULPORE.

"The station of Bhagulpore is situated in the centre of a large tract of country, extending from Berhampore on the East, to Patna on the West,—an expanse of 300 miles; within which lie the districts of Rajmahal, Maldah, Purneeah, Bhagulpore, Monghyr, and part of Tirhoot,—abounding in Christian Inhabitants, who have hitherto been without any stated Clergyman of the Established Church to minister to their spiritual wants.

"The Protestant Community of Bhagulpore having long deplored this state of things, endeavoured in vain to obtain relief;—till, after repeated efforts, and by guaranteeing the payment of a large sum of money, they have at last succeeded in obtaining an Ordained Minister from the Calcutta Diocesan Additional Clergy Society.

"This point having been accomplished, it is now obviously very desirable to build a Church; but as there are not funds sufficient for that purpose, the kind aid of all who favour the good cause is solicited. No arguments need be urged to recommend so excellent an undertaking to the support of Christian people; since it is not for mere personal advantage, nor even for mere public utility, but for the and therefore, in circulating the annexed subscription paper, it is hoped that all who see it will give according to the ability that God has given them. It is also earnestly solicited that none will withhold his assistance, simply because he cannot give a large sum, or so much as he could wish,—for the smallest contribution will be thankfully accepted. Bhagulpore, 22d July, 1843."

Mr. Chairman.—The circulation of this paper has been remarkably blessed. Instead of only three or four hundred rupees, which was the extent of my faithless expectations, the contributions up to the present time (scarcely more than two months from its first circulation) have amounted to as many thousands; besides the liberal donation of one thousand rupees which has been promised by the Trustees of the Church Building Fund in Calcutta.

In addition to this sum, contributions are expected to be shortly received from Poorneah, Tirhoot, Monghyr, Allahabad and Berhampoor; but the exact amount is not known. Thus it will be seen that we have, through God's blessing on our endeavours, been enabled within little more than two months, to raise a sum sufficient to warrant our immediately commencing the undertaking which we have in view; for I calculate that it will not require much more than has already been collected, to complete the building.

Having now put the Meeting in possession of the facts relating to the realization of the Funds, I beg to lay before them a Plan and Elevation of the proposed edifice, and to state that after considering the subject in all its bearings, I am of opinion, that the high spot of ground immediately to the Eastward of the Garden in front of the Jail, will be the most suitable site for the proposed Church; and I earnestly hope you will all concur in this opinion.

Mr. Brown having concluded his address, it was Proposed by Mr. H. C. Metcalfe and seconded by Mr. F. E. Reade, that the high spot of ground situated immediately to the Eastward of the Jail be chosen for the site of the intended Church.

Proposed, in amendment, by Dr. W. B. Webster, and seconded by Major Napleton, that a clear spot of ground in Mr. Johnson's compound, be preferred for the site, on account of its being more centrically situated.

Prior to these propositions being put to the vote, it was unanimously resolved, that the decision obtained by the majority of the votes of the present Meeting should be final, and subject to no after discussion.

The question was then put to the vote, and Mr. H. C. Metcalfe's proposition was carried by a majority of five voices.

Proposed by Mr. E. Lautour and seconded by Dr. Leckie, that the Plan of the Church now submitted by Mr. G. F. Brown, for the approval of the meeting be adopted.—Carried nem. con.

Proposed by Major Napleton and seconded by Mr. John Brown, that as Mr. G. F. Brown has succeeded in collecting so large a sum for the purpose of building the Church, the sole management and superintendence of the undertaking be vested in that gentleman.—Carried nem. con.

Proposed by Mr. H. C. Metcalfe and seconded by Major Napleton, that Trustees be appointed for carrying on the undertaking in the event of Mr. G. F. Brown's leaving the station before its completion.—Carried nem. con.

Proposed by Dr. Leckie and seconded by Mr. H. C. Metcalfe, that Major Napleton, Mr. Reade and Mr. Lautour be the Trustees for the above named purpose; and that in the event of either of the three leaving the station, the remaining two be fully empowered to elect another in his place.—Carried nem. con.

Proposed by Mr. G. F. Brown and seconded by Major Napleton, that the grateful thanks of this Meeting be offered to the Trustees of the Church Building Fund, as well as to the subscribers in Calcutta, and at the different stations in the Upper and Lower Provinces, for having so liberally contributed Funds for building the Church.—Carried nem. con.

Proposed by Mr. Lautour and seconded by Major Napleton, that a vote of thanks be given to Mr. G. F. Brown, for his exertions in the cause.—Carried nem. con.

Proposed by Mr. H. C. Metcalfe and seconded by Mr. Lauteur, that the thanks of the Meeting be voted to Major Napleton for his able conduct in the chair.—Carried nem. con.

The Meeting then broke up, having first expressed its sense of the goodness of God, in providing funds for the erection of a Church at the station, and solicited His blessing on the proceedings of the morning.

On the——of Asouj (?) of the year 1,900, Sirdars Lena Singh and Ajeet Singh, Sindhanwallah, went to announce the muster of their troops to Maharajah Shere Singh of Lahore, who was in the garden of Shah Belaval. The Sirdars were accompanied by a number of Seikhs and other troops, that being the day of the Suncrat, (or the 1st day of the Hindoo Solar month,) and the same being kept as a holyday at the durbar, the Maharajah had gone to the garden to amuse himself on the river, and to enjoy the fresh air. As my elder brother (Akhwan Saheb) was sitting in the Garden, the Sirdars Ajeet Singh and Lena Singh presented themselves, and offered a case, containing a rifle, to the Maharajah. While engaged in examining the rifle Ajeet Singh drew forth a pistol and fired at him. My elder brother was wounded in the face by the pistol being discharged so close to him; and the faithless men instantly struck off his head. Several Sirdars were killed at the same time, amongst them Sirdar Bhood Singh, Gunga Singh of the Toshuk-khanah, &c. Afterwards Sirdar Lena Singh, Sindhanwallah, went accidentally to the garden of Sum-sam-ood-dowlah Tej Sing Bahadur Suftur Jung, situated near the garden of Shah Belaval, and there killed the son of my elder brother, Pertab Singh, who was celebrating the day there and bestowing charity, and beheaded him. They then proceeded towards Lahore, and on the road met the Oojul-dee-dar Neermul-Mudde-Mookur-rub-i-Bargah-Khas-ool-Khas-Wuzeer-i-Azeem Dustoor-Manzam-Naib-i-Sultanut-Oosma-Kheir-Khwah-Dowlut-i-Koobra Mookhteear Kul Rajah Kalan Behadur Rajah Dhyan Singh-Jee, (the clear, the pure in sight, the high-praised, the nearest to the throne, the great Sirdar, the great Wuzeer, the deputy of the Kingdom, the chief well-wisher, the wealthy, Master of all, the great Rajah, Rajah Dhyan Singh) who was coming alone in his buggy. The Sirdar said to him that there was a row amongst the Seikhs in the garden, that Maharajah Shere Singh had been killed, that it would be dangerous to go alone to the garden, and that it would be better to go back and make arrangements about the succession. The Rajah, ignorant of the wicked act of the Sirdar, complied, and accompanied the Sirdar to the fort. They proceeded as far as the Kureeanee gate, when the faithless Ajeet Singh took out his pistol and fired it towards Rajah Dhyan Singh. The Rajah called out, oh Sirdar what a foul deed, and laid his hand on his sword. By this time some followers of Ajeet Singh also fired pistols at Dhyan Singh who fell from his horse; his body was taken to the place where guns were made, and here one of his attendants, named Ahmed Khan, was also killed. The Sirdars then proceeded to make arrangements regarding the succession; on proceeding into the city they approached the house of Khas-ool-Khas Rajah Soochet Singh, who was reviewing such of his troops as were at hand, and accompanied by the following Chiefs, viz. Oojul-dee-dar-Neermul-Mudde-Assud-ood-dowlah Rajah Heerah Singh Bahadur, Oojul-dee-dar Neermul-Muddee-Rae Kesseree Singh, Deena Singh and Prithee Singh and others. These persons were discussing the subject of Maharajah Shere Singh's death, and having heard of the murder of Dhyan Singh, rose from their seats and proceeded to the Boodhoo Barradurree, and there communicated the facts to the troops of the Khalsa. The troops were loud in their murmurs, and protested they would not sit down to a meal until they had served the faithless Sirdars in the same manner as had been done to the Maharajah and his son. The city was accordingly besieged towards the evening, and having opened a heavy fire, they destroyed the walls of the city. The city was taken, and the heads of the faithless men carried to the Sirdars. Now thanks to Providence (Sri Akal Pooruekjee) the Sirdars have succeeded in establishing peace and quiet in the town. Proclamations have been issued to all Sirdars and officers of every description confirming them in their government and situations. (The perwanah then goes on to impress on the Vakeel the necessity of representing to the Sahib (the Political Agent we presume) that the State remained in exactly the same position in regard to the British Government as before the death of His Highness Maharajah Shere Singh).—Delhi Gazette, Oct. 7.

BOKHARA.

All commercial intercourse between this State and Affghanistan having been prohibited by the Sovereign, in consequence of his apprehensions that the merchants would be plundered on their way to Kabul, he found that a great diminution in his revenue had accrued from the non-payment of custom's dues. He therefore authorized the departure of a Kafila, which was so richly stored with goods, that the amount of duty paid on its arriving at Kabul was 10,000 Rupees. Dost Mahomed Khan has previously frequently written to Ghoolam Kadir, and Moolla Budder-ood-deen, two of the chief merchants at Bokhara, and both very rich, enquiring why they had not brought their goods to the markets of Kabul as they formerly used to do; they candidly replied, they were apprehensive that Dost Mahomed might seize their property, as his character was well known. —Delhi Gazette, Oct. 7.

HERAT.

Two Suwars, of the Barrikzye tribe, reached Kabul lately, and brought information that Yar Mahomed Khan has written to the King of Persia to send troops to occupy the town, and been assured in reply by the King's Minister, that no time would be lost in complying with his wishes, and that an army would soon be before Herat. The Minister desired also, that the stores of grain might be laid in by Yar Mahomed for the use of the Persian army. He intimated at the same time that an army would shortly be directed to move on Kandahar, in conformity with the agreement subsisting between the King of Persia and the Sirdars of that town. Yar Mahomed still continues his trade in slaves, selling all the women and children he can seize, to the Oosbegs, taking horses for exchange.—Ibid.

KANDAHAR.

The Sirdars have addressed letters to the Ruler of Khelat, informing him that as the King of Persia had treated them with great consideration during the time they were banished from Kandahar, and had supported them with much kindness for some years, they had agreed with him that, whenever they should regain possession of the city of Kandahar, they would again permit an Envoy from Persia to reside there with an escort of one thousand Persians, who would no doubt inspire both the English and the Seikhs with a due degree of awe. They had also agreed to pay the expenses of the mission, but as their own income was limited, they now wrote to say, that as his (the Khan of Khelat's) dominions were so near to Kandahar, and as he would profit by the presence of this force (which is represented as being near at hand) he ought to contribute towards the expenses from his revenues. "You, (the Khan,) formerly paid tribute to the English, how much better to contribute the same amount to the maintenance of the Persian mission, instead of paying it to the Kaffirs." —Ibid.

LAHORE.

The French General Chevalier Court having taken leave of the Maharajah, has left Lahore for France; he reached Ferozepore on the 27th Sept., and thence proceeds to Loodhianah, where he is expected on the 3d instant. It is supposed he intends proceeding to Simah, to seek an interview with the Lieutenant Governor. The troops ordered to seize the families of Sirdars Lena Singh and Ajeet Singh and put them to death at their place of residence, about 5 koss from Umritsir, executed their commission. They, however, brought away a son of Lena Singh's aged about 9 years, and on his being taken before Rajah Heera Singh, he had pity on him, ordered that he should not be put to death and allowed him 5 Rupees a day for his subsistence. An evident coolness, amounting to open enmity, has arisen between Rajah Heera Singh and Rajah Soochet Singh, his uncle, and it is impossible to say how it may end. The troops of the Sirdars Lena Singh and Ajeet Singh have appointed the kinsmen of those chiefs to command them, and the villagers of Ajeet Singh's Jagheers, who have been mercilessly plundered, have taken refuge with these troops, and as their numbers are considerable, some 6 or 7000, it is thought probable they may excite tumult and opposition; for to use the words of the Persian poet, "the man, who is careless of his life, can perform whatever he chooses to undertake."—Ibid.

LOODHIANAH.

Colonel Richmond, Agent to the Governor General, arrived here on the 24th Sept. from Simla, and Mr. Greathed proceeded to Ferozepore. The Agent has issued stringent orders to prevent any armed parties from crossing the Sutlege either to or from the Lahore territories. The whole of his native subordinates are greatly pleased with the conduct of Col. Richmond and of Lieut. Cunningham. Two or three news-writers have been sent to Lahore by the Agent to gather all the information they can get. Kishen Chund, Vakeel of the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, arrived suddenly from Lahore by dawk; but the object of his visit is not known. He is supposed, however, to be the bearer of a letter from the Maharajah, communicating the latest events, and soliciting assistance from the British Government. Ittaree Singh, Sindhanwallah, who had placed himself under the safeguard of his Gooroo, Vikrama Singh, having heard of the order to seize him, escaped from his place of concealment, and succeeded in reaching Khetrie in the province of Putteeallah. The suwars sent to seize him having heard of his escape followed him to Khetrie and secured his person. The Jemadars of the place, however, turned out to resist his capture and rescued him, saying, they would not permit him to be taken a prisoner without the permission of the Rajah of Putteeallah.—Delhi Gazette, Oct. 7.

LAHORE.

We this morning received the following letter from our active news-writer at Loodhianah, and lose no time in making the contents known, as we believe their authenticity may be relied on. Who can doubt the absolute necessity of interference in the affairs of a frontier nation in such a state of utter disorganization as that now presented in the Punjab?

Loodhianah, 5th October.—A Hurkaru has this moment arrived from Lahore, in 24 hours, with information that Rajah Heerah Singh and Sirdar Lena Singh, Majeetea, were sitting together and consulting about appointing to jageers and situations. Their conversation was, however, soon converted into a dispute and ended in a personal encounter, in which Rajah Heerah Singh fell before the Sirdar. Rajah Goolab Singh is 20 koss from Lahore, with an army of 25,000 men. He will, it is supposed, immediately proceed to Lahore and attack Lena Singh. The latter and General Ventura have coalesced, at least such is the report of an attendant of General Court, who arrived here the day before yesterday.—Delhi Gazette Extraordinary, Oct. 8.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

The Baptist Union.—The annual report of the Baptist Union for 1843 contains very full and excellent statistics of the denomination; we are not aware whether any other denomination publishes a view of its state and operations equally complete. It appears from this report that the number of Baptist churches in Great Britain and Ireland is 1,677: of these, 1,418 have reported their numbers to the Union, and they comprise 131,272 members: 1,141 report Sunday-schools containing 143,027 children. The reported clear increase of members during the last year was 9,639, in 1,274 churches.—Pat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Royal Commission of Fine Arts.—The Commissioners have issued an invitation to artists to send in specimens of fresco painting, for the decoration of the new Houses of Parliament. They have also issued similar invitations for arabesque paintings and heraldic decorations for the enrichment of panels, friezes, &c., in colour and gold, as well as for designs for ornamental metal work for screens, railings, gates, &c. and, lastly, for ornamental pavement.—Pat.

The Late Lord Sydenham.—Mr. Poulett Scrope, in the memoirs of his brother, Lord Sydenham, just published, tells an agreeable anecdote of his childhood, which is worth extracting. He was at Brighton in 1803, with his brothers and sisters, and attracted the notice of George III., always fond of pretty children:—"The King became so partial to Charles (Lord S.), then not quite four years old, that he insisted on a daily visit from him, often watched at the window for his arrival, ran down himself to open the door to let him in, and carried him about in his arms, to show all that could amuse the child in the very ordinary lodging house then occupied by the royal party, and especially the suppers laid out for the children's balls, which their Majesties frequently gave for the amusement of their young favourites. On one occasion, the King being on the pier-head, about to embark in the royal yacht upon one of his sailing trips, and having the child in his arms, he turned round to Mr. Pitt, who was in attendance at his elbow, having probably hurried down from London for an audience on important business, and exclaimed, 'Is not this a fine boy, Pitt! Fine boy, isn't he? Take him in your arms, Pitt; take him in your arms: charming child, isn't he?' Then suiting the action to the word, he made the stiff and solemn premier, weighed down, as he seemed to be, with the cares of state, dandle and kiss the pretty boy, and carry him some minutes in his arms, albeit strange and unused to such burden. The circumstance, though trivial, had so comical an effect, from the awkwardness and apparent reluctance with which the formal Minister performed his compelled part of nurse, as to make an impression on the writer, who stood by, though but seven years old himself, which time has never effaced."—Ibid.

The Aristocracy and their Servants.—The Court Gazette says—"The stewards and housekeepers of the nobility often make large fortunes at the expense of their masters. We have known 20, and even 50 per cent. offered to them by tradesmen, as a remuneration for getting the custom of their employers. How can this be made up except by plunder? We know of entertainments given below stairs, in some of the squares, more costly (if not more select) than those given in the drawing-room. The lady of a prime minister (whom we shall not name) told us that the whole of the aristocracy were the slaves of their servants. "I cannot offer you any refreshment," said she; "but I dare say there are hot pheasants and champagne in the steward's room."—Ibid.

Demolition of Abney House.—Those of our readers who have any curiosity to see the house in which Dr. Watts passed so large a part of his life, and the apartment which was his study, must make haste, or the opportunity will be lost. Abney House is destined to be broken up, and will be brought to the hammer preparatory to demolition on Wednesday next. In the mean time it may be viewed by any person who chooses to jump into a Stoke Newington omnibus for that purpose. The building is to be removed in order to make way for another entrance into Abney park Cemetery. The new entrance will exactly face the elegant little chapel of the cemetery, and will much enhance the beautiful appearance of these spacious grounds.—Ibid.

We are sorry to have to announce the death of Mr. John Bacon Sawrey Morritt, of Rokeby-park, Yorkshire, who died on the 12th inst., after a lingering illness, in the seventy-second year of his age. He was one of the earliest and most extensive Greek travellers of the present generation, and after two years spent in the interesting countries of the East, he returned with a mind replete with classical information, and a taste for every liberal art. It was during his residence abroad that Bryant promulgated his fanciful theories on the site of Troy. On his return with Chevalier and others, he entered keenly into the Trojan controversy, and became one of the most successful supporters of Homer, and able vindicators of his location of the Troad. His two dissertations are familiar to every classical scholar, and went as far towards the settlement of that "vexata questio" as any of the productions of the period. He published also translations from the minor Greek poets, and was the author of articles in the Quarterly Review, and of pamphlets called forth by the passing events of the day.—Record.

Dr. Pusey, Canon of Christ Church, and Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University of Oxford, is the second son of the late Hon. Philip Bouverie (who assumed the name of Pusey), by lady Lucy Sherard, eldest daughter of Robert, fourth Earl of Harborough, and widow of Sir Thomas Cave, Bart. Dr. Pusey's eldest brother is Philip Pusey, Esq., of Pusey, M. P. for Berkshire, the eminent agriculturist. Dr. Pusey was born in June, 1800, and married June 12, 1828, Maria Catherine, youngest daughter of the late John Raynard Barker, Esq. Mrs. Pusey died May 26, 1839, leaving an only daughter. Dr. Pusey entered at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1818, and took a first class degree in literis humanioribus, Easter Term, 1822; he was afterwards elected a Fellow of Oriel College. In 1828, Dr. Pusey was appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew in that University, to which office is attached a canonry in the Cathedral Church of Christ, Oxford. In 1824, Dr. Pusey obtained the Chancellor's prize for Latin composition, the subject being Coloniarum apud Græcos et Romanos inter se comparatio. The family of Pusey, is of great antiquity, having been settled at Pusey, in the county of Berks, prior to the Conquest. The family estate is held by cornage, under a grant by Canute, a fact mentioned both by Camden and Fuller. The horn is that of an ox, of a dark brown colour, and by its production the manor was recovered in the reign of James II.—Pat.

Complete Suffrage.—In the annual report of the National Complete Suffrage Union, recently published, we find it stated, that the postage correspondence during the year cost nearly 50*l.* At this rate, the Union must have circulated about 10,000 letters and papers, no doubt all bearing more or less on the great question of progressive reform. Whatever difference of opinion may prevail amongst Reformers as to the justice or expediency of Complete Suffrage, it must be interesting to know that so much has been done by the Union in this one department alone, to bring its principles and objects under public notice.—Ibid.

Deputation to the King of the Belgians.—On Wednesday, July 5, a deputation, consisting of the following gentlemen, had the honour of an interview with King Leopold, to present the address adopted at the late Peace Convention, "to the Governments of the civilized world," on the importance of inserting a clause in international treaties, binding the parties to refer disputes to the arbitration of one or more friendly Powers:—Lewis Tappan, Esq., of New York; Thomas Fowler, Esq., banker, of London; Rev. John Woodwark, of Tonbridge Chapel; and Rev. John Jefferson, Secretary of the Peace Society. The deputation was introduced by Dr. Bowring, and most graciously received by his Majesty. The King expressed in strong terms his approval of the principle of arbitration; and referred to the satisfaction which he had experienced in being employed as mediator in some cases where the danger of war had appeared. He spoke of a continental war as above all things to be deprecated, and regarded it as all but impossible so long as Austria, France, and England were united in favour of peace. His Majesty also referred to the threatened war in the east of Europe, and to the dispute between France and the United States respecting the payment of a sum of money, as instances in which the remonstrance and friendly interference of other Powers had led to the most satisfactory results.—Ibid.

Rumoured Royal Visit.—According to an unauthenticated report, Queen Victoria, with her Consort, will come to Berlin in the autumn, to return the King's visit. Should this be the case, Berlin would be as animated in autumn as it is now dull in summer.—Hamburg Paper, July 18.

Arrival of the Missionary Ship Camden.—Our readers will be gratified to hear of the safe arrival of this vessel from the South Sea Islands, having on board, as passengers, the Rev. Thomas Heath, with a native chief and a native teacher from the Samoas; a son and daughter of the Rev. A. Buzacott; four daughters of the Rev. J. M. Osmond; one son and two daughters of the Rev. C. Barff; one son and two daughters of the Rev. J. Rogerson; and a son of the Rev. W. Day; also Mrs. Morgan (the wife of the respected commander), and two children. The Camden came up the river last night, and is now lying at the London-dock.—Pat.

The Steel Regimen.—Lancashire is about, it is said, to become "the principal military depot of the kingdom." Government has just entered into a contract for the erection of barracks at Manchester, at a cost of 100,000*l.*, for the accommodation of 2,000 infantry and 2,000 cavalry. Extensive barracks are also in progress of erection at Ashton, Bury, and other towns; and when the whole are completed, it is said there will be permanent accommodation in Lancashire for an army of twenty-five thousand men. It is also said to be in contemplation to erect barracks sufficient for the accommodation of a large army at Halifax, in Yorkshire. Leeds is on the outskirts of the manufacturing district, and the troops stationed there are supposed to be too much out of the way to be of much use in the prompt suppression of any rebellion or insurrection, which might chance to break out in the country. Halifax is nearly in the centre of the manufacturing population of Yorkshire, and it will be there, most probably, where the barracks for the accommodation of the Yorkshire army will be erected.—Leeds Times.

Conservative Apprehensions.—The apparently endless debates in the House of Commons on the state of Ireland become more and more saddening. It has been impossible to follow that which is still proceeding, without an undefinable fear of some impending calamity. This feeling arises from a succession of most mischievous speeches made by professed "Conservatives;" and from a consciousness of their probable influence on the decisions of the Government. The Tractarians in the House of Commons all mingle in this deluge with the greatest zeal; and all take the side of Popery. This will surprise no one who remembers that so long back as seven years since, when the British Magazine was the chief Tractarian journal, a letter was published which seriously advocated the junction of the Romish and Protestant Churches in Ireland. In agreement with this notion, we find Mr. Monckton Milnes and Mr. Smythe warmly asserting the necessity of opening diplomatic relations with the Pope, paying the priests, &c. &c. With these chimes in Captain Rous, the disgrace of the Conservative electors of Westminster, who apparently knows little difference between Protestantism and Mahometanism, and who decides the question by rule of three;—"If 800,000 Protestants have a Church endowed with 500,000*l.* a year, what endowment ought 6,000,000 of Papists to have?" The chief object of interest, however, is, not so much the follies of these (mostly juvenile) legislators, as the tone of the leader of the Government, amidst this distracting and harassing "cross-fire." And the speech of Sir Robert Peel on Tuesday evening was far from being of a satisfactory character.

The Premier had to deal with two recommendations, which had been urged upon him in the course of the debate: the first, to share the revenues of the Irish Church between the Protestant clergy and the Romish priests; the second, to leave the Church as it is, but to take the priests into pay, by a grant from the Consolidated Fund. With the first of these recommendations he dealt sagaciously and practically; but upon the second he maintained an ominous silence.

The sharing the revenues of the Established Church between the Protestant clergy and the Romish priests, was well shewn by Sir Robert Peel to be a project fraught with insuperable difficulties. Were the priests to have a smaller, or even an equal share? That would be instantly complained of as grossly unjust, between 800,000 on the one part, and 6,000,000 on the other. Was the division to be governed by the numerical strength of the Churches?—That would give 80,000*l.* per annum to the Protestant Church; 60,000*l.* to the Presbyterians; and 360,000*l.* to the Papists! And what, then, was to be done with the Churches, which in many cases would be deprived of their present incumbents? The Protestant bishops, too, had seats in the House of Peers;—were the Romish bishops to have the same privilege? These and many other practical difficulties made the idea of a partition quite preposterous.

We should have been glad, however, if Sir R. Peel had not rested his opposition to this proposal so exclusively on "practical difficulties."

To the other plan, however,—that of taking the priests into pay,—Sir Robert did not oppose the same objection. Nay, he avoided even giving a negative opinion;—professing to think that it would not be fitting for him to make any declaration on such a subject, "in the course of an incidental debate."

It is impossible to observe this faint resistance, without feeling a degree of apprehension that there is a lurking disposition in favour of the proposition. Yet it seems strange, that so sagacious a man in worldly matters, does not discern at least as many "difficulties" in this path as in the other.

Can any man believe that the opposition of the Dissenters and Methodists, which recently proved so alarming to the Government, in the matter of the educational clauses, would be less vigorously manifested against a proposition to tax the country some 300,000*l.* a-year for the payment of a set of priests, nominated, located, and governed by an Italian bishop? Or can there be a doubt that this opposition would be strengthened by the adhesion of all the Protestant part of the Church of England? In fact, would not the disgust which would be felt by this latter party, constituting, as it does, no mean portion of the "Conservative" body, render the downfal of the Administration absolutely certain? Is it possible that so cautious a politician as Sir R. Peel can overlook these attendant dangers?

We fear, however, that on such questions as these, none but a sincere and earnest Protestant can even discern the truth or the facts of the case. It is the want of any just understanding of the immense difference between the religion of the Breviary and the faith of the Scriptures that leaves men, sagacious on all other points, to fall into the most fearful errors on this.—Record, July 13.

Ireland.—On Friday, a debate was brought on in the House of Lords by the Marquess of Clanricarde's motion relating to the recent dismissal of Magistrates in Ireland. The noble Marquess spoke at great length upon the general question of Irish affairs, and maintained that the existing agitation was attributable to their inattention, as a Legislature, to the material and real wants and exigencies of the people.

The Repeal of the Union, he said, could it be accomplished, would be the greatest misfortune that could befal either England or Ireland; but, if they meant to keep up the Imperial influence, they must go on improving the condition of Ireland. The Duke of Wellington, in opposing the motion, justified the past conduct of Ministers, and said: "All that the Government has to do, is, to take care to be prepared to resist the consequences of the present state of things,—to do all in their power, all that their wisdom and foresight can suggest, to protect persons and property, and to be prepared for the worst that may happen." With regard to any new measures, the noble Duke said, he knew of none that could be adopted, which would have the slightest effect in remedying any of the evils or inconveniences complained of; more particularly as it appeared that, whether Ireland remained peaceable or not, depended absolutely on the will of one man. His Grace moved the adjournment of the debate for six months.

The Earl of Clancarty blamed the supineness of Ministers, and said, that the speech of the noble Duke, though marked by his usual firmness, was not calculated to inspire confidence. The Earls of Mount Edgecumbe, Glengall, and Charleville spoke in the same strain of dissatisfaction, and called for more vigorous measures to suppress the agitation. Earl Fortescue said, that, if Government had deemed Repeal meetings illegal, proclamations for their suppression ought to have been issued, and obedience to such proclamations enforced. He expressed his gratification at learning that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any coercive measures. He must confess, that he considered the great grievance of Ireland to consist in the present state of the Protestant Church. It had always been his opinion, that the existence of a Church so disproportionate to the numbers of the people, was not only a calamity, but a scandal to the country. He should be glad to see the two Churches of Ireland put upon an equality—to see them both nationally attached to and paid by the State. With respect to other points, he could not help feeling that "property has its duties as well as its rights." One of the duties of the possessors of that property was undoubtedly to care for the well-being of their tenantry. In furtherance of this end, he should strongly advise that the extensive clearance of estates should be speedily made the subject of Parliamentary consideration, with a view to legislative measures.

Lord Wharncliffe defended the conduct of Lord Chancellor Sugden and the inaction of Ministers. The Marquess of Lansdowne supported the Resolution, and called on Ministers to reconsider their opinions, with a view to devise some measures for the benefit of a country which, in its present state, was a disgrace to the Government that presided over it.

Lord Brougham delivered one of his characteristic harangues, warmly defending the conduct of the Irish Lord Chancellor, but deprecating coercion—deprecating even proclamations, followed, as they must be, by prosecutions, and by a dispersion of such meetings by the military. But what was to be done? The noble and learned Lord "had a duty to perform;" and that was, to advocate the policy of providing some means for the spiritual instruction of the Roman Catholics—that is, of taking their spiritual instructors into the pay of the State. Such an offer, it was said, would be spurned. "My Lords," continued his Lordship, "a friend of mine, well known to your Lordships, had a conversation with a Roman Catholic Prelate, which I will relate. My noble friend said to that Right Rev. Prelate, "Bishop, we are thinking of making a State provision for the Roman Catholic Clergy, what do you suppose they will say to it?" The Prelate replied, "Every man of them, from the highest to the lowest, will strenuously and by all means give to such a proposal the most decided opposition." "But," said my noble friend, "suppose we carry it, what will then be done?" The Prelate said, "Then every man, from the highest to the lowest, will instantly and gratefully receive it."

Lord Campbell followed, and contended that the dismissal of the Magistrates in Ireland was unconstitutional. The Lord Chancellor repelled this charge with some vehemence, and expatiated on the dangerous and seditious character of the Repeal meetings. Lord Cottenham gave his opinion, that the conduct of the Irish Government was not sanctioned by law, and was most unconstitutional in its character. After a brief reply from the Marquess of Clanricarde, their Lordships divided: Contents, 29; Non-contents, 91; majority, 62.—Pat.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—It is stated, that the Right Rev. Dr. Carey, Bishop of St. Asaph, has lately placed in the hands of trustees the munificent sum of 20,000*l.* for the benefit, after the death of his Lordship and Mrs. Carey, of students elected from Westminster School to Christ Church, Oxford.—Record.

NAIL MAKING.—The wages of a woman in Dudley for manufacturing 1,200 round-headed hob-nails, are 5½d.; these are made with a hammer weighing 1¼lb. Each nail receives twelve blows before it is completed, and consequently, the poor woman has to raise the enormous weight of 18,000lb. in order to earn that small sum.—Birmingham Advertiser.

THAMES TUNNEL.—Up to Thursday the number of passengers through the tunnel, from its opening as a thoroughfare—a period of little more than fifteen weeks exceeded 1,000,000.—Record.

MR. BAIN'S ELECTRICAL TELEGRAPH.—In the former notice of the improvements effected by Mr. Bain in his electrical telegraph, we communicated his discovery that the circuit of a voltaic battery may be completed, by the earth as a conductor, from any points however distant. We then anticipated that the next step would be the application of the air as a conductor for the return current, so that earth and air might call and respond to each other from all quarters of the globe. Mr. Bain has, however, shown that he can do more than this. He has converted the globe itself into a constant voltaic battery, and proved that it may be rendered the means of carrying on instantaneous correspondence through the earth. This result was the sequence of the previous discovery; for, having ascertained that the moisture of the earth is sufficiently conductive of the electric current of a voltaic battery, he infered that, by placing a plate of copper and a plate of zinc under ground, and connecting them with an isolated wire, an electric current would be formed. The experiment was tried in Hyde Park, with zinc and copper plates placed a mile asunder; and with complete success. This discovery made, it was already applied to simplify and work the electric telegraph. A single wire, connected with a copper plate at one terminus and with a zinc plate at the other, is now all the electrical apparatus required. The principle on which the telegraph operates with this simple self-acting battery is this:—At each terminus there is a corresponding apparatus, with series of wheels like clockwork, which are set in motion by powerful springs or weights: this apparatus is so contrived, that when the hand of a dial is stopped at any letter marked thereon, that letter is printed on paper; the hands on the dials at each station adjusted alike; therefore, when set in motion and stopped at the same instant, the hand of each dial will point to and print the same symbol. Electrical agency is required only to set the apparatus in motion: this it effects, whenever the voltaic connexion is broken, by deflecting a coil of wire, which action removes a stop; the instant the voltaic circuit is renewed, the machinery ceases to act. The communications may thus be carried on for any time with great rapidity; the symbol indicated on one dial being indicated on the other instantaneously, however far apart. As the velocity of electricity is immeasurable; and as the conducting power of the earth is without stint, there appears to be no assignable limit to the action of this terrestrial voltaic telegraph. Should the Lords of the Admiralty conclude satisfactorily their pending negotiation with the patentees for the construction of a telegraph on this principle between Portsmouth and London, the copper sheathing of the guard-ship in Portsmouth harbour would form a magnificent negative plate for the actuating battery; the positive pole of which could be supplied by the water tanks at the Admiralty, the space between them constituting an earthenware cell, on a large scale. These curious results of scientific navigation are probably capable of many other and even more important applications than Mr. Bain at present contemplates. To military men, for example, it may suggest the idea of applying the galvanic agency of the earth to the means of impregnable defence against invaders, by converting the Islands of Great Britain and Ireland into gigantic torpedos. It is well known, that instant contact with a few plates of metals differently oxidizable will melt the hardest rocks and convulse the strongest animals; who then can calculate the effects when all the copper and tin in the bowels of Cornwall combine with the iron of Wales to produce a never-ending succession of shocks?—Spectator.

ROBBERY ON A RAILWAY.—Information was given on Wednesday, at the Leicester station, by a lady, of a robbery that had been committed upon her whilst travelling along the London and Birmingham Railway. The lady in question was on her return to Leicester, when, upon feeling for her ticket, she found that she had been robbed of 40*l.* An express engine was immediately despatched to Rugby, where it was ascertained that the party suspected had taken a ticket for Hampton, and from thence to Derby, at which station he took another ticket for Rugby again. The engine continued its course, and came up with the train at Loughborough, following it to Leicester, where an examination of the passengers took place, and the lady identified one of them as her late fellow traveller, whereupon he was forthwith searched, and the whole of the missing property was found upon him. The lady believes that the robbery was effected in Kilsby tunnel.—Record.

THE BIRDS AND BROUGHAM HALL.—Now that these intruders have been expelled from Lord Brougham's mansion, steps are taking to bring them to justice for the outrage; and a warrant having been issued by the Westmoreland magistrates against one of the party, named John Bird, who resides at Ashton-under-Lyne, the warrant was transmitted, on Thursday, to Mr Beswick, our chief Superintendent of Police. Having ascertained the residence of the party, Mr. Beswick sent Inspector Green to execute the warrant: and this was done on Thursday evening. The prisoner was taken before James Lord, Esq., at Ashton, on the following day, when bail to the amount of 200*l.* was taken for his appearance at the next Westmoreland Assizes.—Manchester Paper.

Earl Ducie's splendid demesne in Gloucestershire was knocked down to Mr. Rhodes, the solicitor, of Davis-street, for one hundred and fifty thousand guineas. We have not yet heard whether it was actually sold. The auction-room was densely crowded by all the moneyed world, and it is said that Mr. Holford and the Baron de Rothschild were, by means of their agents, the principal competitors.—Evening Paper.

The first excursion for the season, from London to Southampton by the railroad, round the Isle of Wight in a steam-vessel, and back to London by the railroad, in the space of thirteen hours and some few minutes took place on Tuesday.—Record.

DESCRIPTION OF FATHER MATHEW.—He was dressed in a plain suit of black, with a white handkerchief adjusted round his neck in the form of a cravat. His upper garment, enveloping nearly his whole person, was a long frock coat, reaching below his knees, and partly hiding from view his bright "exterior" black boots. He is a man of middle stature, inclined to corpulency, possesses an extremely mild and somewhat ruddy countenance, and has a prominent nose. His hair—which was formerly dark, and is now becoming grey—hangs in irregular locks, and constitutes the only feature of his person indicative of advanced years, his physical energies still retaining all the elasticity and vigour of rising manhood. His appearance, altogether, is humble and prepossessing. His visage is intellectual; his forehead rather high and capacious. In all his movements he manifests the enjoyment of the most benevolent disposition. His manners are simple and unassuming; and the kind and hearty reception which he gives to all who approach him, whether brought into his presence through curiosity or respect, is such as strikingly manifests him to be a true philanthropist, whose love and affection for his fellow-men overstep the narrow sphere of benevolence in which moves the mere kindred, party, or sectarian benefactor. Hitherto his least recognised excellence by Englishmen has been as a public speaker; but his addresses at Leeds, York, and other parts of England, prove that in this capacity his merits have not been duly understood or appreciated. His voice is mostly shrill and feeble, and his speeches, in general, are simple as his attire; they are always short, pointed, and harmonious—often clothed in interesting similes, drawn from surrounding or familiar objects, and invariably appropriate and well selected. His addresses, however, are never distinguished by the gaudy ornaments of rhetoric; their elegance and force are more consistent with the language natural to an enlarged, fervid, and virtuous heart, than with a studied nicety of arrangement, or a lofty figurative style. Many public speakers are more eloquent—most more tedious; yet few are more sincere, pleasing, and effective, and fewer in all things more charitable. Such is Father Mathew, the moral regenerator of Ireland.—Leeds Mercury.

FATHER MATHEW IN LONDON.—On Monday morning considerable interest was excited in the East end of the metropolis, it having been publicly announced that the above celebrated individual would make his first public appearance in his character of Teetotal apostle in the British metropolis, in order to administer the pledge of total abstinence to such persons as were willing to take it. The spot selected for the occasion was a large piece of ground, upwards of two acres in extent, situate opposite the George Inn, Commercial-road East. About ten o'clock Father Mathew arrived on the ground in an open carriage, accompanied by his two Secretaries, Messrs. O'Meara and M'Kenna, headed by a procession of several hundred Teetotallers, bearing wands and a number of banners, and bands of music, followed by a vast concourse of people. There were upwards of ten thousand persons assembled, on the ground to receive the Reverend Father, and he was greeted with three hearty cheers. A large platform was erected at the west end of the ground, capable of holding about 400 persons, which was crowded with ministers of every denomination, and gentlemen, who were to take part in the proceedings. Father Mathew commenced his address, by urging the necessity of adopting the total abstinence principle, and showing at great length the beneficial effects which had already taken place in his own country, and calling upon those present to come forward and receive the pledge. Several other speakers also addressed the Meeting, after which Father Mathew began administering the pledge, and hundreds immediately came forward and received it at his hands, and continued doing so until four o'clock, when the Right Hon. the Earl of Stanhope arrived on the ground, and commenced an address to the people. His Lordship said, that he had for many years adopted the principle of total abstinence, and found it beneficial to himself, and, having done so, could recommend with the greatest safety, its adoption to others. He concluded by saying he should feel it a great honour to receive, at the hands of Father Mathew, renewal of his pledge. His Lordship then, followed by about 100 persons, chiefly of the working classes, received the pledge from the Teetotal apostle, amidst much cheering. The great portion of the persons who received the pledge during the day were Protestants. Among the recipients were a number of elegantly-dressed females. Father Mathew was engaged up to eight o'clock in administering the pledge, up to which time considerably more than 5.000 persons had taken it. The remainder of this week is to be dedicated to the same purpose, at the same place.—Morning Paper.

Father Mathew, Earl Stanhope, and the Total Abstinence Pledge.—On Tuesday morning, the Rev. Father Mathew, assisted by the advocates, paid and unpaid, of the Total Abstinence people, resumed his labours, in the Roman Catholic Cemetery, in the Commercial-road East; the people again assembled in immense numbers. Many speeches were made during the day; those delivered by Earl Stanhope and Father Mathew were good, but the best speech of the day was made by a private soldier in the Grenadier Guards, who took the pledge, and whose language was really eloquent and made a deep impression on his hearers. The orations of the other speakers were common-place, and sometimes outrageously extravagant, yet they had the effect of inducing many persons to take the Total Abstinence pledge from Father Mathew. After the pledge had been administered to twelve batches of about 100 each, Earl Stanhope addressed the multitude, and exhorted his hearers to entirely abstain from all intoxicating drinks, and follow his example, and take the pledge. The Noble Lord was very warmly cheered at the conclusion of his speech, and he again addressed the people and said that he did not merit those cheers, but Father Mathew did, and he cried out, "Join with me in giving that good man such a cheer as shall be heard in Hyde Park." This appeal was responded to by the people, who rent the air with their shouts. Father Mathew then came forward. He said he had no sectarian objects in view. Though a Catholic priest, he had been received in the most cordial manner by clergymen and lay members of the Established Church: by Wesleyans, Dissenters, Quakers, ay, and even Jews; and he administered the pledge to millions of all sects. The people of Yorkshire, where he had administered the pledge to upwards of 100,000 persons, wished to pay him for his services, and presents were offered to him from persons of wealth and high standing in society, but he refused to accept of a farthing. He had expended 300*l*. of his own money since he had been in England, but he did not regret it, and if he had been disposed to favour himself and family, he should not have been a temperance advocate, and converted millions of his own countrymen from drunkenness to sobriety. A brother he dearly loved was the proprietor of a large distillery in Ireland, the bare walls of which cost 30,000*l*., and he was compelled to close it, and was almost ruined by the Temperance movement in that country. The husband of his only sister, whom he also dearly loved, was a distiller, and became a bankrupt from the same cause. (Hear, hear.) He was sorry to speak of those things, but when he was accused of being instigated to do what he had done to enrich himself, he felt compelled to deny the charge. It had been also intimated that he was making a large profit by the sale of medals: he never profited a shilling, and never would. He concluded by exhorting the people to come forward and take the pledge, "Come forward, my friends, Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen, and join in taking the pledge to abstain from that which has been the cause of so much crime and misery in this beloved country. Come forward, all of you, and kneel down: don't be ashamed, my friends, to do it publicly; several ladies and gentlemen have condescended to take the pledge with you; come forward, my friends, and follow the example of that good nobleman, Earl Stanhope, who took the pledge with his more humble fellow-countrymen and countrywomen on this ground; come forward and take the pledge, and you will never have cause to regret it." Upwards of 200 persons made their way through the crowd, with the assistance of the police, and answered Father Mathew's appeal by taking the pledge kneeling, in which they were joined by a number of well-dressed persons, who descended from the platform for that purpose. Among those to whom the Total Abstinence pledge was administered was a clergyman of the Established Church, several medical gentlemen, a gentleman connected with the College of Civil Engineers, a number of ladies, and other persons of respectability. The proportion of English was greater than on Monday. Upwards of 50,000 persons visited the ground on Tuesday. The conduct of the vast multitude was of the most orderly description.—Record.

Newspaper Statistics.—It appears, from last return made to Parliament, that there are at present 138 newspapers circulated in London; the yearly circulation of which amounts to 36,271,020 papers, and the advertisement duty amounts to 48,179*l*. 10*s*. There are 214 English country papers in circulation, the total yearly sale of which amounts to 16.857,000 papers; showing that, though the number of journals considerably exceeds the number in London, the yearly circulation does not amount to half of the circulation in the metropolis. The yearly amount of advertisement duty on the country papers is 49,766*l*. 18*s*. In Scotland there are at present 18 papers in circulation, nearly one-fourth of which are published in Edinburgh; and it is worthy of remark that, notwithstanding the wealth of that city, there is not one daily newspaper published there. The yearly amount of circulation in Scotland is 1,478.940, and the advertisement duty is 12,595*l*. 12*s*. In Wales there are 10 papers in circulation, the highest of which averages only 1,500 per week. The circulation of the rest is uncertain, sometimes rising to 10.000 per month, and sometimes falling to 1,000. The total yearly circulation is 88.000, and the advertisement duty is 305*l* 18*s*. 6*d*. There are 25 papers circulated in Dublin, the yearly sale of which amounts to 3.366.406 papers, and the advertisement duty is 4,599*l*. 8*s*. There are 58 Irish country papers, the yearly circulation of which is 2,435,068, and 12.000 supplements. The advertisement duty amounts to 3,686*l*. 16*s*.—Pat.

The Head-Quarters of Puseyism.—To regain her place as one of the great centres of European learning and philosophy, to vindicate her title as more than a mere place of education to the young men of England for the various professions, or for the sports and occupations of a country gentleman's life, as rather one of the well-heads of intellect for England and the world; thus, which ought to be her true vocation, seems totally lost sight of. With all her activity, Oxford is daily becoming more and more a mere school of theology, and is so forfeiting every pretence to the name of a university. In medicine she is and has been nothing; in law, since the days of Blackstone, it has been the same. Natural history and natural science, in spite of the zeal and ability of their professors, meet with little encouragement. Modern history may be said to be on its trial; but at present no one can undertake the extent of knowledge on this point. Political economy seems to the eyes of the world more flourishing; the publications that issue from its professors would do credit to any university; but we understand that lectures, which have been read with interest in Germany and America, were delivered to audiences of eight or ten persons. Logic, though attracting more attention, is confessedly at a low ebb. Comparative philology, in which such vast advances have been made elsewhere, is there almost unknown. Theology and its concomitants absorb nearly the whole industry of Oxford: on that one subject the energies of her most powerful intellects are perpetually, unremittingly concentrated; and even those who observe this exclusiveness, and who deprecate it, feel their own minds affected by the influence of the surrounding atmosphere. We need not say that the one favourite pursuit is far from thriving under such treatment. When one branch of education is cultivated with excessive pains, and the rest are comparatively neglected, it seems hardly possible that the one selected should be prosecuted healthily.—British and Foreign Review.

The Queen's Bench Prison.—The nephew of Lord Denman, who, as was stated in the Record of Thursday, was on that day to have entered on the duty of Governor of this prison, has, as yet, declined to do so, and will, it is supposed, give up his appointment. The situation was originally worth 1,800*l*., but the salary is now reduced to 800*l*. a year. Mr. Chapman continues for the present to fill the office. His retiring pension will be 1,000*l*. a year.—Record.

A Relic of the Clan Colquhoun.—Died on Inchlonaig, Loch Lomond, in the house in which he was born nearly a century before, Robert Colquhoun. When seven years old he was taken into the service of Sir James and Lady Colquhoun, and for the last few years of his life it used to be his proudest boast, that he had served four of the chieftains of Colquhoun, his fealty descending unimpaired from sire to son. When the sun and snows of seventy years had rendered him less able for active duty, he requested to be allowed to end his days in the rugged and romantic island of his birth. Dear to the old Highlander's heart was this lone isle. Its rocks are shadowed by the finest yew-trees, which in ancient times supplied the country with bows—the loch around it is deeper and more blue. The island is also celebrated among the clan as having been the scene of an interview between the chief and Rob Roy, which ended on their being on the best terms ever after. The funeral of the old man, sublime in its very simplicity, was truly characteristic of himself: the little fleet of boats all abreast, keeping solemn time with their oars, on their way to the church-yard of the picturesque village of Luss, where, surrounded by the mountains he so often climbed, quietly reposes this faithful servant of the chiefs of Colquhoun.—Edinburgh Weekly Register.

The Adjournment of the University of Oxford to Ilfracombe.—The Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, the Rev. Dr. Jelf, and the Rev. Dr. Pusey, have determined on visiting that delightfully romantic watering-place, Ilfracombe. The visit of Dr. Pusey has been delayed in consequence of ill-health. Already several tutors with their classes of pupils are sojourning there. Ilfracombe has for several years past been the choice summer retreat of the heads of houses of Oxford. Dr. Jelf was there last year for several months; and so pleased was he with his trip, that a house is now engaged for him, where he is expected in a few days. It is four or five years since the Vice-Chancellor's last visit.—Sun.

The National Debt.—The Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, having certified to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, in pursuance of the Act 10th George IV., c. 27, sec. 1, that the actual expenditure of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland exceeded the actual revenue thereof, for the year ended the 5th day of April, 1843, by the sum of two millions four hundred and twenty-one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five pounds, fourteen shillings, and one-half penny.

The Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt hereby give notice, that no sum will be applied by them on account of the sinking fund under the provisions of the said Act, between the 7th day of July, 1843, and the 10th day of October, 1843

S. Higham, Comptroller-General.

National Debt-office, July 7, 1843.—Pat.

New College in Ireland.—A new college, in which young men, members of the Established Church, will receive instruction on the plan pursued in the English universities, has been established at Stackallan, in Ireland, and will be opened with the usual ceremonies on the 1st of August. The college is dedicated to St. Columba. The governors have already founded five scholarships, which will be held, cæteris paribus, by the sons of the clergy, with a preference to those who are acquainted with the vernacular of the Irish language. His Grace the Archbishop of Armagh, the Primate of all Ireland, has consented to become the visitor of the college, and the following noblemen and gentlemen have been appointed governors:—The Earl of Dunraven; Viscount Adare, M. P.; Mr. A. S. O'Brien, M. P.; the Very Rev. Henry Cotton, D. C. L., Deane of Lismore; the Rev. R. C. Ebrington, D. D., Regius Professor of Divinity in Trinity College, Dublin; the Rev. J. Hawthorn Todd, D. D., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin; and the Rev. W. Sewell, B. D., Fellow and Subrector of Exeter College, Oxford. The following appointments have also been made:—Warden, the Rev. Robert Corbet Singleton, M. A.; Professor of Greek, the Rev. Matthew Morton, B. A.; Professor of Latin, the Rev. Henry Tripp, M. A.; Professor of Mathematics, the Rev. Robert King, B. A. The remaining arrangements will be made in the course of the present month.—Ibid.

The Missionary Gutzlaff, in China, has ascertained that the art of constructing buildings of cast iron has been practised for centuries in the Chinese empire, he has found on the top of a hill, near the town of Tsing Kiang Fou, a pagoda entirely composed of cast iron. It is covered with bas-reliefs and inscriptions, which, from their forms, characters, and dates, show that they are as old as the dynasty of Tang, which was upon the throne as far back as from the fifth to the tenth century of the Christian era. It is in the shape of an octagon pyramid, is forty feet in height, and eight feet in diameter at the base. It has seven stories, each containing extremely curious historical pictures. Mr. Gutzlaff represents this monument as being strikingly elegant, and surpassing in this respect every thing of the kind he had previously seen in China.—Ibid

Revolutions in France.—There will be fifty-four years complete on to-morrow, the 14th of July, (says the National), since the Parisians destroyed the Bastille. Upon the place which it occupied there has been since raised, in honour of another revolution, a column surmounted by the Genius of Liberty. But it is a sad fact to announce, that should any citizens wish to celebrate the glorious anniversary by proceeding there to salute the names inscribed on the column of July, they may see there still a monument of another nature, raised on the very spot where the Bastille threatened Paris. Under the modest name of a guard-house there is at present constructed on the bank of the canal a real citadel, which commands the great street of the Faubourg, the Rue St. Antoine, and the line of the Boulevards. This small fort, built in cut stone, loop-holed, and surrounded by iron palisades, is capable of containing a numerous garrison, and will isolate the Faubourg, and replace to advantage for an oppressive authority the former Bastille. This fort will form an advanced work for the intrenched camp at Vincennes against Paris. The men of '89 ought to be much surprised to see how their sons are treated, and how they submit to such treatment.—Record.

The Expiatory Chapel of Sablonville.—

The plan of the expiatory chapel of Sabloiville is that of a Greek cross, the upper end occupied by the altar, dedicated to the Virgin. In one of the sides of the cross is the chapel dedicated to St. Ferdinand, and in the other a statue of the Duke of Orleans, in the dress of a general officer, and in the position in which he happened to be at the moment of his death. Above the head of this figure is placed an angel, kneeling as if in prayer, sculptured by the Princess Mary. The reclining figure is by M. Triquetti, after a design from the pencil of M Ary Scheffer. On the principal front of the sarcophagus is represented France in the form of a genius in an attitude of grief, bewailing the loss which she had sustained. The French flag lies at her feet. On the walls of the chapel are the Prince's cipher. There are ten windows in the building, all adorned with stained glass, representing fourteen saints, seven at each side of the grand altar. The three circular arches of the roof are ornamented with statues of the three theological virtues: Faith being placed over the entrance, Charity at the side of the chapel of St. Ferdinand, and Hope in the part of the cross occupied by the figure of the dying Prince. The chapel, in the Byzantine style, is surmounted by a stone cross. The works have been executed in an exceedingly short time, six months having scarcely elapsed since the formalities of the purchase of the ground were terminated. The compositions of the windows are by M. Ingress. The piece of ground surrounding the chapel is planted with trees, room being left to allow carriages to turn round. In front of the chapel a residence has been prepared for the officiating ecclesiastic.—Record.

A TREASURE.—There has just been discovered in the ground excavated for the Northern Railroad, between St. Leu d'Esserens and Montalaire, a girdle of solid gold, wrought to imitate a cord, having a hook at each end. The weight of this object is 342 grammes, and the gold is valued at 880f. It was found within two feet and a half of the surface, and no other article was discovered near it. M. Haubigant, Member of the Council-General of the Oise, paid the workmen handsomely for giving it up to him, with a view to having it deposited either in the Museum of Beauvais or the Bibliotheque Royale of Paris. It is supposed to belong to the Gaulish period, about Julius Cæsar's time.—Ibid.

The Courrier de Lyon states that water-pipes made of thick glass, covered with a coating of bitumen, and made to insert into each other with bitumen joints, are being manufactured at Rive de Gier. These pipes will, it is asserted, bear a higher degree of pressure than those of cast-iron, and are thirty per cent. cheaper.

The Augsburg Gazette states from Athens, June 21, that a communication had been received there from London, in the name of the three protecting Powers, to the effect that the proposed reductions in the public expenditure are not considered sufficient. It is added that in consequence of this representation further reductions are to be made.—Ibid.

PRESENTATION OF THE PEACE MEMORIAL TO LOUIS PHILIPPE, KING OF THE FRENCH, &c. &c.—The Memorial to the Governments of the civilized world, adopted at the General Peace Convention lately held in London, on the importance of nations agreeing by treaty stipulations to settle their disputes by a reference to umpires mutually chosen, was presented to the King of the French on the 20th instant, by a deputation, consisting of Messrs. G. C. Beckwith, Thomas Cock, Amasa Walker, and J. R. Willis, from the United States of America; and Rev. William Touse, of Paris, one of the officers of the Society of Christian Morals, the Marquis de la Rochefoucauld Liancourt being necessarily absent. His Majesty gave the deputation a very gracious audience, and assured them he was very happy to receive such a communication. He said he felt a great interest in the subject, and had certainly done all he could to preserve peace in Europe. "Peace," said his Majesty, "is what we all want Thank God! war now costs too much to be often waged; and I trust the day is coming when we shall get rid of it entirely in the civilized world. His Majesty spoke of arbitration as an excellent substitute for war, alluded to several instances of its successful application, and remarked, how perfectly consistent it was in those cases with the dignity of the parties concerned. On other points relative to the subject of peace, the King expressed himself very freely in terms highly gratifying to the deputation, and promised to take the subject of the memorial into favourable consideration.—Pat.

The Moniteur announces that "the Count De Survilliers (Joseph Bonaparte) and M. Levie Ramolino had terminated by a compromise the lawsuit instituted by Madame Letitia (mother of the Emperor) to set aside a donation made by Napoleon in favour of his uncle Ramolino. The Count De Survilliers admitted that the donation ought to be respected, being the expression of the last wish of his brother. On his side, M. Levie Ramolino consented that the house in which Napoleon was born should cease to be a private dwelling, and assigned it to the chief of the Bonaparte family, in order that the latter should give to it a destination conformable to the wishes of the entire population of Corsica."—Pat.

ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.—At a meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris on Wednesday, M. Arago made a communication of the steps that have been taken towards the great work of the cutting through the Isthmus of Panama, which has been so long talked of, but which many persons have regarded as chimerical. According to this communication, a contract has been entered into by Messrs. Baring and Co., of London, with the Republic of New Grenada, in virtue of which the republic is to cede to them the line required for the projected canal, with 80,000 acres of land on the two banks, and 400,000 acres in the interior of the country. Messrs. Baring and Co. had, it is said, in the first instance, fixed the amount of toll for the navigation of the canal at the exorbitant price of 18f. per ton, but they have reduced it to 8f. The work, upon which from 4,000 to 5,000 men are to be engaged, is to be completed in five years.—Ibid.

RUSSIA.—A French Paper publishes a letter from St. Petersburgh of the 20th ult., stating that Prince Dolgoroucki, the author of a pamphlet on the Russian nobility, which gave offence to the Emperor, had been arrested immediately on his arrival at Cronstadt, and placed in solitary confinement. After a month's detention in the house of General Benkendorff (the chief of the Imperial Police), the Prince having said nothing in his book nor in his interrogatories to justify a prosecution for libel, the Emperor offered him permission to enter the military service. The Prince having declined to accept an employment contrary to his taste and literary occupations, the Emperor caused him to be transported to Wiatka, on the confines of Siberia, where he is to remain under the surveillance of the police. Although the work contained no direct or indirect attack against the Government of his country, the friends of the author had advised him to remain abroad until the Emperor, being better informed of the circumstances of the case, should judge him with less prejudice; but the Prince, full of confidence in the purity of his intentions, took immediately a passport for St. Petersburgh, and on reaching Berlin wrote a letter to his Sovereign, in which he protested, in the most respectful terms, his devotedness to his Imperial person.—Record.

EAST RUSSIA, MAY 12.—The complaints of the German inhabitants of the Russian Baltic provinces of the measures of the Government affecting their language, nationality, and religion, have been of late so numerous and urgent that they justly excite the attention of all Germany. When the Russian Government endeavours to establish in Poland its system of assimilation, it has a pretext for doing so,—it attempts at least to justify its policy by alleging that Poland has forfeited its right by the revolution; that the measures prescribed are necessary to maintain peace and order, and to suppress the revolutionary spirit; but when it follows a similar mode of proceeding in the Baltic provinces, it has not the shadow of a justification. The Germans in these provinces have always been among the most loyal subjects of the Russian Crown. The empire is indebted to them for immense benefits; they first introduced civilization among the half barbarous people, they were the founders of commerce and manufactures, they called useful institutions and public education into existence, they organized the internal administration. Russian policy, worked with their speed, filled the civil offices, diplomatists were their pursuits, and the highest offices of State are still filled by Germans. The Baltic provinces have on this account been not improperly called "the head" of Russia. Former sovereigns gratefully acknowledged these great merits of the Germans, and endeavoured to attach them to their interest by extraordinary privileges, among which are those the express object of which is to protect their nationality by liberties such as no other province or town in the Russian empire enjoyed. All this the present Government seeks to do away with; but it seems to forget two things; 1st, that the Germans can no more become Slavonians than the Slavonians Germans; and 2d, that if they were to do so, all the peculiarities of character which now elevate them above the Slavonian population would be lost. In Poland the system of assimilation may under the present circumstances have some success, because the affinity of the two races exercises its influence in drawing them together. But the German element will never blend with the Slavonian, which, both intellectually and morally, is so far behind it. For the same reason the Panslavonian dream, which would prophesy to the Slavonian the supremacy over Germany, will never be realized. The German element is tough as the German oak. The passively energetic opposition of the German in the Baltic provinces may convince the advocates of Panslavonianism that there are bounds which the greatest power cannot pass.—Allgemeine Zeitung, June 1.

TEXAS.—On Wednesday, the 12th inst., the following memorial and resolutions, in reference to the present state of the Republic of Texas, were presented to the Earl of Aberdeen by a deputation of the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-slavery Society, composed of Messrs. George Stacey, John Beaumont, Robert Forster, Josiah Conder, John Scoble, and the Rev. J. H. Hinton, accompanied by Lewis Tappan, Esq., of New York.

The deputation were most courteously received by the noble lord, and not only assured of the lively interest he took in the subject, but of the intention of her Majesty's Government to use their influence, so far as it could honourably and legitimately be done, in promoting the great object proposed in the documents presented.

If the authorities and people of Texas be wise, an opportunity is now afforded them of redeeming the character of their country from the opprobrium under which it rests, and will continue to rest, so long as slavery curses its soil; and of laying the foundations of its future peace and prosperity broad and deep.

"TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF ABERDEEN, &c. &c.

"My Lord,—The position in which the Government of this country has happily taken in relation to the great question of human freedom is such as to warrant the expectation of the people of Great Britain, and of the civilised world, that whenever or wherever its influence can be legitimately exerted to advance it, that influence will be promptly and efficiently put forth. It is on this ground, the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-slavery Society solicit your lordship's serious attention to the remarkable state of things at this time existing in the republic of Texas, which they are firmly convinced present an opportunity, such as never occurred before, for the extinction of slavery, and which, if properly and promptly seized by the Government of this country, cannot fail to lead to the happiest results.

"Whatever opinions may be entertained with regard to the severance of Texas from Mexico, and the relations established between these republics and this and other nations, it must be conceded that its situation, natural resources, and institutions, render it a country of great importance to the whole of the human family. If it continue to be a slave state, the hopes cherished with regard to the speedy extinction of slavery would be greatly depressed; should it, on the contrary, become a free as well as an independent state, those hopes would be realised in the extinction of that giant evil, and consequently of the slave-trade in those parts of the Western world where it now unhappily prevails.

"Recent intelligence, from various quarters, show that the present embarrassed state of Texas, arising from its difficulties with Mexico, its financial perplexities, the depressed prices of its produce, &c., have forced upon its inhabitants a discussion of the question, whether the alarming state of things under which they suffer may not be remedied, and the prosperity of the country permanently secured, by the voluntary abandonment of the system of slavery, and the adoption of a constitution insuring freedom to all. The enterprising and intelligent portion of the Texan community appears to be aware, that unless some change is effected, immigration, which has already subsided, may entirely cease; and that they will be utterly unable to bring the vast resources of the country into profitable use. Their attention is consequently directed to the consideration of such measures as they apprehend may relieve their country from its desperate condition. Annexation to the United States is one of the measures contemplated. This, it is said, will enhance the value of the land, induce immigration of planters with their slaves, and create a new market for the slaves reared in the slave-breeding portion of that country. Another measure proposed is the abolition of slavery. This, it is argued, would invite the hardy yeomanry of Europe and the free states of America, and give even greater value to the land, and stability to its institutions. It is scarcely necessary to suggest to your lordship that these are questions of the highest interest not only to the people of Texas, but to the friends of freedom and peace throughout the world.

"With respect to the annexation of Texas to the United States, the Committee would deprecate that as one of the greatest evils that could befal the human race, inasmuch as it would serve to ensure the extension and perpetuation of slavery in both countries. But they are not without hope that this catastrophe may be prevented, by the timely interposition of the British Government, as there are indications, not less striking than cheering, of a great movement in Texas in favour of liberty, which, if now judiciously strengthened and encouraged, will lead, they believe, to its triumphant establishment.

"Supposing this important point gained, the people of this country, and the friends of free institutions throughout the world, would regard with feelings of the liveliest interest the tide of immigration of free settlers which would then rapidly flow into Texas. Such a population, carrying with them the blessings of freedom, civilisation, and religion—rapidly increasing in number, and as rapidly developing the resources of the country—would prove not only of immense commercial value to this country, but to the world at large; and in advancing its own prosperity and greatness, Texas would then eminently promote the freedom and happiness of millions now held in bondage, and add to the general progress and welfare of mankind.

"It must, however, be confessed, that while the discussion of this question is going on in Texas, an influential portion of the slaveholders of the United States,—many of whom possess lands in that country, now of but nominal value,—are making a renewed, vigorous, and desperate struggle, in unison with that part of the people of Texas whose interests lie in the same direction, to have it annexed to the United States, either by legislative enactment, or by the more summary mode of treaty.

"In reference to this point, the Committee feel it to be their duty to apprise your lordship that facts have come to their knowledge which afford grounds for serious apprehension that unless the British Government speedily interpose with Texas, either directly or through Mexico, to relieve its people from the overwhelming pressure of the present difficulties, the event so much dreaded may occur. The Committee presume not to suggest to your lordship how the influence of this country should be exerted; but they would fail in the duties imposed on them by the anti-slavery body of this country, as well as in the discharge of their obligations to humanity, and to the God of the oppressed, if they did not respectfully and strongly urge an immediate consideration of this weighty subject, in all its important bearings, on her Majesty's Government, believing that they have it in their power to aid Texas, in freeing itself from the curse of a system which has blighted its prosperity, and ruined its prospects, and of establishing a state of things which would ensure its future strength and prosperity.

"Nor do British philanthropists stand alone in these views. At the late Anti-slavery Convention, embracing the representatives of the sacred cause of human freedom from various parts of the world, the contemplated annexation of Texas to the United States was viewed as an evil of the greatest magnitude, which ought to be strenuously resisted by all the friends of justice and freedom throughout the world; and that the feeling now prevailing in that country in favour of free institutions, ought to be encouraged by the British Government and people as a great duty they owe to mankind. In accordance with these views, and the increasing feeling of the people of this country on the subject, the attention of your lordship is earnestly invoked to its early consideration; and the Committee would cherish the expectation, that it may result in such efficacious measures as will redound to the honour of her Majesty's Government, and the fame the nation has acquired by its past efforts for the suppression of slavery and the Slave-trade.

"I have the honour to be,
"On behalf of the Committee, my lord,
"Your lordship's obedient humble servant, (Signed) "THOS. CLARKSON.

UTRECHT, JUNE 3.—Yesterday evening, about eight o'clock, a meteoric stone fell in the commune of Blaauwkapel, about a league from this city. After a violent explosion, repeated three or four times, resembling a discharge of artillery, a whistling and howling noise was heard, which excited much anxiety and alarm among the villagers. It weighs seven pounds, is of a longish irregular shape, and covered with black crust peculiar to these bodies, which is broken off only in one place, where the internal grey matter of the stone appears.—Record.

FREE-CHURCH BUILDING-FUND.

THE COMMITTEE feel called on to express their very grateful sense of the liberal manner in which their appeal for aid in the erection of a "FREE CHURCH" PLACE OF WORSHIP IN CALCUTTA—has already been responded to by the Christian public. They would at the same time beg to remind their Friends that the sum hitherto collected, is scarcely one half of what will ultimately be required on the most moderate scale to accomplish the end in view—in a metropolitan locality—where labour is high—and the value of land, relatively, exorbitant.

But the Committee are persuaded that one generous, strenuous effort of Christian beneficence, is all that is needed to attain the object desired.

The result of that effort will be permanent and great, the erection of another House for the service and worship of God in Calcutta—the effort itself but single and transitory, and even where greatest, will soon cease to be felt.

Nor let it be overlooked by those Catholic friends who take a special and deep interest in the Free Church MISSIONS, how much the local resources of those missions must ultimately depend on the Church status, which they may be enabled to secure in this place—and that nothing here can tend more to their consolidation, than the erection of a Church in connexion with that National Body, to which the missions themselves now stand ecclesiastically related.

The Committee of the FREE-CHURCH BUILDING-FUND, renew therefore their appeal, under these circumstances, with greater earnestness than hitherto. They are much encouraged in doing so, by being able to announce that more than one of their earliest subscribers, have already doubled their original Donations impressed with the views now respectfully urged on the Christian public in general.

Communications may be addressed to either of the Secretaries, the Rev. J. Macdonald and J. Calder Stewart, Esq., at the Presidency; also to E. G. Fraser, Esq., Allahabad; and D. McIver, Esq., Agra.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

A LADY of high respectability and accomplishments, residing in a healthy part of the Coast of Kent, wishes to receive four Girls to board and educate with the advantage of living in a private family. The Lady is a mother, and having been for some years in India is well acquainted with the treatment for young persons of delicate constitutions. If desired too, she would have no objection to take charge of one or two little Boys up to 7 or 8 years old, in any case where parents were unwilling to separate brothers and sisters. The terms will be moderate varying according to the age of the pupil, but always for a specific sum annually, including extra charges of every description.

Cards of address, and other particulars will be given by the undersigned, and parties writing Home may communicate with Messrs J. Cockburn and Co., No. 11, New Broad-street, London.

NICHOL, WILKIE AND CO.

The Punjab.—Last week the Delhi Gazette announced that the days of Heera Singh had been cut short by Lena Sing, a chieftain who is not without power and influence in the Punjab. That paper announces this week the death of Golab Singh. How far these announcements may be supported by subsequent intelligence, cannot at present be known, but the spirit of violence which seems to have been let loose on that country gives them a strong appearance of probability. If Golab Sing has been cut off, the possessions held by his family in the Jumboo hills will probably be wrested from them, as their administration has been so oppressive, that nothing but the presence of a large and well disciplined army, commanded by a man of such ability and courage as Golab Sing, has been able to prevent a general insurrection. The kingdom of Runjeet Sing appears to be on the eve of dissolution; the bonds of government are relaxed; the various provinces will soon be dismembered; and every chief who can muster a force will aspire to independence. This anarchy will smooth the way for the establishment of a strong and beneficent Government such as Britain is prepared to plant in that region, as soon as the time for this event is mature. These mutual conflicts will not only serve to weaken the parties who might otherwise have raised a formidable opposition to our entrance, but so harass the people as to make our interposition, and the tranquillity which must follow it, particularly welcome in their eyes.

The British Government will not of course interpose at this stage of the business. The chiefs of an independent country, like the Punjab, have an undeniable right to cut each others' throats without our officious interference. Lord Ellenborough can' have no pretence for sending a British Army across the Sutlege as long as no inroads are made, into our own territories, and no combination is formed inimical to our interests. Though the course of circumstances is gradually and inevitably tending to this result, yet until an actual demonstration of hostilities has been made, we must and shall remain within our own limits. It is not improbable however that the confusion which is growing up in the province of Mooltan may render interference a duty. Some time back, a petition was presented at the Court of Shere Sing by Sawun Mull, the governor of that province, stating that a number of its turbulent chiefs were anxious to assist Shere Mahomed, the fugitive Ameer of Scinde in an attack on our newly established authority in that kingdom. The answer was such as might have been expected from one who knew that any encouragement of their views would be followed by an unpleasant visit on the part of our troops to Lahore. Sawun Mull has now been murdered. The Delhi Gazette says that Shere Mahomed himself is actually in the province of Mooltan. If he be not, he will of course proceed thither with all speed; and, as the public authority at the capital is paralized by repeated treachery and murders, and all control over the unruly spirits who were anxious to join him has been removed, it is very probable that a hostile force may be assembled in that province with a view to disturb Scinde. This would lead to remonstrances with the Durbar at Lahore, which would of course be unable to afford any satisfactory assurances; and it would become necessary to secure possession of Mooltan—not with a view to the ultimate conquest of the Punjab, but simply for the preservation of our new possessions in Scinde.

The Commander-in-Chief, was not expected to reach Cawnpore much before the end of October. The Army of Exercise, has been officered in the last Calcutta Gazette, and there is every reason to believe that its chief exercise will be upon other ground than our own. It is said that the new authorities at Gwalior are determined rather to stand to arms than yield to the demands of the Governor General; and that they have been taking steps for re-organizing the Pindarees, whom it cost us so much labour to put down twenty-five years ago. In either case, the Army of Exercise will be turned into an Army of Occupation; and we sincerely hope that with the ensuing winter the independence of that state, which has ceased to be advantageous either to the rulers, or the people, will have ceased.

Cooly Emigration.—It was said of Cromwell that he would allow no one to do injury to England but himself, and our contemporary of the Star seems resolved that the present system of Cooly emigration shall be censured by no paper but his. His journal was the first to sound the alarm of incipient abuses, at a time when those journals which had been loudest in crying down the old system were apparently unconscious of the danger. The denunciations of the Star wore an appearance of peculiar impartiality from the warm advocacy of the system of Cooly emigration which had previously appeared in its columns. We have carefully gone over the successive animadversions of our contemporary, and find that there is little substantial difference between them, and the article published in our last number, which he censures somewhat severely. Indeed we question whether our representation of the abuses of the present system are not feebler in character and less likely to be effectual than those which have appeared in that journal. While writing this article, our eye has fallen on the Anti-Slavery Reporter of the 9th August just received, in which we find the following editorial remark: "In another part of our paper will be found an extract from the Calcutta Star, brought by the last overland Mail from India, on Cooly Emigration, from which it will appear that already abuses have become so manifest as to obtain for this species of emigration, the designation of the Cooly Trade." The Editor of that paper is misinformed as to the origin of this term; it was invented by one of the wholesale Cooly Agents, under the old regime, and its peculiar suitability soon led to its general adoption. On turning to the extract from the Star, to which he alludes, we find the Editor decrying the whole system of Cooly Emigration. In speaking of the lowest agent, the Duffadar, the Star says, "he is little better than a crimp, and something worse than a Ghat Serang; all that goes into his pocket is a premium upon kidnapping." Again; "the actual cost of sending a Cooly to the Mauritius is not more than 70 Rupees, and at the very outside, would not be more than 65, if there were no opposition among those who make their livelihood by the trade, for so at present we must call it with reference to these parties." A little farther on he says: "We have supposed a sum to be given to the emigrant as a bonus, which in point of fact does not go into his pocket, but is filched from him, (we mean not all but the greater part) under various pretences by the Duffadar, through whose hands he comes first and goes last."—Lastly, "While the present system lasts, emigration may fairly be called the Cooly trade." These remarks were written by our contemporary in May or June last. Since that period, as the abuses of the system have been farther developed, his exposure of them has become more vehement and indignant. We have cordially rejoiced at the assistance thus afforded to the cause of humanity by one whose former bias gives a double value to his present opinions; but we think he is somewhat unreasonable in expecting to be allowed to monopolise this duty.

Under the old system, the native crimps, who were employed by the European merchants and agents, proceeded to the interior of the country, inveigling men away from their families, under various delusions, and bringing them down to the Capital. The same course is pursued at present to as large an extent; and, till lately, it was rendered [illegible] fatal by the Perwannahs or Writs given officially to these crimps. Under the former system, the men thus entrapped, after having been brought down to Calcutta, were forcibly detained in the lock-up houses of the Native agents. The same practice exists at present. It was only on Friday last that some of the Crimps were fined 50 Rupees by the Magistrates for having thus illegally deprived their victims of their liberty. Under the former system the poor cooly was cheated out of the money which was advanced to him; the Star affirms that the same process is still in vogue. With the exception of the surreptitious shipment of Coolies, and the overcrowding and underfeeding of them on board, all the evils of the old system have been revived. The provision of a Protector and Deputy Protector of the Coolies has checked,—we believe effectually—the forcible shipment of the coolies, and secured them comfortable room and food on board. But as the appointment of those officers has not prevented the system of Cooly emigration from degenerating into a Cooly trade, so there is nothing but their unsleeping vigilance which prevents the Cooly trade from degenerating into a most extensive and detestable Slave trade. All the elements of such a Slave trade are already in existence. There is the Merchant who pays so much a head for every Cooly that he can procure and pass; there is the inferior and unscrupulous agency of the Crimps at hand. The smallest relaxation of official vigilance would fill the country with violence, and convert Calcutta into a slave mart. If with all the activity and diligence of Mr. Fraser, the Deputy Protector, the Native crimps have ventured to bring down droves of men under false pretences from a distance of three, four and five hundred miles, and to detain them by force in the heart of the city of Calcutta, what would be the state of the country, if this vigilance should be relaxed, and any of the present formalities dispensed with?

This was not the system which we were given to expect when the ports were anew opened to emigration. Public suspicion was lulled by the assurance that a system had been anxiously and honestly devised by Her Majesty's Ministers at home, by which all the evils of the old system, —and even the Star in his paper of Sunday last calls them flagrant abuses—would be remedied. This was to be accomplished by making emigration a Government measure, by throwing on the Mauritius treasury the expense of transporting Coolies, and by the "nomination, from time to time, of such persons as the Governor of the Mauritius should see fit, to act as emigration agents at any port or place in India, which the Indian Government might designate as a port or place for the embarkation of Emigrants." The Mauritius Government has paid the premium, but neglected to appoint an Emigration Agent. The business of procuring and shipping Coolies has thus been left to private speculation. Twenty thousand Coolies have been sent since the beginning of the year, and if the Star's calculation of 20 Rupees clear profit on each cooly, be correct, a sum of 40,000£ or four lakhs of Rupees, has been realized by the private agents, to whom the furnishing of this supply has been abandoned; and it is from this violation of good faith on the part of the public authorities that all those scenes of violence and fraud have arisen which led the Star to denounce the whole system, four months ago, as nothing less than "the Cooly trade."

It may perhaps be doubted whether Coolies can, under any arrangement, be sent to the Mauritius to the extent of the Planter's desires, without the use in some degree of objectionable means. After the public Agent shall have been appointed, it is quite possible that the applicants for embarkation may come in so sluggishly, that it may be found necessary to give the system the stimulant of individual cupidity, and to enlist to a certain extent the mercenary agency of the crimps. But there will unquestionably be fewer abuses in a system directed by an Agent of the State, than in one carried on by irresponsible and private agents, who never appear on the scene, though the gold which animates the crimp to deeds of violence comes from their purse. The employment of a Government Agent to preside over the arrangements for emigration, would be an additional check on abuse. That check, the Ministry at home promised to the world; and we hope the Protector of Coolies, who is just come up from the Mauritius, will see the absolute necessity of keeping faith with the Ministry and with the public, by taking the business out of the hands of Agents and Crimps, and entrusting it to an Agent with a fixed salary, as provided for in the Minutes of Council.

POSTAGE BY THE HINDOOSTAN.—In the two previous voyages of the Hindoostan Steamer from Suez to Calcutta, she was not permitted to bring on our Mails, though letters and newspapers had been freely sent home by her. On the present occasion, owing to the loss of the Memnon Steamer, the packets for this Presidency have for the first time been brought to our own doors by our own Steamer. It is probable also that arrangements will be made for allowing the Hindoostan and the Bentinck to bring on our letters and newspapers in future, whenever they may happen to be at Suez when the English packets arrive there. It is therefore of no little importance that the rate of postage which is to be charged in future, and for which no provision has yet been made, should be fixed, before the return of the Hindoostan on her next voyage from Suez. In consequence of the absence of any arrangement on this subject, the Officers of the Post Office have been obliged to levy the usual ship postage on the contents of the overland mail. The letters now brought by the Hindoostan have been charged 4 annas, and the newspapers, 3 annas; and no relaxation of this rule can be expected without the express authority of the Government of India, in whom alone is vested the power of making alterations in the Schedule of postage.

We trust our contemporaries will not withhold their powerful advocacy on this occasion, but urge the necessity of a public address to the Governor General, beseeching that an equitable arrangement may be made regarding the postage, which shall satisfy the public expectations. We advise a public address, because Government is under no necessity of attending to any suggestions of the fourth estate, whereas an application from definite individuals, soliciting any grace or concession, will necessarily meet with "every consideration." There is indeed a tradition that the Head of the Government did formerly read the public newspapers, at least through his Private Secretary, and that some reforms of moment were adopted on their suggestion; but it is an undecided question whether our present ruler ever sees them at all, and we must not depend on the hope that he does.

As to the scale which should be fixed, it is not for us to dictate; but it must appear evident that to levy the same rate, or three annas, for conveying a letter from Garden Reach to the Post Office, a distance of four miles, which is now charged for bringing a newspaper a thousand miles from Bombay to Calcutta, is preposterous and unjust. At Bombay, the Steamers are maintained entirely at the public expense, and the annual cost does not fall short of, we think, 16 lakhs of Rupees. Yet our good friends there are permitted to transmit and receive letters and covers without paying a farthing for them. Towards the expenses of the Peninsular and Oriental Navigation Company's Steamers, the East India Company contributes Two lakhs of Rupees a year. If in these circumstances, we were to ask to be placed on the footing of the most favoured Presidency, there would not we apprehend be any thing unreasonable in the request; but we will not presume to suggest that the same privilege of total exemption which has been so long enjoyed at Bombay should be extended to Calcutta. Something we must pay, and we ought to pay it cheerfully. The outward mails have hitherto been sent by the Hindoostan, at a rate which no one felt to be burdensome. We have been charged one anna for every newspaper, and two annas for each letter. There is reason to believe that if the same scale was established for the inward mails, the public wishes would be satisfied, more especially if the rule laid down in Schedule B. of the Post Office Regulations, was adopted, and newspapers not exceeding six tolas in weight were allowed to be sent for ½ anna. This would enable us to send our newspapers to England on paper as substantial as that on which the English papers we receive, are printed.

THE COLLEGE OF FORT WILLIAM.—The last number of the Calcutta Gazette gives us the Report on the Examination of the students of Fort William College on the 1st of September, and the 2d of October of the present year. The students are twenty in number, not one of whom had been more than ten months in the Institution at the latter period. The Report presents no feature worthy of peculiar notice except the extraordinary qualifications which three of the students appear to have acquired, and which recals to mind the palmy days of the College, when some of the most distinguished of the public servants laid the foundation of their subsequent reputation in the academical honours they acquired. Mr. Schalch who entered the College on the 12th of October 1842, passed in Persian on the 1st of the subsequent month; in Bengalee, on the 1st of February 1843, and on the 1st of May obtained a certificate of high proficiency in that language. He passed in Hindee, his third language, on the 1st of June, and has now received a certificate of high proficiency in it, and is entitled to a reward of 800 Rs. Mr. Seton Karr, who entered College on the 12th December 1842, has now passed in three languages, Persian, Hindee and Bengalee, in the last of which he has obtained a degree of honour and is entitled to a reward of 1600 Rupees. He has also gained a certificate of high proficiency in Sanskrit. Mr. Cust, who entered College on the 24th March 1843, has in the course of five months passed in two languages, and received a certificate of high proficiency in Bengalee and a reward of 800 Rupees.

The revival of Sanskrit studies in the College is naturally traced to the exertions of Dr. Wilson in England, who is reported to be anxious that the students at Hayleybury should apply themselves, while there, to the study of Sanskrit and Arabic, the two classic languages which form the basis of all the languages and dialects which are current in Hindoostan. He does not appear however to have been particularly successful in his efforts, as we find but one student evincing any acquaintance with Sanskrit, and none possessed of any knowledge of Arabic. Indeed, the plan which is said to have been urged by that profound Orientalist, however excellent in theory, will not we think be found to be adapted to the nature and exigencies of the Civil Service. It is quite true that a knowledge of the two sources of Indian philology will eminently facilitate the acquisition of the derivative tongues; but they are so abstruse and complicated that few of the Hayleybury students can be supposed to possess inclination or ability for the study. Not one man in twenty has any natural aptitude for the acquisition of these learned languages or is likely to make any progress in them. It will follow therefore that the nineteen will find to their cost that they have obtained no available knowledge of them, while they have neglected the acquisition of knowledge which would be invaluable to them as public servants, and for the attainment of which they will enjoy no subsequent leisure. To the opinion of the Law Commission we fully subscribe. "We do not attach importance to the study of the Oriental languages in England beyond such an elementary acquaintance with them, as would accelerate future proficiency in India. It is in the latter country that the greatest facilities for acquiring this description of knowledge exist, and we think the principal part of the time spent in England would be most profitably devoted to the pursuit of European literature and science."

There is irresistible truth in these observations.

The most eminent Oriental Scholars in the public service have declared that they learned more of the Native languages in a month in the country itself, than they had acquired in six months at home. At the same time it is desirable that the student should not land in India as ignorant of the country tongues as of Chinese; he should bring the rudiments with him. But the cast of his studies should be accommodated to his circumstances. Once embarked on professional life in India, the Civilian must bid adieu to all hope of advancement in European literature and science. It is with difficulty that he will be able to keep himself abreast of the age by the perusal of its periodical literature. No man has leisure for mental improvement except an Opium or a Salt Agent. It is highly to be desired therefore that the studies of the Civilian should provide for the largest possible acquisition of European literature and science before he leaves England, and the door of hope is closed upon him. Then, the first twelve months of his Indian career should be devoted to those studies which shall fit him for the discharge of public duty—the acquisition of the native languages and of the fundamental principles of the institutions in connection with which his life is to be spent.

A thorough and familiar knowledge of the languages is to be acquired only by contact with the people, and in the discharge of public business, not in the formal routine of College studies. Generally speaking, the man who is reported qualified for the public service, can seldom understand the simplest petition presented to him, or pass any intelligible order upon it. Yet the people look on all other qualifications with comparative indifference. Without this indispensible vernacular knowledge, even the legal acumen and the justice by which a decision may be distinguished, lose the best part of their value, because they are ascribed to the Native and mercenary Amlah. The civilian who has been dismissed to the public service with only a College stock of Bengalee or Ordoo, should therefore undergo a subsequent examination, after he has lived and acted among the people, to ascertain whether he has a sufficient knowledge of the language, to conduct public business with satisfaction, and no situation of 1000 Rs. a month in value should be given to one who has failed to master the people's language. Every dolt who has failed to acquire this qualification should be excluded from all but subordinate situations. Such we believe is the rule at Bombay, and such ought to be the rule here. The true secret of popularizing our administration, and conducting it in such a manner as to win the confidence of the people, is to commit it to men who are at home in their language.

Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly.—The public sympathy has been anew awakened regarding the fate of these officers by an assertion that the account of their execution given to Colonel Sheil is not correct, and by the chivalrous offer of Wolff and Captain Grover to proceed to Bokhara and attempt their rescue. The proposal is of course based on the supposition that they are yet in the land of the living. On this point it is impossible to come to any definite conclusion with the evidence before us. The report of Saleh Mahomed is clear; so is also that of the Jew who is said to have seen them after the date of their supposed murder. If it was allowable to form any conjecture from the character and interests of the Bokhara Court, we should almost conclude that they had not been put to death in the barbarous mode which has been indicated. The Khan of Bokhara could have no vindictive motive for executing them, as the British Government has never provoked his animosity. It would be more for his interest to hold them at a heavy ransom. We learn moreover from Wolff's journal, that in 1832 the King was any thing but pleased with the suspicion thrown upon him of having been accessory to the death of Mr. Moorcroft. "We must give Wolff," said he to his Minister, "permission to travel through our country, in order that we may get rid of the bad name which is cast upon us by the death of Moorcroft."' If this sensitive feeling still pervades the breast of the "Prince of Believers," it is not likely that he would wantonly incur the odium of having murdered two foreigners. That he has subjected them to the extremity of human suffering, will unhappily admit of no doubt.

Supposing the victims of his barbarity to be yet alive, by what means can he be induced to restore them to liberty? Wolff proposes to go as a Christian Minister. On the former occasion he entered Bokhara on horseback with his Hebrew Bible and his Greek Testament in his hand. He now proposes to enter it on foot, robed as a Doctor of Divinity with his gown and hood. We question whether the haughty King of Bokhara will open the prison doors of the captives at the request even of the wisest Doctor of Cambridge or Oxford. As a rigid Mahomedan, he can have no respect for the sacred orders of the unbelievers. Neither can Wolff expect to obtain their release for money or without it. If he takes no money, he will be laughed at; if he carries the money in his portmanteau, it will probably be taken away and he himself sent to keep the prisoners company, with the hope that the ransom of three will be higher than that of two. To invest him with a public character, and depute him as an envoy from the Government, would be to compromise the character of that Government without any hope of effecting the object. The King of Bokhara would be infinitely more likely to cast the accredited agent into a dungeon than to liberate the prisoners at his request. Every effort that could be made, short of the despatch of a public Mission, was made by Sir W. Macnaghten to effect the release of Col. Stoddart at a time when we were all powerful in Affghanistan and seemed to hold the destinies of Central Asia in our hands; but he failed. Since that time we have been ignominiously expelled from the country, and though we have revisited it in triumph and retrieved our national character upon every scene of our disaster, yet our disgrace will be more remembered than our victories. It is a clear fact that we are no longer there, but that the man we expelled, is on his old throne. We have not a foot of land in Affghanistan. The influence we had established, and the terror we had inspired among all the tribes which lie between the Caspian and the Indus, has died away as fast as it arose, and we are nothing in the eyes of the Khan of Bokhara. But while we have been growing less in his esteem, he himself has been growing greater. His power is doubled and his hauteur of course more than doubled. Any official request from us, unless supported by an army on the Oxus, would inevitably be treated with contempt.

Still the mind clings with fondness to the most distant hope of rescuing our two enterprising fellow countrymen from bondage, if they be still in existence. And if Wolff will really undertake a journey to Bokhara on so hallowed a mission, we should think it a duty to further his object by all the means in our power. We think it likely that his object will be promoted far more by his appearing there in a private than in a public character. The same kind Providence which watched over him in his last journey of curiosity, may vouchsafe him equal protection in this new journey of benevolence; and unexpected contingencies may arise to facilitate his object. If Lady Georgiana can spare him, we would certainly, vote for the journey and for a subscription to defray the expense of it. He has enthusiasm enough to carry him through the enterprise.

General Pollock.—It will be in the recollection of many, that the letter written by General Pollock on the receipt of the Governor General's Orders to withdraw with his army from Affghanistan, was not published in the Blue Book. The omission was at the time much censured; but the explanation which has now been given of the reason is perfectly satisfactory. We subjoin the letter, which has been received by the last Mail. The reader will perceive that the General used every argument in his power to prevent the retrograde movement which had been so inconsiderately ordered.

No. 1.

"THE GOVERNOR GENERAL TO THE SECRET COMMITTEE.

(Extract.)

"Having observed, in the report of the debates in Parliament with respect to the Affghan war, that a letter from Major General Pollock, dated the 13th of May is mentioned as not having been received in England, I inquired into the cause of its not having been transmitted, and received the following explanation:—

"2. The original despatch of the 13th of May never reached the office, and must have been lost in transit. The duplicate was received and acknowledged on the 11th of July.

"3. It is the practice of the Secretary's office to keep the unreported papers on all important subjects for each month together, and to forward copies of them to the secret committee, by the monthly overland mail.

"4. The despatch in question was inadvertently put up in its proper place, in the May bundle of reported papers, instead of being left for a time, as it should have been, amongst the unreported papers of July. Hence, when the July papers were copied for transmission to the secret committee this despatch was omitted.

"A copy of it is now forwarded."

No. 2.

COPY OF THE DESPATCH SENT BY MAJOR GENERAL POLLOCK TO THE SECRETARY WITH THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

"Jellalabad, May 13, 1842.

"Sir,—I had the honour to forward with my letter, dated 12th instant, a copy of a letter from His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

"I have now the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated 28th ult., which adverts to the present aspect of affairs in Affghanistan, and the probability of my having advanced to Cabool; stating, also, that in such an event the views of the Governor General, as to the withdrawal of the troops, will not be altered; and, further, that whatever measures I may adopt I must have especial regard to the health of the troops.

"I trust that I am not wrong in considering this letter as leaving to me discretionary powers; and, coming as it does from the supreme power in India, I venture to delay for some days acting up to the instructions communicated in His Excellency, the Commander-in-Chief's letter, dated 29th ultimo.

"I regret much that a want of carriage cattle has detained me here; if it had not been so I should now be several marches in advance, and I am quite certain that such a move would have been highly beneficial. Affairs at Cabool are at the present moment in a very unsettled state, but a few days must decide in favour of one of the parties. Mahomed Akbar is at Cabool, exerting all his influence to overpower the prince. He is without means; and if he cannot within a very short period obtain the ascendancy, he must give up the contest, in which case I have no doubt I shall hear from him again. With regard to our withdrawal at the present moment, I fear that it would have the very worst effect; it would be construed into a defeat, and our character as a powerful nation would be entirely lost in this part of the world. It is true that the garrison of Jellalabad has been saved, which it would not have been had a force not been sent to its relief; but the relief of that garrison is only one object, there still remain others which we cannot disregard. I allude to the release of the prisoners.

"I expect about 19 Europeans from Budeeabad in a few days; the letters which have passed about the other prisoners have already been forwarded for the information of his lordship. If, while these communications were in progress, I were to retire, it would be supposed that a panic had seized us. I, therefore, think that our remaining in this vicinity (or perhaps a few marches in advance) is essential to uphold the character of the British nation; and, in like manner, General Nott might hold his post, at all events, till a more favourable season.

"I have no reason yet to complain that the troops are more unhealthy than they were at Agra. If I am to march to Peshawur the climate is certainly not preferable; and here I can, in one or two marches, find a better climate, and I should be able to dictate better terms than I could at Peshawur.

"I cannot imagine any force being sent from Cabool which I could not successfully oppose; but the advance on Cabool would require that General Nott should act in concert and advance also. I, therefore, cannot help regretting that he should be directed to retire, which, without some demonstration of our power, he will find some difficulty in doing.

"I have less hesitation in thus expressing my opinion, because I could not, under any circumstances, move in less than 18 or 20 days; and your reply might reach me, by express, in about 23 days. The difference in point of time is not very material, but the importance of the subject is sufficient to justify the delay of a few days. In the mean time, I shall endeavour to procure carriage cattle as fast as I can, to move either forward or backward as I may be directed, or, if left to my discretion, as I may think judicious.

"Under any circumstances I should not advocate the delay of the troops, either at Candahar or on this side, beyond the mouth of November; and in this arrangement advertence must be had to the safety of the Khyber, which I consider the Seikhs would gladly hold, if they were allowed to take possession of Jellalabad.—I have, &c., G. Pollock."

The London Missionary Society and the Gospel Propagation Society.—We now redeem our pledge of giving an analysis of the documents which have been published relative to the clashing of these two Societies in their missionary operations to the south of Calcutta, which has occasioned so long a discussion during the last three months. It is not without regret that we devote our columns to a controversy which has led to so unsatisfactory a result, and which, so far from establishing the principle of mutual non-interference, has terminated in a declaration, that no engagement of any Episcopal Society in England to abstain from interfering with the labours of Dissenting Missionaries can be binding on any Church Missionaries in the east. After such a declaration has received the sanction of the highest Episcopal authority in India, it might appear idle to waste any time in examining whether any previous pledge of non-interference was ever given, and whether it has been kept or violated. But the Missionaries of the London Society consider that in the Report of the Sub-Committee of the Gospel Propagation Society, an attempt is made, not only to shew that Bishop Corrie's pledge of non-interference has never been violated by the Missionaries of that Society, but that the agents of the London Missionary Society are open to the charge of having intruded themselves into a scene of labour, which they received a large sum to resign exclusively to the Gospel Propagation Society. From this charge the Dissenting Ministers are naturally anxious to exonerate themselves, and they have therefore published for the information of their supporters in England and the public in India, the documents on which they rest the justification of their conduct. It is much to be regretted that the Report of their Sub-Committee should have been rendered so voluminous by the admission of extraneous considerations, as to deter rather than invite a perusal of it.

In the year 1823, the Rev. Messrs. Morton and Christian having come to India under the auspices of the Gospel Propagation Society, the question arose where Mr. Morton should be stationed. At a Meeting of the Local Committee, Bishop—then Archdeacon—Corrie, stated that the London Missionary Society had a station at Tallygunge where they had erected a Mission House and established Schools, and which they would probably be willing to transfer to the Gospel Propagation Society. The negotiation was confided to him, and he succeeded in obtaining the station, on condition that the expenses incurred by the London Society should be refunded. At the close of his letter to Mr. Hill, he used these memorable words: "I need scarcely add that the same principle of non-interference with the proceedings of your Society in respect of any Missionary stations already formed among the Heathen, will be exercised by the Committee on any opportunity they may have of extending their labours away from large cities."

The Missionaries of the London Society maintain that this pledge of non-interference, has been violated by the missionaries of the Propagation Society, "first, by their entering villages previously occupied by the L. M. S. (and that whether by the residence of Christians or catechumens in our connexion, the establishment of schools or chapels, or the visitation of our Missionaries); 2ndly, by receiving into their communion insubordinate or excluded members of our churches, not only in some instances without enquiry, but even against remonstrance and information given of their ill-desert. 3rdly. By giving employment with salaries, as Readers or Catechists, to persons who had gone over from us, whether by invitation from persons of their communion or dissatisfaction with our discipline. The case of Jhangera already cited, and others, are glaring instances of the aggressions referred to, which we will not however further particularise. 4thly. By the issue of a tract in Bengalee denying the right of the Dissenters to preach the gospel at all, asserting the invalidity of ordinances administered by them, and enforcing the duty of the Natives, on the great peril of their souls, to attach themselves only to episcopalian Missionaries."

The Sub-Committee of the Propagation Society on the contrary assert that the pledge has not been violated, because Archdeacon Corrie does not speak of stations that shall be hereafter established, but of stations already formed; "in other words, the pledge extended only to those stations which were in existence on the 27th of November, 1823; and any stations which the London Society might form subsequently to that period, in any part of India, might be invaded by the Propagation Society without any breach of good faith. The Sub-Committee also consider the charge at variance with the manifest design of the letter, which was to remove the London Missionaries to a distance. The subsequent establishment of a station by them at Ramakal Choke, which is about six miles from Tallygunge was never contemplated by the Episcopal Society when the pledge was given; and they consider its establishment as a violation of the corresponding pledge given by the London Society, and which was recorded in these terms in the Minutes of the Gospel Propagation Society; "The said Trustees," those of the London Society, "disclaim, on the basis proposed in Archdeacon Corrie's correspondence, all intention of establishing fresh Schools in the district of Tallygunge hereafter, while it remains the scene of the Society's operations." They state that the charge is at variance also with the well known designs of Bishop Middleton in establishing Schools in the Tallygunge district, and founding Bishop's College, in connection with which they were to be brought when the proposal was made to the London Missionaries. They argue that if the interpretation of the pledge given by that body be correct, it will follow that the Bishop, the Archdeacon and the Principal of Bishop's College "knowing full well the extensive and growing nature of the undertaking in which they were embarked, consented to shut themselves up in the district of Tallygunge and to forbear entering the wide Missionary field which lay in every direction around, if perchance the London Missionary Society's agents should see good to settle however near them, beyond the immediate precincts of the said district, and that too when the Gospel Propagation Society had already planted Schools preparatory to Missionary labours as far south as Barripore, twelve miles from Tallygunge. Such a conclusion is in the highest degree improbable and extravagant." The Sub-Committee also consider the charge as at variance with the subsequent conduct of Archdeacon Corrie, who continued, in connection with the Gospel Propagation Society for twelve years after the pledge was given, up to the time of his final departure in 1835, and witnessed the gradual extension of the Missions of that Society in every direction, without regard to geographical limits of any supposed pledge. It is not, say they, to be supposed that if he had intended his pledge to bear the meaning now put on it by the London Society, he would have suffered these things to pass in silence. Finally, they remark that no remonstrance was made against the extending operations of the Propagation Society's Missionaries as long as Mr. Corrie continued in Calcutta, and that the first reference made to his letter was in December, 1836, when the Committee of that Society proposed to establish a mission at Berhampore. The Report closes with the distinct and final revocation of whatever pledge of non-interference Archdeacon Corrie may have given, and the assurance that no pledge hereafter made, can ever be binding on the Missionaries of the Society. "What we would insist on is, the incompetency of a Diocesan Committee, or even of a home Committee to pledge a Society of the Church of England to an engagement of the kind with Dissenting Missionaries of any denomination."

To this the Sub-Committee of the London Society have replied at great length. They divide their reply into three parts, and in the first place, enquire whether any pledge of non-interference was given by Archdeacon Corrie. Secondly, what was included in the cession of Tallygunge, and thirdly, whether the pledge has been violated, and by whom. On the first point they have the testimony of Mr. Morton who was stationed by the Propagation Society at Tallygunge, when it was first purchased, though he is now a Missionary of the London Society. He has given a succinct history of the circumstances which led to the purchase of Tallygunge, and he states that a pledge of future non-interference was a principal condition of the arrangement so made, and was not only intended to be made, but actually was believed by ourselves (that is by the Missionaries of the Propagation Society) to have been made. But we need not unnecessarily lengthen this article by dwelling on this part of the subject. The fact that a pledge of non-interference was given by Archdeacon Corrie, is proved by the attempt made in the Report of the Sub-Committee of the Propagation Society to limit it to stations existing in November 1823. and to deny its applicability to stations which might be subsequently formed—rather a jesuitical construction of the word already—and by the declaration at the end of the Report that no such pledge can be binding on the Missionaries of the Society.

Mr. Micaiah Hill, who was the Missionary "bought out" of the Tallygunge station, thus narrates the conversation which Archdeacon Corrie had with him on the subject of the session. It is remarkable among other matters for the declaration that Tallygunge was the extremity of the line of Schools, then designed by the Propagation Society, though it is a pity Mr. Hill did not remember whether it was said to be the southern or northern terminus. This fact would throw a flood of light on the subject. The Archdeacon said;

The school we have at Tallygunge is the extremity of our line; and you can conceive that with us it is an object to have our whole line complete and subject to no interference. Your station at Tallygunge obstructs our plan, and in what way satisfactorily to all parties we could remove this obstruction has been discussed in our Diocesan Committee. I suggested to his Lordship that you, as the resident Missionary at Tallygunge, should be addressed, and that as a reason for your resigning the station to us we should propose a pledge of non-interference; and that in all future movements, whenever and wherever you may have first established a Mission, with that Mission the Church of England should not interfere. Mr. Hawtayne objected to my proposal saying that the Committee would only expose itself to an insult. I (Archdeacon Corrie) observed, 'I know Mr. Hill; should our negociation fail, I am sure of a gentlemanly reply from him.' His Lordship (Bishop Heber) rejoined, 'Then Mr. Corrie, will you undertake to address Mr. Hill and offer him our pledge of non-interference?'

And now (continued Mr. Corrie), I wait upon you, Mr. Hill, with the Bishop's personal thanks for having so kindly acceded to our request, and to state that his Lordship, as the head of the English church in India, guarantees that this principle of non-interference with each other's Missions shall be strictly observed on his part."

To the second query, what was comprized in Tallygunge, the Sub-Committee of the London Society reply that it was distinctly understood to mean, only a station, and not, as the Episcopal Society affirms, a district. They support this idea by affirming that at the time of the cession of Tallygunge, they had Missionary Schools and preaching stations at Bhuwanipore two miles to the north of it, and Chitla one mile to the west, and Beyala, two miles south west of it. They argue, and we think with much force, that if the Propagation Society at the time purchased Tallygunge Mission House, as the centre of a prepared Missionary field with a view to keep that field exclusively their own, free from all other agency, they would have made proposals for the removal of the London Society's other stations, from its immediate vicinity. They argue also that if the continued occupation of Missionary stations within two miles of Tallygunge was not considered a violation of the counterpart pledge which that Society's agents are said to have given, the subsequent establishment of a station six miles off at Ramakal Choke, cannot be considered in that light.

On this point, however, we are constrained to remark that the Episcopal Society do appear at the time of the purchase, to have supposed that they were purchasing the exclusive occupancy of a district, and not of a single village. In the extract we have already quoted from the Minutes of the 26th March, 1824, this idea is distinctly recorded in the words—"that the London Missionary Society's Agents disclaim all intention of establishing fresh Schools in the district hereafter." The question then rises what were the limits of this district. We believe we shall not be far from the truth in supposing that they have gradually expanded with the enlarging views of the Propagation Society. This district which was to be exclusively Episcopal, free from all Dissenting Agents, did not extend in 1823 to the distance of two miles south west, to Beyala, where the Dissenters were allowed to remain unmolested. Its present boundary is utterly indefinite, for the Propagation Society, in the Sub-Committee's Report speak of the London Society's Agents not only as having no right to settle in the district itself, but beyond the immediate precincts of it. It would appear then that the Propagation Society consider that they bought the London Missionaries not only out of the district, which is a sufficiently indefinite term, but out of its neighbourhood, which is still more indefinite. It is impossible to pursue this part of the subject any farther with any prospect of a satisfactory result. If the London Missionary Society's Agents sold only the station of Tallygunge to the Episcopal Society in 1823, they had a right to settle in other places at some distance from it, and the Archdeacon's pledge must be considered as having been violated by interfering with them at those missionary establishments. If, on the contrary, they surrendered a district to the Episcopal Society, and that district extended to Barripore, they had no right to settle at Ramakal Choke, a station midway between the two stations. It is evident that the London Missionaries thought at the time they were transferring a station, while the Gospel Propagation Society thought they had acquired the unmolested occupancy of a district. It appears however from one circumstance that Archdeacon Corrie did not assign those large dimensions to the district of Tallygunge which are now claimed for it. The London Society's Missionaries had established a station at Jangheera, a mile from Ramakal Choke, and Mr. Tweddale, one of the Propagation Society's Missionaries soon after attempted to open a school there and had actually collected the materials for it, when the matter was represented to Archdeacon Corrie, and he was directed to desist. This is a material fact in the controversy, because it goes far to shew that the Archdeacon did consider himself bound by a pledge of non-interference, even at a station, only seven miles from Tallygunge, which was not in existence when that place was sold.

The statements of which we have given an analysis, were laid before Mr. Hawkins, of the Civil Service, a member of the Church of England, whose calm and impartial opinion on the facts of this controversy, we subjoin.

The Bishop having declined to appoint any individual to co-operate in review with Drs. Duff and Yates, the District Committee of the L. M. S. applied by their Secretary to several gentlemen of the Episcopal Church, soliciting such co-operation; but these were compelled to decline, from a feeling of delicacy and (in their view) of impropriety in sitting in review, as laymen, upon the judgment of their ecclesiastical pastors or superiors; at the same time expressing, however, their decided conviction that, in regard to the simple facts of the case in dispute, without giving any opinion whatever upon, or touching, either matters of ecclesiastical discipline or the motives of individuals, the three points discussed in this report had been most satisfactorily established in favour of our body. One gentleman, whose name, we are at liberty to give, and whose candour and caution add great weight to his opinion, thus writes,—

"As to the case itself. The Diocesan Report proceeds upon the assumption that when the Schools were purchased by the D. C. in 1823, Tallygunge was considered by the then Committee as a district, and not merely as a station; and that as the D. C. had a school at Barrypore,* it was an unauthorized interference and a violation of the existing understanding, for the Missionaries of the L. S. to form a station at Rámmákál Choke, between the station of Tallygunge and Barrypore. With this view of the facts of the case, the Sub-Committee are of opinion that there was no violation of the pledge alleged to have been given by Archdeacon Corrie to the agents of the L. M. S.

"Having now had an opportunity of seeing both the Report of the Sub-Committee of the S. P. G. Diocesan Committee, and the reply of the Missionaries of the London Missionary Society, I am of opinion that your reply sets forth facts which quite alter the features of the case from what the Diocesan Report assumes. It appears that at the time of the transfer of the school at Tallygunge, the London Missionary Society had schools and preaching stations at Beyálá, Chitlá and Bhawanipore in the vicinity of Tallygunge, and that they were permitted to continue their occupation of these without any remonstrance or objection on the part of those to whom the school at Tallygunge had been transferred. This fact leads, in my opinion, decisively to the conclusion that the parties to the transfer looked upon Tallygunge as a station, not as a district. Had these facts been before the Sub-Committee, I cannot but think that, on this point, they would have come to a different determination.

"Looking also at Archdeacon Corrie's letter of the 27th November 1823, in its general tenor and the circumstances under which it was written, it certainly does appear to my mind to convey a pledge of non-interference, by the party represented by him, with any station then or afterwards (to be) previously occupied by the London Missionary Society.

"Taking the unfortunate matter in all its bearings, I arrive at the conclusion that the London Missionary Society, considering that it had transferred to the D. C. only the station of Tallygunge, felt itself at perfect liberty to establish a station at Ramakal Choke: while the present successors of the party to whom the transfer was made, considering the subject of the transfer to have been the district between Tallygunge and Bhawanipur, view the establishment of the station at Rámmákál Choke as an unauthorized invasion of such district.

"Had this been all, a little mutual explanation might have obviated every difficulty. Such explanation, however, is of course useless in the face of a declaration that a pledge of the kind alluded to is inadmissible, and that societies in connection with the Church of England cannot bind themselves not to interfere with the labours of Dissenting Missionaries of any denomination.

"I beg that you will consider me as giving an opinion only on the leading facts of the case. I am not required in so doing to discuss any of the principles of the Church of England; and therefore purposely refrain from so doing.

"I farther beg that I may not be considered as in any way a party to the strictures upon the conduct and proceedings of individuals.

"J. A. F. Hawkins."

These documents were also submitted to the Revd. Drs. Duff and Yates and their judgments on the points of difference is thus given.

"The Calcutta District Committee of the London Missionary Society having laid before us certain duly authenticated statements and testimonies, relative to the points of difference between them and the committee of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel,—resolved as follows:—

1st. That, as our opinion has been solicited,—not in regard to any thing personal connected with the conduct or proceedings of the authorities concerned, but simply and solely in regard to the precise nature and actual reality of certain disputed matters of fact, to be determined by suitable documentary evidence;—we know of no valid or sufficient reason for declining to respond to the solicitation of our Christian Brethren.

* This we have above shewn not to be fact.

2nd. That, after the most careful and attentive consideration of the whole of the materials submitted to us, it is our deliberate conviction that the evidence presented conclusively establishes the fact that, as a Christian return for a truly generous concession, a pledge was given by the late Archdeacon, afterwards Bishop Corrie, to the Missionaries of the London Missionary Society, not to interfere, in time coming, with any stations which might be pre-occupied by them—and, without passing any opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of proffering such a pledge at all, that the Society on whose behalf and under whose direction the Venerable Archdeacon officially acted, was clearly bound, by every principle of rational and moral obligation, to preserve it inviolate, when once made.

3rd. That the whole weight of evidence, external and internal, is in favour of the statement that the original purchase and consequent cession extended only to the Mission premises and schools of the single village of Tallygunge, and not to any imaginary and undefined district or cluster of adjacent villages.

4th. That among the places, obviously exempted by the aforesaid pledge from interference or intrusion on the part of the agents of the Diocesan Committee of the P. C. K. or P. G. F. Society, must be fairly included all stations south of Calcutta which were then or might thereafter be found actually pre occupied by the Missionaries of the London Missionary Society.

5th. That, in regard to several of these pre-occupied stations the pledge certainly has, in point of fact, been again and again violated by the Missionaries of the Propagation Society:—while there is satisfactory evidence, on the other hand, to prove that it has not been so violated by the Missionaries of the London Missionary Society.

6th. That in consequence of this violation of the pledge, on the part of the S. P. G. Missionaries (a violation, which we record simply as an established fact, without imputing any sinister intention or design to the parties more immediately concerned,) the most serious evils have arisen alike injurious to the cause of Christianity, to the peace of the Missionaries, and to the salvation of the Heathen.

7th. That, in conclusion, we cannot but indulge the hope that when such Christian men as the present Bishop and Archdeacon of Calcutta and Mr. Pratt come to be fully cognizant of all the facts of the case, they will effectually interpose their influence and authority to secure an honourable fulfilment of any engagements officially contracted by their venerated predecessors, and thus restore peace and harmony to a once tranquil, but now harassed and distracted, district.

WILLIAM YATES."

From the time when this controversy was first opened, the appeal to Archdeacon Corrie's pledge has appeared to us only a fruitless waste of labour. First, from the indefinite language in which it was couched, and which afforded those who were not imbued with the spirit in which it was given, a plausible reason for disregarding it: Secondly, from the nature of those violations of it which were made the subject of complaint, and which, springing as they did from a feeling of strong hostility to dissent, would have been exhibited in the same degree if the limits of the district of Tallygunge had been defined by a Revenue Surveyor; but lastly, and chiefly, from the result to which this appeal appeared sure to lead. The pledge given by Archdeacon Corrie, with the full concurrence of the good Bishop Heber, of whom Dr. Marshman used to remark that he was the most formidable enemy to Dissent who had ever appeared in India, because of the extreme mildness and candor which marked his conduct, was a true index of their Christian character. The pledge was not in exact accordance with what are called Church Principles, and which are not always softened down by the presence of evangelical sentiments. It is repugnant to those Church Principles to give any quarter to Dissent, or to regard it in any other light than as an enemy to be annihilated. Nothing can be more foreign to those principles than to recognize the legitimate existence of Dissenters by entering into any kind of negotiation with them. Such is the feeling in England where the Episcopal Church is by law established, and Dissenters are as much considered spiritual rebels, as the revolted colonies of North America were considered political rebels—till they had established their own independence. The division of India into Episcopal sees, and the establishment of a Metropolitan Bishop, whose jurisdiction extends from the Himalaya to Point de Galle, and from Singapore to the Hills of Beloochistan, appear to intend the subjection of this distant empire, to the same rules of ecclesiastical discipline which prevail in England; and to imply that all Dissenting teachers found within these limits are equally to be considered as unauthorized interlopers, and rebels against the legitimate spiritual authorities of the country. The rise of Tractarianism, the chief seat of which in India is Bishop's College, has given a peculiar acerbity to these Church principles, and led its advocates to put a more pointed and sectarian construction on the ordination Vows, which bind the Minister of the Church of England, 'to banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrine.' The Missionaries of the Propagation Society in whose conduct the present discussion originated, of course fully participate in the views and feelings by which their Alma Mater is distinguished.

Of these circumstances, the London Society's Agents were fully aware, when they brought the question of the "pledge," given under happier auspices, into discussion. They might easily have foreseen, that to any charge of having violated a pledge of non-interference, the reply would be that the pledge itself was at variance with the ordination vows of the Missionary, from the obligation of which no ecclesiastical authority could liberate him. They might have foreseen that any appeal to an Episcopal Society to hold sacred a pledge of non-interference would, in the present temper of the times, be followed by its instant repudiation. They ought to have known that for the Church dignitaries in India, upon a solemn appeal, to have confirmed the assertion of Archdeacon Corrie that "the field of Missionary labour was large enough for all the Missionaries of the various Societies in the country without interfering with each other," would have been to acknowledge as Christian teachers those who had not been ordained by Bishops possessed of the Apostolical succession, and to recognise the ordinances administered by them as valid. If in these circumstances, the Dissenting Missionaries expected the same consideration which they experienced from the amiable Heber and the apostolic Corrie, their expectations were unreasonable. If they hoped to be thus recognized as Christian Ministers, at this time of day, by the Church authorities, their hopes were quite as preposterous as those entertained by the members of the Established Church, who expect the haughty Church of Rome to acknowledge that they have the Apostolic succession, that their orders are valid, or the ordinances they administer, are efficacious. Some of our readers may remember how ridiculous the Puseyite Bishop of Australia has just rendered himself by the foolish protest he signed against the intrusion of a Roman Catholic Archbishop into his diocese. He considered it a most unkind, ungenerous, unchristian act that the Pope should erect Australia into a Roman Catholic see, when it was already the see of an Anglo Catholic Bishop. His Lordship's distress has only served to excite the laughter of every sound Protestant and every consistent Roman Catholic; and whenever the London Missionary Society's Agents shall manifest the slightest annoyance that the Puseyites do not acknowledge the validity of their orders, or attach any value to the ordinances they administer, they will render themselves equally an object of public ridicule. The contempt which the Puseyites pour on the Dissenters and their ministrations, is only the counterpart of the still more profound contempt which the Romanists pour on the spiritual pretensions of the Puseyites. To be affected by any such contumely would betray a degree of childish weakness, unworthy of Christian men. In the ranks of the Episcopal Church in India, notwithstanding the increasing leaven of Puseyism, there will still be found men of the same stamp as Corrie, and Martyn, and Thomason, who will rejoice that Christian truth is made known in this benighted land, though by other communities of Christians, and who will consider it a sin against Christian charity to disturb their labours. From them the Dissenting Missionaries will continue to receive generous sympathy—and whenever they come in contact with men of a different stamp, walking upon the stilts of Puseyism, and denouncing all who have not episcopal ordination, they must treat their sneers with the same placid indifference with which Bishop Wilson and Archdeacon Dealtry treat the contempt which the Roman Catholic cast on the 'heretical' Church of England.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19.

— By the last arrival from the Persian Gulf, we learn that Seyed Ben Calfaun has been appointed American Consul at Muscat and its dependencies. The appointment is said to have given general satisfaction as that gentleman speaks English fluently, and has always manifested the utmost kindness both to Americans and English.

— We believe that it escaped us at the time to state, that the Directors of the Bank of Bombay had received permission of the Supreme Government to establish a Branch in Calcutta with no other restriction save that of issuing their notes. From the Bombay Times we learn that no effort has been made to take advantage of the permission, though the Bank itself appears to be labouring under a plethora, and is drowsy from repletion. We should have thought that at a time when the Union Bank was, as it respects real banking operations, in a state of suspended animation, and the Bengal Bank dividing 14 per cent per annum, such an opening would have been eagerly embraced.

— The Star's home correspondent tells him by the last Mail that there was some half idea of the Ministry's doing justice to themselves by recalling Lord Ellenborough, but the idea has died out, and his Lordship will not be recalled,—and he will not resign while his friends are in power. The Scinde affair will not come under discussion before the next Session, and not then—for by that time the internal state of the country will demand all the time Parliament can command. Mr. Roebuck, who seems to act the part to Lords Auckland and Ellenborough which Mr. Paull acted to Lord Wellesley, has, according to the last accounts abandoned his opposition to the retention of Scinde and confines his censure to the mode of its acquisition.

— The Bombay papers state, that an express had arrived at that Presidency from the Governor General, suspending the order for the withdrawal of the Bombay troops from Scinde to make room for the Bengal troops by whom it was to have been garrisoned. All the Bombay troops are, it appears, to stand fast in the province, and the Bengal troops who had been ordered to relieve them will stand fast at Ferozepore till matters are a little settled in the Punjab.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20.

— The news regarding the detention of the Scinde bound troops at Ferozepore is confirmed. An express had been received by Col. Richmond from the Commander-in-Chief to that effect; but the express had been anticipated by the Colonel and Mr. Greathead, who would allow none of the troops to pass down until they were relieved.

— A paragraph in the London Mail alludes to the death of Col. Justin Sheil, our Chargé d' affaire at Teheran; but we are happy to find in the Hurkaru of this morning satisfactory evidence that the account is unfounded. Letters of the 17th of August have been received in Calcutta from Teheran, at which date nothing of the Colonel's demise was known there. It is impossible that intelligence of his death can have reached Ireland from Persia, in a fortnight, except by the Aerial carriage.

— The festival of the Dusserah, which was expected to be marked by farther commotions at Lahore, has passed off quietly; and the account published in the Delhi Gazette Extra of the murder of Heera Sing, has not been confirmed. Neither is it certain that Duleep Sing has left the Capital with the diamond, and sought the protection of our Government. We have indeed no accounts on which any dependence can be placed subsequent to the great tragedy which closed with the death of Ajeet Sing.

— There is a very sparkling account of Darjeeling in this day's Hurkaru, but as we have a letter from our own correspondent there, we will borrow from our neighbour only the remarkable fact, that a robbery having recently been committed at the Bright Spot to the extent of 1298 Rupees, the whole sum was recovered by the Magistrate and four of the robbers seized; a circumstance so unusual in Bengal as to demand particular record.

— Our Bombay friends are dumfounded by the non-arrival of the Mail, while we for once are revelling in its contents, having received not letters and newspapers only, but the whole of our monthly Periodicals, within fifty days after their publication in London. The conveyance costs but a trifle compared with the overwhelming expense which their transmission from Bombay would have entailed.

— General Avitabile, who is released from all previous obligations by the recent tragic events at Lahore, is said by the papers to have been earnestly invited back; and, if we are not much mistaken, he is actually about to return thither, a measure for which it is impossible to account, considering the safety of his fortune in English funds.

— The troops under orders to move, which are ordered to stand fast on the banks of the Sutlege, are, the 4th Troop 1st Brigade Horse Artillery, 3d Company 5th Battalion Artillery with No. 5 Light Field Battery, the 3d and 7th Light Cavalry, and the 6th, the 15th, the 19th and the 64th native Infantry.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21.

— The 52d Regiment of Native Infantry now at Barrackpore has been somewhat suddenly ordered to Goruckpore, to relieve the 41st, which is understood to have suffered much from sickness.

— The Hurkaru states on the authority of a correspondent, that a rumour prevails of Golab Sing's having been assassinated on his way from Jumboo to Lahore. No confirmation is given of the murder of Heera Sing, reported in a Delhi Gazette Extra, and it may turn out to be premature. The death of the warlike Golab Sing would produce a greater effect on the destinies of the Punjab, than the removal of the young and inexperienced Heera Sing. The ashes of Shere Sing and his son Pertab Sing had arrived at Loodiana, on their way to the family tomb at Hurdwar. They were received with every demonstration of military respect.

— The Hurkaru observes, that at a grand tiffin party given on board the Bentinck Steamer in August last, the Chairman, Sir John Campbell, complained of the little support given to Steam Communication by the Indian community, and our contemporary considers this language to have a suspicious air, and to point to the proposed abstraction of the Hindoostan and Bentinck from our port, which was mooted some time ago. We have however been given distinctly to understand that at the time when the last Mail left England, not the most distant idea of any such arrangement was entertained by that Company.

— We have extracted from the Hurkaru, a well digested summary of the progress made by the Free Protesting Church of Scotland, compiled by the Editor from the various publications received by the last mail.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 23.

— The last Calcutta Gazette gives the names of the Officers whom the Governor General has selected for the command of the Army of Exercise. The subordinate staff is to be filled up by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

— The amount of Bills drawn by the Home authorities on the Calcutta Treasury by the last Mail, amounts to ninety one lakhs of Rupees. The greater part of this sum is designed to pay the Opium claims, which Parliament has fixed at the rate of about 600 Rupees a chest. This is a far higher sum than the Opium Agents had any reason to expect. The arrival of this large sum will ease, as they say, the money market.

— The Express came in from Bombay yesterday. The Mails by the Victoria reached that Port on the 11th of October, and the Express has been eleven days on the road!

— We learn from the Star that the Commander-in-Chief landed at Allahabad on the 7th instant, and was received by the Buffs and the left Wing of the 18th Regiment. His Excellency presented new colours to the 37th N. I. in lieu of those which were lost in the disastrous retreat from Cabul. The Regiment was commanded by the brave Major Griffiths, to whom Sir Hugh Gough paid several handsome and well merited compliments on the gallantry he had displayed throughout the whole of the Affghan campaign, and especially on the retreat. Why should it be a rule of the British service, that an officer by falling into the hands of the enemy, though under the most honourable circumstances, should forfeit all claim to any reward for his previous services, however noble and exemplary they may have been?

— Mr. Paymaster Routh, of H. M. 15th Hussars, has been found by a Court Martial guilty of the embezzlement of large sums of money and sentenced to transportation for seven years.

— Great doubt hangs over the report of Heera Sing's death which the Delhi Gazette appears to have published rather prematurely. The last number of the journal now received states, that a report prevailed in the city, that some bankers had written to their friends in the Punjab, to enquire whether Heera Sing was really dead or not, and that the answer was that he was alive.

— The 13th half yearly meeting of the Dock Company was held at the office of the Secretary, Rustumjee Cowasjee, Esq. To all appearances, this is the most flourishing Company in Calcutta. It works with a capital of about six lakhs, pays its Secretaries, as it is said, 2000 Rupees a month, and is yet able to divide a profit of Sixteen per cent. There were eight gentlemen present and it was unanimously resolved that the accounts were very satisfactory.

— Military stores are daily sent off from the Delhi Magazine to that at Ferozepore.

— General Sir Jasper Nicolls and his family leave Simlah on the 20th October for Ferozepore on their way to Sindh, Bombay and England.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 24.

— We republish from the Bombay Times a notice regarding the Panorama of Cabul, by the late Major Kershaw, of H. M. 13th Foot, and which his widow is anxious, if possible, to recover. The Major was one of the most exquisite draftsmen in the retreating army, and we hope that his admirable designs for Major Havelock's "Campaigns," which reached London too late to be published with that work, will not be lost to the world. He had, it appears, sketched a panorama of Cabul in eight sheets, and the last time he was seen by Capt. Souter, he had it slung to his back like a telescope. It was the only possession he had saved during the fatal retreat. We fear it is irrecoverably lost; but we recommend the appeal of his widow to our readers, in the distant hope that by some unforeseen circumstance it may possibly turn up.

— We also republish a letter which has appeared in the Delhi Gazette, to which we invite particular attention. Our readers are aware that it is popularly believed that General Pollock asked General Nott to send on a detachment of troops for the rescue of the prisoners at Bameean, and that General Nott refused to do so, on which Sir Richmond Shakespear pushed on with the Kuzilbashes and Sir Robert Sale followed him with a Brigade. The refusal has generally been attributed to pique, arising from General Pollock's having forestalled General Nott in the occupation of Cabul. The letter to which we invite attention completely upsets this assertion, and places the matter altogether in a new light.

— The sixth Criminal Sessions in the Supreme Court were opened for the present year on Monday last. The Clerk of the Crown appears to have ceased altogether to summon Civilians, who formerly constituted one third of every Grand Jury. On the present list there is not one Civilian; there are three Natives; the rest are Merchants and Agents. The Chief Justice charged the Jury. The number of cases on the Calendar, forty-four, is very considerable, considering that there are now seven sessions instead of four.

— A Delhi Gazette Extra received last evening states, that a letter had been received from Loodianah, dated the 13th October to the effect that a report prevailed at that station on what was considered very good authority that Rajah Golab Singh had been killed. If so, the only man capable of sustaining the fortunes of the Jumboo family has been removed, and we must expect a series of petty conflicts which will end in complete anarchy.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25.

— The Star has a long and interesting article in this morning's paper on the assemblage of the Army of Exercise, which will consist of as many corps as were originally assigned to it before the disturbances in the Punjab broke out. Our contemporary appears to think that work has been cut out for it in the Gwalior state, unless the demands of Government should be unconditionally complied with. Any arrangement which should leave a shadow of independence to this worn out despotism, would be most unadvisable. It is time that the whole country was brought under one administration. In every instance in which we have occasion to resort to arms, the occupation of the country should be complete and final.

REV. W. BOWLEY OF CHUNAR.

We have this week the melancholy task of recording the death of the Rev. W. Bowley of Chunar. Mr. Bowley has been for the last thirty years and upwards, one of the most laborious and faithful Missionaries of the cross in India; possessed of a robust constitution and buoyant mind, intimately acquainted with the habits and language of the people, capable of sustaining almost any amount of labor without injury, of simple habits and devoted heart, possessed of considerable preaching talent and full of love to souls—he was one of the most useful Missionaries in the country. For the translation of the Bible into Hindui, together with several of the most useful Christian books and tracts in that language, the Church of Christ is indebted to Mr. Bowley.

The cheerfulness and promptitude with which he undertook and executed works for the Bible, Tract and book Societies, rendered him, at all times, peculiarly valuable to these institutions. He loved them all, and ever most willingly and indefatigably aided them with his advice and his pen. He was the early associate of the beloved Corrie at Agra, and belonged in spirit and action to the Christians of that early stage in the history of Missions and Christianity in this land. He loved all practically who loved the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth.

This excellent servant of Christ had written to a friend the day before his death, stating that he was about to go on his usual Missionary tour in the cold season; he was then in his apparently usual health. The next day in almost an instant, while preparing to go to the bazar to preach, he fell a prey to death, it is supposed from an affection of the heart. Thus in the midst of his labors did he enter into his reward.

"Oh happy servant he in such a posture found."

May we also be found ready when the son of Man cometh, for in such an hour as we think not He cometh to many and he may so come to us.

Mr. Bowley was about sixty years of age.—Calcutta Christ. Advocate.

PROGRESS OF THE FREE PROTESTING CHURCH IN AUGUST LAST.

In conformity to the practice, that we have lately adopted, of giving our Scottish readers and others, who are interested in the questions which have recently issued in the disruption of the Scottish Establishment, a monthly review of the intelligence, received from the scene of that event, we proceed now to mention some of the leading points that have struck us, in our perusal of the last file of Scotch newspapers.

We have endeavoured to ascertain the precise extent of the secession, so far as it can now be known, but have not succeeded. We find the Town Council of Glasgow presenting a memorial to Government, on the hardship of their being compelled to fill up the vacancies in all those City Churches that belong to them, and which they say, contain 12,630 sittings, whereof 2,245 only are let. As some of the Residuaries in the zeal of the moment have taken several more sittings than they need, it appears, that even this proportion of occupied sittings, is a favourable representation of the matter. In Aberdeen, with Church accommodation for nearly 20,000 persons, there are only about 1,290 attendants at the Churches. The case cannot be much better in Edinburgh than in Glasgow. In one Church in Edinburgh, only thirteen families are said to attend. At Paisley, the case is almost as bad as at Aberdeen; at Hawick the chief place in Roxburgshire, 120 persons form the whole body of Church attendants; and many country parishes, especially Highland parishes, are named, wherein no persons whatever adhere to the Residuary Establishment.

This view of the matter is of itself gloomy enough, but when viewed in connection with other circumstances, it becomes doubly so. In Edinburgh, Paisley, Aberdeen, and Glasgow, and other Boroughs, the town councils, though they now will receive a very small amount of pew rents, will nevertheless be still compelled to maintain the Borough Churches and clergy. Even when all the seats were occupied, it seems from the memorial of the Town Council of Glasgow, that there was a deficiency which fell on the Borough fund; but now, that deficiency must be increased, perhaps, ten-fold, and raised to so considerable a sum, as to make the Church establishment, in all these towns, a means of augmenting very largely the local burdens; and therefore an object of general popular opposition. It does not appear to us very likely, that such an establishment will long be upheld in such a country as Scotland, for the benefit of about four thousand persons out of Glasgow's 300,000 or of about twelve hundred persons out of Aberdeen's 50,000. Nor is it reasonable that it should be so mantained, contrary to the will, not merely of the majority of the people, but also of a majority of the most intelligent and honourable of the Presbyterian clergy, by means of statutory enactments that violate the act of union, and on principles that have been repudiated by the people of the land, for centuries.

Nearly everything seems to be warring against the establishment. About 500 of the chief ministers have seceded, and while they are diligently working in their parishes, their former pulpits in most cases remain vacant. And with respect to a large proportion of these pulpits—those in quoad sacra parishes—they are likely to remain empty for a very long time. There is no endowment of them to induce any man to take them on that ground; and they now will yield no pew-rents. Thus, in many places, and those some of the principal places in the country, the Free Church is working without opposition.

But a much more important circumstance is contributing to that Church's success—we mean the infatuation of the Moderates. Not only have they re-enacted the old law for excluding dissenters from their pulpits,—the dissenters in Scotland, in very few cases, differing in any respect, as regards doctrine, and having, up to the first enactment of the schismatical law in 1799, been freely allowed the interchange of pulpits; not only have they thus commenced their career, but they have followed up that movement, by attempts to keep the quoad sacra Chapels which they cannot use, and yet by making the Free Churchmen who are their managers, still responsible for the debts on them; and then one of their friends, Mr Macleod of Macleod, has applied for an interdict, prohibiting a seceding minister from preaching on any part of his mountainous estate, even "on the highways thereof," and the Court of Session, their still warmer friends, have amazed and irritated thousands, by granting this interdict; and to crown all, "the Moderates" of St. Andrews, have applied to Government to enforce some obsolete statutes, and to dismiss Sir David Brewster from their university. It appears, that with Sir David must go all those distinguished persons, who are in any way connected with other Scotch universities, who are not Residuaries. Among these are Sir J. Herschel, Lord Francis Egerton, Professors Gregory, Fleming, Forbes, Kelland, Alison, Sir H. Bishop, &c. It never occurred to the Moderates to enforce these statutes against Episcopalians, nor against some professors, who notoriously had no religion at all. On the contrary, they elected Sir Robert Peel, Lord Rector of Glasgow, and never asked him to become a Presbyterian, and they have been content at Edinburgh, with one professor, who is an Episcopal clergyman. But now, Moderate ascendancy is about to show what it can do against Sir David Brewster, and so statutes are enforced, that in applying to him, must apply to several of the principal and most eminent professors, in the country and to a great portion of the parish schoolmasters. And, therefore, Sir David, when he marches out of the university, of which he is the principal ornament, may consider, that he leads about as large a procession of literary men, as ever walked in company.

As to Lord Aberdeen's bill, its fate has been most curious. The heads of it were privately submitted to the non-intrusion party, before the disruption of the Church; they considered that it unsettled many things, without satisfactorily settling any, and as they could get no other bill, they seceded, to the number of nearly half the clergy, and with the mass of the people. Those who staid behind, however, were of course friendly to the bill? No such thing. They met, and agreed to it, only by a majority of sixty-one, to thirty-three, the minority being headed by the most able, and probably most influential of the residuaries, the Moderator of the general assembly, Dr. Cook, and Dr. Mearns, by whom it was declared, that the bill could not be carried into effect, with satisfaction or advantage. The debate which preceded the decision on this question, showed very clearly, that there is as little union in the Residuary Church, as there was in the entire establishment, prior to the disruption. And "a house divided against itself cannot stand."

The building of the new Churches goes on well. The only serious impediment seems to be in Sutherland, where the people, almost without exception, have seceded, but where, from the refusal of the Duke of Sutherland to grant sites, considerable difficulty is sustained. In most places the new Churches are likely to be finished before the winter; and this rapid progress seems to be the chief source of embarrassment. The calls on the building fund are almost outrunning its increase; not that that has slackened, for nearly £10,000, are coming from Ireland, and £30,000 are expected from England. Other signs of prosperity are but wanting. In many parishes where the ministers did not secede, there are demands for new Churches; and so rapidly is the cause growing, that a necessity has arisen for the Free Church to obtain some additional labourers, from the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. The site refusing system seems to have failed everywhere, but in Sutherland. Many landlords, besides those we formerly named, have freely given ground. Even in Sutherland itself, three sites have been obtained. The spirit among the common people is extraordinary. One poor old woman who possessed a small piece of land in a parish, which entirely belonged to the Duke of Buccleugh, gave it up as a site for a free Church, though it was the whole of her earthly property, and though the Duke's agents offered her £500 for it; and this zealous conduct of poor Janet Fraser, has kindled a similar spirit in many thousands more. This circumstance, the refusal of sites, and the interdict granted to Mr. Macleod, have tended to keep alive the national excitement, but we notice with sincere gratification, that the seceding clergy, instead of inflaming the popular mind, with protests against the violation of the treaty of Union, and other political topics, have devoted their energies, and that too with almost unprecedented success, to a general revival of religion throughout those parts of the country, especially, when the deadening influence of moderatism was formerly most severely felt. Some of the accounts of the change in these districts, are most remarkable.—Hurk. Oct. 21.

THE LOST MEMNON.

A letter from Aden of the 29th ult. mentions that the Memnon "has gone entirely to pieces with the exception of the larboard paddle wheel with the boat on the top of it; some of the machinery and the boilers are visible above the water: the starboard side has broken up into four or five large pieces and floated on shore, while the larboard or shore side has come away entire from stern to stern just above the bilge, and lies it's whole length. The spot of the wreck is at the mouth of a very small bay (about 350 yards broad) about three miles S. E. of Ras Assair. It was remarkably fortunate that the ship struck at this exact spot, otherwise I fear not a life could have been saved, for even at the distance of 200 yards, either north or south from where the wreck now is, the rocks, which are so sharp that it is difficult to walk upon them, rise abruptly from the sea about eight feet high, and being hollow underneath to the depth of ten and in some places fifteen feet, any person dashed up in the serf must inevitably have perished. The ground above the shore was literally one field of letters and papers, the boxes having been opened by the natives in expectation of finding valuables. We recovered about 3000 letters but most of them damaged: Bills of Exchange were in the market to any amount, it being a common occurrence to pick up £5000 under a bush, or see a lac speeding steadily before the wind, and as for merchants' letters I assure you "esteemed favours" declared themselves most cruelly neglected— but joking apart all this must be a serious inconvenience to men of business."—Cal. Star, Oct. 19.

RESCUE OF THE KABUL PRISONERS.

To the Editor of the Delhi Gazette.

Sir,—I observe you allude, Mr. Editor, in your remarks on "TRUTH's" letter to General Nott's absolute refusal to send a Brigade for the prisoners and wish to know the true circumstances of this case, they are as follow:—On General Nott's arriving at the ground within four or five miles of Kabul, he [illegible]ived a private note from General Pollock, ASKING him to send off a Brigade towards Bameean, to aid in the bringing off the prisoners. The General knowing that Shumsood-deen and Sultan Jan had left Meidan two days prior in the direction of Bamean, and having reason to suppose that Mahomed Akbar had after his retreat and flight from the passes, placed himself between his prisoners and Kabul with what troops he could command, considered the force proposed to be detached too small, and wrote General P. so, telling him that if after this opinion he still wished the Brigade to go, to send him the order and it should be off immediately; the only reply to this was that General P., if agreeable, would breakfast and spend the day with General N. the next morning, which he duly did; at this meeting General Nott fully explained his sentiments on the above point and proposed to General Pollock, that either General should go with his whole force; but General P. did not seem to think the movement any longer necessary; however, on his road home from General Nott's camp he received another note from Shakspear, which induced him to send a pencil note to General Nott to relieve the corps of the Jellalabad force then in the Bala Hissar, and another order to his own camp for the Brigade under General Sale immediately to move; this is the true case, let those contradict it who can. General Nott received a request from General Pollock tantamount to an order not to enter Kabul before he, Genl. P., could enter with him, but without this request General N., well knowing there was no enemy there to oppose us, was not a likely man to harass his men and kill his cattle merely to be able to say he was there first; though, had he been aware of the Tom Foolery that was to be performed there on Genl. P.'s arrival he might have hurried to have used his influence, as second in command, if possible to prevent it. I allude to the king making, supported by two British Generals. There has been more said about the old Kazee Gun than it ever was worth; the only remark I have to make about it is, had General Nott received orders to bring it on, he would have done so; as he did not, he neither chose to harass his men or sacrifice life for such a rotten affair. You never asked why Pollock's division left it, that is what puzzles me.

SAWUN MULL—MOOLTAN.

The death of Sawun Mull (caused, we should say, by Dyan Singh, in connection with his proposed destruction of Shere Singh and his family, a point which the date of the event not yet ascertained, will clear up) may have even more immediate results on our frontier. It may be remembered that he has with some difficulty, on more than one occasion, repressed an evident inclination on the part of many of those around him to take part in the affairs of Scinde, and assist the defeated Shere Mahomed. That ruler is strongly suspected to be at the present moment at Mooltan, and the chiefs released by the restraining power of the late Governor, will be too ready now to give that assistance which he withheld so strenuously, when alive though not disinclined to take a slice of the spoil for himself should an opportunity have offered. The consequence will probably be the early appearance on the North Western Frontier of Scinde of a considerable force under the command of Shere Mahomed assisted by the Murree and Boogtee tribes; and, perhaps, by others, still further to the west. All these points will no doubt attract the attention of our Government and excite the vigilance of their servants on the frontier. In the meantime we have every reason to believe that military preparations on a very large scale are already in contemplation, that Lord Ellenborough has positively determined on proceeding at once to these Provinces, and that so strong is the impression at the Presidency that an armed interference will be resorted to, that strenuous efforts are being made by many Officers in that quarter to be allowed to form part of the staff of the Grand Army, or to speak in more homely language "to come in for a share of the (expected) spoil.—Delhi Gazette, Oct. 11.

THE LATE MAJOR KERSHAW AND THE PANORAMA OF CABUL.

We give place to the following from one of those bereaved by the slaughter in the retreat from Cabool—a wife made a widow by the death of a gallant and enterprising officer. We fear that the relic enquired after is little likely now to be found; but we are anxious to do all within our power to comply with the wishes of one who seeks—all in vain it may be—with the eye of affection to recover the memorial of the departed so much prized:—

"13, Hatherley Place, Cheltenham, July 27, 1843.

"SIR,—I hope you will excuse my addressing you, for I must introduce myself to your notice, as being one of the sufferers by the Affghan war; and having a presentiment that the panorama of Cabul, which was with Major Kershaw, at the time of his death at Gundamuck, might be recovered, if means were taken to give it publicity, I hope and trust you will do me the great kindness to have a paragraph inserted in your valuable paper, calling upon the sympathy of all persons to resign this most interesting memento of Major Kershaw's talents to his sorrowing relatives; and it is only through the medium of the press, both in the European and native languages, that a likelihood of recovery is surmised by our friends. Captain Souter, of H. M. 44th mentions, that the last time he spoke to Major Kershaw, was on one of the two last nights of the fatal struggle; he then had the panorama slung across his shoulders, about the size and form of a telescope. It was composed of eight sheets of paper, rolled on a piece of wood and covered with wax cloth; it was his only possession, and evidently the only thing he had the power of endeavouring to preserve during the fatal march. I feel assured, any one who possessed such a melancholy relic, would resign it in favour of his afflicted relatives; therefore a notice in the Gazettes of Persian and Hindostanee languages, might attract the observation of some one who could give some information of the valuable relic. The Indian news of the last month has a paragraph upon the subject—a kindness of the Editor's promptitude in assisting the afflicted, which we feel most grateful for, Messrs. Smith and Elder taking an interest in our cause, immediately they were made acquainted with it. Hoping to have some favourable result from your interest and kind exertions, I am, Sir, your obedient servant———."

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE BRIGHT SPOT.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Really Mr. Editor this is a bright spot, as the word "Darjeeling" was first interpreted, notwithstanding a sick lady or gentleman may occasionally doubt the fact, when enveloped in a mist, which only the amiable and enterprising "Ranald" can enjoy; but, the climate! who can impeach its salubrity? How quickly the exhausted invalid from the plains, recovers life and energy: whilst its influence upon the temper, may be justly compared to the "fideliter artes," which "emollit mores, nec sine esse feros." All here are gentle, from the excellent Superintendent, to the last "arrival:" and none more so, than the Lepcha natives.

The view of Darjeeling, from and above the approach, by the Auckland road, on a sunny forenoon, is blithe and pictorial, extending along a knobbed spur, and surrounded at a distance, by mountains, 9 or 10,000 feet high, with the glorious Snowy Range, rising upon a section of the horizon, like a bright supernatural bulwark. Among the dwellings of our dear countrymen, pitched at various elevations, stands conspicuous the imposing Hotel of Mr. Wilson; while at the upper extremity of the mountain, on a picturesque elevation, may be seen the admired ruin of a Boodhist monastery. The English Church which is now in preliminary progress, will soon arrest the gratified view of the Christian exile, and will cost some 8,000 Rupees, furnishing twelve dozen sittings.

The roads adjoining the settlement already extend about 18 miles, and exhibit many a transcendent view of sylvan beauty and magnificence, amidst the surrounding mountain scenery. The dense underwood teems with fruit and other useful products; and in this respect, Darjeeling probably stands pre-eminent among Himalayan Sanataria. The numerous gushing springs in the vicinity already attract fair votaries of the Hydropathic system, and a drooping Lily or Narcissus may be met, returning from the pure waters, with renewed life and grace. Amidst liberty, scenery and incidents such as these, it is not surprising that a warm son of Erin with his heart full of the green beauties of his native land, should become passionately enamoured of Darjeeling. Indeed in a moment of poetic enthusiasm, he was heard to mutter something about a rival Epic, to be entitled "Paradise regained," which it is to be hoped, in respect to the fame of our immortal Bard, he will abandon.

To lend dignity to this otherwise fugitive sketch, I must here introduce a statistical paragraph. The number of adult Europeans at Darjeeling this year, may be stated as 80.—7 civilians, 12 military, 7 medical, 2 clerical, 30 miscellaneous, and about 25 ladies; of whom 17 are present. These, a fanciful and flattering friend, has chosen to constitute a Bouquet, consisting of the following flowers:—Heartsease, Sweet William, Hyacinth, Jessamine, Daffodil, Lupine, Magnolia, Lily of the Valley, Myrtle, Honeysuckle, Woodbine, Rhododendron, Lavender, Hawthorn, Orangeblossom, Heliotrope, and the Double (red) Dahlia. Amongst these pretty flowers all, I beg to prefer the first named!

Accommodations, and Provisions have been tolerably commensurate to the wants of the Public this year, and will probably be on a much improved scale, next; for which, efforts are now making; but, a hint to families may not be out of place here, viz. to bring up goats enough to supply milk for children, and kid flesh. Furnished Rooms are now to be had by the suite; and as this mode of accommodation is found to be popular, it is probable that more Houses will be built upon the same plan.

Touching the approach to Darjeeling from the Westward, by water, it may be recommended to enter the River Mahanuddee, opposite to Rajmehal; and to ascend the Purnababa, eight miles below Malda to Dinagepore (when the quantity of water in this river will permit) whence staging Bungalows extend to Titalya. The usual water-route recommended, is that by the Mahanuddee to Dulolgunge, and thence to Titalya, by land; but, on this road, Bungalows are not yet erected, though contemplated, and it is probable that in the course of next year, both this route and that from Caragola Ghat on the Ganges opposite to Peer Pointee, via Purneah and Titalya, will be facilitated to travellers.

In conclusion I must commend to future visitors, a Guide to Darjeeling by Mr. Smoult, published by Messrs. S. Smith and Co., as containing much useful and interesting information; though it may be observed, that two instead of four Rupees, will be considered by the Public, a sufficient price for it.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

THE RUMOURED APOSTOLIC VICAR FOR MALTA.—We quite approve of the observations of our contemporary the Portafoglio on the rumoured appointment of an "Apostolic Vicar" for Malta, who is not to be a Maltese, and who, it is also added, is to succeed the present Bishop of Malta. The elements of religious strife are already sufficiently abundant in Malta, and most direfully irritating, without new importations. Indeed, it is difficult to conjecture where it will end—Malta has become, within these last twelve months, the very hot-bed, centre, and focus, of religious and sectarian debate, dissension, and clamour. The causes of this deplorable state of things have been frequently laid before the public in this journal, so we shall not repeat them. We are, therefore, most decidedly opposed to the introduction of an English or Irish Roman Catholic bishop, being perfectly persuaded that if such a measure is allowed it will be impossible to carry on the civil government of the island. Already, during the last year, if the truth is to be spoken, the public peace has been menaced by ecclesiastical dissensions. We trust, then, to see the new Governor set himself most determinedly against the introducing of this new element of religious discord and disaster to the peace of the inhabitants—reminding him, above all other things, that the intellect of the people is not strong, or matured enough for such theological discussions. We also repeat the observation made by us some months ago, that the appointment by the Court of Rome of such an emissary, or more politely, such a Vicar extraordinary," is injurious to, and asperses the character of the native Maltese clergy, clearly intimating, that they are not capable of managing the affairs of their own Church, an imputation which, if they have a spark of national honour and pride, they will resist with all their might. But besides this, as ecclesiastics are supposed to have ambition like other men, it is extremely disheartening to the native clergy, damping or destroying all emulation in them, and, in fact, removing all the motives of an honourable competition for the great prize of the Bishopric. Moreover, an English prelate can never be so well acquainted with the wants and feelings of the people as a native prelate. Rome would hardly send a Maltese bishop to Ireland, or to England; then why send a stranger here? . . . The case is not very dissimilar. But shall we let out the secret, "the cat out of the bag," if you prefer the phrase? Rome knows that a native bishop is more submissive (shall we say respectful?) to Government, and this haughty Court is determined, at last, to send out an ecclesiastic to Malta, who shall be a rival with the civil power, and who shall dispute the government of the island with the military Commander-in-Chief. This is the real state of the case so far as Rome is concerned. With the Maltese, as a nation, there can be no sympathy between this Court and them. The Maltese, however, on the other hand, grateful for the blessings of a free Government, and proud of that flag which waves only over freemen, and comparing their own wise and paternal Government with the neighbouring countries of the Mediterranean, are convinced of the immense superiority of British rule, and are unwilling to disturb the amicable social relations between themselves and Englishmen, and the general Government, provided, which has always been the case, they have their religion and their priests protected and honoured. We expect to see a Petition from the Maltese clergy, protesting against this projected innovation of the Court of Rome.—Malta Times.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COMMERCIAL.—During the month of August the manufacturers in Lancashire have been in full work, as compared with some months past, and, generally speaking, throughout the country there has been more business doing than at any previous period during the present year.

East India and Colonial produce, however, have not made any corresponding advance, considering the very low prices to which all kinds had arrived.

The stock of bullion in the Bank is increasing, and will probably reach £16,000,000, gold being a trifle dearer in London than in any other part of Europe. Money therefore, is still easy, at 2½ per cent. on tolerable security; but it has been more in demand, which shows an increasing trade, and, this aided by a bountiful harvest, makes us to anticipate that our future reports under this head will be more cheering than we as faithful journalists could make for some time past. We venture also to indulge a hope that the spirit of wild and reckless speculation abroad has been "laid," and that operations will be carried on with caution, remembering the large stocks on hand in this country, and that it must be some time before any outlet can be depended on to considerably reduce them.

Failures in the Iron trade are of daily occurrence, but the price has advanced 10s. per ton; the prevailing opinion is that many more of limited means will be brought down.

Since the foregoing was in print we have an arrival from America, and the following paragraph, which appears in one of the New York papers, and is generally considered to be worthy of credit, has been read with much interest by the merchants in the city:—

"Cotton, low as its price has been in England, has yielded this year a better return relative to the cost of its production than in some former years, when the prices in England were 50 per cent. higher than now. The cheapness of supplies, and bagging and bale-rope, and the increased industry and sagacity of the planters in putting corn and other crops in connexion with cotton, have produced this result. They have borne the depression of price incident upon a crop 50 per cent, greater than that of the previous year, with much less injury than could have been expected."

An American correspondent of the Times warns the public that from the rapidly increasing slave-power, which the people of the United States are unable to check, and for which they must provide employment, the area of plantations must be increased every year through the whole of the cotton-growing section of the Union. To such a degree, he says, is the extent already progressing, that even bad weather will not suffice to occasion what is called a "short crop."—London Mail.

LORD ABERDEEN.—We understand that the Earl of Aberdeen, on an application by the Rev. Mr. Manson and the adherents to the Free Church in Fyvie, for a site on which to build a church, has, in the most liberal manner, returned an immediate answer, expressing his willingness to grant a site on any part of his property that may be most suitable for that purpose.—Caledonian Mercury.

On Tuesday week a grand fête took place at Marlesford Hall, in this county, in celebration of W. Shuldham, Esq., the respected proprietor, attaining the 100th year of his age. The "Centenarian," we are happy to say, was in the best health and spirits on the occasion. The attendance comprised many of the principal families of Suffolk, and the numbers assembled on the domain were variously estimated at from 8,000 to 10,000 persons. A dinner was given to the Guardians of the Plomesgate Union, and the poor were also feasted upon the occasion. In the course of the day rustic sports took place on Marlesford Common, and the day's proceedings went off to the gratification of all present, though the weather in the afternoon was unpropitious.—Ipswich Paper.

LIBRARY OF THE LATE DUKE OF SUSSEX.—Among the various editions of the Bible in the library of the late Duke of Sussex, there are many highly curious by reason of their antiquity; but there is also in the same collection a copy of the Bible of quite modern date, equally interesting in point of rareness, and much more so from its intrinsic value. It is a copy of a Bible printed a few years ago by Messrs. Taylor, of Fleet-street, with translations of notes by Ganganelli. There are only three known copies in existence; one of which is the copy in question, and another is in the possession of Colonel Tynte, at Halswell. The notes are copious, learned, and explanatory. The circumstance of there being so few copies is said to be in consequence of a fire which happened at the printers soon after the copies had been struck off, whereby all were destroyed but three, which had been removed accidentally in the early part of the day. The Duke's copy was presented to him by Colonel Tynte, who was fortunate in obtaining one of the others for his own library. The Italian edition, from which the notes have been taken, is said to be also very scarce. It is believed that Colonel Tynte intends to publish the notes by themselves, with references to the passages to which they apply; and thus the country will have a benefit of which it was deprived only by an accidental calamity.—Times.

LIVERPOOL AND MANCHESTER RAILWAY COMPANY.—The Twenty-third Half-yearly Meeting of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Company was held last week, in the Exchange Buildings, Liverpool, for the purpose of declaring a dividend out of the profits of the undertaking. The Half-yearly Report set out by saying that the Directors would have been happy if they could have presented a more favourable report of the traffic for the last six months. In the merchandise department the receipts did not differ materially from those of the corresponding six months of last year, but in the coaching department there was a falling off of nearly 5000*l.* The accounts showed the receipts to be as follows:—In the coaching department, 60,752*l.* 14s. 2d; merchandise ditto, 45,245*l.* 12s.; coal ditto, 2,962*l.* 6s. 11d.; total, 108,960*l.* 10s. 1d. The total expenses were 51,897*l.* 18s. 6d., leaving a nett profit for the year of 57,062*l.* 11s. 7d. By the statement it appeared that the nett proceeds for the half-year amounted to 57,062*l.* 11s. 6d., to which must be added the surplus for the last half-year (after paying the income tax), 2,039*l.* 15s. 3d.; in addition to which the Directors recommend the appropriation of 1,347*l.* 13s. 2d. from the reserved fund for that purpose, making a disposable sum of 60,450*l.*, being equal to 5*l.* per share on 12,090 shares entitled to a dividend. The Directors accordingly recommended that amount of dividend to the proprietors.—Record.

MANCHESTER AND BOLTON RAILWAY.—The Half-yearly Report of the Directors shows that the total receipts for the half-year have been 17,811*l.*, leaving, after the payment of expenses, a disposable surplus of 10,296*l.*, equal to a dividend of 1*l.* 7s. 6d. per share for the half-year. An accession of business was likely to accrue from the opening of the Bolton and Preston Railway, which took place in June last, but irrespective of new sources of trade, there had been a considerable improvement in the past, as compared with the results of preceding half-years.—Ibid.

GEORGE THE THIRD.—The King being on the pier-head at Weymouth, about to embark in the Royal yacht on one of his sailing trips, turned round to Mr. Pitt, who was in attendance at his elbow, having probably hurried down from London for an audience on important business, and exclaimed, "Is not this a fine boy, Pitt? Fine boy, isn't he? Take him in your arms, Pitt—take him in your arms. Charming child, isn't he? Then suiting the action to the word, he made the stiff and solemn Premier, weighed down as he seemed to be with cares of State, dandle and kiss the pretty boy and carry him some minutes in his arms, albeit strange and unused to such a burden. The circumstance, though trivial, had so comical an effect, from the awkwardness and apparent reluctance with which the formal Minister performed his compelled part of nurse, as to make an impress on the writer, who stood by, though but seven years old himself, which time has never effaced. Pitt, although no doubt fretted by his master's childish fancy, which exposed him to the ill-suppressed titter of the circle around, including several of the younger branches of the Royal family, to whom the scene afforded great amusement, put the best countenance he could on the matter; but little thought, no doubt, that the infant he was required to nurse would at no very distant time had the offer of the same high official post which he then occupied—the Chancellorship of the Exchequer.—Life of Lord Sydenham.

BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—The up and down morning mail trains upon the London and Birmingham Railway are to be accelerated on and after Tuesday next, the whole distance being accomplished in four hours and a-half. For this increased speed, and for the superior accommodation which these trains (to be composed wholly of first-rate carriages) will offer, it is intended to charge an additional 2s. 6d. per passenger. To this there can be no objection, seeing that the other trains will continue to run at the usual charges. The carriages of the accelerated train are much more commodious than the others, and will take only fifteen in place of eighteen passengers, and no private carriage or horse-boxes will be conveyed by this train. It has been thus arranged at the urgent request of many of the nobility and the higher classes of society, and merchants and others, who are willing to pay an extra price for extra speed and comfort.—Railway Times.

HER MAJESTY'S STATE BALL.—We understand that 1,200 cards of invitation for Her Majesty's last state ball for the season were issued, and nearly that number attended. The Board of Green Cloth, we hear, granted six penny tickets to every coachman and servant in attendance on the company, which were exchanged at the Lord Chamberlain's office, the servants having had refreshments to the amount at the taverns and public houses in the neighbourhood of the Palace.—Record.

PRESENT TO THE PRINCE OF WALES.—On Thursday evening last, Her Majesty was pleased to command the attendance of two celebrated Welsh harpists (Mr. Jones, of Llanover, harper to Sir Benjamin Hall, and Mr. Griffiths, the harper of Tredegar), at Buckingham Palace, to have the honour of performing before Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and their illustrious visitors. At the same time, the Rev. Mr. Price, Vicar of Cwmdo (one of the most learned antiquaries of the Principality), was appointed with the splendid Welsh harp, made by Mr. Basset Jones, of Cardiff, the chief harp-maker of Wales, expressly for his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and which tribute of loyalty and respect Her Majesty and Prince Albert were graciously pleased to receive, and a description of which is subjoined. The Welsh minstrels first performed a duet, ("Codiad yr Ehedydd") on their own harps, after which Mr. Jones, of Llanover, had the honour of performing a solo on the Prince of Wales's harp ("March of the Men of Harlech"), which he did with much taste and effect. Mr. Griffiths followed with the ancient melody of "Pen-Rhan," which he performed in a very masterly manner. After which they played "Sir Harry Ddû" as a duet. The performances concluded by Mr. Griffiths playing a composition of his own, named "Dyverwch Tywysog Cymru; or, the Prince of Wales's Delight." The Rev. Mr. Price had the honour of explaining to Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert the peculiar construction of the harp of Wales, and the meaning of the Welsh mottos carved upon the Prince of Wales's harp, with the workmanship and design of which Her Majesty and Prince Albert expressed their approbation. Her Majesty was also graciously pleased to desire that the harpers might be informed that she had been much gratified by their performance. The harp which Her Majesty and Prince Albert have graciously received for his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is in the ancient and picturesque form of the national instrument of the Principality, stands about six feet high; it is elaborately carved in solid wood, the base of the pillar is supported by the leek, the emblem of Wales, entwind with misseltoe and oak leaves, wreath of oak leaves goes up the pillar, which terminates in the Prince of Wales's plume, supported by sprays of oak, from which depend three labels, on which are carved in antique characters, "Albert, Tywysog Cymru" (or Albert, Prince of Wales). On the side of the comb of the harp is likewise carved, in old characters, the following line from one of the Welsh bards:—"Faith enaid ar ei thannau" (the language of the soul is on its strings). On the sounding-board are emblazoned the arms of Wales, four lions passant—or, and gules counterchanged, with the red dragon of Wales supporting the shield, and the coronet and plume of the Prince of Wales.—Ibid.

LYCIAN ANTIQUITIES.—Our few words last week respecting the proceedings of the French Government, have obtained for us some particulars respecting our own Lycian expedition. Mr. Fellows, it appears, is now on his way to Malta, whence the expedition will start in October. It will consist of 100 persons,—engineers, carpenters, masons, &c., besides an architect and artist,—(under Mr. Fellow's control, who acts gratuitously). A Government steamer, the Medea, whose officers having been employed before, have volunteered again, is placed at his command. They will arrive during the healthy season, and not, as was the case when the Syrian marbles were fetched away, exactly at the time when the climate became intolerable, and even the natives had deserted the banks of the Xanthus, a mistake which occurred in spite of Mr. Fellow's express warnings, that they should be out of the country before the month of June. Lord Aberdeen and Sir Startford Canning have meanwhile diplomatically made all the arrangements to facilitate proceedings. The firman given to Mr. Fellows before is still in force; the local pachas are prepared to render every assistance; timber is felled in readiness to pack up all that may be acquired; and it is probable that every thing worth having,—on the Xanthus at least, besides what may be discovered elsewhere,—will be added to the stores in the British Museum.—Athenæum.

NARRATIVE OF SAALEH MAHOMED COMMONLY CALLED AKHOONDZADEH.—"I am the son of Cazee Mahomed Hassan of Herat, one of the principal persons of that city; we are the family whose lives Major Todd bought for 10,000 tomans from Yar Mahomed, when the former quitted Herat.

"When the Russians were advancing towards Khiva, Major Todd sent my father on a mission to that city. Afterwards Capt. Abbot went to Khiva, and I met him at Meroe, where I was purchasing grain. He sent me to Herat, and Major Todd ordered me to proceed and join that officer at Khiva, with 1,000 tomans. When I reached Khiva I learned that Mr. Abbot had gone towards Astrakhan, and, moreover, that he had been killed among the Kuzzaks. I still thought it my duty to follow his steps, which I did for 22 marches; the last four days and nights I was perfectly alone in the desert, and I found him wounded and a prisoner in a Kuzzack tent, where I delivered to him 980 ducats.

"I then returned to Khiva, and the day after my arrival Mr. Shakespeare and my father entered the city. Mr. Shakespeare despatched me to Herat.

"Four months afterwards Major Todd directed me to join Capt. Conolly, then on the road to Meroe, proceeding to Khiva and Koghan, and deliver to him 2,000 ducats. We resided seven months in Khiva. Capt. Conolly then sent me to Cabool to Sir W. Macnaghten with important despatches and messages. Shortly after my arrival in Cabool, Sir W. Macnaghten told me it was necessary that I should return to Khiva to inform Capt. Conolly that he was to remain in Khiva, and not proceed to Koghan, on account of the expected attack of Persia on Khiva. When I reached Meroe, fourteen or fifteen months ago, I found that Capt. Conolly had left Khiva and gone to Koghan. I became grievously ill, and the Khan of Khiva ordered me to be conveyed in a camel litter to Khiva, where I delivered my letters and presents, and remained upwards of two months waiting for orders from Captain Conolly, who, the Khan told me, had given him a promise to return to Khiva. Capt. Conolly then obtained leave from the Ameer for me to join him in Bukhara, which the Khan permitted me to do, and gave me presents, saying, at the same time, that Capt. Conolly had committed a great error by going to Bokhara, where he would be treated like Col. Stoddart. The Khan had a great regard for Capt. Conolly and expressed great regret at his having left Khiva. I do not know the cause of Capt. Conolly's quitting that city; but I suspect it was owing to an intrigue of the Mokter or Vizier. When I reached the Bokhara frontier, the commander told me that two days before my arrival (about the middle of December, 1841), the Ameer had seized and confined Col. Stodart and Capt. Conolly, and thus I could not proceed without further orders. He placed a guard over me. Five days afterwards orders arrived that I should be sent to Bokhara. We reached the city in two days about sunrise; an hour afterwards I was carried before the Ameer. I saluted him with 'Allaho-Akbar;' he looked at me for about a minute, but said nothing, and on his making a signal with his head I was carried off. They put me in confinement in a comfortable place, and treated me well. I was under the charge of the Topchi Bashi; so too were Col. Stoddart and Captain Conolly and Allahdad Khan, Shah Soojah's envoy, who were in confinement in his harem, and were then well treated. My servants, seven in number, and the servants of Captain Conolly, 33 in number, were imprisoned in the Seeah Chah, or Black Well.

"The Black Well is the prison for criminals. It is a circular well, 17 feet deep, and 21 feet in diameter; it has a brick roof, with a hole in it, and criminals are lowered down by a rope.

"I used to communicate secretly with the gentlemen. I was very ill, and the Ameer sent me a doctor. After 20 days he sent me two painters, and ordered me to make a plan of Herat. A week afterwards the Ameer sent for me at night. He was seated on the ground in a small room with two servants in attendance. He forced me to sit down, as I was ill. He asked how I, the son of a Cazee, could serve the English? He then spoke of the events in Cabul, and of the insurrection there. It was the disasters in Cabul which induced the Ameer to confine the two officers. Thirty days or so subsequently, about the beginning of Moharem (middle of February), two men came into my room, and stripped me of all my good clothes, and shoved me out of the room; and, at the same time, Allahdad Khan appeared under charge of two other men. The Ameer was looking out of a window. They took us to the top of a hill, outside the citadel, but within the city, and called for a rope. I thought they were going to kill us, but this was the Black Well; and I was greatly rejoiced to find that the rope was only wanted to lower us down, which was done. We found there Yoosoof, Capt. Conolly's Greek, and six others of his servants. The other people, being Capt. Conolly's servants, Allahdad Khan's and mine, amounting to about 55 persons, who had hitherto been confined in the well, with about 25 or 30 criminals, in all 80 persons had been previously removed from the well, where they were packed one on the top of the other. The necessary was in the same place, and it was removed every 15 days. The floor was beyond measure damp. I had no clothes except a cotton shirt and trousers, though it was deep winter, and I was very ill from fever and ague; but one of Capt. Conolly's servants gave me a cloth coat, which saved my life. Our food was a small piece of bread in the morning, and the same at night.

"Up to this time the two gentlemen remained in the same place of confinement in the harem of the Topchi Bashi.

"We remained for two months without any change and without any communication, with Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly. The Ameer then went to Koghan in the beginning of Rebbee-ool-Eovel (the middle of April), having first liberated Capt. Conolly's servants who were in the well. Thus Allahdad Khan, I, and Yoosoof, were the only persons living there besides the criminals; but our food was increased abundantly by an allowance given by Capt. Conolly, and permitted by the Ameer.

"The Ameer returned in less than two months, about the end of Rebbee-ool-Akhir (the last day of this month was the 10th of June). Three days afterwards we three were hauled out of the well, and Allahdad Khan and I were chained together by the neck. Allahdad Khan told me to say the Killemeh, for that they were going to put us to death. Yoosoof was chained with a Hindoo, a highway man, and a man who had killed his father. They took us in this way through the bazars to the citadel, and made us halt at a place where the Ameer looked at us. They took the chains from Allahdad Khan's neck and mine, and led Yoosoof and the other three prisoners out of the citadel and killed them. I saw their bodies half an hour afterwards. The Hindoo was killed first,—and then Yoosoof, and who told the executioner to sharpen his knife, that he might not suffer pain. He then raised his hands and eyes towards heaven, and his throat was cut. This one of the spectators told me. This happened on Friday, the 30th of Rebee-ool-Akhir (the 10th of June). Yoosoof while in the well, had become a Mussulman to escape the ill-treatment of the criminals, who would give him nothing to eat. He was not circumcised, but he said the Killemeh.

"Allahdad Khan and I were told we were at liberty to go where we pleased.

"I went to live with the Ameer's Vizier's father, who was a merchant and a good man, who pitied my condition. He gave me lodging, food, and clothing, and a Candahar merchant of my acquaintance, gave me 15 ducats. My five horses and two hired camels, and all my property, consisting of Cashmere shawls, gold-hilted sword, and gold-hilted dagger, and about 200 tomans in ready money, amounting in all to about 1,000 ducats, were seized and confiscated by the Ameer, besides about 450 ducats value of Government presents, which I was conveying to Capt. Conolly.

"The next morning a secret message came from Capt. Conolly, saying he had heard that I and Allahdad Khan had been killed, and that he was full of anxiety. The same day another message came ordering me to remain in Bokhara, that an English gentleman (Mr. Thomson) had gone to Khiva, and that he (Capt. Conolly) had contrived to send Hossein Lang, the Heratee to Khiva. When I afterwards went to Khiva, I found that Hossein had actually gone to Khiva, but had arrived after the departure of Mr. Thomson.

"On Sunday or Monday the Ameer sent to Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly certain letters from Cabool, which had got into the Ameer's possession seven or nine months before, the contents of which the Ameer desired to know. This I heard from Seyd Hossein, the brother of the Topchi Bashi, who had charge of the officers. The Ameer sent at the same time a message that he would free them in a few days, and told them to be of good heart. On Tuesday, at night, their quarters were entered by several men, who stripped them, and carried them off to prison; but I do not know whether it was to the Black Well or some other. In stripping Col. Stoddart, a lead pencil was found in the lining of his coat, and some papers in his waist. These were taken to the Ameer, who gave order that Col. Stoddart should be beaten with heavy sticks until he disclosed who brought the papers, and to whom he wrote. He was most violently beaten, but he revealed nothing; he was beaten repeatedly for two or three days. On Friday, the 8th or 9th (the 7th) of Jemmadee-ool Eovel (17th of June), the Ameer gave orders that Col. Stoddart should be killed in the presence of Capt. Conolly, who was to be offered life if he would become a Mahomedan. In the afternoon they were taken outside the prison into the street, which is a kind of small square. Their hands were tied across in front. Many people assembled to behold the spectacle. Their graves were dug before their eyes. Col. Stoddart exclaimed aloud at the cruelty and tyranny of the Ameer. His head was then cut off with a knife.

"The chief executioner then turned to Capt. Conolly, and said—'The Ameer spares your life if you will become a Mussulman.' Capt. Conolly answered —'Col. Stoddart has been a Mussulman for three years, and you have killed him; you killed Yoosoof too; I will not be a Mussulman, and I am ready to die,' saying which he stretched forth his neck. His head was then cut off.

"Their bodies were interred in the graves which had been dug, and I myself have seen the spot and the small hillocks which mark the place.

"One of the executioners gave me the foregoing relation, and, moreover, he offered to bring me the heads, if I chose, that I might take them with me, but I refused this offer.

"I remained ten days in Bokhara after the death of the two gentlemen, with the good Oozbell merchant, named Keshan-i-kazee; he had given the thirty-three servants of Captain Conolly and my servants food and clothes.

"The cause, as I said before, of the Ameer's treatment of the two officers was the events in Cabul. In addition to this, the day I was liberated from the Black Well, a letter arrived from Cabool to the Ameer, sealed by Akbar Khan, the brother of Allahdad Khan, the chiefs and moollahs of Cabool, stating that they had slain the greater part of the English, and that as he had feared to kill the two Englishmen who were his prisoners, he had better give them to the writers of the letter; but that Allahdad Khan was guiltless, as he had gone to Bokhara by the orders of Shah Soojah. This letter made a deep impression upon the Ameer. The object of it was to procure the liberation of Allahdad, and it was he who told me that such a letter had arrived.

"I thought it the best plan to leave Bokhara perfectly quiet. I, therefore, set out on foot, with one servant, who had remained in Bokhara. On the fourth day I reached the river, but the commander would not let me cross without orders from Bokhara, as I had no pass. This caused a detention of 15 days, until the pass arrived, but I was well treated.

"The day of my arrival, a Mr. Marcelli, proceeding to Bokhara, arrived. He said his father was a Mussulman, and that he wished to be a Mussulman, and enter the Ameer's service. He went on to Bokhara under restraint, and I heard by the return messenger who brought my pass that he had been put into the Black Well, to remain there until it was ascertained what he really was.

"I then hired a camel and went with a caravan in eight days to Meroe, where I borrowed 30 ducats from the Jews who were my acquaintances, and went on to Khiva. On my return with the money the Khan gave me, I repaid the debt.

"I went to Khiva, because I thought it might, perchance, be useful, there having been an arrangement to return to Khiva with Capt. Conolly, I was seven days on the journey, and travelled by the desert road. We had no guide, and being unable to find the wells, were near perishing from thirst, which would certainly have happened, had not some travellers come to our assistance. I remained 15 days in Khiva, and was treated with great kindness by the Khan. At my departure he gave me 120 tomans, and two coats of cloths, and a shawl. I then returned in 14 days to Meroe, where I halted 20 days, waiting for a caravan, and then I proceeded to Meshed. I sent some of the money given me by the Khan at Khiva in purchasing necessaries, and I borrowed 80 tomans, to be repaid by 90 tomans."

"TEHERAN, Nov. 23, 1842.—Besides the internal evidence of truth contained in the foregoing narrative, I wish to add that the appearance and manners of the Akhoondzadeh, who is a most intelligent prepossessing young man, contribute highly in strengthening the impression in favour of his veracity.—JUSTIN SHIEL."—London Mail, Sept. 6.

DANGEROUS USE OF MESMERISM.—A young lad, a baker in High Street, Glasgow, who had for some time past allowed himself to be mesmerised by all and sundry of his companions who desired it for their amusement, has for two days been so completely put into the magnetic sleep, that it is found impossible to get him out of it. During this time his eyes are shut, his jaws firmly fixed, and neither food nor drink can be administered to him. It is feared that the unfortunate youth may have forfeited his life to this folly.—Glasgow Journal.

REPORT ON THE NUISANCE OF SMOKE.—Augt.

17th 1843. The Select Committee to inquire into the means and the expediency of preventing the nuisance of smoke arising from fires, or furnaces, and who were empowered to report their opinion, together with the minutes of evidence taken before them, to the house;—have considered the matters to them referred, and have agreed to the following report:—

In their endeavours to investigate the subject, your committee have deemed it expedient to call before them a variety of persons. They have received the evidence of the most eminent men in the science of chemistry, and practical engineers of high reputation of leading master manufacturers and proprietors of steam engines, and of ingenious persons who had devised means and taken out patents for the prevention of smoke. The attention of the parties called to give evidence has been principally directed to the consideration of the following heads, on which their opinions were given:—

1. Whether it was practicable entirely to prevent, or very much to diminish, the nuisance now so severely felt in large towns and populous districts from the smoke of furnaces or of steam-engines.

2. Whether, if this were practicable, it would be advisable to take any steps to prevent the nuisance, as so doing might interfere with the property or interests of manufactures, or of the proprietors of furnaces.

3. If, in the event of the two former questions being answered in the affirmative, they would recommend some legislative enactment to be framed to prohibit the nuisance of smoke.

In regard to the first of these questions, it appears from the whole of the evidence of scientific and practical men, including master manufacturers, that smoke, which is the result of imperfect combustion, may in all cases be much diminished, if not entirely prevented.

It appears to be the unanimous opinion of the witnesses conversant with the subject, that imperfect combustion arises from a deficiency of atmospheric air to mix with and act on the inflammable matter at a proper temperature, and under circumstances which must ensure its effective operation: that this admission of air, properly regulated is the great, if not the only principle of preventing smoke which is generally applicable, and that all inventions for the prevention of smoke (except where the smoke has been separated mechanically by an artificial shower of water, produced in a flue constructed for the purpose), are only various applications, in different forms, of this general principle; even the flow or jet of steam which has been applied by some persons to prevent smoke in furnaces being merely a modification of this general principle, as, though steam may modify combustion, air must necessarily flow in with it, otherwise the combustion in the furnace is arrested.

The evidence before your committee further shows, that the admission of atmospheric air, under proper regulations, into the furnace is productive of saving in fuel, by causing the particles of carbon which would otherwise rise in smoke, and be wasted, to ignite, and thereby to increase the heat in the boiler.

It appears that the expense attendant on putting up whatever apparatus may be required to prevent smoke arising from furnaces is very trifling, and, as some of the witnesses observed, the outlay may be repaid within the year by the diminished consumption of fuel. For additional information on this subject, your committee beg to refer to the evidence.

Several most ingenious patents and inventions for the prevention and consumption of smoke were laid before your committee, which, from the testimony of the proprietors of furnaces by whom they were adopted, appeared to answer the two-fold purpose of preventing smoke, and of lessening the quantity of fuel required.

The means of preventing smoke might also be applied to the furnaces of steam boats, but such application would be attended with rather more expense than on land, from the occasional want of space and the setting of boilers in a steam-vessel. No doubt however existed, in the opinions of those examined, that the prevention of smoke could be accomplished in all steam-vessels.

The use of anthracite coal and of coke, as the means of preventing smoke, were not overlooked by your committee but, being well known, need not be repeated here.

In reference to the last and most important point under the consideration of your committee, how far it would be expedient to frame some legislative enactment to lessen the nuisance from smoke, your committee, after a careful survey of the evidence before them, seeing that the evils arising from smoke are severely felt in all populous places, and are likely to increase in proportion as wealth and the use of machinery cause a greater extension of furnaces and steam-engines, come, without hesitation, to the conclusion, that such a legislative enactment should be introduced without delay; and they trust that the perusal of this evidence will ensure cordial aid and co-operation on the part of the proprietors of factories in accomplishing an object so essential to the comfort and well-being of the surrounding country and population,—an expectation which your committee feel justified in entertaining by the knowledge of the laudable exertion which have lately been made, with much success, by the manufacturers and inhabitants of Leeds and Bradford in Yorkshire, for the prevention of smoke in those districts.

Your committee have received the most gratifying assurances of the confident hope entertained by several of the highest scientific authorities examined by them that the same black smoke proceeding from fires in private dwellings, and all other places may eventually be entirely prevented, either by the adoption of stoves and grates formed for a perfect combustion of the common bituminous coal, or by the use of coke, or of anthracite; but they are of opinion that the present state of knowledge on that subject is not such as to justify any legislative interference with these smaller fires.

In conclusion, therefore, your committee beg leave to recommend that a bill should be brought into Parliament at an early period of the next session, to prohibit the production of smoke from furnaces and steam-engines.

They indulge a hope that the matter will be thought of sufficient national importance to induce the Government to bring in a bill; but in the event of their not doing so early next session, your committee recommend that the chairman of this committee should frame such a measure, as being the necessary result of the complete and strong conviction to which they have come by the prosecution of this inquiry.—Edinburgh Observer.

COMPARATIVE SKILL OF THE ENGLISH AND FRENCH.—The execution of the railway from Paris to Rouen, by a company in which English capital predominated, under the influence of English habits, and under the direction of English engineers (although France had also enlightened representatives in the company) is not a fact indifferent in itself. By this we have placed before our eyes the elements of a very curious comparison between the proceedings of the two people. It will be very curious to trace that parallel, for it will show one of two things,—either it will turn to our advantage, and we ought to congratulate ourselves upon it, or it will show prominently the British superiority, and from that we may draw a conclusion from which we ought to profit. The fact is certain. The Rouen Railway has been completed in a very short period of time: less than two years have sufficed for that purpose. The sum of fifty millions of francs has been usefully and economically laid out in less than two years. This enormous mass of cuttings, of bridges, and of tunnels, has been conducted with such order, and so much system, that the whole is completed at the same instant. This is assuredly very beautiful. The English generally excel in promptitude of execution. It has been a thousand times remarked, with what rapidity a ship of war is armed in their magnificent arsenals, where immense stores of all sorts are collected for that purpose, and where, besides, engines of the most admirable construction are always kept ready for work.

The rapid execution of public works in Great Britain must be attributed in most part to the ability, or to express it better, to the wealth of the English contractors. The English contractor is a compound of the engineer and capitalist. He has the dollars of the latter, and he knows as well as the former all the intricacies and expedients of the art of construction. He is an architect,—he is a mason,—he is a carpenter,—but above all, he is a millionaire. On no one of the English railways have such manifest proofs of this been seen as on the Paris and Rouen Railway. One contractor,—one alone in two persons, associated in partnership, Mackenzie & Bracey,—undertook the whole line, and, with the exception of the rails, furnished everything. A mere bagatelle of some forty and odd millions! and everything done at the time appointed, and with the most perfect ease. This system is advantageous in a thousand ways. It simplifies the task of the engineer, and it is of service to the company, insomuch as it allows and secures a moderate net profit to the contractor, whilst the system of small jobs and the frittering away of the enterprise by their means is prevented. This useful and, in fact, indispensable class of men is nearly unknown in France. Among French contractors we may reckon many well-informed and enterprising men; but we can scarcely count any that are rich. It is not only that great capitalists are rare in France, but the engineer and the contractor are, with us, natural enemies to each other. In England, on the contrary, they are on the best terms. When the first section of the Rouen Railway,—viz., that portion from Colombe to Poissy, including two bridges over the Seine, and numerous embankments, was to be contracted for, the French contractors offered to complete it for 6,500,000 francs. Messrs. Mackenzie & Bracey took it for 3,730,000 francs, and made a profit by their bargain. We must confess, at the same time, that the superiority of the English speculators does not proceed alone from their wealth and capability; they possess in the workmen whom they employ a productive power arising from two causes, which is our own fault if we do not extend to our country.

The English workman gets through more work in a given time than a Frenchman. Is this because he is more intelligent, more supple of limb, quicker or more dexterous than the Frenchman? No; but he has more muscular power, and is provided with better tools. Place a French workman in the same circumstances with regard to food and tools, and he will be soon equal to an Englishman. A hundred times we have seen instances of it. At the forges of Charenton, about twenty years ago, when the consequences of a strike forced Messrs. Manly and Wilson to employ French workman in some of their most difficult operations, it was found that these men, heretofore inferior, did the same quantity of work as the English, from the moment that, like them, they were fed with beef and mutton, washed down with copious draughts of beer and wine. On the Rouen Railway the same proof was afforded. At the bridge of Tourville, the piles of stone-work were divided between the French and English, separated the one from the other, but provided with the same tools, and living in the same manner. A love of roast beef having spread among the masons of Normandy, there was a trial of strength between the two, and the French gained it. At Rouen, the splendid establishment of the Chartraux, founded almost in a day by English people drawn thither by the necessities of the railway, and devoted to the construction of carriages and engines, was carried on by means of both French and English workmen. In all those kinds of work requiring more skill and nicety than manual strength, the French very rapidly became equal to the English; in the smithies the English were far in advance. But the French, as soon as they began to imitate their mode of work, and more especially to feed upon beef as they did were soon as powerful as they. This is one more proof of the necessity of extending, by all possible means, the use of meat among the labouring classes of France.

Besides this, as we have already said, the English workman is generally provided with better tools than the French; and this superiority contributes, in a great degree, to that result so eminently advantageous to him, that you may give him a larger amount of wages, without increasing the ultimate cost of the work. The tools of the savage are his ten fingers only. In proportion as society advances in the path of civilization, man invents tools, which become, in fact, additional origins, thereby his strength and acting are increased. The English bring more ingenuity to the construction of tools and engines than any other people. By this means they facilitate and simplify labour. Amongst them, tools are invented, or improved every day. The steam-engine is with them a tool, and no more; so is a railway itself. They construct large embankments by establishing temporary railways, on which the waggons filled with earth or stones are put in motion by an ordinary locomotive. This mode of operation contributed in no small degree to the cheapness of the embankments on the Rouen line. In the same way, the English have found means to improve tools which, one would have thought, had reached to the last degree of perfection. It might have been remarked, on the Rouen Railway, that their barrows, their pickaxes, their hatchets, and their spades were different from ours. It may also have been remarked that the English workmen understand the division of labour better than ours do, and can execute more difficult and ingenious turns than ours can. It is difficult for those not thoroughly acquainted with the matter to form an idea of the great practical importance of the proper distribution of labour, and of quickness of hand, even in works which appear the most elementary. Simply on account of their superiority in this respect, the Flemish labourers in the vicinity of Dunkirk, who make use of exactly the same kind of implements as ours do, will sometimes gain double the amount of our men, although paid at about half the price per cubic metre. And it would have been well if our engineers had studied in this respect the proceedings of the English. The opportunity was favourable. Out of 8000 workmen who at the busiest times were employed upon the line, 4000 at least were English excavators, masons, bricklayers, miners, carpenters; workmen of every kind had crossed the Channel; and all these men applied themselves to their work, because French workmen were mingled with them, and the population generally had their eyes upon them. It was an open competition, in which the English and French were not the only competitors. At the bridge of Maisons, for example, almost as many languages and idioms were spoken as at the Tower of Babel. There were British, French, Piedmontese, Germans, Poles,—and the British were subdivided in their dialects, some speaking Welsh, some English, some Irish, some Scotch.—Journal des Debats.

FRANCE.—Considerable alarm prevailed in Paris respecting the reported Turkish expedition against Tunis, and two ships of the line and a steamer sailed from Toulon for that destination on the 26th.

The Semaphore de Marseilles of the 28th ult. announces, that in the evening of the 25th the Maritime Prefect was instructed by a telegraphic despatch to send out immediately all the vessels of war which had their provisions on board, and early in the morning of the 26th the Gemappe and Alger ships of the line, and the steamers Castor and Euphrates, put to sea, the ships and the Castor for Tunis, and the Euphrates for the islands of Hyeres. It was supposed that the Government had received some important information from the Regency of Tunis, and its last despatches from Constantinople had apprised it of the intention of the Ottoman Government to make another attempt against that Regency. Some even stated that the Turkish fleet was already before Tunis. The Cerbere steamer, returning from Bona, on the 19th, descried a fleet of nine sail off Cape Gattes, apparently steering towards Gibraltar. This naval force, at first mistaken for an English fleet, was now believed to be the Ottoman squadron, which was to have put to sea on the 5th for the Archipelago.—Record.

The Gothenburg Gazette states as positive that the interview which took place at Stralsund between the King of Prussia and the King of Denmark included, amongst other objects, the marriage of Prince Frederick of Hesse, nephew of Christian VIII., with a Grand Duchess of Russia. Prince Frederick is presumptive heir of the Electorate of Hesse and of the kingdom of Denmark.—Ibid.

General Alava, one of the brave companions of the great Duke on the field of Waterloo, and afterwards Ambassador from the Queen of Spain in Paris and London, died a few days since at the Waters of Bareges. We have seen a private letter of the Duke of Wellington's, in which he states, that after his own despatch in the London Gazette, General Alava's was the most to be relied upon of all the official and unofficial accounts of that memorable battle. That same letter contained also the contradiction of a remarkable error committed by the Prussian General Gneisenau, in the despatch which he addressed to his own Government. He there mentions that Blucher and Wellington met, accidentally, at the farm-house of La Belle Alliance, when the two armies were in pursuit of the flying squadrons of Napoleon, and that Blucher wished the battle to be called the Battle of La Belle Alliance, in commemoration of this circumstance. The Duke says, they met at Genappes, several miles further on, and adds (what is the fact), that any person who inspects a plan of the field of battle, will see that it was impossible they could have met at La Belle Alliance. The mistake is curious; and teaches us the value of historical truth. Sir Walter Raleigh felt this when he consigned to the flames the manuscript of the second volume of his History of the World, because he could not get at the exact truth of a brawl which had occurred only ten minutes before beneath his window in the Tower. "And yet," exclaimed the too scrupulous historian, "I am pretending to relate the exact truth as regards events which happened two thousand years ago!"—Weekly Paper.

Spain.—"Bayonne, Sept. 4.—"Mr. Aston, Minister Plenipotentiary of England, announced on the 24th, to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, at Madrid, at an audience which he had asked for that purpose, that his Government had acknowledged the provisional Government of Spain, and that the relations of good harmony and friendship had hitherto prevailed between the two countries would continue as heretofore. This news is inserted in the official Gazette of the 31st.—London Mail

Joe Smith the Mormon Prophet.—News was brought to St. Louis, on the 29th ult., by the steamer Osprey, that Joe Smith, the Mormon Prophet, has been arrested and placed in gaol at Ottawa; and further, that when the intelligence reached Nauvoo two hundred horsemen of the Legion started immediately for Ottawa, with the intention of liberating him. The steamboat Iowa had also been chartered at Nauvoo by the Mormons, and is at present ascending the Illinois river with one hundred and fifty armed men, to second the attack of the horsemen on Ottawa. Ottawa is situated up the Illinois, and is distant about three hundred miles from this city. We believe the Prophet has been travelling in the northern part of the State, for the purpose of keeping from the arrest made under the requisition of the Governor of Missouri, which accounts for his being lodged in gaol at Ottawa.—New York Herald.

The Seventeen-year Locusts of America.—The locusts have made their appearance both at Hartford and Newhaven; seventeen years having elapsed since their last visit. In the vicinity of the Hubbard Farm, back of West Rock, Newhaven, they are to be seen in immense quantities, covering the leaves and branches to the tops, and flying off in swarms after maturing their wings for a flight. A correspondent of the Newhaven Herald says,—"Their singing, when in a state of rest, is heard more than a mile. They commence when the sun shines pleasantly. About half past seven P. M., when the sun is obscured, they shelter themselves under the leaves of the trees and in the grass. The swarms that have proceeded from this field have taken a northerly direction, flying about forty roods at an effort. As far as I have observed, they make but one flight in the same day. They have hatched in the same field at four different periods, at intervals of seventeen years each, according to the memory of one person who lives in the neighbourhood; others can remember for two and three periods.—Edinburgh Observer.

The Honourable the Lieutenant Governor is pleased to place the Settlement of Mussoorie under the Provisions of Act X. of 1842, and to authorize the Gentlemen noted in the margin* to constitute themselves a Committee as provided in Section II. of the said enactment.

* A. Macgregor, Esquire.
Major Swetenham.
Captain Hutton.
Mr. Healy.
Mr. E. A. Pitts.

The annexed Code of Bye-Laws approved by the Lieutenant Governor North Western Provinces, is published for general information:

BYE-LAWS.

I. A rate not exceeding five per cent. per annum on the annual rents of all houses in Mussoorie and its vicinity, payable in advance on the 1st October, commencing 1840, shall be levied for 1841, and for future years, for the purpose of repairing, widening, fencing and improving the roads of the Settlement, and for other purposes hereinafter specified; and the fund thereby raised, shall be under the management of a Committee, to be denominated the Committee of Roads, and Bye-Laws of Mussoorie and its vicinity.

II. The Committee to be composed of not less than five, or more than seven Members, with a Secretary, being Registered Proprietors of Houses. The Committee is empowered to nominate a Chairman and Treasurer from amongst their own number, and appoint their Secretary, such Secretary being a Registered House Proprietor and not a Member of the Committee. A majority of the Committee shall form a quorum, and when the suffrages are equal, the Chairman shall have a casting vote.

III. The Committee to be chosen by the votes of Registered Proprietors of Houses on the last Saturday in the month of May every year, at a meeting to be held at Mussoorie, and to be called by the Secretary of the Committee six weeks before, by advertisement in the Mofussil papers, for that purpose, and for the purpose of recording reports of past proceedings, passing accounts, and considering the measures most necessary to be undertaken by the new Committee.

IV. Any vacancy occurring in the Committee between the Annual General Meeting, which reduces the number below five, to be filled up by the votes of the remaining Members of the Committee.

V. Should the Committee consider it necessary to lay any matter before the Proprietors, or should any four Registered Proprietors request a meeting, the meeting to be called by the Secretary, by letter sent to all the Resident Proprietors informing them of the object thereof.

VI. A Registered Proprietor is entitled to vote by proxy, but no voter to have at any meeting, in virtue of general proxy, the command of more than four votes, including his own.

VII. The proprietor of a house being registered paying the rate on rupees 400, to have one vote at all Meetings, and of a house or houses paying the rate on rupees 2,000, to have two votes, and on rupees 8,000 or more, three votes.

VIII. All houses from the Gorge above Rajpoor to Budraj inclusive, all houses on either side of the main roads in that direction, to be considered as in Mussoorie and its vicinity, and consequently liable to pay the rate; the neck of land generally known as the Grand Parade, and dividing Mussoorie from Landour, to be considered as the boundary to the north-east.

IX. The Committee to have the power of assessing houses, and should any Proprietor consider himself over-assessed, the subject to be referred, either personally or by letter, to the next General Meeting of Proprietors, whose decision shall be final: and an Agent or Tenant shall be empowered, on application from the Committee, to deduct from the rent due to a Proprietor any sum remaining due on account of the rate: and, upon the application of the Committee, through the Secretary, to any Magistrate or Justice of the Peace, such Magistrate, or Justice, shall be authorised to exercise the same power for levying the rate, which may be due from any defaulter as are specified in Act II. of 1839, inasmuch as that Act relates to the levy of such sum by distress, sale of the goods and chattels belonging to the person from whom the rate is due.

X. No Registered Proprietor to be allowed to vote at any Meeting, unless the rate at which his property has been assessed for the year has been paid.

XI. No Proprietor to be entitled to vote at any Meeting in virtue of a purchase until after registry of his purchase.

XII. A Register of estates and assessment shall be kept at the Superintendent's Office; and the Secretary to the Committee of Registered Proprietors, shall be bound to cause this Register to be duly corrected on every change of Proprietorship being intimated to him, and on every alteration of assessment made by the Committee. This Register to be considered the authentic Register of Proprietors entitled to vote in person or by proxy, and the assessment entered in this Register to be the assessment to be collected.

XIII. A duplicate Register to be kept by the Secretary to the Committee at Mussoorie, and notices of change to be made to the Secretary at Mussoorie. A fee of one rupee to be charged on Registry, and a further fee of one rupee for a copy or certificate of Registry.

XIV. The Committee to be empowered to levy a fine not exceeding 20 rupees on any person or persons, proved to them, as having bathed, or committed nuisance in or near any streams from which water is drawn for the community, or having destroyed, or in any way injured, any road, under their charge, by the throwing down stones, or rubbish, or in any other manner. The fine to be recovered as in Bye-Law IX.

XV. In cases where it is required to throw rubbish in the road, for temporary purposes such as clearing sites for building upon, permission to be obtained from the Committee, whose duty it will be, in granting such permission, to take care that the party is bound down to repair any injury that the road may sustain, and also to prevent the public being inconvenienced.

XVI. Should the funds at any time, at the disposal of the Committee, admit of the outlay, the Committee are authorized to cut roads to all the frequented springs, and to have tanks and reservoirs dug at different parts of the settlement, where water is most required.

XVII. No sums of money to be paid out, or expended by the Treasurer, without the sanction of the Committee.

XVIII. All fines levied by the Committee, in consequence of the infringement of any of the above Bye-Laws, to be made over to the Committee for the repairs of the roads.

Hindoostan 13th February, 1844.
Bentinck 15th March, .. 1844.
Hindoostan 12th May, .. .. 1844.

To parties proceeding to Europe, the advantages offered by the Overland route need no comment as independently of the certainty of arriving in England within two months, they are saved both the trouble and expense of fitting up Cabins and providing a large outfit of clothing which on their arrival at home is quite useless. Any further information can be obtained by applying at the Co.'s Office, No. 11, Strand.

J. R. ENGLEDUE,
Superintendent and Agent.

24th August, 1843.

PARCELS OVERLAND.

AS many persons have complained of delay in the delivery of their parcels, and as such delay arises from the parcels not being sent through the proper office. J. R. Engledue requests the Indian Community desirous of availing themselves of the Overland route to send their packages direct to his office in Calcutta, Captain Biden, Madras and to Captain Twynham, Point de Galle, and to instruct their Booksellers, Tradesmen and friends in England to send them to the following offices in London, viz.

James Hartly and Co. 16, John St. Crutched Friars and 44, Regent Street, Piccadilly.

James Barbay and Co. 17, St. Mary Axe.

All orders accompanied by a remittance will be promptly attended to.

J. R. Engledue will receive dividends and remit by order payable at sight upon Jas. Hartly and Co. London.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

A LADY of high respectability and accomplishments, residing in a healthy part of the Coast of Kent, wishes to receive four Girls to board and educate with the advantage of living in a private family. The Lady is a mother, and having been for some years in India is well acquainted with the treatment for young persons of delicate constitutions. If desired too, she would have no objection to take charge of one or two little Boys up to 7 or 8 years old, in any case where parents were unwilling to separate brothers and sisters. The terms will be moderate varying according to the age of the pupil, but always for a specific sum annually, including extra charges of every description.

Cards of address, and other particulars will be given by the undersigned, and parties writing Home may communicate with Messrs. J. Cockburn and Co., No. 11, New Broad-street, London.

At a Meeting of the Committee thus constituted, held Sept. 29th, 1843, it was unanimously resolved:

1. That the principles, the objects, and the success of the Scottish Mission, appear to this Committee, to warrant the most cheering expectations, that, with the blessing of the Lord, it will prove a powerful agent for good in this benighted land; and that former benefits which have been derived from it, as well as the prospect of its future usefulness, impose a duty on all who are anxious for the spread of the Gospel, to succour and extend it.

2. That this Committee rejoice to hear, that it has been declared by the Church to which the Missionaries are now attached, that they desire to carry on and to increase their present Missionary operations.

3. That this Committee is of opinion, that an appeal for the purpose of raising funds to carry out this design, can be made nowhere so appropriately as in this country, where the nature and results of the Scottish Mission are most accurately known, and where its benefits have been imparted; and that a subscription be therefore opened, to assist its future maintenance, and to further its extension.

4. That this Committee considering, that under the terms of the interim arrangement lately made between the Missionaries, and the Calcutta corresponding Board of the Established Church, with which they were recently in connection, the whole support of the Mission must, very soon, be derived through this Committee, (from funds contributed to the purpose in Great Britain and in India,) and not, as heretofore, through the above mentioned Board;—and that, therefore, provision ought to be made, to meet the necessarily large current expenses of so extensive a Mission, from the early date when that arrangement will terminate; and also considering their prospects, of still further increasing the Mission, and the necessity of providing for the purchase of the present Institution, (which by law belongs to the Established Church,) or for the erection and furniture, or for the rent and furniture of another building, do, on these grounds, make an earnest appeal to all of every Church, who desire to promote the glory of their Lord in this land, and to extend his Kingdom, to come forward and help them with liberal donations and permanent periodical subscriptions.

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY MORNING.

No. 461. VOL. IX.] SERAMPORE: THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2D. 1843. {Price 2 Co's. Rs. monthly, or 20 Rs. yearly if paid in advance.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL has resolved again to proceed to the Western Provinces after a residence of less than four months among us, without having accepted the invitation of the Civilians to a public entertainment. They will thus learn the value of being earlier in the field when his Lordship again returns to the Presidency, and is prepared to receive the congratulations of the public service.

Lord Ellenborough's departure appears to be sudden, without being unexpected. After his declaration at one of the public dinners that his proper place was by the side of the Commander-in-Chief, more especially when any work had been carved out for our military friends, it was naturally to be expected that the departure of his Excellency for the Army of Exercise would be followed by that of his Lordship. The recent journey of the Governor General's Military Secretary, to the same destination, was regarded by the discerning as an index of his Master's intentions which could not be mistaken; and so it has turned up.

Lord Ellenborough returns to the North Western Provinces divested of all the encumbrance of their internal administration. During his previous residence there, he combined in his own person the office of Governor General of India and of Lieut. Governor of the Agra Presidency; but he has entirely altered the character of the administration by separating the duties of Deputy Governor of Bengal and Lieut. Governor of the North West, from the post of Governor General, and by reserving himself exclusively for the Political and Military responsibilities of the Empire. Though the arrangement has been made the subject of animadversion, and will in all probability come under the revision of Parliament during the next Session, —that is if O'Connel and Rebecca should leave that assembly any leisure—yet in our humble apprehension, it appears to be reasonable and beneficial. Any inconveniences it may entail appear to be outweighed by its substantial advantages. It is perfectly absurd to crowd on the Governor General all those details of business to which he can give no adequate attention without injury to the general interests of the Empire. It is the dictate of common sense to place the internal economy of the country under the direction of men who have a thorough and comprehensive knowledge of it. This overloading of the Governor General with the minutiæ of business is the last relic of the Commercial system of the Company, under which the Chief of the Factory was mixed up with the details of all its transactions. In this country the Head of the Government ought to occupy the same position in the administration, which the Premier does in the administration of Great Britain, and should be burdened with no duties which it would be considered preposterous to cast upon that functionary.

On the present occasion, when large political questions have arisen out of the revolution at Gwalior, and yet larger questions may grow out of that in the Punjab, it seems eminently proper that the Governor General should be on the spot, to direct every diplomatic and military movement, and to provide for every emergency as it may arise. As it regards Gwalior, it is to be hoped that the vigour and decision which have marked his Lordship's career, may be displayed in putting that state out of a condition to give us any future annoyance or disquietude. It would be a matter much to be deplored if any half measure should be pursued in reference to it, or if the present opportunity of giving to its oppressed inhabitants the benefit of a British administration, be neglected. It is time that the independence of these principalities should cease, and their chiefs be consigned to the indolent repose of a pension, for which alone they are fit.

THE PUNJAB.—There is nothing new from the Punjab. The only intelligence received from thence since our last issue is, that our previous news was unfounded. Dulеep Sing has not abdicated the throne, and taken refuge in our territories, with the celebrated Diamond. Lena Sing has not murdered Heera Sing; both are alive, and hearty; conducting the administration in unison, perhaps in harmony, and General Ventura is apparently Commander in Chief. Golab Sing has not been murdered, except in the papers; neither is he within three days march of the Capital, with 20,000 men; but is said to have returned to his family domains in Jumboo, if indeed he ever left them. The announcement that he had quitted that country to march on Lahore, always looked doubtful, for his hold on it is so entirely dependent on his own presence, that after he had accompanied our troops through the Khyber, he was obliged to leave the army on the well founded plea that he dared not continue long absent from Jumboo, lest its refractory mountaineers should subvert his authority. He is more likely to allow matters at Lahore to take their course, than to risk the loss of his rich and unassailable principality, by absenting himself from it: He is too wise to exchange his real sovereignty in the Hills for any divided rule at the Capital. He will not drop the substance to grasp at the shadow.

The Government at Lahore is for the present strong; the troops, whose importance and arrogance is always doubled on the occurrence of a revolution, are said to be clamorous for higher pay and gratuities, and may upset the present administration; but as yet it is sufficiently vigorous, to maintain its external relations of amity, which is all we have to look at. There is no opening for the wedge of our ambition. It is quite possible that Peshawur may again pass under the dominion of the Affghans; but our own frontier has not been violated, nor have our allies been insulted. All that we can do therefore is to station a strong force to watch the fords of the Sutledge. Meanwhile the Governor General and the Commander in Chief will possibly find sufficient occupation, on the banks of the Jumna, in reviewing the Army of Exercise, and preparing it to assist, we hope, at the obsequies of the House of Scindia.

THE COOLY TRADE AGAIN.—Since the issue of our last number, the draft of an Act has been published which ordains that after the 1st of March next, Coolies shall be shipped only from the Port of Calcutta, and that an Emigration Agent shall be appointed there on the part of the Government of the Mauritius. The Governor General is so anxious to carry the Act through, that he has suspended the rule which requires the publication of the Draft two months before the Act is passed. Yet, strange to say, the Act itself is not to come into operation for nearly four months. We can divine no other cause for this extreme haste and subsequent delay, than the desire to allow those who have made arrangements for the collection and shipment of Coolies at Madras and Bombay sufficient time for winding up their affairs. If the Ports had been originally opened on the system which was guaranteed by the Privy Council, no such concession of time to the Cooly Merchants, would have been requisite. Their vocation has grown out of a breach of public faith, which cannot be palliated. It will of course be their business to make the most of the three months and twenty days which the new Act allows them—and it will be the duty of Capt. Rogers and Mr. Fraser, to exercise more than ordinary vigilance to prevent abuses.

The Act grows, of course, out of the suggestion of Mr. Anderson, the Cooly Protector, who has been sent up from the Mauritius, after ten months of inaction, on a special Mission to Bengal; and we regret much to see the selfishness which appears to characterise the proposed law. The only reason given for now carrying into effect that part of the original design which provided for the appointment of an emigration Agent at the port of embarkation, and which was held out as a remedy for the abuses which had rendered the older trade intolerable, is, that a sufficient number of women had not been sent with the men! The abuses which have grown out of the neglect of this appointment do not seem to have occasioned the smallest disquietude, and are not so much as hinted at. It would appear as though the Mauritius Government, suspecting that if the emigration had been at once placed under the charge of a responsible agent, the wants of the island would not be supplied as rapidly as the planters desired, have been quite content to leave the provision of Coolies to individual cupidity, however revolting might be the abuses which it engendered. The Mauritius Authorities appear to have waited till the island was sufficiently stocked with labourers collected under a system of private agency, before any check was placed on these proceedings. And its present interference has no respect to the interests of the Coolies; it is publicly declared to arise from an exclusive attention to those of the island. It was found that the supply of twenty thousand coolies had cost the colony fourteen lakhs of Rupees, and that as the men had in general come without their families, and would claim their privilege of return at the end of five years, an annual expenditure of 30, or 40,000£ would be necessary to keep up the complement. It is on this ground that the Mauritius Government appears to have sent round an Agent to make arrangements for stopping all farther emigration, unless the men could be induced to take their families with them, and thus hold out a hope of their settling in the island. We will not affirm that such is the reasoning on which that Colonial Government has been induced to appoint an Agent in Calcutta, and to call for an act restricting emigration to those who should obtain a passport from him. But such is the plain and obvious reading of the new law. It would have been far more discreet to have kept these selfish considerations out of view altogether, and simply to have stated that, whereas the original plan of the Ministry made provision for the appointment of an Emigration Agent, and whereas the neglect of this provision had revived the old abuses, be it enacted that no port shall be open to the export of Coolies but that of Calcutta, and that no labourer shall be exported from thence but under a certificate from the Emigration Agent to be appointed by the Mauritius Government. That Agent might then have quietly rejected the application of all those who were not willing to expatriate themselves for ever with their wives and children. As the Act now stands, the Legislative Council, which ought to have had the interests of this country primarily in view, appears to have closed its eyes upon the injury which has been inflicted on it, and to have based its legislative enactment only on the interests of the Crown Colony, by proposing to pass an act, the cheif object of which is to part for ever with those who may embark for the Mauritius.

DARJELING.—In the letter which we published last week from Darjeling, there was one sentence with regard to the journey thither to which we think the public authorities of the place should direct their attention. We allude to the idea thrown out that those who were desirous of visiting it might hereafter go by the Steamer to Caragola Ghaut opposite to Peer Pointee, and then proceed by land through Purneah to the Hills.

The greatest obstacle to the free resort of visitors, whether from the Western or the Southern provinces to the Sanatarium is presented by the difficulty of approaching it. We are told that a budgerow will carry one as far as there is water carriage from Calcutta in twenty or twenty-five days; but nothing can be more wearisome and disheartening than a trip by water, in a budgerow, to the foot of the Hills. It may also be reached by land in five days; but an invalid cannot bear a hundred and twenty hours' successive jolting in an uneasy palankeen, with the certainty of being waked out of sleep every two hours by the bearers demanding their busis, which in many cases is we fear the only reward they receive for months from the Dawk Moonshee for their labour. It was suggested at the first establishment of the Sanatarium that facilities should be created for a conveyance by land from the nearest point which the Steamers could reach, and which we now find is Caragola Ghaut, just a hundred miles from the foot of the Hills. But this consideration has been entirely overlooked, and we are only now told that provision will shortly be made for the convenience of visitors, from that point to the Sanatarium. We are convinced that no time should be lost in giving effect to this design in as much as it will form such an inducement to resort to Darjeeling as the public has never yet enjoyed, and thereby increase the popularity of the bright spot. Without such an arrangement, indeed, we think it must soon yield to its great rival in Ceylon, Newerra Ellia or Neuralia.—We wish our brethren in the island could be induced to adopt this more euphonous and classical designation. Darjeling and Neuralia are equally described as enjoying a climate altogether heavenly. At both places the visitor fancies himself again among the bracing breezes and in the lovely scenery of his native land. A pilgrim to Neuralia embarks on a Steamer in Calcutta, with a hundred of his fellow countrymen and women, and enjoys a delightful sea voyage to Galle, where he meets with a comfortable inn, and a stage coach, which drives him at once to the new paradise. It is difficult to fancy anything, not merely more free from inconvenience but more positively delightful, than the journey from Calcutta to the Sanatarium in Ceylon. Contrast with this the tedious, the insupportable voyage by water in a budgerow to Dinagepore, and then the transfer to a palankeen, in order to reach Darjeling; or the still more intolerable dawk journey for an invalid from Calcutta to that spot. To place the journey to the two settlements on something like an equality, it is necessary that arrangements should be made for the visitor to enjoy the convenience of a steam trip to Caragola Ghaut, and an easy land journey from thence to the Bright Spot. We throw out these remarks for the consideration of those who take an interest in the Sanatarium. The Hindoostan has brought back some of the visitors from Neuralia, who are extravagant, if that be possible, in their praise of that residence, and whose descriptions are likely to do injury to Darjeling, unless the inconveniences now experienced in the transit can be removed.

THE CALCUTTA POST OFFICE.—The Bombay Times has been making himself merry at the expense of the Ditchers. In an article headed "Slow Coaches of the Calcutta Press" which will be found in another column, he has copied the Post Office Notification by which the public is guided, as it respects the postage of letters sent by the Steamers, and apostrophizes Mr. Oldfield, heretofore Post Master, in this strain: "Now good Mr. Oldfield, you must be a very old, a very forgetful fellow indeed, if the date of your knowledge of Post office matters extends no farther than the 27th of May 1840," which is the date of the last notification regarding steam postage. Every body, except the Post Master General, knows that it was promulgated on the 6th of July last, that the French Government had reduced the postage of a letter from 2*s.* 8*d.* to 1*s.* 8*d.* We say that the Post Master General is ignorant of the charge, because it is not to be supposed, if he had been cognizant of it, that he would have lost a single day in giving the public official information of so gratifying a reduction. We alluded to the change at the time, and expressed a hope that the Notification, weekly published in the Calcutta Gazette, would be modified; but the suggestion produced no result.

If the Bombay Times had paid due attention to the state of circumstances here he would have ceased to wonder that the most distinguished man of letters, as he facetiously denominates the Post Master General, should continue to publish an obsolete rate of Postage. Does he really require to be informed that the pay and the duties of that office have long since been divorced; the duties being conducted by the Deputy, and the pay drawn by the Chief? Every one in the city of Palaces knows that the office of Post Master General is almost the only remaining sinecure in the service. If there be any office, the efficient management of which requires a long and arduous experience, it must be the Post Office; yet we have had five Post Masters General, within the last five years, of whom one had been a Commissioner of Revenue, two Civil and Session Judges, and one a Magistrate. It must therefore be self evident that the office is filled up on the principle of its being more adapted for the man, than the man for it. In England, the situation of Post Master General is usually considered an honorary office; and it would have been pleasing if we could have regarded it in that light in this country; but Government has deprived us of that satisfaction, by turning it on two occasions into a penal appointment, and thrusting into it, much against their inclination, two public servants who had incurred its displeasure. We trust this explanation will sufficiently account to our Western Contemporary for the notification of 1840, which has afforded him so much amusement.

We must however remind him that he is altogether wrong in laying any portion of the blame of this egregious omission on Mr. Oldfield, who has long ceased to have any connection with the Post Office, and is now Opium Agent in Behar. Since the date of that notification, there have been two Post Masters, upon the last of whom rests the censure of having allowed his predecessor's Notice to stand so long after the arrangement it announces had been superseded.

NEW CRIMINAL CODE.—One of the London Papers of August last states that the Law Commission in Calcutta was about to present Government with a new Criminal Code. It is difficult to account for the origin of this rumour, unless we trace it to the pleasantry of some mischievous wag, anxious to cast ridicule on that body. It is quite true that the only complete work of the Law Commission was a Criminal Code, drawn up under the superintendence of Mr. Macaulay; but though it was finished more than six years ago, and transmitted to the Home Government, nothing has since been heard of it. The labour of three years, the result of an expenditure exceeding 70,000*l.* has been treated with the most disgraceful neglect; and now that the office of the Commissioners is about—as they say—to be included in the bills of mortality, we are informed that they are about to give birth to a second Code!

If however the Commission should be dissolved without completing a Code of Criminal Jurisprudence for this country, there will be just reason to complain that public money to an extent of not less than 200,000£ has been very ill bestowed. We fully admit the value of its labours in the collection and digest of evidence relative to the state of Slavery in the East, though even in this important matter, we have got rid of the evil, not by following its advice and making it the object of legislation, but by sweeping it at once from the face of the land. But if there was any one subject to which the exertions of such a Commission ought to have been primarily and uninterruptedly directed, and which it should not be allowed to separate without completing, it was assuredly the formation of a Code of Criminal jurisprudence, which should give to India the benefit of European research and improvement in this department of legislation, and relieve it from the incubus of that barbarous and antiquated system of Mahomedan law, under which it groans. It was long the opprobrium of our Government that, notwithstanding all its boast of superior light and knowledge, it continued to administer a system of criminal law, so far behind the civilized institutions of the age; and we naturally looked to the labours of the Law Commission to relieve our administration from this obloquy. But to all present appearance, the Commission will be abolished without having effected this necessary improvement. With the extinction of this body, all hope of obtaining a Criminal Code worthy of the age and of the Government, must, we fear, be altogether relinquished. It is scarcely probable that another body, with the same knowledge, leisure and aptitude for this great national undertaking, can be again assembled. We have therefore no other prospect before us, but that of continued subjection to a system of Criminal jurisprudence, which has no other recommendation, than that it may be retained without exertion.

We cannot better indicate the bitterness of disappointment which arises from this prospect, than by referring to the two most recent anomalies which have been exposed to view. Not long since, a young East Indian was brought up before the Magistrate in a district not far from Allahabad, on a charge of having destroyed the domestic peace of another person. If public report be true, the fault lay quite as much with the husband as with the transgressor; but to that circumstance we have nothing to say. The East Indian was by religion a Christian. In his infancy he had, to our certain knowledge, received Christian baptism, after the most approved form, from the hands of an Episcopally ordained Clergyman. Of his creed there could therefore be no doubt. Yet he has been tried by the Mahomedan law, and by that Code sentenced to two years' imprisonment, which, we hear, he is now undergoing. The sentence has excited much astonishment and some indignation in the neighbourhood; but we question whether the Law is not more in fault than the Judge.

The second instance is recorded in the Report of the State of the Police for the first six months of 1841, just published. "The prisoner was found in the act of murdering an infirm old man on the borders of a tank for the sake of plunder. The law Officer of the Session,—the Mahomedan Mouluvee,—was of opinion that the stick with which the crime was committed, was below the standard weight for murderous weapons, as prescribed in the Koran. A reference was made to the Nizamut Court, and the prisoner was sentenced to imprisonment for life." Well does the Superintendent of Police exclaim: "I really do not comprehend why these absurdities of the Mahomedan Law are at the present time attended to or allowed to interfere with the punishment of a murderer. Here is a man caught in the act of murder red handed, and because the bamboo with which he killed an infirm old man is not of a certain weight, the crime is declared by the Mouluvee tantamount to culpable homicide punishable at the discretion of the Court, and a sentence of perpetual imprisonment, instead of death, is passed in compliance with the grave absurdity of the Mahomedan Law Officer."

It was to remedy these glaring and unjust anomalies in our Criminal Jurisprudence that the Law Commission was undoubtedly established. It was to prevent the trial of Christians, in cases of abduction, by Mahomedan Law; to prevent the determination of the crime of murder by the weight of the instrument, and other such like absurdities that an expensive establishment of Law Commissioners was set up by the Whig Government. If after nine years of labour, that Commission should be suppressed without having accomplished this part of its vocation, leaving us still under the rule of a barbarous legislation, and that through the mismanagement of the Home Authorities, by whom the appointments are made and to whom alone the Commission is amenable for its labours,—they will have no right to censure the local authorities, for permitting the same waste of time and money in any department confided to their responsibility.

THE KHOOND CHILDREN.—We have received a letter from the northern Division of the Madras Presidency relative to the disposal of the children rescued from the Khoonds, which it appears safer for us to give in substance in our own words. Our correspondent exonerates the Madras Government from all censure in this matter; and states that it is understood as a fact, that the petition written some months ago to the Governor of Madras is still in the Agent's office at Ganjam. He expresses a hope that as that officer is about to proceed shortly to England, his successor may be more alive to the cause of humanity. He says it is customary to talk of the rescued victim as children, but that many of them have grown up under the charge of the Tehsildar of Goomsoor to be men and women, and that the manner in which many of the latter have been allowed to run wild, is revolting. It was currently known at the station that one of the young women threatened to hang herself if she was not given away in marriage, and so convinced was the officer in charge, of the sincerity of her intentions, that there was a general search among the mety boys for a volunteer husband. A boy was recently made over to a man who called himself a Christian, but who immediately circumcised him and made him a Mahomedan. He adds that although the victims may be freely distributed among the officers as servants, or made over to the sepoys who convert them into Hindoos or Mahomedans, yet as soon as the subject of making them over to Christian Missionaries is mooted, the pledge of non-interference with the faith of the natives, that standing bug-bear of our Government, is immediately raised.

We give these statements as we have received them, in the hope that public attention will be drawn to the subject, and that the disposal of the victims will no longer be left to individual discretion, but that the Madras Government will imperatively provide for their intellectual and spiritual improvement, and thus consummate the good work of humanity which it has begun. Our correspondent suggests that it might be an advantage to that cause, if the Court of Directors were to require of the Agent, who is about to return to England, an account of the temporal and spiritual condition of the children who have been rescued, and of the measures which have been adopted to promote their welfare. We believe no such enquiry will be necessary. The matter may be left with perfect confidence to the benevolent sympathies of the Marquis of Tweeddale. The fact that an application to the Madras Government has been detained by the local Agent for many months, will at once open his Lordship's eyes to the state of the case, and point out the necessity of some stringent provisions on the subject. What benefit might not have been conferred on these poor children, if the local officers had been imbued with the same generous feelings which dictated the plans for their rescue?

The Madras Spectator, writing on the subject of the Khoond sacrifices, censures us for having overlooked the facts which "he brought especially to our notice" in an article which appeared on the 13th of September last. We have many apologies to offer him for this neglect, which arose entirely from inadvertence. In the crowd of papers which came in simultaneously with that number, it was accidentally overlooked. We have now much pleasure in reprinting it.

However anxious we may be to keep within the limits of the law of libel, not merely as it may be legally constructed, but in its moral acceptation, we are equally anxious to discharge our duty as public journalists, without fear or hesitation. We will therefore venture to say that there does not appear to exist among the local authorities on the Khoond borders, the same sense of the responsibility which begins with the rescue of the victims of that horrid superstition, which pervades the minds of the Christian community in our own land, whose influence is as unquestionable as it is beneficial. From all we can learn, they do not appear to be alive to the duty of training up these victims in a manner becoming men who enjoy the privileges of Britons and Christians. There is large room for the interposition of the public authorities at Madras; perhaps we should speak more correctly were we to say that there is large necessity for it. An indifference to the intellectual improvement and spiritual welfare of the Natives may be perfectly compatible with the most praise-worthy discharge of official duties. The man who first brought the Madras Government into that unhallowed connection with the shrines of idolatry which has covered it with such obloquy, was doubtless an efficient public servant, and, if one had doubted his Christianity, would probably have sent him a challenge.

As it regards the reduction, and, if possible, the extermination, of these diabolical sacrifices, there are two plans which offer a prospect of success; the one is that of establishing a paramount authority throughout the hills; but this is all but impracticable, on account of their extreme unhealthiness, which is so fatal to the European constitution. The other is that of stopping the supplies of victims, which are drawn chiefly from the plains, where our authority is omnipotent. But the claims of humanity have hitherto been defeated by an over-scrupulous attention to what are considered the claims of justice. Owing to the forms of the Courts, and the difficulty of obtaining legal evidence, the duffadars or crimps of the Khoonds, have generally managed to escape punishment. It is necessary to arm the local officers in the Collectorates of Ganjam and Vizagaputam with summary powers to punish on the spot, all persons detected in kidnapping and selling children for the Meria sacrifice. If this power is used in the spirit in which it was given, it would effectually dry up the source of the evil.

The Spectator states that the draft of an Act for conferring suitable powers on the public officers in those districts, was prepared three or four months ago and transmitted to Calcutta, and he advises us to look nearer home, and ascertain why this proposed Act has been allowed to slumber. In his editorial remarks of the 11th of October he also affirms that more than two months have elapsed "since a strong remonstrance was sent from Madras for a complete separation,—, according to the Court's orders—from all idolatrous institutions, and from all affairs connected with the temples, and that the papers, instead of receiving the prompt attention which their nature demanded, have been left slumbering in the archives of the Government of India. We have already," says he, "borne the fardel of this reproach long enough; if there is farther delay, the Friend will acknowledge the justice of placing it on a different shoulder."

Placing, as we do, implicit confidence in the statements of our contemporary, we have no hesitation in saying that he has effectually taken the blame off the shoulders of the Madras Government, and placed it upon those of the Government of India. Why the arrangement for the entire separation of the British official authorities at Madras from idolatrous connections has been delayed in Calcutta for two months, or why the Act for the more effectual suppression of human sacrifices has remained unnoticed for four months, it is not for us to divine. Lord Ellenborough is upon the spot, and legislation need not slumber, more especially as there is a Legislative Member, encumbered with no other duty but that of drawing up Acts for the Council. They say that the question of perpetuating this Whig appointment is to come formally before Parliament in the next Session. Perhaps the present sluggish movement of the Council in the matter of Legislation, may not be without an object. It may be designed to prove the inutility of the appointment. But, whenever his Lordship is in earnest, the forms of the Legislative Council are suspended, and law-making moves at a railway pace. Mr. Anderson, the Protector of Emigrants at the Mauritius, has been sent up to put a stop to the farther emigration of men without their wives, and the Council has resolved to hurry through an Act, which shall send away female as well as male labourers—in the hope that neither will return. Could not the Government of Madras spare one of its Members of Council—we manage to govern seventy millions without them—on deputation to Calcutta? He might get the Meria Sacrifice Repression Act, and the Government Patronage Suppression Act through in a fortnight, and carry them back in his pocket in the Hindoostan or the Bentinck. There is nothing like a little Dhurna at the door of the Council Chamber.

CEYLON.—In the palmy days of Hindooism, when the throne of India was filled by the greatest warrior of the heroic age, the island of Ceylon became an object of the deepest interest to the whole Continent. Every chief, from the banks of the Irawuddy to those of the Indus, was marshalled under the banners of Ramchunder to assist in the recovery of Sheeta; the whole country was agitated by that mighty expedition of which Ceylon was the object. The interest which it excited at that distant period, affords room for a strong contrast with the indifference to which it has been for a long period consigned by the European community at this Presidency. Had it not been for an occasional extract from the papers of the island, the very existence of this noble possession might have been forgotten. No higher interest was felt in its condition or progress, than in that of the province of Newfoundland. This indifference to an island not two hundred miles from Madras, was owing partly to the narrowness of our commercial dealings with it, partly to the absence of all personal intercourse, and in part to its stationary, and therefore uninteresting, condition. Our mercantile connection with it has not, it is true, been enlarged, for in the past year the whole amount of our exports to and imports from it, did not exceed five lakhs, but our personal intercourse has been multiplied by means of the Steamer which calls at Galle on its way to and from Suez, and in consequence of the opening of a Sanatarium at Neuralia, which is becoming a great resort for legal invalids. Its argricultural improvement has taken India by surprise. These circumstances have created a new interest in the prospects of the island among the community at this Presidency, and there is every hope of its being fostered and increased.

The attraction of capital is attributed by the Madras Spectator, in an article which we have copied, and recommend to the special attention of the reader, to the establishment of a Legislative Council. Of this we are not altogether certain, although there can be little doubt that it has served to give confidence to colonists, not so much perhaps from its present results, as from its inevitable tendency to the system of representative Government, which prevails in other Crown colonies. The Legislative Council of Ceylon does not consist, like that of India, of four or five members, but of seventeen. Of these, ten are members of Government; while only seven are appointed from among the colonists. This preponderance of official influence in the Council, of course enables the Government to carry any measures it may propose; but in such a colony as Ceylon, or in such a country as India, this construction of the first Legislative Council seems to be the dictate of prudence. It would scarcely be wise to form it on the principle of so proportioning the votes that Government should, on every question, be liable to defeat. A great change must be effected in the general condition of society before any such system of administration can be safe. The object of such a Legislative institution, when first bestowed on an eastern possession, should be to dissolve the mystery in which the administration is shrouded, to create public confidence by unfolding to public view the springs of action, and gradually to prepare the community for taking a larger share in the Government. It is enough perhaps for the first step of improvement that the estimates are discussed and voted in an Assembly, the doors of which are open to the public, and the debates of which are published in the journals. This is an amazing advance upon the theory and practice of a simple—we do not mean unjust—despotism. And in Ceylon it has been found to work well. Though from its numerical majority, Government is omnipotent in the Council, yet it is obliged to explain the reason of the measures it adopts; their utility as well as their details are openly canvassed, and public opinion is brought to bear on them. Since the establishment of the Council in that island, there has been, on the one hand, more attention to economy; on the other, an increasing effort to accelerate public improvement by the construction of roads, by digging canals, and by giving all legitimate encouragement to the spirit of enterprize.

The sudden start of improvement which this colony seems to have taken, has no parallel, we believe, in any Indian settlement. The old lethargy which characterized its residents, appears to have been at once exchanged for habits of energy and enterprize, which have done more to develope its resources in four years than had been done in the previous forty. The increase of colonists, and the influx of European capital, both from England and India, appears from all accounts to have been steadily progressing for some time. This has been attributed, as we have said, partly to the existence of the Legislative Council, and in part to the nature of the land tenures of the island. We are inclined to attribute it almost entirely to the latter cause. We question whether here in India the establishment of the most popular Legislature would induce the investment of Capital, from Europe, in the purchase of land. When Government went with so half hearted a spirit into the plan of admitting Europeans to hold land, Lord William Bentinck said his fear was, not that too many, but that too few Europeans would be induced to lay out their money in estates. His fears have been fully realized. Some planters, well versed in the mysteries of landed property, have, it is true, bought estates, that their indigo ryots might owe no allegiance to unaccommodating Zemindars; but while two millions sterling and more have been laid out in the purchase of land in Canada, in Australia, and in New Zealand, not one hundreth part of such a sum has been transferred to India. If report be true, one of our highest public functionaries, on a late visit to the island of Ceylon, became the purchaser of a large coffee plantation. We question whether any thing, but insanity, could have induced him to lay out the same amount in a zemindaree. Every thing here has been characterized as fugitive, but the tenure of an estate held by a European is of all things most fugitive. Suppose a man to have "deposited the hopes of his family in the soil of India," and devoted a lakh of Rupees to the purchase of an estate, and half a lakh more to the improvement of it, he has still but a secondary right in it. It is for ever hypothecated to Government for the rent, which must be paid quarterly, to the minute, or the estate goes to the hammer. If he proceed to sea for the benefit of his health, or if he visit England to revive his associations, and, by any one of the thousand accidents of life, the rent should be unpaid by sunset on a particular day, four times in the year, his estate is sold, and he returns to beggary. We are not complaining of a hardship; we are merely stating a fact. For this there appears no remedy except by allowing landlords to redeem the land rent, by one large payment. But this is altogether inadmissible, because it would enable the existing Government to anticipate and eat up the resources of posterity. In Ceylon, however, the land is purchased out and out, free from all claim on the part of the state, and may thus become a perpetual heir loom in a family; and this is, we think, the great attraction to capitalists.

But there are other subjects of interest, more particularly to the Service here, connected with the administration of Ceylon, which ought not to be overlooked. This island is essentially part and parcel of Hindoostan, and is separated from the main land only by a narrow strait. Its population consists of Natives in the same stage of civilization, possessed of the same domestic habits, and governed by the same feelings, as those who reside on the Continent. Notwithstanding the difference of religion, there is not more difference between the ryot of Ceylon and the ryot of Madras, than between the latter and the ryot of Bengal. It is a dependency of the Crown, and there the Ministers of the Crown have been for some time past carrying forward, unostentatiously, the experiment of governing an Indian possession, upon principles entirely distinct from those adopted in the countries entrusted to the Company. The two systems are diametrically different both as it regards legislative and administrative arrangements, or the construction and the allowances of the public service. The fundamental principle of the Civil Service in that Island is not the retention of patronage as a remuneration for the labour of governing it. There, in a country which little exceeds one of our largest Zillahs in population and revenue, and for which the Company would consider five or six Civilians an ample allowance, the Civil Service embraces thirty-seven individuals, with a host of other functionaries, not included in that list. That service is not formed into a distinct class, which it is deemed necessary to qualify by a specific system of education for public employment. All the civil, criminal and fiscal business of Ceylon is conducted by men trained at no College similar to that of Hayleybury. Nor is there a greater difference between the training of Judges and Collectors for Ceylon, and that of Judges and Collectors for Bengal than exists also in the matter of their allowances. The whole body of Civilians, thirty-seven in number, the Secretaries, the Government Agents, the Judges, the Magistrates, the fiscal officers, receive no more than 27,000*l.* sterling a year, a sum less than that enjoyed by two of our Secretaries, two Members of the Board of Customs and two of the Board of Revenue. Then, the Crown has also contrived to obtain the services of a Chief Justice, equal in legal attainments to any of those who have adorned the bench in Calcutta, and for less than one-third of their pay. The salary of Sir A. Oliphant is less only by 500£ than the mere retiring pension of Sir Edward Ryan.

It is scarcely to be supposed that the administration of India will be maintained upon its present footing after the expiration of the present Charter. There is every reason to believe that, whatever party may be in power at the time, the Ministry will endeavour to dispense altogether with the Court of Directors, as an instrument of Government, and place India in the same direct subordination to the Crown, as its other colonial possessions. The design so palpably manifested by the present Ministry of reducing the Court of Directors to a cypher, and of concentrating all real power at the Board of Control, seems to prefigure the turn which circumstances are likely to take, when the construction of the future Government of India, comes under discussion in 1853. Should the Administration of that day be prepared to take the Government into its own hands, there is every reason to suppose that the system will be modified in some respects after the model of that which has been introduced at Ceylon; that the selections for the Civil Service will be made upon a broader basis, and from a larger circle; that the exclusive education of Hayleybury will be at once repudiated, and the establishments which now furnish our Members of Parliament and Statesmen, our Barristers and Judges, our Clergy and Bishops will be deemed sufficient for the education of Civilians; that the number of Covenanted servants will be augmented, and their allowances reduced; and that the whole Indian service, instead of continuing to represent the peculiar and anomalous circumstances in which the Empire of the East arose, will be recast in the mould of that modern colonial system which England has been gradually maturing in her foreign possessions.

We have received and very carefully analysed the Report of the State of the Police in 1841, but our notice of it extends to more than four columns, and we are therefore constrained to postpone the insertion of it, as well as a notice of the Economist, to the next week.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26.

— By some inadvertence, the Report of the last Meeting of the Agricultural Society was omitted in our last number. We have given it in our present issue.

— The Assam Steamer reached Allahabad on the 19th, having made the trip in twenty days; no very great feat for so powerful a vessel, encumbered with so light a cargo boat astern.

— The report of Heera Singh's murder is now distinctly contradicted. He is conducting affairs at Lahore conjointly with Lena Singh.

— Capt. Somerset, Military Secretary to the Governor General, proceeds to the Western Provinces immediately by dawk. This movement is thought by many the precursor of his Lordship's departure.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 27.

— The Star has obtained a copy of the Gibraltar Chronicle of the 28th of August which details the loss by fire of the Missouri U. S. Steam Frigate. It appears that every possible assistance was rendered by the English Steamers present, and by the Commandant at Gibraltar. The present year seems peculiarly inauspicious to Steamers, both English and American. The loss of the Missouri is an irreparable loss, as it constituted one-half the United States Sea going Steam Navy. John Quincy Adams, some time since ridiculed the idea of America's going to war with us, with only two Steamers against our two hundred. If our memory does not fail us, he said that one of them was laid up, with a large hole in her side. Whether the Missouri was the disabled or the sound steamer, however, we cannot say.

— The Englishman says, that the Grand Jury attracted by a letter signed Captive, which appeared in that paper, went on a visit to the Grand Jail to examine into the nuisance complained of.

— The Deputy Governor has, it is said, given one of the twelve appointments of Deputy Magistrate to a relative or connection of Baboo Chunder Mohun Chaterjee, the gentleman who accompanied him in his visit to England last year.

— The Englishman gives a letter from Maulmein, of the 12th of October, which contains little news. The writer states that the timber duties still continue a source of vexation to the settlement; that there is a report that the Commissioner intends to remove his present residence;—he is living we believe in a hiredhouse,—and to draw the town to Tavoy-Zoo, a mile to the southward, which the writer, and others think will be an improvement. The letter ends with, "Altogether, Moulmein is improving." On the other hand there is a letter in the Hurkaru of this date which says, "It is farthest from my thoughts to detract one iota from the merits of the present gallant Commissioner Major Broadfoot, but his policy has been to throw suspicion if not blame on his predecessor to shew that all has been wrong." If this be true, the Commissioner has been following the example set him by a high authority, which example as it has no foundation in past usages, will we hope have no influence on future functionaries, except by pointing out to them the course which ought by all means to be avoided. It is the part of greatness to correct evils, of littleness to censure them.

— A correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that the worship of Doorga has been more diffused this year in Calcutta, the centre of illumination, than on any former year. He affirms that two thousand images have been made, and that the highest sum spent in any poojah was 13,000 Rs. If a hundred Rupees be the lowest average of the expense of each poojah, the sum laid out will have been two lakhs.

— Mr. George Clerk, the Lieut. Governor of the North West Provinces, has received serious injury by a fall from his horse, and was, according to the last accounts, lying dangerously ill at Simlah.

— We were wrong in stating that General Avitabile was returning to the Punjab. We learn from the Delhi Gazette that he had passed through that town on his way to Calcutta. We learn also with much regret that he, who allowed the British officers "to drink his cellars dry," who kept an open table for 30, 40 or 50 officers daily, was not received with honour or hospitality at Delhi, a blot on the escutcheon of Delhi, which will not be soon obliterated.

— Government is said to be about to construct a fort at Ferozepore, which is to be capable of holding the treasury and the magazine, and of resisting any marauding attack that can be made.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28.

— The Hurkaru of this morning has an article on American repudiation,"—the transatlantic term for the non-payment of debts—and alludes to a petition from General Sir John Wilson who invested 7500*l.* in American State securities, of which the dividends have ceased to be paid. He writes to an American General Scott, with whom he fought nearly thirty years ago at the battle of Chippewa, and to whom he says, "I have a wife and six children, and two of your musket balls are lodged in my body. Will you then, my dear General, pardon my writing to you, and inform me whether or not in your opinion, the Legislature of the above states are wanting in those high feelings of honour and honesty for which I gave them credit, or whether their present embarrassment has arisen out of unexpected difficulties and that they have not had sufficient time to meet their engagements?" Our contemporary speaks rather disparagingly of the previous letter of Sydney Smith, and says that with all its force and good sense, "his petition produced no great commisseration for him personally." We do not think he cared a straw about the money he had lost. None of the great Smiths, neither Percy, nor Sydney, nor Courtenay, were ever remarkable for a love of money. Had Sydney cared about money, he might have been worth 300,000*l.* as an Irish Bishop ere now; but his object was to pay off the Americans for their dishonesty; and deeply has brother Jonathan felt his terrific censure. He will not soon forget that sentence, that "the Americans prefer any amount of infamy, however heavy, to any amount of taxation, however light."

— Our Bombay friends are again unfortunate in spite of their "advantageous position." Their July Mails were lost in the Memnon; there we suffered in company, for ours were lost likewise. Their August Mails came back, whereas ours did not, as they went in the Hindoostan. And now all their Magazines and Periodicals of September have been left behind, just at the time when we have for the first time received ours early and cheap. But the magnanimity with which the ever cheerful Courier bears these disappointments is truly exemplary, and eminently edifying.

— The Englishman gives the names of a number of gentlemen, ladies and families, who go home next month in the Hindostan; twenty-seven in number; but we have heard that she will go full again—and no wonder, after the splendid run of the last voyage. The sailing vessels will deeply feel the competition of the two Steamers.

— The Englishman says that Mr. Thomason leaves Calcutta immediately to assume charge of the Government of the North West Provinces, in consequence of the severe accident which Mr. George Clerk has experienced. The last accounts from Simlah gave strong hopes of his recovery; but this accident will probably unfit him in his weak state for public business, and make him anxious for the arrival of his successor. Mr. Thomason's successor Mr. F. Currie, has arrived in Calcutta.

— The Commander-in-Chief announces in General Orders that it has appeared to Government necessary to strengthen the North West Frontier and to maintain a powerful force at Umbala. For this the troops in the Meerut division are to be chiefly employed. Major General Fast will therefore retain a subordinate command and Major General Sir R. H. Dick, commanding the Meerut division, will take the command of both the Sirhind and the Meerut divisions, and the charge of all Military movements.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 30.

— The papers announce the death of the Rev. Mr. Moré the Rector of St. Xavier's College, at Calcutta, and of General Churchill, the Quarter Master General of the Queen's troops at Simlah.

— The Englishman stated on Thursday last that in consequence of the representation of one of his correspondents, the Grand Jury had gone to visit the Grand Jail, which was said to be in a filthy state. The correspondent is disappointed. They found the Jail in the best order, and in the most cleanly state. The nuisance complained of arose from an invasion of the apartments in the third story, appropriated to the better class of debtors, by a whole army of rats. This circumstance was duly presented to the Judges, but though the members of the Grand Jury informed their Lordships "that measures were already in progress for remedying the evil in a manner which they felt confident would prove effectual," yet they did not descend to particulars nor inform the Court for the benefit of the country at large what those means were. We hope the next Grand Jury will follow up the matter and visit the third story of the Jail in person to see whether the warm anticipations of success entertained by their predecessors have been realized. There are other places besides the Grand Jail overrun with rats, and the discovery of a sovereign and effectual remedy will be a national blessing.

— The Municipal chest is empty; the lighting and watering of the city of Palaces is almost at a stand, and the Magistrates are at their wit's end to discover the means of replenishing the chest. At the last meeting various plans for raising a revenue were discussed. That of taxing vehicles was mooted and rejected because of the difficulty of collecting it. At length two of the Magistrates proposed to increase the assessment by 1½ per cent. Mr. Blacquiere opposed the innovation, and wished the lighting and watering to be lessened so as to come within the present means of the Magistrate, which advice, however agreeable to the venerable adage of cutting the coat according to the cloth, is not exactly the most effectual mode of improving the town. Mr. Montrieu, who was absent, was called in, but did not feel himself competent to give an opinion. The matter is postponed.

— We are happy to learn that the last accounts from Simlah represent Mr. George Clerk as better. Dr Robertson had been called in to assist at a consultation. It appears that he has received a concussion of the brain by a fall from his horse.

— Major Patrick Grant has been appointed to succeed the late Major Craigie as Deputy Adjutant General of the Army with the official rank of Major and Capt. J. R. Lumley steps into the post of 1st Assistant.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31.

— The report of General Churchill's death, though given in all the papers of the Presidency, is now said to be incorrect. Subsequent letters from Simlah make no mention of it, which is fatal to its authenticity. The latest letter from thence, one of the 20th October, states that Mr. George Clerk was going on extremely well.

— A Calcutta Gazette Extra, announces the approaching departure of the Governor General for the North West Provinces. The draft of the usual Act for conferring all powers, except those of the Legislative Council, on his Lordship is, also published; and Mr. Thomason is gazetted as the successor of Mr. George Clerk, in the Government of the North West Provinces.

— The Star of this morning gives a somewhat different version of the remarks which fell from Sir Lawrence Peel last week, regarding a proposed alteration in the law of debtor and creditor. He says. "Government has requested the Judges of the Supreme Court to prepare the draft of a new Insolvent Act, the present expiring in a year or two, and that such Act will be passed by the Home Legislature if approved of. Sir L. Peel said he trusted that at no remote day the power of a creditor to arrest his debtor and detain him in prison would be much abridged," &c. His Lordship also stated that any relaxation, however, of the present law ought to be accompanied by more effectual, speedy and cheap means of realizing the property of debtors where any existed— and we may add, in the case of Natives, by a more stringent law of Registration, to prevent that fictitious alienation of property which always takes place when a man wants to cheat his creditors.

— Intelligence from China to the 29th of August has reached Bombay. It is not of any stirring interest. The enquiry which the Emperor instituted into the conduct of the Formosan authorities, regarding the murdered crews of the Ann and the Nerbudda, has terminated in a confession of their guilt. They have been made over to the Board of Punishments; but it is thought they will come off without suffering much injury. The opium trade continues to flourish under other flags; though as soon as the treaty came into operation, all the British opium smuggling vessels and an American receiving ship left the river. Hong Kong had proved very unhealthy, and it had been found necessary to appoint a Board of Health to investigate the cause.

— In consequence of the great services rendered to the Roman Catholic cause in Calcutta, by Messrs John Lackersteen and Co. the Pope has conferred the title of Count on Mr. John Lackersteen, and made him a Chevalier of the Golden Spur. The honour is to be hereditary as long as the eldest son continues a Catholic. Mr. O. R. Lackersteen and William Lackersteen, are also made Chevaliers of the illustrious order of St. Gregory. The mother of the family has at the same time been created a Countess. We learn from the Catholic Herald that Captain Fitzsimons of the 29th B. N. I. has purchased an old bell for 84 Rs. which had long been lying in the Government House compound at Serampore, and presented it to the Catholic Establishments in this town.

— The Catholic Herald of Saturday states, that the Sovereign Pontiff has raised Dr. Oliffe, to the Episcopal dignity and appointed him co-adjutor of the Catholic Archbishop of Calcutta.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 1.

— Cape papers have been received to the 25th of August. They announce the death of Lady D'Urban; also the "glorious intelligence of the entire pacification of Natal." At a meeting of the emigrant farmers at Pietermauritzburg, the terms of the Governor's proclamation for the settlement of Natal affairs was accepted.

— The Star states that Lord Ellenborough's departure is fixed for the 21st instant. Most probably it will take place much earlier. His Lordship we learn goes up by dawk, and returns before the hot winds set in next year.

— The Madras Athenæum of the 19th instant announces the death of Sir John Norton four days after the departure of the vessel in which he embarked from Madras roads. This intelligence was however known here more than a fortnight ago.

— H. M. 3d Buffs are under orders to leave Allahabad, and march to Culpee and there await farther orders. The Star says that the corps will probably join the Army of Exercise; but this must of course depend on the progress of affairs at Gwalior, and the resolution of the Usurper.

— The papers have been loud in their censure of Government for appointing Sir Robert Dick, a Queen's officer, over the head of General Fast, a Company's officer, to command the army assembling on the banks of the Sutledge, the latter being senior it is said to the former. After two goodly columns of remonstrance, it is found that the former is actually senior to the latter!

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

A General Meeting of the Society was held at the Town-Hall, on Wednesday, the 18th October, 1843.

William Griffith, Esq., Vice President, in the Chair.

The gentlemen proposed at the last meeting were duly elected members of the Society, viz. :—

As an Honorary Member.

Dr. Justus Liebig.

As Ordinary Members.

Lieut. Edward Close, Baboo Ooychurn Mullick, Capt. Henry Cotton, Baboo Kissunchunder Roy. Messrs. C. C. Jackson, T. H. Lakin, J. O. Price and Richard Dodd.

The names of the following gentlemen were submitted as candidates for election :—

E. Jenkins, Esq. Civil Service,—proposed by Mr. W. Quintin, seconded by the Secretary.

R. P. Sage, Esq., of Katgara Factory, Bongong,—proposed by Mr. A. Sawers, seconded by the Secretary.

T. C. Loch, Esq., Civil Service,—proposed by Mr. R. B. Garrett, seconded by Mr. H. G. French

A. Wallace, Esq. merchant, Calcutta,—proposed by Dr. Mouat, seconded by the Secretary.

C. R. Jennings Esq , of Galimpore Factory Surdah,—proposed by Mr. Gilson, R. French,—seconded by Mr. H. G. French.

Lieut. H. Rigby, Engineers,—proposed by Major DeBude, seconded by the Secretary.

E. Boyle, Esq. merchant, Calcutta,—proposed by Mr. C. S. Stowell,—seconded by the Secretary.

Capt. G. B. Reddie (29th N. I.) Asst. Commy General, Neemuch, proposed by Mr. C. S. Stowell,—seconded by the Secretary.

PRESENTATIONS TO THE LIBRARY.

1. The Calcutta Journal of Natural History No. 1 to 14. Presented by Dr. McClelland.
2. Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal for 1842. Presented by the Society.
3. Report on the settlement of the District of Gurhwall. Presented by the Govt. N. W. Provinces.
4. Transactions of the Agri-Horticultural Society of Western India, No. II. quarterly issue Presented by the Government of Bengal.
5. The India Review and Journal of Foreign Science and the Arts. Presented by the Proprietor.
6. The Indian Record's and Planter's Journal No. 63 to 66. Presented by the Proprietor.
7. The India Journal of Medical and Physical Science, No. IX. of vol. I. Presented by the Proprietor.

GARDEN AND MUSEUM.

1. Seed of the Madia Sativa, raised at the Government Botanic Garden at Dapooree. Presented by Dr. Gibson.

Dr. Gibson presents this small supply of seed for distribution on this side of India. The very dry climate of the Deccan, Dr. Gibson states, is unsuited for the plant, but he sees no reason why it should not thrive in other localities.

2. A superior description of Barley from Darjeeling. Presented by Dr. Campbell.

3. Samples of sun-dried Salep Misree procured in the neighbourhood of Kottah, near Odeypore. Presented by Lieut. J. C. Brooke.

With these samples, Lieut. Brooke has forwarded an interesting paper descriptive of the country where the plant exists, together with other particulars on the subject. This communication was referred to the Committee of Papers. The samples were considered to be of the best description of Salep

4. Seed of the Asparagus Bean. Presented by Mr. Piddington.

5. A quantity of Bhilsa Tobacco Seed raised in his garden at Kidderpore. Presented by Baboo Suttchurn Ghosaul.

6. Three small boxes of English Tulip Bulbs.

SUGAR CANE DISTRIBUTION.

A memorandum from the Overseer of the Society's Garden was submitted. It mentions that about twenty thousand canes, consisting of the Otaheite, Singapore, Bourbon and China varieties, are ready for cutting. It was agreed that these canes should be forthwith advertised for distribution at the same charge as that of former years, viz. one anna for each cane, which charge is to include the expense of straw-bands for securing the canes in bundles.

Report on Tea the produce of Chittagong.

The Secretary mentioned that, in accordance with the promise made at the last meeting, he had submitted Mr. Seonce's sample of Tea, grown and manufactured at Chittagong from leaves of Assam plants, to Mr. Charles Terry, and that gentleman has obligingly favoured the Society with the following report thereon :—

"I have examined the Sample of Tea you sent me, the produce of Chittagong and have much pleasure in handing you my opinion of it.

"It is a superior Tea in flavor also in strength and is of the Pekoe class. Had it been well manufactured, it would command a good price in the English Market.

"The manufacturing does not appear to be understood, the leaves not having been rolled.

"I should recommend any parties interested in the cultivation at Chittagong procuring a particular account of the process adopted by the Assam Company which is very simple and could not fail to render the article valuable."

Report on Wheat grown at Bolundshahur from Egyptian seed.

The next paper that was submitted was the following report from Mr. Wm. Haworth on the sample of wheat grown at Bolundshahur by Mr. Tonnochy which was presented at the last meeting :—

"I have examined the few ears of wheat which you sent me and which I understand are grown from Egyptian Wheat. The ears I should consider very fine and well grown, the quality of the grain, is very superior for this country growth, in nature and appearance it resembles the "Gungajelly" wheat grown in the districts of Rajmahal to Patna and it is also like some of the wheats imported into England from the Mediterranean or perhaps more like the wheat brought from Odessa. It is hard and flinty quite unfit for the English market, except to mix with wheat of soft and unsound condition, alone it would make a dark colored flour of little value, but on the contrary, if ground into the article so well known amongst the natives called Soojee it would make as fine bread as could be wished for.

I send you a few grains of Native Gungajelly wheat, also the few grains I took from the ears you sent me, that you may have an opportunity of comparing them."

INDIAN WHEAT QUESTION.

The Secretary drew the attention of the meeting to a memorandum from Mr. Speede 'relative to the question of admission of Indian Wheat into British ports on an equal footing with that of Canada.'

Mr. Speede states, that his object in submitting this memorandum is to induce the Society to make an early reference on the subject to those parties in England who are known to be favourably disposed to the measure. He then enters at some length into particulars connected with the passing of the Canada wheat and flour bill into a law; alludes to the claims of India for an equal admission of her wheat into the home market, and concludes by 'soliciting the aid of all members to bring the matter to a conclusion so as to proceed with as little delay as possible to frame our several addresses and bring them forward for the opinion of the Society.'

The Secretary intimated that in accordance with the recommendation of the report of the Wheat Committee,—which was confirmed at the general meeting in June,—circulars were addressed to members in various parts of the country. A few replies only had, as yet, been received, several of the members were at a considerable distance and some delay in obtaining answers was naturally to be expected; consequently it was probable that further information would be afforded in due time.

Resolved, that the replies already received by the Society, and the paper now submitted, be circulated to the Committee, with view to determine if the information on hand be sufficient to admit of their recommending the carrying into immediate effect the suggestions contained in Mr. Speede's memorandum.

The Secretary called the attention of the meeting to a passage at the commencement of Mr. Speede's minute, in which he mentioned that he had applied that the papers which had been received might be handed over to him, and that he had not been prepared for the application being unsuccessful. The Secretary stated he had not felt himself at liberty to part with papers of importance addressed to the Society before they had been laid on the table. The Committee appointed by the Society could of course have had them at any time, but he thought he was not justified in handing them over to a single member. The meeting thought the Secretary had acted properly.

THE COCOA PLANT.

A letter from Mr. Stikeman, Secretary of the East India and China Association, was next submitted. Mr. Stikeman mentions that after the despatch of his former letter, (which was submitted at the last meeting) he had put himself in communication with Dr. Royle and made him acquainted with the Society's wishes of procuring nuts of the Cacao, and that at a subsequent interview Dr. Royle had informed him that he had written to some friends in the West Indies on the subject. Mr. Stikeman adds, that it will afford considerable gratification to the Association to know that the result has been successful.

The Secretary stated, that with reference to the letter of Mr. Seonce which was read at the last meeting, he had the pleasure to submit a note from Mr. Wray enclosing a letter from Captain Marquard communicating the transfer for the Society's Garden of the greater portion of the Chocolate trees now in his garden at Chittagong. The best thanks of the Society were directed to be given to Captain Marquard for this acceptable contribution.

BHAUGULPORE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Major Napleton, the Secretary of the Branch Agricultural Society at Bhaugulpore, intimates the receipt of a large assortment of seeds which was furnished by the Parent Society, and tenders best thanks for the same. Major Napleton adds that the public garden, and every thing connected with the Institution is in a flourishing and satisfactory state. The number of monthly subscribers has reached 109, and the donation book shows a collection of about 1,200 Rupees.

---

Letters were read from Dr. Gibson, at Dapooree, forwarding a report of trials made of the power of Bramah's Hydrostatic Press, as applied to the extraction of oil from the Earth nut, carthamus, flax, seasum, castor and other seeds; and from Mr. O'Riley at Amherst, submitting a memorandum relative to a prospectus of a Joint Stock Coffee Company at Chittagong, which was published in a late number of the Journal. Both communications were transferred to the Committee of Papers.

For all the foregoing letters and presents the thanks of the Society were accorded.

JAMES HUME,
Honorary Secretary.

HORTICULTURAL EXHIBITION AT THE TOWN HALL.

The Horticultural exhibition, which was held at the Town Hall Saturday morning, may we think, be considered a satisfactory commencement of the change from an annual to quarterly shows. We confess we did not anticipate beholding so goodly an array of fruits and vegetables, country and foreign, covering nearly the whole extent of the hall on this occasion. Among Europe vegetables we particularly noticed turnips, carrots, lettuces of sorts, beans, onions, potatoes, Jerusalem artichokes, asparagus and radishes. For all these prizes were awarded. Several prizes, we believe, were included in the schedule, for early York and Battersea cabbages, and for early dwarf peas, but not a single basket of these was there to be seen. This may be attributed to the lateness of the season consequent on the heavy rains in September, for if these vegetables could have been brought to perfection so early, the hope of handsome rewards would have induced the native gardener to exhibit them, more particularly when, as we have reason to know, early intimation was afforded of the descriptions of vegetables for which prizes would be given. There were a few baskets of Tenasserim yams and Assam beans, with various sorts of native vegetables. Prizes were also awarded for the best samples of pomegranates, sapotas, oranges, (grown in the neighbourhood of Calcutta) pumpleneses, pine-apples, papyas, custard-apples, &c. When a few more such shows early and late in the season, have been held, and due encouragement afforded to the mallees, we may hope to have Europe vegetables in perfection for more than half the year, instead of for three or four months, as is now the case. We cannot conclude this brief notice without expressing our gratification at so many lady visitors having honoured the exhibition with their presence. Several members of the Society were also present.—Cal. Star, Oct. 30.

THE MERIA SACRIFIS.

We have taken from the Friend of India an article on "Human Sacrifices among the Khoonds," which is the renewal of a former discussion of the same subject in connection with certain rescued children whom the Missionaries had requested might be transferred to them for their education and bringing up. We have already expressed our opinion on this latter and separate question, and need not here repeat it, but on the general subject of the human sacrifices we cannot but feel that our usually plain dealing contemporary has not acted quite candidly towards this Presidency, in avoiding all allusion to the facts which we brought specially to his notice in our issue of the 13th ultimo, and which must have been before him when he penned his article on the 28th. We then shewed that it was not the fault of the Madras authorities, but a certain apathy in Bengal if anywhere, which withheld from being adopted the mode, alone efficient under existing circumstances, for checking this barbarous rite. From the Friend's article however one would be left to conclude that an indifference was still manifested about interposing a check to the practise, and we must therefore, as the subject is one of no slight moment, protest against the disingenuous reproach.

But there is another and even more important matter incidentally introduced into the article of the Friend of India, which has long been a favourite subject of animadversion (we wish we could say an unjust one) with our contemporary, until now it has become a standing philippic against the Government of Madras. We allude to the official connection with idolatrous institutions. We must here again beg of our worthy contemporary to address himself nearer home: we think he will find that some two months or so have elapsed since a strong recommendation went from this Presidency for a complete separation according to the Court's orders from all idolatrous institutions and from all affairs connected with the temples, and we think he will further find that, like with the proposed enactment for measures tending to suppress the Khoond sacrifices, the papers instead of receiving the prompt sanction which their nature demanded, have been left slumbering in the archives of the Government of India. We have already borne the fardel of this reproach long enough; if there is further delay the Friend will acknowledge the justice of now placing it on a different shoulder.—Madras Spectator, Oct. 11.

We have not ascertained how the exact fact rests in regard to the letter addressed by the Missionaries in the North to the Madras Government, on the subject of the youthful victims rescued from the sacrifice of the Meriah, which was brought to the notice by the Friend of India; but we learn with satisfaction that there has been no lack of zeal on the part of our local authorities, in framing such measures as may tend the most effectually to suppress this detestable sacrifice itself.

It seems to be pretty clearly established that the victims are generally if not entirely obtained from the low country, where some vile beings are always to be found, sufficiently tempted by the golden lure of the price paid for them, to steal children from their unhappy parents for the purpose of conveying them to the superstitious Khoonds. To prevent the inhuman practice by the punishment of these monsters, is of course an object to be most earnestly sought; and to their apprehension the vigilance of our officers has been sedulously directed. But hitherto this has proved without effect; the necessary forms of our Judicial Courts have always stood in the way of sufficient evidence being acquired to convict the offender, as the Khoonds, whose testimony would be necessary to establish the complete chain, cannot be prevailed upon to quit their native villages and present themselves at our Courts on this account. In consequence of this serious difficulty, a correspondence took place several months ago between the Government of India and that of Madras with a view to the preparation of a Legislative Enactment which should invest the local officers in the Khoond country—that is, the Collectors of Ganjam and Vizagapatam in their separate capacity of Agents of the Governor of Madras, and their assistants also—with summary powers to punish on the spot all persons detected in kidnapping and selling children for the Meriah sacrifice. This would prove, it is fully anticipated, the most effectual way of striking a blow at the root of the atrocious system. At present these child-stealers are doubly encouraged by the prospect of pecuniary reward, and the apparent impunity with which the offence may be committed, but, when they once find that conviction and punishment follow with an immediate step upon detection, (and that the latter is, by a watchful care, rendered easy,) the sordid inducement which has hitherto led them on will fade before the greater dread of the penalty which will then be too sensibly imminent, and, with the consequent abandonment of their occupation, will be stayed the amount of human suffering of which it has already been so lamentably productive.

We understand that a Draft Act for the above important object was framed by the proper authority some four or five months ago; and we would suggest to our respected cotemporary the Friend of India, in the interest he has always evinced on the subject, to make some enquiries near home, to ascertain where, and for what cause, this necessary measure has been permitted to remain in a slumber of such long duration.—Madras Spectator, Sept. 13.

SLOW COACHES OF THE CALCUTTA PRESS.

We are in the habit of seeing claims preferred by our respected brethren of the Marhatta ditch to the possession of intelligence so early and accurate in its character, that it was vain for any other journals on the face of the earth to attempt to contend with them. On the publication of the documents which from time to time make their appearance in the shape of Blue Books, we have sometimes amused ourselves by reverting to the old files of our contemporaries, and found that they were so far ahead that they knew the determinations of government before government had determined on anything—and were acquainted with recommendations certain parties were asserted to have made, which the said parties never themselves appear to have been aware of. With all these matters conceded, we have still been disposed to maintain our own position, and to insist upon it that we could see as far into a millstone as any of our neighbours. We have now got an illustration of this which dare not be controverted or gainsayed. If we were to name the Star, the Hurkaru, the Herald, or the Englishman, as being behind the world, we should immediately have a cry raised by all the others—oh! you are not to take that paper as an indication of our intelligence! Nothing can be more unjustifiable than to stigmatize the whole of an enlightened and intelligent press because one fat-headed fusty fellow is in the wrong. Well, our brethren shall have it their own way,—the position of the paper we are about to single out cannot be disputed,—it is the Fort William Government Gazette. Neither can the literary fame of the individual party be called in question,—if the most distinguished man of letters in Calcutta is not the Post Master General, we should like to know who disputes with him the palm. The following notification appears in the Gazette of the 4th instant, the latest which has reached us:—

"Third.—Letters for the United Kingdom of Great Britain, weighing less than a quarter of an ounce, and passing through France, are charged single postage, which by that route amounts to 2s. 8*d.* By the Falmouth route, Letters of half an ounce in weight are subject to single postage only, which by that route has now been reduced to 1*s.*

"Newspapers, if sent via Falmouth, are free of postage; but if transmitted by the way of Marseilles, they are charged 2*d.* each.

"H. S. OLDFIELD, Offg. Post Master General."

"Fort William, Genl. Post Office, the 27th May, 1840."

Now, good Mr. Oldfield, you must be a very old—a very forgetful fellow indeed, if the date of your knowledge of post office matters extends no farther than May 27, 1840. Since then, if our annals have been written aright, we have had at least two changes,—the last promulgated on the 6th July, and a very strict one it is: to the effect that letters sent by Falmouth are to be charged 1s., and may weigh half an ounce; those sent through France being charged 1*s.* 8*d.*, and weighing a quarter of an ounce. Yet, doubtless, the poor ditchers, misled by official authority, are up to this hour dreaming that by sending letters by Falmouth they are saving not 8*d.* (as is really the case) but 1*s.* 6*d.* Never more let a Calcutta editor speak of the freshness of his information when that of the Post Master General is three and a half years behind.—Bombay Times, Oct. 18.

CEYLON.

The progress of Ceylon can never be a matter of indifference to us at Madras. It is not merely the unavoidable sympathy with a near neighbour, or a selfish interest in the course of agricultural improvement where soil and climate so closely resemble many of our own provinces, but the different mode of Government pursued in the neighbour Island that must give a keen zest to the attention which watches its effects, and draws a comparison between these and the condition of our own "Company" administered territories. When the application of the new system of British Colonial administration to Ceylon took place and a Legislative Council was ordered to be formed, consisting of certain functionaries of the Government and a moderate admixture of independent residents, there was a pretty general disposition to ridicule the arrangement as a burlesque on legislation and all idea of utility or independence in its proceedings as a visionary expectation. We never were able to concur in these views: we always apprehended that, however the numbers arrayed on the side of the Executive Government would suffice to bear down all opposition when any serious difference in the Council might arise, and however diffident the early members might prove in the discharge of their new duties, this latter drawback would in time wear away, popular suggestions for reform and improvement be frequently forced into consideration, and the whole public service be rendered more active and vigorous, from the necessity for high functionaries being prepared at all times to explain and vindicate the measures of their particular departments, and from a consciousness on their own part of an opportunity being enjoyed of fully developing any views they might entertain. This expectation seems indeed now to be realized: the open doors of the Council admit the public to an acquaintance with the discussions that take place, and we are thus enabled to trace the degree of interest which is manifested in the various measures affecting the welfare of the Island. The consideration of the Estimates, which has of late occupied the attention of the Council, affords a fair field for this test, and it is gratifying to observe how much those great land marks of civilization—roads and canals—have engaged the care of the members. The sum voted for works of this nature are of course moderate; the revenues of the Colony do not admit of much being done—but, to the extent of the means, there seems a general disposition to aid them, while all the suggestions of the independent members are readily entertained, and the explanations of the official Heads of the Departments these works belong to are fully and freely made. In this way the very best information is gained on the expediency of opening up any particular line of communication, and a judicious and economical appropriation of the public money is the necessary consequence. The check therefore works well; and, as every object of public expenditure comes before the Council in a distinct Estimate, there is the fullest opportunity enjoyed of exposing abuses and bringing forward amendments, wherever the interests of the people or some better understanding of the question suggests such a course.

We cannot doubt that a knowledge of the existence of this useful system of legislative Government has had its degree of effect in inducing the embarkation of so many capitalists in agricultural pursuits in Ceylon, as has been the case of late years, while, to look homewards, our own vast tract of territory has in comparison been almost entirely neglected. The aversion to such adventures in India, and the willing preference given to Ceylon, arises, we know, chiefly from the differing tenures of land. In this country all that can be obtained from the Government is a lease of waste lands of 21 years duration: in Ceylon on the contrary land may be purchased outright and held in fee simple as the absolute property of the purchaser—what, with all the improvements he effects upon it, he can be sure of enjoying, and hand down to his children after him. But still there is a further inducement to the preference of Ceylon in the knowledge, that the Council offers a sure means of keeping attention fixed on the construction of roads and those other facilities to traffic, which are so indispensable to the prosperity of the agriculturist whose produce is only to find its market on the sea coast. Under the influence of these advantages Ceylon is beginning to go ahead rapidly, and the following comparative statement of the Revenue and Expenditure during the first seven months of the present and past years, will shew how very favourable is the existing position of her Financial affairs, particularly when we remember that a deficit has hitherto been almost their invariable result.

| "First seven months of | 1842 | 1843 |
| Revenue............... | £185,559 | 221,290 |
| Expenditure........ | 190,553 | 201,327 |
| Deficit in 1842...... | £4,994 | |
| Net surplus of 1843.. | | £19,963 |

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE REV. DR. WOLFF.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—I have just seen, in the Delhi Gazette of the 4th October, a letter signed Fidelis containing an appeal to the Army for a subscription to defray the expences of the Rev. J. Wolff and a companion from England to Bokhara. The above-named enthusiast has voluntarily offered to journey thither with a view to ascertain the fate, or procure the release, of Colonel Stoddart and Arthur Conolly.

I am not one of those who believe, though I sincerely hope, they are alive; but I am most willing to aid in ascertaining their fate, whatever it may be. Before however hurrying into a scheme such as that Mr. Wolff proposes, let us consider two points. Is that gentleman the best person to employ? Secondly. Will not the aid of the Anglo-Indian Government render the attainment of our object more probable?

First as to Mr. Wolff. He is warm, enthusiastic and persevering. But he is not generally popular among the Mahomedans of Central Asia. (I speak from what I have myself heard from them). He is looked upon and tolerated rather as one of God's afflicted than any thing else, an idea to which his extreme enthusiasm and total want of caution probably gave rise. Few orientals would dream of an entirely sane man purposely travelling to the "Commander of the faithful" to attack Mahomedanism. Mr. Wolff was therefore and probably for the same reason would again be safe; though I doubt if his Officer companion would not but add another to the victims of the Khan of Bokhara. But neither the influence of Mr. Wolff or any other Christian is likely to be beneficial in the present instance, more particularly if it be true, as I have heard it said, that Col. Stoddart's first imprisonment was occasioned by an incautious polemical discussion with the Moollahs.

Secondly, as to means. The Government through the re-opened communication with Dost Mahomed Khan, commands the means of ascertaining positively and speedily, the fact of the life or death of our gallant comrades. Or by the Agency of the Lohanee merchants, it might obtain their release. If the state of the finances forbid the Government to go to any expence, the fund proposed by Fidelis will be forthcoming.

But is it not the bounden duty of the Government to release them; or Conolly at all events, if alive, and (humanly speaking) to revenge them if dead? The state will, no doubt, ever find able, zealous and ambitious individuals ready to risk life and liberty in barbarous lands to advance the interests of their country. But is it just to these—is it holding out fair reward or due encouragement, to let them see the Government apathetically indifferent to the sufferings and unmindful of the fate of such men as the gallant Stoddart, the chivalrous, the good and sanguine Arthur Conolly? Can it be expected that with the possibility of their employers' taking no interest in their fall, or any steps towards their freedom, Officers will again risk liberty and life with the same confidence they have hitherto? No Sir! the sustaining power in difficulties and dangers among savage and barbarous tribes has ever been (next to Faith in Him who is every where present,) the certainty that the British Government would never allow a subject—far less an Agent to be injured, with impunity. Let the Government then exert itself. The Lohanee merchants will this month be on the banks of the Attock; in November and December many of them with their Camels will be in our provinces, purchasing merchandise; in April next, they will ascend the hills again to Cubool, and by September next we may, by their agency, hail our released friends, or at least have the melancholy satisfaction of mourning over their recovered remains. Let not the question of expence weigh with the Government. We want its assistance—the weight of its name not its money. The brave, the chivalrous and true will still find friends enough to secure their freedom if money be the only requisite; and the State will make but a bad exchange if it keep its money and sacrifice its brave, chivalrous and true.

Your obedient Servant,

WHAT THINK YOU?

ERRATUM.

In paragraph 7 before "read" insert "speak."

MEMORANDUM.

II. An improved bearing towards, and the better treatment of, the Native Officers of Mofussil Courts.

1. "I never yet knew an honest Native."—"I would as soon trust a Moonsiff as a Mohurrir," "they are all rogues alike" are phrases of frequent recurrence both on public and private occasions in the mouths of some, I trust I may say some few, of the Officers of Government. A very little reflection should point out the impropriety, and probable mischief of such remarks.

2. Oftener far than we are aware, such careless remarks are repeated by servants and others (erroneously supposed not to understand any English) and the effect is, that the innocent, the less guilty, and the hardened in guilt, feeling themselves all looked upon in one and the same light, never hearing an expression of sympathy from their official superior, have no motive to pursue an upright line of conduct, but indeed every temptation, and provocative to the contrary.

3. Again where even care and precaution are used in regard to expressions of distrust, the heartless neglect, and absence of any indication of good feeling too frequently apparent, alienate, and while they alienate, lower our Native Omlah—in fact we should censure our own conduct towards them as one of the main causes of those "sins, negligences, and ignorances" for which we are ever so ready to malign them.

4. I have seldom seen real sympathy shown towards this class of persons, such sympathy as might call forth the better feelings which (I suppose it will not be denied) they are capable of cherishing, to their own moral improvement, and the benefit of those, whom they serve. They are treated as mere machines; or, if feelings are allowed them, with none but those which lead to evil—if sick, they are seldom enquired after, except perhaps with a careless growl at their absence—if in domestic affliction, the master with whom they are in daily communication manifests no concern; (which however he would at the death or miscarriage of a favorite Spaniel)—if working extra hours, they seldom receive any thanks or kind words, nor is there in the latter matter any difference shewn between the drones, and the industrious, and energetic—if obliged by want, caused perhaps by unavoidable misfortune, to leave a home of former affluence, and rank, and endeavour to gain a livelihood by public employ in a Government office, no regard is shewn in the treatment which such a one receives to the misfortune which compelled him to take the step, and no approbation of any honourable motives which may have conduced to it. A particular favouritism may be shewn; but this is obviously as mischievous, as a well-directed general considerateness, and kind treatment are the reverse.

5. It will of course be urged as an objection, that to evince such kindness towards Omlahs would only be to encourage them to turn it to bad account, and to create abuses greater than already exist, to place the superior moreover in the false position of being supposed to be for some reason or other dependent upon his Omlah. This objection is futile, when the qualifications, (especially in the command of the Vernacular language) and character of the officer, stand high—and are allowed to let themselves be well-known; when also he regulates his treatment of his Omlah with discrimination, firmness, and consistency.

6. A few practical instances will briefly illustrate my meaning. An Officer may take an opportunity to call and enquire after the health of a Peshkar who is ill—and (exclaim the objectors) such an ill-judged visit will put 2000 Rs. into the Peshkar's pocket, and take it from poor suitors who will crowd round the favoured individual with their douceurs on his return to the duties of his office. No. There is no individual to be favoured—this is merely an exemplar of what should form the subject of a consistent course of considerateness towards all, and all evil will be avoided if on the next occasion when the Court may be crowded, and the attendant Peshkar's influence is supposed to have been thus increased, the presiding officer will but take from the hand of that particular Omlah any petition it may contain—delay its perusal till others shall have been read—then read it himself—speak to the petitioner in the Vernacular himself, dictate his own order in the Vernacular himself through any 8 Rupee Mohurrir standing about, and have it read clearly to the petitioner after signature; every Vakeel in attendance will then make the gup of the Sudder Bazar, and thus of the whole district, to be, these proofs of the Huzoor's being his own master, the Peshkar being no body, of its being needless to douceur him in particular, or any Omlah generally. It will also be well understood that the visit of the Huzoor in the illness of the Peshkar arose solely from the kind heartedness of the former. The Peshkar albeit possibly annoyed secretly at the course taken will feel the presiding officer has both a will, and a way of his own which it is dangerous to thwart, or attempt to deceive; he will also feel bound by gratitude for the consideration shewn to him in his illness. Such feelings will not only raise the superior's character in his view, and in that of every body else, but it will do much towards raising the Peshkar's own character, and self esteem—if in particular cases, it does not succeed in this, at any rate such a course cannot have a contrary tendency. I will add a real case in which a Civilian got from his own house on the mention of the dangerous illness of the father of one of his Omlahs (whilst in Cutcheree) some medicine, had careful directions written as to its application, gave it to the Omlah for his father. The father was cured, and the town was supposed to be wondering at the peculiar interest (it being the first opportunity that had offered for any exhibition of sympathy towards any Omlah,) taken in this individual, and the cause of it on the part of the Huzoor. The next day happened to be petition day, and a Vakeel presuming some strong influence on the part of this Omlah gave his petition into his hands, and when it had been read, requested the Omlah in question to tell him what was the order and then afterwards applied to the Court for the same purpose. The presiding officer replied loudly enough to be heard through the Court that as the Vakeel had given the petition to the Omlah, and had asked that person for the order, it will be better that he should not now apply to the Huzoor, as he had not done so in the first instance. A general smile pervaded the Court, the Vakeel looked excessively foolish; it may be that his own practice was not benefited by the public rebuke, and the erroneous supposition that the Amlah had any influence whatever was completely removed.

7. The loan of books is another mode of shewing kindness to them, and at the same time of improving and elevating their minds. I may say that I have found the Alumni of our Government Colleges far more useful even without practical experience of the particular office, than those brought up in the old school of Omlahs. Where the presiding officer is himself au fait of his duties this will be still more the case.

8. The higher officer, as Sherishtadar, Peshkar, or the head of any Department who has nothing to look for from promotion should be allowed progressive increases of pay on the same principle which regulates these grants in every London office, and which has been recognized and successfully applied in the cases of the Uncovenanted Judicial, Revenue, and latterly Police Officers.

9. I do not mean to say that the carrying out the few rough suggestions thrown out in this paper will stop bribery and corruption—will render our Omlahs a pattern to the prompt money receiving underlings of English offices, or will convert a race only just beginning to be assisted from the slough of immorality in which they have been merged for generations, at once into high-minded and honourable men. But I would fain hope that an improved bearing towards and a better treatment of the Native officers of Mofussil Courts (combined with the progress of ameliorization of the people in other respects) may tend in some degree to elevate their character, to reform their deeply rooted proneness to evil, and afford us eventually the gratification of feeling that they are working with us, fortiter et fideliter, towards the general good of the people of British India.

RELIGIOUS.

THE UNIVERSITY OF ST. ANDREWS VERSUS THE FREE CHURCH.—We copy the following singular announcement from a cotemporary of Saturday last:—"The Committee appointed at last meeting of the Presbytery of St. Andrews for conferring with the University regarding Sir David Brewster, Principal of the United College, met on the 21st ultimo. Sederunt,—Mr. Taylor of Carnbee, Convener; Messrs. Rogers, Wright, Merson, and Stott, ministers; Sir Ralph Anstruther and Dr. Mudie, elders. A conference was held for some time with the University, and it was unanimously resolved to recommend to the Presbytery to proceed to depose Sir David Brewster from his office according to the rules of the Church, and to deprive him of his license as a probationer of the Church of Scotland."

Both the Presbytery and the professors of St. Andrews have manifested and great deal more zeal than either knowledge or discretion in the manner in which they have set about depriving the Principal of his office; and should they proceed to act upon the preposterous recommendation of their committee, they will to a certainty bring themselves into an awkward scrape. Whatever may be the ultimate result of the movement, one point is clear beyond the possibility of doubt, that the Presbytery have no right whatever to interfere in the matter. This was most explicitly laid down by Lord Cunninghame in the case of Professor Blaikie. In the interlocutor pronounced by his Lordship on that occasion he says,—"A pretension is urged by the Presbytery that they have some right of control and superintendence at common law over the conduct and religious opinions of all professors in our universities as teachers of youth in these schools; but the Lord Ordinary conceives that claim to be quite untenable. He has found no authority for any such jurisdiction either in the statutes or in the principles of common law; and he should think it alike disadvantageous, to science and to religion to give its ministers any right of control, either in the admission of lay professors or over the general course of instruction in our universities." And again, in another paragraph, which bears still more strongly on the case in dispute, his Lordship says,—"Suppose that a lay professor, after signing the Confession of Faith, had in a few weeks or days after subscription openly joined in the communion of the Episcopal Church, the Presbytery of the bounds would find it very difficult to institute any complaint or action before this Court to recall or cancel the certificate of subscription, or to subject the professor to any penalty or forfeiture for alleged insincerity or falsehood in his subscription. The answer would be insurmountable, that let the right of complaint (if any be competent) lie where it may, it has not been conferred on the Presbytery of the bounds." It is rather unlucky that the residuaries of St. Andrews have not one at least among their number who possesses some knowledge of the matter with which they have presumed to intermeddle.

Sir James Graham seems to imagine, because certain chairs in the University of Glasgow are at present held by Episcopalians, that these offices are in law open to members of the Episcopal Church. This notion is altogether erroneous. One law applies to all the universities; and if it should be found contrary to law for the Principalship of St. Andrews University to be held by a member of the Free Church, it is at least equally illegal for an Episcopalian to hold the Professorship of Greek in the University of Glasgow. Nay, more, the same law would render it necessary that the office of Rector, which has been held by Sir James Graham himself, should be filled only by members of the Residuary Establishment. It would not be difficult, however, to show, that all that the statute requires is merely subscription to the Confession of Faith, and that even this form may be omitted, and yet the professorial office retained. Lord Cuninghame expressly states, that while the office held by a professor who omits to take the oath of allegiance is ipso facto adjudged void, "the neglect to subscribe the Confession of Faith is attended with no such penalty, and, therefore, when any College in Scotland agrees to waive the Act of Queen Anne relative to subscription, it has never yet been ascertained by what authority it is to be enforced."

In our former article we adverted to the probability of the erection of a new college, should the attempt to eject the seceding professors prove successful. Some of the Moderates affect to sneer at such a proposal as impracticable; but in doing so, they only manifest their wonted ignorance of the strength of their opponents, and of the fatal effect which the disruption has had upon their own numbers and influence. We are enabled to state, on the authority of a gentleman who has been at great pains to obtain accurate information on this subject, that were the different bodies of evangelical Dissenters in Scotland to unite, as we have no doubt they would do, in the erection of a new university, it would be opened with at least six hundred students. The students in connection with the United Secession Church have been estimated at 150, those belonging to the various other bodies of evangelical Dissenters at the same number, and the adherents of the Free Church, in the four existing universities, at 300,—a calculation, we have reason to believe, below the truth. It will be observed, that in this estimate no account is taken of those students who either have no view to the ministry, or relinquish it before reaching the Divinity Halls. The sum paid by each student for attendance on the literary and philosophical classes during the curriculum of four years, is about £30. The entire sum contributed by 600 students during their curriculum would thus amount to £18,000, which would give £4500 as the annual income of the College,—a sum amply sufficient for the maintenance of the institution, without the aid of a shilling from the funds of the various bodies by which it would be supported.

While we are thoroughly convinced of the practicability of the proposal, we are of opinion that the erection of a new college ought not to be attempted, until an effort is at least made to reform the existing institution. The present system of education under which students of the various learned professions, and of all religious denominations meet in the same class-room on an equal footing, is attended with many advantages which would be lost by the erection of a separate seminary.

The existing universities are national institutions, intended for the benefit of the whole nation, and not for the exclusive advantage of one sect. By a slight change in their regulations, they might easily be adapted to the present state of society, and to the views of the various religious bodies into which the country is divided, and we should deeply regret were they to be turned into mere dormitories for the drones of the Establishment, as they would inevitably be, were they left wholly in the hands of the Moderates.—Scotsman.

MALTA MISSIONS OF THE FREE CHURCH.—Our readers are aware that the Ladies' Colonial Association have been the means of conferring great benefits on our countrymen in Malta. They sent out the Rev. J. J. Wood, temporarily to labour there; and they have resolved to settle permanently there a minister and an experienced teacher. We are happy to be able to announce, that the Wesleyan Missionary Society having made offer, on peculiarly favourable terms, of their missionary buildings at Valetta, including church and dwelling-house, to the Free Church, the India and Jewish Committees have concurred with the Colonial in the purchase of these buildings. It is difficult to over-estimate the importance of Malta as a central missionary station. In many ways the property which the Free Church has acquired will be found valuable for continuing and extending missionary operations in the east. It is to be viewed as a remarkable token for good, that at this time such an unexpected opening should have presented itself, and we must feel that the special offer of their Mission House is an additional proof of the deep interest which the Wesleyan body cherish towards the Free Church. We understand that arrangements are made for the immediate transmission of labourers to Malta.—Witness.

THE INDIA MISSIONARIES.—We understand that letters have already been received from Dr. Wilson and all the missionaries at Bombay and Poonah, declaring their cordial adherence to the Free Church. By the next mail, we hope to have similar communications from the other stations in India.—Ibid.

THE REV. GEORGE SCOTT'S EXPULSION FROM SWEDEN.—Gravesend, May 2, 1843.—GENTLEMEN,—Now that I have obtained the royal decision on our Swedish affairs, I feel the time has come when I must write to you without delay.

The things which have happened to me to in Sweden have not in anywise affected the progress of vital godliness in the capital, or throughout the kingdom. In Stockholm, my friend Rosenius writes me, there never were more converted persons than at this moment; and although the chapel being closed, no general meetings can be held—although having to meet in smaller rooms, the company of believers is divided, and the same persons not allowed to meet at more than one place—although threatenings from the police authorities, that these meetings will be broken in upon, and half-decided—yet the crowds attending Rosenius's daily or nightly Scripture expositions increase continually, and many are brought to experience the life of God in their souls. From other sources (for hosts of letters from the pious reach me) I learn that the devoted labours of Rosenius are greatly blessed of the Lord. In the country, south and north, a great work is going forward. South of Stockholm, in Smaland, "the preaching sickness," (a name given by the authorities to the marvellous event of scores of uneducated persons, principally young females, appearing in public, preaching repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and for which as many as seventy have been carried into the hospitals to be cured of this malady!) has produced great excitement, led to many awakenings, and occasioned a very general outcry for copies of the Holy Scriptures.

In the north, more healthy and more blessed revivals are progressing. At ——, where my old friend R—— labours, a marvellous work is going forward. For twenty-eight years he has faithfully laboured among a very wicked people, without any apparent fruit: the last ten he has endeavoured to promote the Temperance cause; but, of his 1,000 hearers, not 50 could be prevailed upon to sign the pledge up to March last, when a revival commenced, principally through God's blessing, on the visit of a young peasant, whom I had engaged some time before, as a Bible colporteur; and, in October last, he writes:—"The people, especially the young, have been truly awakened; the fear of man has vanished, and men and women fall down in numbers at our meetings, weeping, deploring their guilt in the sight of God, and soliciting the intercessions of their brethren on their behalf. Of my 1,600 parishioners, 1,200 have joined the Temperance Society; so that brandy is nearly banished from our borders. In nearly every house some one or more are concerned for their souls, and wherever you go the conversation is about godliness and temperance. Such an awakening, so general and sincere, I have never either read or heard of."

This is by no means the only parish where the work of God is revived: but, strange to say, the parishes of ——, and some others known to us, have not so general a visitation: can it be because these have, in a cowardly spirit, turned their backs upon, and disowned the instrumentality God has been pleased to bless to this end; while R——, and others, humble and staunch like him, have never ceased to acknowledge their obligations to English and American Christians? R—— writes me:—"Just when you were by all right-minded esteemed and beloved, all was changed, and suddenly you were insulted, hated, persecuted, forsaken, and driven away. All must be taken, however, from God's hand. We may say—He sent you here to us; he hath taken you again from us. Well, what was your errand here? You came to put life in the dead Christianity of Sweden, and this you have done. Thus was the purpose of God in sending you accomplished, and we could not longer retain you."

And now to my own circumstances. You know of the riot on March 21, 1842, and the prohibition of the Governor; and I think you also know of an unsuccessful application to the English Government. Had the case been connected with the High-Church party, the answer of Lord Aberdeen would have been very different. The Governor prohibited my having any religious exercises in Sweden (even family prayer), on three grounds:—1. That I had no royal permission, expressing my right to preach in Swedish. 2. That no Methodist Church, composed of Swedes, was known in Stockholm. 3. That certain charges of my having transgressed the Church law had been made against me. Against this, we lodged, on the 1st of July, an appeal to the King, showing that, 1st, No permission was needed where no proscription was found in the law; and that the Consistory having objected, in 1838, to my Swedish preaching, and the King having overruled the objection, the right I had so long exercised remained. 2nd. That it was never my endeavour to make Swedish Methodists; and 3rd, That no charges ever had been communicated to me; and it was therefore absurd to found so important a prohibition on loose, uninvestigated charges—charges which, even if established, constituted no serious breach of law. The King, on the 31st of January last, passed a resolution, waiving all reply to the first and second, and confirming, on the third ground, the prohibition of the Governor. So the chapel erected by the efforts of Catholic Christians in England and America is closed against us, in all probability, for ever. I met our committee yesterday on the subject, and greatly admired the noble spirit manifested. All seemed to say—"Let us not hurry with the sale; the pious in Stockholm must have a place to meet in." Let them have this at a very trifling rent; and as religious liberty must soon be recognised there, perhaps these very persons, for whose edification the chapel was erected, may become the possessors of it. I have sometimes wondered if your foreign Evangelical Society could not become owners, on easy terms, of the property, and try America's influence for Sweden's good.

I have an important sphere of operations in Gravesend, and still do much for poor dear Sweden; still, it deeply grieves my heart that, after twelve years' hard self-denying labour, I am thus unrighteously and unceremoniously rejected. But last night I was standing side by side, on a missionary platform, with a fellow-sufferer, Mr. Stallybrass, who, after twenty-three years' labours in Siberia, has been just as unceremoniously sent away by the Russian Government. But it will, another day, appear all right.

A very large edition of "One Hundred Arguments for the Divinity of Christ," to meet Strauss's dreadful and widely-spread errors, has been put in circulation. I cannot give all particulars.

The noble grant of the Bible Society has not been so rapidly expended as if I had been still in Sweden; but much good has been done, and that Society has no reason to regret this grant. The Seaman's Friend Society will, I hope, continue Petterson and Wilson at Stockholm and Gottenburg. They are doing a blessed work among sailors of all nations.

I have never regretted my journey to America. It has not occasioned the disruption in Sweden, but only hastened the crisis which must have come. And we shall see that this is all right, however distressing the process of working out the problem may be. So write me, and soon. If you prefer it, you may correspond with Keyser on the Society business; but the language will be a difficulty, and I am quite willing in this, or any Christian way, to labour for Sweden.

Yours, &c.

GEORGE SCOTT.

BIBLE-BURNING IN AMERICA.—Not long since there was a great deal said in some of the newspapers, concerning the destruction of some Bibles at Champlain, New York, by direction of a Catholic priest. Lately, a committee composed of both Catholics and Protestants have, at the request of Bishop Hughes, inquired into the matter with a view to acquaint the public with the facts. They report that some forty Bibles were burnt; that it was done by M. Telman, a missionary from Canada, and recently from France, in opposition to the express wishes of the resident priest, and that the Bishop of Montreal promptly condemned the act within five days.—National Intelligencer. An account of this investigation has already been published in the Commercial at large. Our object in again adverting to the subject is simply to inquire of those connected with the Roman Church, who can give the information for which we seek, by whom was this missionary sent out? Who licensed him, or gave him authority as a missionary? The presumption is that he is a priest in orders conferred by the Roman Catholic Church. The Bibles, then, were burnt by the hands of a Roman priest. Has the ecclesiastical authority to which he is amenable repudiated the act? It will be remembered that the offence was committed some months ago. Now, what society, or ecclesiastical body sent out this missionary? Has the Bishop of Montreal complained to that body? Has Bishop Hughes, within whose diocese the offence was committed, made any such complaint? Has the missionary been recalled? Where is he now, and what is he doing? Time enough has elapsed to communicate with France, or even with Rome—has the priest been rebuked either by his immediate employers, or by the Pope, the head of his Church? It will be remembered that the accusation for committing this offence is not against the Bishop of Montreal, or the Bishop of New York, but against the Roman Catholic Church itself.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE HEIR OF HANOVER.—It is stated in circles usually well informed, though we are unable to trace the report to any positive authority, that an illustrious personage,—the monarch of an independent kingdom, now on a visit to this country,—has it in contemplation to resign his sovereignty in favour of his son, and once more take up his residence in England. The reason assigned for this intention is, that the royal father is extremely anxious to see his son securely settled in the succession, as, though the heir apparent is justly beloved, possesses superior talents, and is of a most amiable nature, he would, from a deplorable visitation of Providence, be ill able to cope with any difficulties that might arise from his being suddenly called to the throne. If this report be well founded, it will account for the desire often expressed by the illustrious personage referred to, that he may be addressed and received according to the style and rank he held before his departure from this country, and not have the honours paid him which are due to his exalted station as one of the crowned heads of Europe.—Britannia.

LORD LYNEDOCH.—We regret to mention that this venerable nobleman met with rather a serious accident on Monday last. Though now in his ninety-fourth year, his lordship is a keen sportsman, and while following his favorite amusement on horseback, in the Edzell hills on Monday, the pony on which he was riding wheeled suddenly round, on the discharge of his fowling piece, whereby his lordship was thrown to the ground with considerable violence. His lordship was immediately taken to his shooting quarters, from whence, by advice of Dr. Guthrie, he the same day left for his seat in Perthshire, where it is to be hoped he will soon recover.—Dundee Courier.

The Morning Post records a strange "apparition in high life:—"A curious circumstance occurred at the dinner given to the King of Hanover by the Duke of Wellington, on Saturday evening last. The soup and fish had only been removed, when the folding-doors were thrown open, and a lady, in full dress, and wearing a profusion of diamonds, entered, and advanced towards the table, evidently with the intention of becoming one of the convives. There was, however, no vacant place. The guests looked at the lady with the suspicion which her unexpected appearance was calculated to excite; and the noble host having at a glance ascertained that she was not an acquaintance of his, deputed Lord Charles Wellesley to hand her from the salle à manger. The lady asserted that she was an invited guest—nay, more, that she had attended the concert lately given by his Grace. Her name she declared to be Angela; but it is stated that her real name is S. Report asserts her to have been a miniature painter, who inherited a fortune some time back, and whose intellects are somewhat deranged. It appears, on inquiry, that this person did gain admittance at the Duke's concert the other evening."—Dumfries Herald and Advertiser.

The will of the Duke of Sussex has recently passed the seal of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. It is very short, being written on a small sheet of paper. The property was sworn under £80,000: the testator directs that a bond held by his daughter for £10,000, be discharged; that the whole of his property go to his wife, the Duchess of Inverness; that his plate, jewels, and many other articles, be sold by auction (they have since realized the sum of £37,713); and that if Government do not purchase his library within a year, it is also to be sold by auction.—Dumfries Herald and Advertiser.

The National Society for promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church have been moved to unusual activity. They issued an address, stating that the withdrawal of the Education clauses in the Factory Bill suggested to the Society the necessity of calling on private benevolence to provide resources for affording "sound religious instruction and moral training to the children of the poor." The call has been responded to by the subscription of £60,000; the number of contributors being 1,300.—Ibid.

DREADFUL DEATH OF MR. AYMER, THE CELEBRATED AMERICAN VAULTER.—This unfortunate man, whose recent performance at the English Opera, under the management of Van Amburgh and Titus, excited so much admiration in his peculiar department, met his death on Thursday night at the Circus of Mr. Batty, proprietor of the Royal Amphitheatre, who has several establishments in various parts of the kingdom, and one in the island of Jersey, where the late performer was fulfiling an engagement. The particular performance for which Mr. Aymer was announced concluded with a double summerset, in feat considered almost (if not quite) impossible, and a throwing at the ill-fated artist, instead of alighting on his feet, fell on his neck, and death was the immediate result. Mr. Batty, on hearing the fatal intelligence, immediately quitted London for Jersey. Smith, a great trampoline and vaulter, met his death in a manner precisely similar during the management of Messrs. Ducrow and West, at Astley's, some seasons back.—Ibid.

The bronze statue of Rubens was placed, some days ago, upon its pedestal in the Place Verte, at Antwerp. The figure itself is 14 feet high, and weighs 20,000 pounds. The whole monument rises to 30 feet. The inauguration was celebrated with music from the bands of the regiments quartered in the garrison and the amateur societies of the city. At night the Place Verte was illuminated.—Ibid.

THE CARRIER PIGEON.—On Tuesday last, a bird which had been sent from London, 200 miles by Railroad, was thrown at the time directed, and arrived in London under two hours and a half. One hundred pigeons sent from Antwerp were liberated from London at seven o'clock on the morning of the 17th of November, 1831, and the same day, at noon, one of them arrived at Antwerp; a quarter of an hour afterwards a second arrived. The remainder were all at home early the following morning.—Ibid.

NEW POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.—The negociations that have been carried on for some time between the Postmaster-General and the Post-Office authorities of Belgium, Holland, Austria, Saxony, Prussia, Sweden, Norway, and Russia, are, it is said, fully concluded for the transmission of letters and newspapers to and from the above countries, the same as it is between England and France, by prepaying the postage or not, at the option of the parties. The Prussian and Austrian Governments have reduced the postage on letters to a uniform price throughout their territories on the English system, by which the commercial interest, as well as the public, will be greatly benefited in the transmission of samples of manufactured goods and their general correspondence. The French Government is making arrangements with the Post-Office departments of Switzerland, Turin, Rome, Naples, Sardinia, and the Two Sicilies; so that all letters and journals from and to this country, via France, will be placed under the same regulations as the Post-Office convention entered into in June last with England.—Witness.

DISSOLUTION OF THE ST. GEORGE STEAM-PACKET COMPANY.—A general meeting of the proprietors of this Company was held in Liverpool a few days ago, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of dissolving the Company. In the course of the conversation which took place, it appeared that during the eight years' existence of the Company, the losses sustained amounted to no less than half a million sterling. A resolution dissolving the Company was recorded, and a meeting announced for a future day, for the purpose of winding up its affairs.—Ibid.

At Durham Assizes on Friday, Joseph Atkinson was convicted of illegally solemnising a marriage. The prisoner was one of those individuals who infest Berwick and its neighbourhood, by officiating as priest at those border marriages which are so frequent in that part of the country. At the toll-house, where these marriages usually take place, a couple who had eloped sought the offices of the individual alluded to; finding that he was not there, they proceeded to Berwick in search of him, where they found him in a public-house called the "Old Hen and Chickens." As they were afraid of being traced, they wished him to perform the ceremony there, which at first he refused, afraid of the consequences; but being made drunk, he complied; a confusion of legal geography, which caused him to be sentenced to seven years' transportation.—Witness.

ORPHAN HOSPITAL.—At a meeting of the Incorporation of this hospital, held on Monday last, the resolutions of the managers to allow the children to remain with Mr. Manson, and attend the Free Church, and also to omit from the regulations the words requiring "that the master and mistress shall be members of the Established Church," which rule had been made, for the first time, during the heat of the Voluntary controversy, were, on the motion of Sheriff Spiers, seconded by Walter Brown, Esq., ratified by a majority of 37 to 21.—Mr. More protesting against the decision. The minority should be only 19; for Andrew Storie, Esq. claimed a right to two votes, one in the capacity of treasurer to the Society of Writers to the Signet, and another in his individual capacity as a member of the Incorporation; and Mr. Richard Mackenzie, one of the deputy-keepers of the Signet, insisted on voting as Keeper of the Signet, who is ex officio a member of the Incorporation,—that office being at present held by the Right Hon. William Dundas. Among those who supported the motion, were Drs. Abercrombie, Beilby, Begbie, Wm. Brown, and Omond; Rev. Dr. Muirhead, Rev. Messrs. J. Buchanan, J. Bruce, R. Elder, Henry Grey, and John Sym; Robert Paul, Esq.; John Thomson, Esq.; A. Bonar, Esq.; A. Jameson, Esq.; Thos. Miller, Esq.; Walter Brown, Esq.; Convener Maclagan; J. Bonar, Esq.; John Lander, Esq.; John Cowan, Esq. advocate; the Lord Provost, the Treasurer of the City; Colonel Cadell; James Walker, W. S.; Mr. W. Alexander, Leith, &c. &c. The counter motion, by J. S. More, Esq., "to remit the question to the managers, with instructions to take the opinion of counsel," was supported by Rev. J. Paul and R. Jameson; Richard Mackenzie, Esq.; A. Tawse, Esq.; Mr. W. Fraser, printer; Geo. Ross, Esq.; Mr. T. Sawers; Dr. Sibbald, &c. &c.—Ibid.

CIVIC COURTESIES BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.—The Mayor and Civic authorities of Boulogne have accepted an invitation from the Mayor and Corporation of Folkestone to dinner on Tuesday the 1st August. The Directors of the Dover Railway are invited from London, and all parties are to return to their own domiciles the same evening. We presume, when the railway from Boulogne to Paris is completed, we shall see similar courtesies pass between the authorities of London and Paris.—Railway Times.

DEATH OF A RAVEN.—Died a few days ago, at Rampton, near Retford, a raven, belonging to Mr. John Binge, in the 28th year of his age. This singular bird was bred in grove Park, and could talk as plainly as any man, as far as his knowledge extended. In point of imitation he was inimitable; and could mimic anything he ever heard. Like many others of his tribe, he was often exceedingly mischievous, but generally amusing. But his masterpiece was his correct repetition of the Lord's prayer, which for emphasis and distinct enunciation would have done no discredit to many a village schoolmaster.—Leeds Intelligencer.

AN OLD MAN WHOSE FATHER LIVED IN THE TIME OF OLIVER CROMWELL.—Having heard of the extraordinary circumstance of an old man, named James Horrocks, in his 100th year, living in Harwood, about three miles from Bolton, whose father lived in the time of Oliver Cromwell, we took an opportunity a few days ago of visiting this venerable descendant of a sire who was contemporary with the renowned Protector. Until within the last few years he resided at Hill End, a small estate left him by an uncle when he was about 26 years old, but both his surviving daughters being married, and himself growing feeble, and his sight failing him, he let the land and went to reside with his eldest daughter, Margaret, and his son-in-law, John Haslam, at a place called "The Nook," near the Britannia, in Harwood. Here we found the old man, surrounded with every comfort which easy circumstances and affectionate friends can afford, and, to use his own language, "neither tired of living, nor yet afraid to die." He is a remarkable good-looking old man, with long silvery locks, and a countenance beaming with benevolence and good nature. He has nearly lost the use of his eye-sight, and is a little dull of hearing; yet he is enabled to walk about. The loss of his sight he regrets most of all, as it prevents him from spending his time in reading, to which he was before accustomed; and, as he remarked, also denies him the pleasure of looking upon his children and his old friends. He converses with remarkable cheerfulness for one of his years. As an instance, we may mention, that, on observing to him that he must have been a tall man in his youth, he sprang up from his arm-chair with the elasticity of middle age, rather than the decrepitude usually accompanying those who are permitted to spin out the thread of life to the extent of a century, and, with a humorous smile upon his countenance, put his hands to his thighs, and stood as straight as an arrow against a gentleman nearly six feet, remarking, at the same time, "I don't think I am much less now than ever I was." He stands now about five feet eight inches and a-half. A short time ago, on coming down stairs in the morning, he observed to his daughter, with his accustomed good humour and buoyancy of spirits, "I wonder what I shall dream next; I dreamed last night that I was going to be married again; and who knows but I could find somebody that would have me yet?" His son-in-law is an old grey-headed man, much harder of hearing than himself; and it frequently happens that when any of the family are endeavouring to explain to him, old James will say, "Stop, and I'll 'inarnse' him?" and his lungs seldom fail in the undertaking.—Manchester Guardian.

PROPORTION OF PAUPERS TO THE POPULATION.—A Parliamentary return has been issued, headed "A Return showing the number of in-door and out door Paupers relieved during the first week of the month of April, 1843, in the several unions comprised in each Assistant-Poor-law Commissioner's district." It appears that there are nine assistant-commissioners. The number of unions in the nine districts is 587. In-door paupers relieved in the week mentioned, 115,250. Out-door paupers relieved in the same period, 701,741. Total of paupers relieved in the week, 816,991. The population in 1841 was, in England and Wales, 15,[illegible]. The proportion of the total number of paupers to the population is at about 6 per cent. The return further shows the following two items:—Estimate for unions not included, and places not in unions in door paupers, 17,968; out-door, 109.346. Total, 127,314. Estimated totals of (paupers) England and Wales, in-door, 133,208; out-door, 811,687. Total, 944,895, out of a population, in 1841, of 15,906,821, being 6 per cent. on the whole, six persons out of every 100 receiving parish relief!—Pat.

FATHER MATHEW.—On Saturday the indefatigable apostle of "total abstinence" resumed his labours among the inhabitants of the great metropolitan city, in the New City Bunhill-fields Burial-ground, Golden-lane.

Father Mathew, having partaken of breakfast with the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, nearly the whole of the Norfolk family, and a large number of the aristocracy, arrived in the carriage of the noble earl at the cemetery, about twelve o'clock, accompanied by his lordship, the Hon. Stafford Jerningham, and one or two other gentlemen. There were from 3.000 to 4,000 persons assembled. On Father Mathew coming forward, he was loudly cheered, and the Reverend gentleman proceeded to address the people.

The Earl of Arundel and Surrey was affected even to tears, and at the conclusion of Father Mathew's address, came forward to the front of the platform, and declared his desire to take the pledge, which he did kneeling, in the presence of the people assembled, and on rising was loudly and repeatedly cheered. The noble earl remarked that he had not come there with any such intention, but that the soul-stirring address of the Reverend father had so convinced him that it was his duty to set an example to others, that he could not refrain.

Father Mathew having presented the noble earl with a handsome silver medal, expressed the great delight and gratification he felt that at the example set by so virtuous and distinguished a nobleman as the Earl of Arundel and Surrey. He was yesterday gratified at having the honour to give the pledge to that most noble lady, the Marchioness Wellesley, but to see a nobleman thus publicly coming forward was indeed delightful.

A batch was then formed of about one hundred persons, and twenty-one of them were stokers belonging to the gas-works in Worship-street. Father Mathew presented each man with a medal.

In one batch, Father Mathew administered the pledge to several non-commissioned officers of the Fusilier Guards.

Father Mathew expressed his gratification at this circumstance, and said he was aware that it was the wish of his Grace the Duke of Wellington that temperance should become general throughout the army, and he was proud of this, for that great man was an Irishman.

A Voice: But Mr. O'Connell says he is not an Irishman.

Father Mathew: I care not what Mr. O'Connell, or any other man, may say. I repeat he is an Irishman—Ireland ought to be proud of him. (Tremendous cheering.)

The batches were continued throughout the day, and among other Dissenting ministers on the platform was noticed the Rev. J. Burnet, of Camberwell, who cordially shook hands with Father Mathew, and wished him success in his labours.

Nearly 1,000 persons again took the pledge, making it amount to 2,900 in this spot.

Yesterday Father Mathew revisited the opening scene of his temperance labours in the metropolis, and again administered the total abstinence pledge to 2,000 persons in the newly-consecrated Roman Catholic Cemetery, Commercial-road, St. George's in the East.

The apostle this day attends in the neighbourhood of Manchester-square, to administer the pledge to the Irish inhabitants of Kelmell-buildings and others in Marylebone, and which will terminate his proceedings in the metropolis.—Pat. Sept. 4.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO PHILANTHROPISTS.—We have seen working-men who adorned and dignified their station; we have seen them toiling on from youth to age in unremitting but contented industry; securing constant employment by constant steadiness and skill; insuring an adequate and comfortable subsistence by diligence, frugality, and forethought; earning efficient friends in the hour of need, by the uniform tenor of a blameless life; not giving to their children, it is true, an extensive or scientific education, but bringing them up in habits of industry, and in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord;" and spending their scanty leisure, not in idleness or animal indulgence, but in healthy recreations, or in such intellectual pleasures as might be within their reach. All who have mixed much with the poor will agree that this is no imaginary character, we have known many such; and, in our estimation, such men are objects of sincerer admiration, of deeper interest, of tenderer regard, than the statesman in the most successful hour of his ambition, or the rich man surrounded by all the elegancies and refinements which wealth can purchase, or lofty station can bestow. Not, then, to raise such men out of their class, but to make all their class resemble them, should be our aim, and may be our attainment; by wiser institutions, and less selfish and clumsy legislation, to make that condition of comfort and contentment easy and possible to all, which now requires minds of no ordinary endowments to reach. The object, however, cannot be obtained per saltum; it will require the coadjutorship of many minds, in many different departments, for many tedious and toilsome years. But the moment we have convinced ourselves that it is attainable, or approachable, that moment it becomes an object, not only of reasonable desire, of sober hope, but of positive, paramount, pressing obligation, to all who have the power in any one line of exertion to provide it.—Westminster Review.

SLAVERY IN THE DANISH COLONIES.—A Copenhagen letter, of the 22nd ult., announces the arrival there of two delegates from the London Anti Slavery Society, charged with a request to the Danish Government for the immediate abolition of slavery in its colonies.—Pat.

IRON AND COAL IN AMERICA.—I have visited the great anthracite coal region at Pottsville, 98 miles west of Philadelphia. It is an astonishing district. The business commenced only 17 years ago, and there are already five or six towns and villages built in the midst of the wildest mountain region imaginable, containing about 16,000 inhabitants, all supported by the coal trade. Coals can be obtained here in almost unlimited quantity. Besides the supply for the neighbourhood, about 20,000 tons are sent down weekly by the canal and railway to Philadelphia, and 30,000 tons could be obtained readily if required. Colliers earn about 24s. and labourers 18s. per week. The colliers in this neighbourhood are as sober, moral, and intelligent as any working population I have yet seen, even in America; they are almost all teetotallers, and they, their wives, and children are genteelly dressed on Sundays, attending their respective chapels; each has a cottage and garden, many of them their own; most families have a cow, which they turn into the woods to graze, free of cost; fuel they get free; beef and mutton 2d. to 3d. per lb., butter 5d. per lb., flour 18s. to 20s. per barrel of 196 lb. The general condition of working men in America is much better than in England, but it is getting worse; there is less demand for labour, and wages are declining. The truck system is likewise practised here to a considerable extent, in a similar manner, and attended with the same evils, as in England. The manufacture of iron in the States is as prostrate as in England; the high duty has done the American iron-masters no service as yet. They complain that their sales and prices are less than before. There are five furnaces at Danville, near Pottsville, the four largest of which, lately built, have never been in blast; at Shamokin is another furnace, that was in blast only six weeks, and is now standing; one at Pottsville is standing; the Lenagh furnaces are standing; Paterson, Baltimore, has ceased making; Ellicotts, at Baltimore, will be shortly at a stand; the Ulster are out, besides many others. I obtained a calculation of the cost of a ton of pig iron in Baltimore, amounting to 52s. per ton. In manufactured iron, the Americans give all possible encouragement to their own make, and feel no desire to push the sale of British iron. In quantity and quality the Americans are making great progress; some descriptions I examined were of excellent quality, particularly boiler plates. The general complaint against American manufactured iron is, the want of uniformity in quality, but they are improving in this; and, in my opinion, as wages are fast coming down in this country, they will, in a very few years, not only be able to compete with us in price as well as quality in their own market, but in the market of the world. The iron-makers are very powerful in Congress; and unless our corn laws are greatly altered, the duties on the importation of British goods will not be materially reduced. They all say that they are quite willing to begin a system of free trade with us, if it be really free trade; but that if we make discriminating laws with respect to British shipping, trade with British colonies, corn, machinery and manufactures, they will take care to protect themselves; that they have abundant means to produce all the articles they receive from us, and that if they are protected a few years longer, they will be able to compete with us in the price of everything. Messrs. Eastwick and Harrison, Philadelphia, have the patent for making the great excavating machine, which will excavate a square yard of earth per minute. They have made four of these machines already; two are in the United States, one near London, and the other in Russia. They are now making two more for the Russian Government; one, which I saw, will be ready in August; it will lift a stone three tons weight into a cart with great ease. The machine weighs about 17 tons; costs £5 per day for working and wear and tear, and will do as much work as 80 men.—From Notes of a Man of Business.

The Times this morning exhibits a novelty in journalism. Several Carmarthenshire farmers, who had missed laying their grievances before Mr. Hall, of whose progress they were not informed, requested the reporter of the Times to hear them. He did so on Wednesday last, and duly reports their evidence, under the old heads "Turnpike-tolls," "New Poor-law," "Countyrate," "Rents," with a further complaint against "Magistrates and their fines," the Magistrates only understanding the English, and despising the Welsh. This is the first time that a newspaper has thus formally been acknowledged as a tribunal for investigation, and its reporter as something like a public commissioner of inquiry. The tolls were more than ever proved to be intolerable; and the Times likens them to the imposts on the French peasantry before the Revolution.—Spectator of Saturday.

SPAIN.—The Spanish Revolutionary Government have resorted to a measure which stamps them beyond all cavil the Government de facto if not de jure, and neither they nor any other Ministry can undo it; they have proclaimed the majority of Queen Isabella the Second. The act only awaits the formal recognition of the Cortes. The little Queen looked pleased at the ceremony, and talked in a very friendly manner with the men who had thus hastened her own accession to the name of complete power. At that time, her friend Espartero was a wanderer, sick, and in misfortune, and denied an asylum in Portugal. It were indiscreet to draw too strong inferences from this appearance of youthful levity and thoughtlessness; yet, whatever Isabella the Second may become, Spain has not yet an earnest strong-minded head. The Queen's husband, however, may still save it, if well chosen; and a vigorous understanding would be of more worth than all the balances of connexion, and all the idiotic negations which diplomatists favour.—Spectator.

SPAIN.—We have received very important communications from Madrid, of the 26th, 27th, and 28th. The courier was delayed, in order that he might be the bearer of a letter from the young Queen, dated La Granja, to her mother.

The result of these letters from our own and from occasional correspondents is, that the reaction against the present Government, and in favour of Espartero and the old Liberals, is much greater and more menacing than was at all supposed. The unconstitutional Government, divided in itself, full of quarrels and dissensions, has no support whatever. The late insurrection disorganized the army, and the Moderados, in purging it, have disorganized it still more, and diminished it; whilst the Juntas having done, in one sense, what the Moderados, Narvaez and Concha, have done in another, the effects of both are neutralized, and the army may be considered, for all political purposes, as defunct.

In the electoral meetings there is but one cry—distrust of the Moderados, and consequent distrust of the Government. Even those who support it, seek, at the same time, to guarantee themselves and their principles against it. Numerous concessions to the Juntas, and to the exigencies of local and provincial interests and influences, have not appeased the jealousies, nor gained the good opinions of any parties. There is not a doubt that the first vote of a Cortes would be instantly to send about their business the Moderados and the Liberals who placed their heads under the feet of the old foes of Liberalism. But the fear is not now what the Cortes may do; but how the Government is to go on until the Cortes meet. The Moderados put off that epoch, in order to allow time for electoral manœuvres and accession of strength. But every day they lose more than they gain. Their unpopularity at Madrid increases, little possible as that may seem; and they are obliged to recur to the most arbitrary measures in order to sustain themselves against the odium in which they are held by the electors.

We give an instance. A meeting was held the other day of the Progressista party, for the purpose of naming commissaries for the elections. In the very quarter, or electoral district of the palace, the commissioners named were General San Miguel, who was Espartero's Captain-General of Madrid, and Senor O'Leal, the Alcalde under the Regency. Nothing more natural, nothing more legal than this. Yet so infuriated was the Government—the Government that calls itself parliamentary and constitutional exclusively—that it instantly fabricated a decree at its war-office, sending to head-quarters, in distant provinces, all the officers supposed to be favourable to the Regent. In this number were Rodil, San Miguel and his brother, Rodriguez Vera, Capaz, Isidro, Minuissir, and Colonel Lujan. In order to render the election of these personages impossible, they have been all ordered off to spots where they can have least influence.

Such an arbitrary measure can only recoil on the head of its authors, the Brigadiers Narvaez and Concha, who will be powerless for any violent act. "The army," writes one of our correspondents, "exists no more. In obedience to the orders of the Juntas, the War-office has disbanded the military levies of 1836 and 1839, being more than 30,000 of the best and steadiest soldiers. The provincial militia has been disbanded at the same time: the cadres, or a few of the principal officers, being alone maintained. Efforts are making to re-organize the army after the French plan; but even this is unpopular with the troops. All the military appointments of the Juntas have been confirmed: that is, the hottest volunteers and most inexperienced soldiers have been declared colonels, captains, and majors, whilst the old officers are turned adrift. Serrano tried at first to resist, but in vain." All the military suspected of attachment to Espartero have been turned adrift. The regiment of hussars, of which the Regent was colonel, rather basely deserted him at Utrera. They have been worthily recompensed, for the regiment has been broken up, and all its men discharged.

Such is the state of the army. And the civil government is quite as much disorganised. The "feeble but honest Lopez," says one of our correspondents, "flings himself on his sofa, and has abandoned hope, as well as activity. Caballero and Aylion, on the contrary, show fight, resist the Moderados, and appoint none but downright Liberals. Serrano is in the hands of Narvaez; Frias, Marine Minister, and holding the portfolio of Foreign Affairs, ad interim, is as null as Lopez. Olozaga and Cortina are petrified, and cry out, 'Let there be no change, no quarrel.' All they hope for is to drag on till the Cortes meet. The Infante Don Francisco inhabits Carabanchel, two leagues from Madrid. He and his family are furious at the open determination of the Coalition to have a French Prince marry the Queen. He has pawned all his jewels, and the money procured will probably go to excite a new insurrection. Already, indeed, the cry of 'Death to the Moderados, Viva Espartero,' grows common in the streets and suburbs."

The utter weakness of the Government is, however, fully depicted in an account which we have received of its anxieties and debates on the Barcelona affair, in a letter of the 28th, from Madrid. It seems that on the first news of the Barcelona discontents, and the foolish conduct of Arbuthnot, the ministry could devise no better plan than to send down Arauz, a known Ayacucho as Captain-general. They afterwards received more serious intelligence, and Serrano set off to La Granja to consult General Olozaga as to what was to be done. In the midst of these doubts, the delegates, whom we spoke of as despatched from Barcelona, arrived at Madrid. They had been persuaded by Prim not to demand a central Junta, but to insist merely on guarantees against a Moderado triumph or reaction. They require that, in the elections, but a certain number of Moderado candidate shall come forward. And they insist upon keeping Barcelona and all its fortresses in the hands of their friends—no Moderado to come there. They demand the appointment of Prim as Captain-General, Pujol as commander of the citadel, and Milans of the Atturazanas. They insist on Echalecu remaining Governor of Montjuich, he being the determined foe of the Moderados. These several demands of the Barcelonese delegates have thrown the Government into despair. Lopez and Serrano had returned from La Granja with Olozaga's advice; and this is to try to get the delegates to accept Araoz and Gil Avalee as Captain-General and secundo cabo, leaving Prim governor of the town, and subscribing all the conditions about the elections. The Cabinet is to have an interview with the Barcelonese delegates on the 29th, and the result will, probably, not be known for a day or two.

In the midst of this chaos Maria Christina keeps up an active correspondence with her daughter, and imagines that, with the Queen's name, she can marry Isabella, and rule Spain as she will. She will soon find herself egregiously mistaken. The Juntas, however they may have hidden their heads, or exchanged the name of supreme for that of auxiliary, are still the true masters of public events, the Queen's marriage included; and if the French and the Moderados would carry their schemes into execution, it must be done by force of arms. For the present, we see nothing but the mingled elements of political chaos, the Liberals, who created it, being lost in mortification at the absurdity of their conduct in getting rid of the constitutional Regent.—Chronicle.

TAHITI.—We find in the Courrier des Etats Unis the following analysis of the convention entered into between Queen Pomare and Rear-Admiral du Petit-Thouars for the regulations of the conditions of the Protectorate of France. The Courrier states that it is textually from a journal of the Sandwich Islands:—

"There shall be created at Papeiti, the capital of Tahiti, a Council of Government. This Council shall be invested conformably with the conditions of the Protectorate, with the administrative and executive powers, as also with the political relations which the Government of Queen Pomare has with foreign powers. The Council of the Government shall be composed of three members, viz., the Consul of France, King's Commissioner to the Government of her Majesty Queen Pomare, the Military Governor of Papeiti, and the Captain of Papeiti. The decisions of the Council of the Government shall not be pronounced until after having been discussed in the assembly, and they can only be carried into execution when they have been come to unanimously. Civil justice shall be administered at Tahiti by tribunals, whose members shall be natives, named by the Queen, in causes between natives, and according to existing usages; but in all suits in which foreigners shall be parties, there shall be added to these tribunals an equal number of white jurymen, so as to form mixed tribunals, and these shall be named by the Council of Government. All these judgments shall be pronounced according to the laws already promulgated in the country. The natives and whites are equal in the eye of the law. The freedom of religious worship is recognised, and the Government grants to it an equal protection. No person can be attacked for his religious opinions, or obstructed in the exercise of his worship. Individual liberty is guaranteed, and no person can be arrested, except in virtue of a warrant or order, with the motive assigned, emanating from the Council, and after an unanimous resolution. Property of every kind is guaranteed; the disputes which may arise on this subject belong, by the reservations made by the Queen, to the jurisdiction of tribunals of natives. No person is to be compelled to sell or exchange his property. Every white resident at Tahiti is to provide himself with a certificate of nationality, or to be known to the consul of his nation, or to place himself under the protection of an accredited agent. In default of one of these guarantees, he is to be regarded as in a state of vagabondage, and, in consequence, to be expelled from the country. ... The prohibition of the sale of spirituous liquors, as established by the laws emanating from Queen Pomare, is maintained. The inviolability of dwelling-houses is recognised, with the following exceptions, viz. public houses used as hotels, restaurants, cabarets, taverns, and billiard-rooms: gaming-houses are interdicted; every infraction of this prohibition shall be severely punished; and in case of a second offence, the offender shall be expelled from the country. Every white who shall interfere in the affairs of the Government, as they now exist between Queen Pomare and the King of the French, or who by his speeches, intrigues, calumnies, or acts, shall seek to disturb public order or good harmony, may, after a decision come to unanimously in the Council, be sent out of the country. The captains of vessels who shall enter the port of Papeiti are bound to declare the motives of their arrival at the office of the Captain of the Port; they are also to apprize him of the day for their departure, and to pay the pilot and anchorage dues, as they shall be fixed by Queen Pomare. These dues shall be levied in the same way as hitherto, until it shall have been decided otherwise by the King of the French, after he shall have granted his protectorate."—Pat.

Head Quarters, Camp Allahabad, 10th October, 1843.

No. 9.—At a General Court-Martial held at Bangalore on the 7th day of July 1843, Pay Master Henry Routh of Her Majesty's 15th (or the King's) regiment of hussars, was arraigned on the following charges:

CHARGES.—Henry Routh, Pay Master of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, placed in arrest by my order, upon the following charges:

First Charge.—For having at Bangalore, on the thirty-first of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, embezzled or fraudulently misapplied the sum of rupees eight hundred and forty-three, embezzled or fraudulently misapplied the sum of nine hundred and seventy-two Rupees, three annas and six pies, being a balance of money due on the pay abstracts of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons or the King's hussars, for the month of March of the same year left in his hands and entrusted to his charge, as Pay Master of the said regiment, for regimental purposes.

Second Charge.—For having at Bangalore, on the thirty-first of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, embezzled or fraudulently misapplied the sum of rupees four hundred and ninety, being the balance of rupees one thousand, left in his hands on the sixth of March of the same year, by Robert Nicholls, regimental number eight hundred and ninety-eight, private in the B., or Captain Michael William Smith's troop of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, had entrusted to his charge, as Pay Master, for purchasing the discharge and paying for the passage to England of the said private Nicholls.

Third Charge.—For having at Bangalore, on the thirty-first of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, embezzled or fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees three hundred, the property of Samuel Hartcourt Woods, regimental number one thousand one hundred and seventy-seven, private in the H., or Captain Charles Higginson Teush Hecker's troop of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, which had been deposited with him by the said private Woods on the seventeenth of February of the same year, and entrusted to his charge, as Pay Master, for the purpose of purchasing his, the said private Woods' discharge.

Fourth Charge.—For having at Bangalore, on the thirty-first of March one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, embezzled or fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees fifty, the property of Her Majesty, and which had been lodged with him, for Her Majesty's use, by Charles Sweet, regimental number three hundred and nineteen, private in the F., or Captain Edward Thomas Harley Chamber's troop of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, on the eighteenth of October one thousand eight hundred and forty two, and who was discharged on the thirty-first of December of the same year.

Fifth Charge.—For having at Bangalore, on the thirty-first of March one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, embezzled or fraudulently misapplied the sum of twenty-nine Rupees, fourteen annas, and ten pies, being the effects of deceased soldiers of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, which had been entrusted to his charge as Pay Master, on the fourteenth of February of the same year, for the purpose of being paid into the East India Company's Treasury at Madras.

Sixth Charge.—For scandalous and infamous behaviour, unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman in the following instances:

First Instance.—In having at Bangalore, on the thirtieth of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, embezzled or fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees thirteen thousand, three hundred and thirty, one anna, and one pie, being monies entrusted to his charge, as Pay Master, belonging to the regimental funds of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons or the King's hussars, in the following proportions; viz: on account of the Saint George's fund, seven hundred and eighteen Rupees, four annas and nine pies; on account of the canteen fund, Rupees four thousand and seventy-seven and two pies; on account of the mess funds, Rupees seven thousand seven hundred and twenty-six, four annas and four pies; and on account of the band of fund, Rupees eight hundred and eight, seven annas and ten pies.

Second Instance.—In having at the same place on the thirty-first of March one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees three hundred and sixty-seven, being the amount of a subscription made for William George regimental number seven hundred and fifty four, private in the E., or Captain Robert Rollo Gillespie's troop of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons or the King's hussars, by officers and soldiers of the same regiment, and which had been received by him, and entrusted to his charge as Pay Master, in December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, on account of the said William George, discharged from the service in consequence of an accident.

Third Instance.—In having at the same place on the thirty-first of March one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees two thousand and five hundred, being money entrusted to his charge as Pay Master, by Henry Tarleton, regimental number two hundred, Troop Sergeant Major of the H., or Captain Charles Higginson Teush Hecker's troop of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, on the following dates; namely; Rupees one thousand on the fifteenth of April, Rupees one thousand on the fifteenth of October, and Rupees five hundred on the sixteenth of November, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two.

Fourth Instance.—In having at the same place, on the thirty-first of March one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees eight hundred, being money entrusted to his charge for the purchase of a silver tankard, by certain officers of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, and which amount he, as Pay Master, stopped by instalments from the pay issued to those officers in the months of July, August, September, and October, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two.

Fifth Instance.—In having at the same place, on the second of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, made a false and fraudulent entry as Pay Master, in the private account book of the mess of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, to the effect that he had on that date, paid to John Batho regimental number seven hundred and seventy-three, Sergeant in the G., or Captain Oswald Samuel Blachford's troop of the said regiment, the sum of Rupees one hundred, in terms of an order from Captain Richard Knox of the same regiment and president of the mess Committee. No such money having been so paid, nor any such order given.

Sixth Instance.—In having at the same place, on the fifteenth of March, in the same year, made false and fraudulent entries in his public books, as Pay Master, to the effect, that he had, on that date, paid on account of Quarter Master William Betson of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, the sum of Rupees one thousand; no such money having been so paid.

Seventh Instance.—In having at the same place, on the sixteenth of March, in the same year, made a false and fraudulent charge in his account with Captain Richard Knox, of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons; or the King's hussars, of the sum of Rupees one hundred and one; and eight annas, stated to have been paid by him, as Pay Master, on account of the said Captain Richard Knox; no such sum having been so paid.

Eighth Instance.—In having at the same place on the twenty-first of March in the same year, received from Cornet Charles Bill of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars an order on John Innes Geddes, at Madras, for the sum of Rupees two hundred and fifty, on account of Captain John Bunce Pilgrim of the same regiment, and which he fraudulently misapplied.

Ninth Instance.—In having at the same place, on the thirty-first of March in the same year, fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees five thousand and eighteen, and nine annas, being a balance of pay left in his hands as Pay Master by the following officers of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars; namely; by Major General (Colonel) Lovell Benjamin Lovell, Rupees one hundred and one, eleven annas and six pies by Captain Edward Thomas Hagley Chambers, Rupees one hundred and fifteen, four annas and ten pies; by Captain Charles Higginson Teush Hacker, Rupees six hundred and fifty-two and eight pies; by Captain Francis Woodley Horne, Rupees three hundred and twenty-five and ten pies; by Captain John Bunce Pilgrim, Rupees ninety-eight, three annas and eight pies; by Lieutenant John Brett, Rupees twenty-five, eleven annas and three pies: by Lieutenant Thomas Brook Jackson, Rupees one hundred and thirty-seven, six annas and one pie: by Lieutenant Henry Keown, Rupees one hundred and forty-nine, thirteen annas and one pie; by Lieutenant George Arthur Ede, Rupees two hundred and one, three annas and two pies; by Lieutenant Henry Brett, Rupees fifty-four, eleven annas and seven pies; by Lieutenant Eardley Norton, Rupees three hundred and forty-four, and six annas; by Lieutenant Blackwood Montray Read, Rupees two hundred and ninety and four pies; by Lieutenant Herbert Morgan, Rupees two hundred and three, one anna and seven pies; by Cornet Charles Bill, Rupees three hundred and twelve, ten annas and two pies; by Surgeon James Mouat, Rupees seven hundred and fifty-two, eight annas and three pies; by Veterinary Surgeon Thomas Hurford, Rupees three hundred and twenty-eight and five pies: and by Quarter Master William Betson, Rupees nine hundred and twenty-six, eleven annas and seven pies.

Tenth Instance.—In having at the same place, on the thirty-first of March in the same year, fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees fifty, the property of Major George William Key, of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, which had been entrusted to his charge as Pay Master, for the use of the said Major Key.

Eleventh Instance.—In having at the same place on the thirty-first of March in the same year, fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees eighty-eight, twelve annas and eleven pies, being a balance of pay left in his hands as Pay Master by Assistant Surgeon Francis William Innes, of Her Majesty's eighty-fourth regiment of foot, doing duty with Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons or the King's hussars.

Twelfth Instance.—In having at the same place, on the seventeenth of March in the same year, fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees two hundred and fifteen, the property of Captain Oswald Samuel Blachford, of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars: the same being a balance of pay entrusted to his charge as Pay Master, for the purpose of his procuring for the said Captain Blachford an Accountant General's bill for the same sum; in lieu of which he, Pay Master Routh, gave a bill dated the twenty-first of the said month at ten days sight, in his own name, in favour of the said Captain Blachford, on Messieurs Griffiths and Company, at Madras, for the same amount, which was returned dishonoured; he, Pay Master Routh, having made no provision to meet the same.

Thirteenth Instance.—In having at the same place, on the twenty-first of March, in the same year, given to Veterinary Surgeon Thomas Hurford of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons, or the King's hussars, on account of money due by him to the said Veterinary Surgeon Hurford, a bill of the same date, at fifteen days sight, on Messieurs Griffiths and Company, Madras, in favour of Messieurs Ashton Richardson and Company or order, for Rupees twenty-five and six annas, which was returned dishonoured; he, Pay Master Routh, having made no provision to meet the same.

Fourteenth Instance.—In having at the same place, on the thirty-first of March, in the same year, fraudulently misapplied the sum of Rupees seven hundred, the property of Lieutenant John Surman, of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of light dragoons or the King's hussars, and which had been entrusted to his charge as Pay Master, for the purpose of the same being remitted, on the said Lieutenant Surman's account to the Agent to the Agra bank at Madras.

Fifteenth Instance.—In having at the same place on the fourteenth of December one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, given to Captain John Bunce Pilgrim, of Her Majesty's fifteenth regiment of dragoons or the King's hussars, on account of money due by him, Pay Master Routh, to that officer, two orders under the aforesaid date, at fifteen days' sight, for Rupees five hundred each, in favour of the said Captain Pilgrim, and made payable at Messieurs Hall, Bainbridge and Company at Madras; which orders were returned dishonoured; he, Pay Master Routh, having made no provision to meet the same.

The above being in breach of the Articles of war.

(Signed) L. LOVELL, Major General, Colonel, Commanding 15th Hussars.

Bangalore, the third of May, one thousand eight hundred and forty-three.

By order of the Most Noble the Commander-in-Chief,

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

A LADY of high respectability and accomplishments, residing in a healthy part of the Coast of Kent, wishes to receive four Girls to board and educate with the advantage of living in a private family. The Lady is a mother, and having been for some years in India is well acquainted with the treatment for young persons of delicate constitutions. If desired too, she would have no objection to take charge of one or two little Boys up to 7 or 8 years old, in any case where parents were unwilling to separate brothers and sisters. The terms will be moderate varying according to the age of the pupil, but always for a specific sum annually, including extra charges of every description.

Cards of address, and other particulars will be given by the undersigned, and parties writing Home may communicate with Messrs. J. Cockburn and Co., No. 11, New Broad-street, London.

GWALIOR AND THE PUNJAB.—The papers of the week are filled with notices of the march of Regiments, European and Native, to the banks of the Jumna and the Sutlege, to watch the progress of events in the territories of Scindia, and in the Punjab. It appears to be altogether uncertain whether either army will be called into action, though it is difficult to imagine how the present disorganization in these frontier states can be extinguished, and such a degree of tranquillity restored, as shall give security to our own provinces, without the active intervention of the paramount Power in Hindoostan. In the prospect of hostilities, it is confidently said that all furloughs will be suspended, and that those who had quitted their corps in the hope of visiting England, will be required to rejoin them.

The Star informs us that terms have been offered to the Regent at Gwalior, and that if they are not complied with, hostilities will immediately commence. The terms are thus given by our contemporary: That the Khasgee who has usurped the office and power of Prime Minister be dismissed, and Mama Saib be restored to that post; that certain tracts of territory, which inconveniently protrude themselves into Bundlekund and other of our provinces, be exchanged for tracts more convenient to the Durbar and to ourselves; that the present refractory army be dismissed, and a large contingent force under British officers, be substituted in its stead; and that the Gwalior treasury pay the expense incurred by the present assemblage of troops. These terms are extremely moderate, and refute the assertion that the present movement of our troops arises from an itch for territorial aggrandisement. The restoration of the Mama Saib, the Prime Minister whose appointment our Government had sanctioned, is due to the dignified position it sustains in India. To plead the principle of non interference in the face of danger, after we had interfered with our suffrage in the appointment of a Premier, would be worse than affectation; it would be to subscribe to our own disgrace. The exchange of territories is rendered necessary by the state of things in Bundlekund; the disaffected and lawless of which province find effectual shelter in districts, nominally under the sway of Gwalior, which we cannot enter; while the substitution of a stipendiary force, under our own Officers, for the present army, though it effectually extinguishes the independence of the state, appears indispensible from a regard to the security of our provinces. The demand for the expenses of the war, is in fact nothing more than the time-honoured rule that, those who have provoked hostilities, should pay for the rod which corrects them; and every treaty imposed by the strong on the weak should wind up with a similar item.

But while the Governor General is negotiating, the refractory troops are acting, and to all appearance making rapid advances to the supreme power. If a letter from a correspondent of the Hurkaru, which we have copied, can be depended on, they have already rebelled against the legitimate authority in the state, and are now paramount at the capital. There may soon be no Government left to treat with, or rather the Regent may be constrained, by a regard for her own safety to accede to our terms and accept with joy the intervention of our troops. It is evident that the insurgent troops cannot be disbanded by the mere order of the ruling authorities at Gwalior, which they have already learned to despise; to all appearance, they can be dispersed only by our own soldiers.

From the Punjab we have nothing but reports, but they become daily more interesting as they indicate the approach of the crisis, which will demand our interference. Golab Sing, it is said, warily keeps himself to the Hills, curbing his mountain subjects. Heera Sing and Lena Sing rule at Lahore, with the permission of their soldiers, who are mutinous for increase of pay, and are said to be gradually quitting their ranks. The authority of the Seikh Government over the army is described as likely to last till the treasury is empty, after which—but we must not anticipate events. How far these accounts are to be depended on, we cannot say, but a reference to the past history of Hindoostan, renders it highly probable that they are authentic; for it is thus that one Asiatic monarchy after another has crumbled to dust.

As soon as there ceases to be any Government at Lahore capable of maintaining its pacific relations with us, the duty of providing for the security of our own provinces, will supersede every other consideration, and all existing treaties, and we shall be constrained to take possession of the administration in self defence. Meanwhile, we are informed, that the Seikh troops who had been left to guard Peshawur, have deserted their post, and fled to the Indus, plundering the inhabitants on the route. If they have not done so already, it must be evident that in the confusion which prevails in the Punjab, they will do so ere long. It is more than probable therefore that the province of Peshawur has by this time been dismembered from the Punjab, of which it was an integral part, at the time when we guaranteed to Runjeet and his family the integrity of his dominions, by a treaty offensive and defensive. Most probably Heera Sing, distracted by the demands of an insolent soldiery, will be unable to despatch troops for the recovery of that province. Most probably, he will claim that assistance from the British Government which it solemnly engaged to afford. We do not see how our Government can honourably back out of its engagements, or refuse to march an army across the Indus to oppose the Affghans in the field. We have not been able to lay our hands on the treaty of 26th June 1838, but the Simlah Proclamation of the 1st of October of that year states that by that tripartite treaty, His Highness Runjeet Singh is guaranteed in his present possessions—including Peshawur—and that the friends and enemies of one of the contracting parties have been declared to be the friends and enemies of all. On the strength of this treaty we called upon Runjeet Singh's successor, Shere Singh, to assist us with a contingent, in forcing the Khyber Pass, and fighting the Affghans. If his successor should call upon us to afford the same assistance in repelling the assaults of the same foes in the same locality, how can our Government resist the requisition?—And then will be fulfilled the prediction of one of the chiefs of Cabul, who, on the retirement of our troops said to an eminent officer, "We shall meet again before three years have passed."

THE LIEUTENANT GOVERNORSHIP OF THE NORTH WEST PROVINCES has been conferred by Lord Ellenborough on Mr. James Thomason, and the appointment has given general satisfaction. The office has been divested of all political responsibility, and all military duties, and its functions are confined to the superintendence of the Civil, Criminal and Fiscal administration of the North West Provinces, and the promotion of internal improvements. It requires therefore the services of one who is thoroughly versed in the details of those departments, and is at the same time gifted with the faculty of taking a comprehensive view of the public interests associated with it. We think it would have been difficult to have selected from the ranks of the service, any individual better qualified by natural endowments and enlarged experience to undertake the internal administration of these provinces, or more disposed by his own benevolence of disposition, to render his administration beneficial to the country, than the individual on whom Lord Ellenborough's choice has fallen. Instead of congratulating Mr. Thomason on having, comparatively at so early an age, risen to a post of such great distinction, we ought rather therefore to congratulate those provinces on having been placed under the direction of one so eminently qualified to promote their well being.

If we were to particularise any one object to which Mr. Thomason's attention will be ardently devoted, and which will probably be among the most lasting monuments of his administration, we should point to that great undertaking, the Doab Canal, projected by Capt. Cautley, and patronized by Lord Auckland. In this important enterprize, Mr. Thomason took the deepest interest, when in a less influential situation; and we rejoice that he will now be enabled to bring all the power and influence of the local Government to bear upon its completion. If ever high office may legitimately become an object of envy, it is in a view of the facilities it affords the possessor for carrying objects of such extensive and permanent utility into execution, and thus of associating his name with the benedections of future ages.

The independent character which has been given to the two Governments of Agra and Bengal, whether the head of the Government resides at either of them, or not, creates a new era in our administration. For the first time the Governor General has divested himself entirely of that most important appendage of his office, the patronage of all Civil, Criminal and Revenual appointments, throughout the Presidency, both in the Civil Service and out of it.

The entire patronage of the North West Provinces is vested in Mr. Thomason; of the Lower Provinces, in Mr. Bird. Not a tithe of the patronage of the Indian service now remains with the Governor General, who has reserved to himself nothing beyond the disposal of those political appointments which belong to offices connected with the Government of India.

THE STAR AND THE FRIEND OF THE COOLY TRADE.—The Star says we have imputed to the Mauritius Government, "that it has chosen to be indifferent to the appointment of an Emigration Agent from the dread that with such an officer, emigration would not have gone on fast enough to meet the wants of the Island. "We have referred to our article and find that no such charge was brought against that Government; but we did distinctly state that the passing of the Act, at this time of day, looked as though the Government of that Colony had acted on the principle of tacitly allowing it to be stocked with Coolies by private speculation. And we put it to the most candid whether the appointment of an Emigration Agent, just at the time when it is publicly declared that the wants of the Colony had been nearly supplied, does not strengthen such a suspicion. The nomination of such an Agent was part and parcel of the plan laid down by Lord Stanley, when he was endeavouring to remove the objections which had been created by previous abuses, to the revival of the trade. Why was that Agent not appointed simultaneously with the opening of the ports to emigration? Why is his appointment delayed to a time when the Act tells us he will have little or nothing to do?

The evils of the old system, which led to the Act prohibiting the exportation of Coolies, were said to be three fold. First; the mode in which the Coolies were obtained; viz. by means of crimps, who traversed the country and collected the men by false representations, and, having brought them to Calcutta, kept them in confinement, and finally cheated them on their departure of the advances which had been given for them. Secondly, the surreptitious embarkation of Coolies, on crowded ships, without any adequate provision of food, or comfort. Thirdly; their treatment at the Island, where it was supposed that the planters would deal with them as they had been accustomed to deal with their slaves. It is but justice to the planters to state that the fears which were entertained on this branch of the subject, have not been realized. The returned Coolies, with few exceptions, have borne good testimony to the kindness and consideration of their masters.

It was to remedy these three distinct evils that Lord Stanley devised the scheme on which the revival of emigration was founded. To cure the first evil, he proposed that the emigration, that is, the despatch of Coolies, instead of being left to private cupidity, should be placed under the direction of a Government Agent, who should receive applications from those who were desirous of embarking, and provide them with the means of proceeding to the Island. The second grievance was to be remedied by the appointment of a Protector of Coolies in Calcutta on the part of the Government of India, whose duty it should be to examine each Cooly individually, in order to be certain that he was aware of the nature of his engagement, and was not deported against his will; also to survey the ships in order to prevent their being over crowded, and to secure a sufficient stock of provisions for the emigrants. The third grievance was to be remedied by means of a Protector of Immigrants at the Mauritius, who was to guard against the forcible allotment of Coolies to Agents who had indented for them, and generally, to watch over the treatment they received in the Island.

The last two provisions of the scheme have been carried into effect. A Protector of Emigrants has been nominated in Calcutta, and the Coolies have been personally examined, and the ships surveyed. The Government of the Mauritius has appointed a Protector who appears on all occasions to have acted with vigour and impartiality; and of whose faithful discharge of duty, the dissatisfaction of the Planters is said to be the best evidence. But the provision which was made in the new law by the Privy Council, against the evils which had grown out of the speculations of the Cooly Merchants in India, has been entirely neglected for a twelve month. Whether there would have been as great abuses, notwithstanding the superintendence of a Government Agent, is not now under discussion; though we are ready to meet the question whenever it arises. However some may be disposed to maintain that his agency would not have prevented them; in other words, that the supply of Emigrants, under the most favourable auspices, cannot be purified from these evils: we maintain that the appointment of the official Agent was believed by the Projector of the plan and the Privy Council to be a sufficient preventive of these abuses; and until the plan has been tried and has failed. we have a perfect right to affirm that the remedy would have been adequate. This provision, as we have said, has been neglected. The engagement of Coolies has been left to private Agency, as it was under the old system, and the same old abuses have grown up. As to the existence of these abuses, the Star wishes us to dismiss from our minds the 'clap trap' reports of the papers which are unfavourable to the Cooly trade. We willingly yield to his advice, and draw on the more authentic columns of the Star, who, legally speaking, is a hostile witness, and on the Police Reports for our information; and we find the most irrefragable evidence that those abuses which it was intended to cure by the appointment of an Emigration Agent, have again become rife. The Crimps have been despatched throughout the country for hundreds of miles to bring down men to Calcutta to be shipped for the Mauritius. The poor Coolies have been drawn from their homes by them under the most deceitful pretences; they have been confined in the town of Calcutta by the crimps and ill treated, and the offenders have been fined by the Magistrates for thus confining and ill treating them. The poor Coolies have been pillaged of the advances made for them by the duffadars, to such an extent as to arouse the indignation of our contemporary. These are evils, and abuses which it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government at home to tolerate; but the arrangement which they devised for preventing them has remained dormant till after 20,000 coolies had been shipped, and the bounty had ceased. We maintain therefore that the lache of the Mauritius Government is the cause of the evil.

The restrictions imposed upon emigration, are, we know, censured, as an unnatural restraint upon the liberty which every man ought to enjoy of taking his labour to the best market; but this appears to be an erroneous view of the matter. They are restraints upon the fraud, injustice, and oppression of the crimps, which Government ought legitimately to punish, and therefore to prevent, as far as it may be possible. If the crimps had obtained possession of any goods from the poor Cooly by similar imposition and violence, the Courts would be bound to afford the sufferer ample redress. It is bound to afford equal relief when the same nefarious arts are practised to obtain a higher and more valuable object, the possession of the Cooly himself and the command of his labour. And the Government has a distinct right to restrict emigration to those places where it has the means of affording redress against the illegal acts of Cooly merchants and crimps. But the recal of that permission which was given to the ports of Madras and Bombay, where Government had already established Protectors, appears to be an arbitrary exercise of power, which we trace altogether to an unwillingness on the part of the Mauritius Government to incur the expense of Emigration Agents there, at a cost of, say 1000*l.* a year. This seems a strange fit of economy after 140,000*l.* had been devoted, as it is said, to the importation of labourers. We think it unjust to both those ports, and to the Natives who may be anxious to emigrate from thence. But the fact is that there exists a wide difference of opinion between the Planters and the Government of the Mauritius as to the number of labourers required for the island. And this is doubtless one reason for the deputation of Mr. Anderson to Calcutta, and for the enactment of a new law which shall not only limit the emigration to one port, but, in that port, place the regulation of the supply entirely in the hands of a public Agent appointed by the authorities of the island who think that the stock is already sufficient. But we must not pursue the subject farther this week.

CEYLON.—The Hurkaru, in noticing the article which appeared in our last issue on the Island of Ceylon cites the testimony of Bishop Turner, about twelve years ago, to the want of success which, up to that time, had attended the efforts made for its improvement.

"The progress which Ceylon is making, certainly speaks much for her system of Government. A few years ago that system was thought to be a failure; a very fine shadow without much substance. But late events have proved that the liberal principles which were adopted in the management of that colony, had in them, the germ of great results. A curious testimony to the former state of feeling, may be found in a notice, (we believe by the present Deputy Governor) of the life of the late excellent Bishop Turner. Writing from Ceylon on the 17th March 1831, the Bishop says, "I have been much interested by what I have seen and heard in Ceylon. A very useful lesson may be learned here, especially important to those like myself, who are apt to growl at the Company's domination. Every measure we would desire to see adopted in India, may be found in actual operation in Ceylon: there is no restraint on colonization; the Government avoids interfering with mercantile concerns, (except as respects the sale of cinnamon and pearls); trial by jury is fully established; in a great part of the island, there is an extensive and systematic provision for Government schools, and yet every thing languishes: there is no spirit of improvement; industry, either commercial or agricultural, seems altogether unknown; and the finest island in the world, rich in spontaneous productions, richer still in those which might be produced by labour, with noble harbours, and a situation that commands the commerce of the eastern world, is scantily peopled, and of that scanty population a very large proportion is miserably fed, and they are liable almost periodically, to severe famine. What can be the secret of all this? However, as matters stand, if you wish to ascertain how completely good institutions may be nullified, you may come to Ceylon, and on the other hand, to know how theoretical evils may be cured, you must take such a journey as I have done, through the three presidencies of India. I am satisfied that there is no Government in the world, so well served as that of the East India Company; I mean that no service I ever knew or heard of, comprises so large a proportion of individuals able and willing to discharge their duty."

To look on this picture, and then to turn to that, which might now be drawn of Ceylon, would present a remarkable contrast. It would be found, that industry and enterprize now characterize the people, that the country is being colonized under most favourable circumstances, that its revenue is advancing and yields a surplus, and that its improvement is going on at a most rapid and yet at an increasing rate.—Hurkaru.

The contrast which the present appearance of activity affords to the death-like lethargy, which prevailed when the late Bishop visited it, is a subject of no small congratulation. But to develope the resources of the island to the utmost, and to give full scope to the spirit of improvement by which its colonists are animated, it is necessary to assist it with labourers from the Continent. The great want of the Island is in the article of agricultural labour. The indigenous inhabitants are either not sufficient in number for the new demand which has arisen, or they are wanting in those habits of industry which the planters require; and there is reason to fear that unless the deficiency can be supplied from the teeming population of Hindoostan, the labours of the Colonists will be cramped to a lamentable extent. Hitherto, the wants of the Island have been partially supplied by transitory emigrants from the Malabar Coast; in fact, nine tenths of the labourers employed in the new plantations are Malabars, who cross over to the island, as the Irish reapers come over to England, and having made up a little purse, take their departure at their own convenience, without any reference to the interests of their masters,—and unfortunately just at the time when their assistance in the Coffee plantations is most required.

This inconvenience can be remedied only by the introduction of labourers, upon fixed engagements, on a plan similar to that which has now stocked the Mauritius with Twenty thousand Coolies in a twelvemonth. It is strange indeed that India should send her labourers to so distant and altogether foreign a colony, while one, which lies at her very door, which forms, so to speak, part and parcel of Hindoostan, which was annexed to its empire before the Druids had begun to sacrifice children in England, and the name of which still lives in the memory of every Native of India, should be neglected. Ceylon has certainly the first claim on India for a portion of its superabundant population, and the claim will not be disallowed, if proper measures are taken to urge it.

We are not certain whether the non-emigration of labourers from Bengal has arisen from the inactivity of the new Colonists, or from the state of the law. If from their inactivity, the recent purchase of land by capitalists in Calcutta, will soon remove that obstacle. As to the state of the law, it is certain that the Malabars emigrate by hundreds every year from the Madras Provinces to this Crown Colony, without let or hindrance. It is possible, however, that a specific Act may be necessary to authorize the despatch of labourers from Calcutta by ship to this Island. The Act of 1838 prohibited the exportation of all labourers by sea. The Mauritius Emigration Act passed at the close of last year, opened the ports only in favour of that Island. But if there be any legal obstacle to the emigration of our coolies for four or five years to Ceylon, we think it would be at once removed by an application to the Legislative Council. Nor are we to despair of the emigration of whole families,—if the common people can be disabused of the idea that it is still peopled with the monster their popular hero went to combat. The island may be reached in the cold season in ten days. It is always within reach of Government, who, if complaints of abuse are raised, might depute a public servant to proceed thither in a steamer and examine into their truth. Every consideration appears favourable to the measure of transferring a part of our agricultural labourers to the Island.—And the present is the time for it. Those who are interested in the matter should not lose a day in requesting Government to discuss and settle the question before the Governor General quits Calcutta; otherwise, the present monsoon will be lost for emigration. There are said to be several thousand Coolies in Calcutta, seeking to be sent to the Mauritius. These will probably be taken off before the new Act comes into operation, after which, the despatch will become sluggish, and an opening will be afforded for the Ceylon Colonists to come into the market of labour, and furnish their plantations with labourers.

Police Report for the Year 1841.—We have been favoured with a copy of two printed Reports of the state of the Police for the year 1841, drawn up by the Superintendent, and now proceed to notice the more important matters contained in them. In addition to the statistics of crime, they contain a review of the labours and success of the different Magistrates and Joint Magistrates, in the thirty-five districts of the Bengal Government, and are designed to answer the double purpose of keeping Government informed of the state of the Police, and the Magistrates of the estimate which is successively formed of their official conduct. The delay in the appearance of the Reports is therefore much to be regretted, for the salutary reproofs administered in them to the indolent and the careless, lose much of their effect, by coming nearly two years after the transgression. The Superintendent has an arduous task. His charge extends over a larger domain, and a more numerous population, than that in which the talents of Fouché were so eminently displayed; yet he is without a single covenanted assistant. If the office is worth keeping up, it is worth making efficient. Two able assistants, from the junior ranks of the service, similar to those recently bestowed on the Government of Bengal, would scarcely be too many for its important duties. At the same time, the Superintendent's office would probably be found to furnish them with the best training for the subsequent performance of Magisterial functions.

Much of the interest also attached to these Reports is lost by their protracted appearance. A report of 1841 must appear comparatively stale and flat at the end of 1843. We shall therefore call the reader's attention chiefly to the particular facts which they furnish relative to the actual condition of the country, and the measures by which it may be improved. As it regards the general statistics of crime, it may be quite sufficient to state, in the gross, that the total number of offences ascertained by the Police to have been committed in the Lower Provinces, in the first half year of 1840 was 21,377; in the last half, 24,250; that the number of persons supposed to be concerned in these crimes, was, in the first period, 46,483; in the last, 50,197; that in both periods the number of persons arrested, was a little less than half the number of the suspected; that of those arrested, two thirds were convicted, and the rest acquitted.

*If there was any probability that these numbers gave a correct idea of the actual amount of crimes committed in the country, we would enter on a comparison of the number given for 1841 with that of any preceding year. But in every case, the reported number must be regarded as altogether suppositious. The Superintendent has repeatedly recorded that no confidence could be placed in it. Probably it is no nearer the truth than the various and conflicting estimates we receive of the population of China, which has been calculated by some at two, by others at three hundred millions, and by one writer at three hundred and fifty millions. Whether therefore we are informed that in one district crimes have been doubled in six months; or that in an [illegible] they have been reduced from three hundred to two hundred; or that dacoities are very numerous in one district, and entirely unknown in the adjoining district in which the professional robbers are known to abound, we receive every report with a feeling of deep mistrust. When dacoities are reported to have diminished in any district, instead of inferring the superior vigilance of the Police, we conclude that they have been negligent; and the Police becomes the object of credit whenever the number of dacoities, burglaries, and other crimes, is reported to be greatly on the increase!

This is a very singular and anomalous state of things; but it is not the less true; and the reason is self evident. The people who suffer from dacoities and robberies will not complain, well knowing that the remedy will be worse than the disease. After having been robbed by dacoits, they consider it a matter of prudence to retain what is left rather than to risk the loss of it by revealing their grief to the Darogas. In 1832, Lord William passed a law forbidding any enquiry into cases of dacoity or burglary, except at the particular request of the sufferers, or at the discretionary orders of the Magistrates. In the report before us we find that the Magistrates have in almost all instances refrained from the exercise of the discretion vested in them. In three cases, however, they have considered it their duty to cause every case which came to their knowledge to be investigated; and the result is, that, in one district, 18 cases were examined at the request of the people, and 58 by orders of the Magistrate; in the second, there were 34 cases in which the people made known their complaints, and 100 in which they did not; in the third, the proportion was 77 of the former, to 234 of the latter. It is natural therefore to conclude that if every crime had been reported and investigated, the number would appear to be three times that which appears on the record.

The indisposition of the people to complain, and thus subject themselves to all the inconveniences of an official investigation of crime, is excused by the assertion that it is not confined to Hindoostan. The same feeling prevails in our own land; it is manifested even in this country by Europeans whom the Police officers cannot oppress. All this is fully admitted. Men naturally shrink from the duty of prosecuting offences to conviction, at the sacrifice of their own comfort, when it is only the cause of public justice which is likely to be benefited thereby. It is part of the selfishness of our nature, which it requires much public spirit to overcome; but it is a disposition detrimental to the interests of society, and one which ought to be repressed rather than encouraged. In this country however, it is not merely the dread of private inconvenience, which deters the sufferers from becoming prosecutors. Crime is systematically and studiously concealed, chiefly because the enquiries of the Police entail a positive injury upon those who have already suffered severely from the dacoits. "Any protective measures," says the first Report, "would bring the people into contact with our Police and our Courts, which they dread equally with, if not more than these occasional robberies, as being known and certain evils, and until our Police system is new modelled, they will prefer to take their chances of being plundered by dacoits ra-[illegible] n incur the certainty of inconvenience if [illegible] treatment, and looting—being plundered [illegible] Police officers." In more than one case, [illegible]rogahs, to save themselves trouble, and to [illegible] little temporary credit for vigilance, have [illegible] the forced confessions of innocent men. [illegible]er instance, the Police officer not only [illegible] violence to extort confessions, but fabricated a list of the articles stolen to secure the punishment of the parties whom he committed. It is to these abuses, says the Report, "that we owe the hostility of the people to our Police, and the dread inspired by them, which leads to a general concealment of crime." In another case, the Darogah was dismissed for being concerned in the brutal and indecent torture of a female to extort confessions." "Owing to the rascality of our Police Agents," says Mr. Samuells, the ablest Magistrate under the Government of Bengal, "the villagers, generally speaking, look upon a visit from the Police as a certain source of loss and trouble." Thus the natural indisposition of men to make any sacrifice of their personal ease for the public benefit, is indefinitely increased in this country by the positive loss to which they would be subjected by the unprincipled rapacity of our Police Agents. The former can be cured only by the infusion of nobler principles; the latter it is the duty of our Government to remedy to the utmost of its power.

It is certain that nothing is so easy as to reprobate an evil, which has so long been known to exist; and that the great difficulty is to show how it may be remedied. To do this with an hope of success, it is necessary to examine wherein our present institutions for the detection of crime are defective; and this has we think been sufficiently indicated in all the Police reports which have been published since the office of Superintendent was revived. To cope effectually with crime, we require a separation of the two departments of the Magistracy, its Police, and its Judicial duties. The one requires that the officer should be moving about in the district, and following up the scent, when any crime is discovered to have been committed; the other, that he should remain stationary at his Cutchery, to dispose of the numerous cases brought before him, and to shorten as much as possible the detention of the accused, and the witnesses. These two duties, both of which are equally important, are utterly incompatible, when confided to the same individual, and ought therefore to be separated. The Judicial functions of the Magistrate are of themselves enough to occupy his whole time; indeed in many districts it is difficult for him to prevent causes from running into arrears. In some districts, as the Reports indicate, one or two hundred individuals are thus detained from their homes at the highest inconvenience, and thus the dread of having any thing to do with our Courts, though they are established solely for the protection of the people, becomes more confirmed and more general.

While the Magistrate is thus confined to the bench, it is impossible he should know anything that passes in the interior of his district, among a population of a million, except as it may be reported by the Native Officers of Police, the Darogahs, the fidelity of whose reports he has no means of testing. These men have been entrusted with large power in a country where the smallest power is always abused, and they have hitherto received the merest pittance for their pay, in a country where bribery and extortion are the rule, almost without exception. They have thus been exposed to the constant temptation of turning that power into money,—a process no where so well understood as in India. It is to such venial and uncontrolled officers that the charge of the Police, of searching after crime, has been committed. We use the word uncontrolled,—because not one act of extortion committed by them out of a hundred is ever known to the Magistrate, and because, the occasional, or even the frequent dismissal of the Darogahs has no effect in checking the system of oppression. It rather furnishes the Darogah with an additional stimulant for extortion; and teaches him the necessity of making the most of his brief and uncertain tenure of office. Government has resolved to raise the salaries of a certain number of the Darogahs; and this system of superior pay, will of course contribute to purify the Police; but something more is necessary to detect and to repress crime, and to restore the confidence of the people in our judicial institutions, than this mere increase of pay. A Darogah, may always make 200 Rs. a month without any remarkable oppression. Indeed we question whether, upon the old oriental adage that "those who live in the water, must keep on good terms with the alligator," a sum equal to this may not be voluntarily offered to him, by those who are under his immediate authority, or who live within the reach of his official influence. In many cases, a Darogah's place is worth 500 Rs. a month; and this will not be wondered at when it is considered that there are Police jurisdictions, in which more money circulates in a day, than circulated throughout the whole of England, in the reign of Edward the Fourth. The moral effect of higher pay will not be immediately visible in men who have been accustomed to live by plunder; and Government must not be surprised if some of the men who have been raised to 100 Rs. a month, should still consider a dacoity in a wealthy village as a god-send, and contrive to add a neat hundred or two of Rupees to their allowances by extortion.

It has been said that the Police is not worse than it was thirty years ago, and that there is, after all, not much to complain of. It is just possible that the Police may have been in the same state of inefficiency, in the year 1813; but there can be no doubt that the condition of the people has greatly deteriorated. It is impossible to suppose such a Police as that which the Report describes to have existed for thirty years without having produced the most pernicious effect on public happiness. Every year during that period, the people have become more and more alienated from the Police, more determined to keep away from our Courts, more resolved to put up with any inconvenience and distress from dacoits and plunderers rather than to bring down the terrors of a Darogah's inquest upon them. This resignation has necessarily emboldened the dacoits and rogues, and led to the establishment of active and systematic plans for plundering the country. To suppose that the public misery has not increased under the operation of our present system, or to doubt that it must continue to increase until the system is recast, would be to forget altogether the connection between cause and effect. The nature of the disease suggests the nature of the remedy. To the systematic depredations of robbers, whom the indolence or connivance of our police has encouraged, we must oppose a systematic and honest crusade against rogues. We require a Police establishment whose chief business shall be to ferret out thieves and dacoits, quite as much as we require a Judicial Magistrate to try them when they are caught. In addition to the higher pay of the Darogahs, we require officers who shall have their eye continually on them to spur them to activity, and to check the abuse of their power. Mr. Dampier, after a careful review of the acts of the Police during the year 1841,

"I am of opinion that the Police force as it now is, might be rendered much more useful and beneficial to the community, and many of the evils now attending the system done away if the duty of superintending the District Divisions was placed in other hands than those of the Magistrates, who are too much occupied with their Judicial duties to pay that attention which is necessary for the improvement of this important branch of the executive authority. It is to this total want of adequate local control that the indolence, corruption of, and use of torture by, the Police may be traced, and until this department is completely taken out of the hands of functionaries overburthened with other duties these evils will remain."

It was suggested some time since, that an establishment similar to that which had succeeded in breaking up the organization of the Thugs, would be the most appropriate for breaking up the organization of dacoits. Within the last year or two, some of the Thug Officers have been directed to extend their enquiries to the state of dacoities in Bengal; and the result has fully answered expectation. One of the first services of Capt. Marsh, the Thug officer, was to discover the men who had actually been concerned in the robbery and murder at Mr. Smylie's house at Suddamahl. Nine persons had been arrested for the offence; of these four were convicted on the evidence adduced, and sentenced to imprisonment, one for life, two for fourteen years and one for seven. As soon as Capt. Marsh's establishment began to work, it was discovered that the murder and robbery had been committed by a gang of Kechuks, one of whom was then in jail for another crime, and that there was every reason to believe that all those who had been sentenced to imprisonment were entirely innocent of the crime, and that the confession and evidence which was credited by the Courts, had been extorted by the Darogahs! Many other instances of successful enquiry by the Thug establishment, have lately been brought forward, and there can be little doubt that the same system which has almost eradicated Thuggee, would do up Dacoity in a few years, and that no other plan which has yet been proposed is likely to succeed. It is quite possible that there may be some exaggeration in the confessions made by the Kechuk robbers of Bengal to Capt. Marsh, but after every deduction has been made, there is abundant evidence of the existence of a daring and organized body of men, living by plunder alone, and distributed all over the country, who are in some instances encouraged by our police office, but who in every case despise them and set them at defiance. Such a state of things indeed would naturally be the result of the present system, which fills the Magistrate's hand with work he can scarcely accomplish, and leaves the detection of crime entirely in the hands of corrupt and ill paid Darogahs. It is worth while therefore to try the experiment, for a year or two, of committing three or four of the districts in which crime has been most rife to Officers trained in the Sleeman School, and who shall be a match for public offenders. An Act will shortly be passed for extending to Dacoity the same stringent laws which have been enacted regarding Thuggee; but unless the same kind of machinery which has been found so effectual in eradicating the crime of Thuggee be organized for the detection of dacoits, the law will in all probability prove ineffectual. This consideration cannot have escaped the attention of Government, and we may expect therefore to find that the enactment of the law will be followed up by the appointment of a corresponding establishment to operate against dacoits. This may be effected without any violent change of system, or any appalling increase of expense; and it may eventually result in a gradual and entire separation of the Police from the Judicial duties of the Magistracy, than which a greater blessing could scarcely be conferred on the country.

In order to strengthen our argument, we annex an extract from the very able minute written by Mr. Halliday, five years ago, in which the anomaly of untiting the duties of the Police, and of the Bench; of thief catcher and thief trier, in the same person is described in strong language. The experience of the five years which have since elapsed, has irresistibly confirmed this representation of the evil; while the partial experiment of committing the functions of the Police to a seperate agency, that of the Thug officers, has shewn how greatly the peace, security, and welfare of the country would be promoted by adopting the suggestions which have been so repeatedly made.

"The union of Magistrate with Collector has been stigmatized as incompatible, but the junction of thief-catcher with Judge is surely more anomalous in theory, and more mischievous in practice. So long as it lasts, the public confidence in our Criminal tribunals must always be liable to injury and the authority of justice itself must often be abused and misapplied. For this evil, which arises from a constant and unavoidable bias against all supposed offenders, the power of appeal is not a sufficient remedy:—the danger to justice, under such circumstances, is not in a few cases nor in any proportion of cases, but in every case. In all, the Magistrate is Constable, Prosecutor, and Judge. If the appeal be necessary to secure justice in any case, it must be so in all; and if—as will follow—all sentences by a Magistrate should properly be revised by another authority, it would manifestly be for the public benefit that the appellate tribunal should decide all cases in the first instance.

"It is well known, on the other hand, that the judicial labours of a Magistrate occupy nearly all his time; that which is devoted to matters strictly Executive, being only the short space daily employed in hearing Thannah Reports. But the effectual management of even a small Police force, and the duties of a public prosecutor, ought to occupy the whole of one man's time, and the management of the Police of a large District, must necessarily be inefficient, which from press of other duties, is slurred over in two hasty hours of each day.

"I consider it then an indispensable preliminary to the improvement of our system, that the duties of preventing crime and of apprehending and prosecuting offenders, should without delay, be separated from the Judicial function; and for this essential improvement, the amendments of the Report do not provide."

FREIGHT BY THE PENINSULAR COMPANY'S STEAMERS.—The original Schedule of freight by the Oriental Company's Steamers, fixed the lowest charge at fourteen shillings or seven Rupees for a cubic foot. But as the Periodical publications which may be imported in any month by private individuals, or by book clubs, are seldom equal in their contents to any thing like a quarter of a cubic foot, a considerable effort was made to induce Capt. Engledue to allow parcels to be charged according to their weight. We believe he did not feel himself authorized to make any alteration in the scale of charges without a reference to England. The parties who had applied to him, accordingly addressed the Company at home, and the following answer has been received by the last Mail. "In reply to your letter we have the satisfaction to inform you, that we have reduced our freights to Calcutta, to 2 Rs. per pound for periodicals. We shall be glad to make a still greater reduction in our freights when a more regular communication between Suez and India is established."

This intelligence is to a certain extent gratifying. Those who import half a dozen Magazines, will not be constrained to pay the same freight as if they imported fifty. But, the public will long for that more regular communication between India and Suez, which will enable the Company to make a still greater reduction; for a pound of periodical literature will give only three ordinarily thick Monthly Magazines, whereas a cubic foot of Magazines weighs twenty-six pounds. The relative difference therefore between the freight of small parcels, of less than a cubic foot, and of large ones equal to those dimensions, is more than 80 Per Cent. Still, we would not stint our acknowledgments to the Company for the new privilege they have given, but offer to them that large measure of gratitude which arises out of the hope of future favours.

COL. STODDART AND CAPT. CONOLLY.—The interest which has been created regarding the unfortunate prisoners of Bokhara, by the offer of Dr. Wolff to proceed to that capital and attempt to obtain their liberation, has been kept up by the receipt of additional information regarding them during the last week. One account is that of a Jew from Bokhara, who stated to the writer of the letter that he was an eye witness to the execution of four Europeans, viz. Col. Stoddard, Capt. Conolly, a young German officer, and a baptised Jew. He affirms that there is only one European left at Bokhara, viz. an Italian of the name of Giovanni, who manufactures clay images. But the testimony of another witness, who could have had no communication with the Jew, has just been obtained at Loodiana, and affords strong reason to believe that Col. Stoddart still survives. The man states, that after the Bokhara forces had been defeated by the Khan of Khiva, the king ordered Captain Conolly to be put to death, because he was supposed to be a great favourite of the Khan at whose court he had been most favourably received. This witness also states that four individuals, supposed to be Europeans, were actually executed, but that Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly were not among the number. Lastly, he affirms that the Topshee basha had lent Capt. Conolly 3000 Rupees, which he was anxious to recover, and that Col. Stoddart tore a leaf out of that officer's journal and gave it to the creditor who despatched it to Col. Sheil, in Persia. We have yet to learn that the Colonel has received it. If it contained an acknowledgment of the receipt of this sum, there can be no doubt that it was extracted from the book by a European, and we may reasonably suppose that the European was Col. Stoddart. In this case, however, there is every reason to suppose that he would have affixed some writing or notification to it, in some shape or other, to inform his friends of his own condition, and of the fate of his companion.

These conflicting statements seem to strengthen the obligation of the community, and we think, in a higher sense, the obligation of Government to make an immediate attempt to rescue the unfortunate officers, if they be still alive; and at least to ascertain their fate. It may be true that at the period of their captivity, they were not accredited to the Court of Bokhara, and so far as this plea exonerates Government from the necessity of going to war with t' Prince of Believers, and the most barb of monarchs, it may be valid. But it British officers, that they were travelling gions in which it was important at the time establish British influence, and with this general commission they had assuredly been entrusted. They were sufficiently British officers, labouring for the promotion of British interests, to lay on their official Masters the imperative necessity of using every effort,—short of a distant and ruinous war, which would probably be the signal for their execution if they are alive—to secure their release; and at the least to devote the sum of 10,000, or 15,000 Rupees to that object.

Of the proposals which have been made in England and in this country, we incline to that of employing a native agent whose full reward shall depend upon the success of his mission. It is much to be doubted whether Dr. Wolff will ever be permitted to reach Bokhara. He will find the feelings of the people in Central Asia not a little changed during the last ten years. The irruption of a European army; its discomfiture; its return and triumph; and its final departure will have given a new turn to the minds of men; and they may not be disposed again to grant him the privileges of a traveller. Should he be permitted to reach Bokhara, it is more probable that he will be sent to the same dungeon in which the unfortunate officers were confined, than be permitted to carry them off. On the other hand, a Native of Central Asia, if faithful to his promises, will find no difficulty in entering Bokhara, and discovering the fate of the captives, and bringing a note from them, if alive. It is even possible that in that case he might be enabled to negotiate for their release. If the individual mentioned by the Editor of the Star, as willing to undertake the perilous undertaking, should be found trustworthy, we would vote for his being despatched to Bokhara without delay. The duty of providing for his expenses, devolves in the first instance on the Government, in whose service the Officers put their lives in jeopardy. If Government should refuse assistance, we hope an application will be made to the community, and with immediate success.

THE ECONOMIST.—We have been favored with two numbers of a Newspaper, the Economist, recently started in England, on liberal commercial principles. The numbers appear to be got up with much diligence, and to be edited with considerable talent. It bids fair, therefore, to maintain its position among the periodical publications of England, though as a weekly paper, it has a most formidable competition to cope with, in other papers of established reputation. If the subsequent numbers should bear the same marks of diligence and ability, we should feel no hesitation in recommending it to the patronage of the community in India.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2.

— We accidentally omitted to state last week that Major Mackeson, C. B. who had been employed in high political trusts during the Affghan war, in which he had earned no ordinary reputation, and who was subsequently remanded to his own Regiment, where he was employed on the Staff, has again been placed by Lord Ellenborough in a political situation, in which there will be scope for his talents. Thus the present administration has been relieved from another opprobrium, for no one could fail to perceive that the treatment of one who had earned a Brevet Majority and a Companionship of the Bath by his ability, to a Regimental Quarter Mastership was disgraceful only to Government. Of the officers who served with honour under Lord Auckland, and were subsequently proscribed, there remain therefore only Col. Outram, and Majors Macgregor and Pottinger, of whom the two former are in England, and the latter in China.

— The Court of Directors, says the Star, have refused to Mr. Fox, the author of the letters signed Quarter Century, in which the system pursued by Government towards their own European troops and non-commissioned officers was exposed in the most masterly style, the pension of 60£ a year to which he is entitled by 22 years service in India and 17 in the department from which he was removed—thereby bearing testimony themselves to the truth of Mr. Fox's statement of grievances.

— The Registration Act, which has been long on the tapis, has been at length passed. It is of course only a temporary measure, for all Registration to be beneficial must be compulsory; the validity of a deed must be made to date from its registration not from its execution. There must be no exceptions; and it is the business of Government to establish such machinery as shall be sufficient for the registration of all deeds without inconvenience to the people. The fees of Registration will always pay for its establishment.

— We are sorry to learn from the Calcutta Christian Intelligencer that the Archdeacon was unable to return to Calcutta in the Hindoostan from indisposition. We are not a little surprised that this information should not have transpired until more than a fortnight after the arrival of the Hindoostan.

— The Lecture on Education, which was to have been delivered by Mr. Montague, of the Parental Academy, on Tuesday evening at the Mechanic's Institute, was postponed, and very properly, for want of an audience, for there must be two parties to a lecture, the lecturer and the lectured. On this occasion there were not a dozen present.

— A correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that by the extinction of Runjeet Sing's family, the Seikh states on the left bank of the Sutlege revert to us by virtue of a treaty which exists between the two Governments. He calls this resumption; but the estates were never in our possession.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 3.

Mr. Vining, who came out in the Hindoostan, and has assumed the direction of the Theatre in Calcutta, into which he is said to have introduced diverse reforms, among the most remarkable and unexpected of which is said to be that of punctuality, made his debut last night as Shylock. The amusement of the evening was suddenly interrupted by Mrs. Leach's dress catching fire on the stage, through some carelessness in placing the lamps. Her whole figure was soon in a blaze, but it was speedily extinguished. Fortunately some of the medical fraternity were in the Theatre and assistance was very promptly given to the sufferer. Some twenty-two years ago when the Marquis of Hastings was suddenly attacked in Church with a fit, he was not so fortunate, for not a medical gentleman was to be found within its walls, and it was some time before assistance could be procured for His Lordship.

— The Delhi Gazette states, that the Sudder Board, and we suppose also the Sudder Court, were to commence their march from Allahabad to Agra on the 1st of the present month. There does not seem to be any particular object in this movement, unless it be intended to continue to Agra the gift of a separate Government with a Lieutenant Governor to superintend the Civil, Criminal and fiscal details of the administration, for Agra is not more centrical than Allahabad was. Yet we are told that the question of perpetuating a separate Government at Agra is to be brought under discussion in Parliament in the ensuing Session.

— The Hurkaru states, that H. M's. 31st Foot have received orders to march to Ferozepore; that the 1st European Light Infantry proceeds to Loodiana, while H. M's. 9th Foot stands fast at Umballa. The Star adds, that the 2d European Regiment and H. M's. 40th Foot will proceed to Umballa. The assembly of so large a European force on the borders of the Punjab has an evident aspect to the ticklish state of affairs in that country.

— The Governor General's establishment, says the Englishman, proceeds to the Upper Provinces on the 5th, and the detachment of the Body Guard left Barrackpore yesterday. His Lordship does not proceed till after the arrival of the Mail, and then by dawk. But there is some hope that the Gwalior negotiations may be brought to a successful issue, without the necessity of the Governor General's proceeding to Agra in person; in which case his Lordship, it is said, will remain here. Possibly a Persian translation of Act 20 of 1843, which announces the approaching departure of Lord Ellenborough may frighten the Khasgee into a compliance with the ultimatum of our Government.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4.

— The Agra Ukhbar states, that a Brahmun at Gwalior having died there on the 19th, leaving a young widow, aged 17, and no children, she declared her intention to sacrifice herself on his funeral pile. When every thing had been prepared, she ascended it, but no sooner did the flames reach her, than, unable to endure the torture, she leaped from the burning pile, and besought the spectators to save her from so horrid a death; but the brahmuns insisted on her remounting the pile. She refused to do so, and was immediately cut down and thrown into the flames. The principality of Gwalior will shortly either become entirely our own, in which case we hope the Suttee law will be extended to it, or it will be placed under our influence, so that the wish of the Governor General will be law. We hope the opportunity will not be lost to eradicate this diabolical practise. The Romans acquired immortal honour by stipulating in one of their treaties that no more children should be sacrificed. Lord Ellenborough has already taken advantage of the acquisition of Scinde to declare slavery at an end. It will be equally easy for him to provide for the extinction of Suttee in Scindea's territories when settling its affairs.

— The Bombay papers of the 25th mention the arrival of the Brandy-wine American sixty gun ship in the port. She is destined to convey his Excellency the Envoy from the President of the United States to His Celestial Majesty. If his Majesty should decline the honour of a visit from the Envoy at Pekin, will brother Jonathan put up with the insult, or issue a declaration of war against China?

— The Commander-in-Chief reached Agra on the 21st of October, and the various officers of the general Staff came in either with him or soon after. His Excellency was expected to march towards Agra at the beginning of next month.

— Two great zemindars of Sealdah in the suburbs of Calcutta, Fus-ul-Kureem and Buz-ul-Ruheem, who have hitherto continued to keep themselves clear of the Courts, though they have sent many there, whom they had instigated to acts of violence, have at length been caught. Mr. Dyson, was sent to serve a writ on them, and was immediately made prisoner. The Magistrate released him with a large force and in his turn captured the Zemindars, who have been duly fined and imprisoned for resistance of process, and thus lose their much prized koormut, which in general means nothing more or less than exemption from that legal process to which all other classes of the community are subject.

— The Star says, that the Assam Steam Company's vessel, the Assam, has just returned from her trip to Allahabad. She has been absent a month and three days, of which three days and a half were lost by detention. She has therefore performed the voyage there and back in twenty-nine days. The Government Steamers have sometimes done the same at this season of the year. But we rejoice to find that there is a competitor in the market; and as this competitor has begun with charging Two Rupees a cubic foot for freight, we hope Mr. Robertson who went up in her, will soon be able to establish another rival Association, and thus reduce freight within reasonable limits.

— The Star has a letter from Sukkur of so late a date as the 18th October which confirms the intelligence received from Delhi of the extreme unhealthiness of the station. We have extracted the first part of it, which will be found interesting.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 6.

— The Legislative Council of Ceylon has just resolved that Clergymen shall be compelled to sit on the Jury. This unusual step has excited much indignation both on the Island and at Madras. The writers however seem to forget that every argument they use against the appointment of Clergymen to the Jury applies with ten fold force to the appointment of Clerical Magistrates at home, which is strenuously defended by a large portion of the Press and of Society.

— The papers have noticed, not without censure, that as soon as the Assam Steamer advertised to receive freight, Government put on a Steamer, and fixed to receive freight at the same hour. This is said to be ungenerous. If the Assam Steamer had lowered her freight below that of the Government, she would have had nothing to fear from this competition, but as the Proprietors have chosen to fix their rates 25 Per Cent. higher than that of Government, we think the public is likely to benefit by the competition. If Government has tonnage to spare, it is better that the public should have it at a Rupee eight annas the foot, than be obliged to pay the exorbitant price of two Rupees to this new Company.

— The Delhi Gazette states that the little state of Shekawuttee is in a disturbed state. There is an insurrection, and 5000 armed men have set our authority at defiance and are in possession of two forts. Major Forster has gone against them, and Major Thoresby has sent some heavy guns from Jeypore.

— Col. Spiers has been appointed Resident at Nagpore, vice Major Wilkinson. Can any of our readers say why the Major has been superseded? His appointment belongs to the Foreign Department in connection with which department, it was that Lord Ellenborough issued the order prohibiting the communication of papers and news; but some unofficial person may surely be able to gratify public curiosity in this respect.

— His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has presented new colours to the 54th Native Infantry. The regiment was annihilated in Affghanistan; and the only surviving officer of that catastrophe, Capt. Melville, received the highest compliments from Sir Hugh.

— An attempt at Suttee has been made at Bombay. A Marwaree had died, and his widow declared her determination to burn with his body. One European and two Native Magistrates endeavoured to dissuade her from her purpose, but she did not relinquish her hold on the corpse without a hard struggle with the Police officers.

— We copy from the Star an account of the bust of the lamented James Prinsep by the great Chantry, one of his last works, which has arrived in Calcutta, and now adorns the rooms of the Asiatic Society.

— The Bombay papers announce that the prizes captured in Scinde had arrived there in the Auckland, 500 boxes, valued at Seventy lakhs of Rupees.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 7.

— The Madras papers mention the death of Mr. Carruthers, the oldest attorney of the Court at the age of 62. We are told that he had previously realized two fortunes, and returned to England, where they were lost—doubtless in the vain hope of adding to them,—and that he was constrained to come out a third time to India.

— It has been rumoured for some time that furloughs would be immediately suspended in reference to the uncertain state of our relations with Gwalior and Lahore. This will be a very great disappointment, and a source of no little expense to officers who have come down to the Presidency to go home on the urgency of private affairs, of business or relaxation. It will also seriously affect the prospects of the noble sailing vessels now in harbour, or shortly expected. What between the suspension of furlough and the competition of the Steamers, they must suffer considerably.

— The Hurkaru mentions, on the strength of letters from the North-west, that the Seikh troops at Peshawur had deserted the city and fort in great alarm, and were flying to the Indus, plundering the country in their route. This was fully anticipated. There is no longer any Avitabile there to curb the miscreants by his terrific examples of severity.

— The same paper gives us an extract of a letter from Gwalior, which will be found among our selections, from which we should infer that there will soon be no government to treat with at all, but that the whole country will fall into a state of anarchy and be subjected to general plunder.

— The Sheriff of Madras has convened a meeting of the inhabitants "to consider the expediency of adopting some means for improving the communication between the shore and the shipping." the Madras Spectator has been unremitting in his efforts to rouse the inhabitants to action on this important matter.

— The Star states, that Mr. Caird, Deputy Collector at Allahabad, is to be appointed Agent for Emigration on the part of the Mauritius Government.

— Preparations have been for some time making in front of the steps of Government House in Calcutta for some building of which nothing could be seen, but some huge blocks of marble. The Star tells us that there is to be a Dragon to sit upon the stone pedestal, and a gun on the back of the Dragon, to commemorate, we suppose, the victories we achieved over the Dragon throne.

— From the same paper we learn that Government has declined entering upon any expense on account of a geological survey of the field of recent volcanic action, near the island of Cheduba, though ready to have the spot examined by a competent Marine Surveyor.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 8.

— The intelligence given in the papers of this morning is most important, if true. At Gwalior, the Khasgee has been seized by the troops without bloodshed, and his reign is at an end. It is supposed that this event will render the advance of an Army unnecessary. The Star says that Lord Ellenborough has already abandoned the idea of leaving Calcutta.

— Dost Mahomed has been shot dead at Cabul by order of the Prince of Believers, the Khan of Bokhara. It is said that the Khan sent several papers with his own seal to Cabul stating that whoever should kill the Dost, would go to heaven. This event will probably lead to a suspension of any effort on the part of the Affghans to occupy Peshawur; but the upshot will probably be that Cabul itself will fall a prey to Bokhara, an event which those acquainted with the state of affairs in that region, have contemplated as not improbable.

— The accounts from Sukker are more distressing than ever. It appears that of the troops there, 1,371 are in hospital, and only 153 well. Every officer but one in each corps is inefficient from illness.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

BUST OF JAMES PRINSEP.

A bust, one of the last executed by Chantrey, of our distinguished and lamented townsman, James Prinsep, has arrived we understand in Calcutta, and is now placed in the rooms of the Asiatic Society. To the likeness we are unable from personal experience to speak, but the resemblance is said to be peculiarly striking, and certainly the execution of the bust as a work of art places it among the happiest of the efforts of the great artist by whom it was produced. Mr. James Prinsep left India in so deplorably weak a state of health that the very nature and character of the ordinary expression of his speaking countenance are said to have undergone considerable change. The bust, however, although modelled after his arrival in England exhibits no traces of any alteration in what we conceive must have been the personal appearance of it's eminent original while in all the vigour of health, and intellect. The model by Chantrey is said to have been aided in it's completion by reference to pictures of the subject, and our informants who knew James Prinsep well, pronounce the success of the attempt to give his exact likeness as indisputable. The finishing of the marble was we believe accomplished after the death of the great designer of the model from which it was worked, and it reflects the utmost credit upon those by whom it was completed. The look of life and intelligence is perfect, and it gives, as it were, a double expression, common as we are told to the original, of commingled thoughtfulness, and enquiry.

The bust has been executed for the Asiatic Society of Bengal, and we congratulate that body upon having had occasion to add to their collection of similar mementos of their illustrious members, so valuable a possession. We are no less satisfied at seeing another eminent work of art deposited in the public rooms of a Local Society. convinced that the more numerous such importations into this country of works eloquent of intelligence, civilization, and advancement in the arts, the more rapid will be the spread of that taste which alone can appreciate them, and which is itself the result of increased knowledge, and the cultivation of the finer faculties.—Calcutta Star, Nov. 6.

LAHORE.

"The following is our latest letter from Lahore, dated the 15th of October. It conveys nothing of positive intelligence of any important kind, but confirms our previous view of the state of the army in Lahore. Heera Singh is loath to part with his treasure, the men are discontented at his not fulfilling his promises to them, and consequently resorting to desertion in large numbers. These deserters will probably form themselves into bands of plunderers, who will prey for a while on the population of the country, and, when tired of this work, join the standard of the man who can afford to pay them best, and who may be desirous of securing power and influence.

"Many of the Natives of this country are doing their best to abandon it and carry off their property to Hindostan. Many of the soldiers of the Government have taken their leave, and proceeded to their homes. Many of those who plundered the inhabitants of Lahore at the time of the outbreak, have succeeded in keeping and carrying away their spoil. Some days since Rajah Heera Singh sent to invite Nebal Singh, of Kapperthullah, but the Sirdar thinking his life might be in danger if he should comply with this request, pleaded sickness as an excuse, and has to this day declined presenting himself at the Durbar. On the 11th Rajah Heera Singh ordered a parade of the troops, promising to those who should attend, one month's pay, and threatening those who might absent themselves with half a month's deduction, which caused great dissatisfaction amongst those who intended to absent themselves, and the murmurs of the Army generally are loud against Heera Singh. Maharajah Dulleep Singh has been suffering for some time from the effects of fever, and all the medicine which he has taken has been of no avail in removing the sickness. His mother is in constant attendance upon him, apprehensive that some one might administer poison to him together with his medicine. He has now been attacked with diarrhœa, and Rajah Heera Singh, Suchet Singh, Faqueer Noor-oodeen, Dewan Deenanath, and other Sirdars, waited upon his mother and endeavourd to persuade her to allow the Maharajah to take the medicine which was ordered for him to which she gave a decided negative. At last the Rajah sent for the medicine and administered it himself to the Maharajah. Rajah Heera Singh has repeatedly written to his Uncle, Goolab Singh to join him at Lahore, which, however, the Lord of Jumboo is unable to do on account of the great disturbances prevailing in his own possessions, and it is currently believed that no Government can be permanently established in Lahore until he makes his appearance. The Seikh soldiers are dissatisfied for the want of their pay, and those who are strictly Hindostanees are anxious to get away for fear of what will come. Every one who can do so is removing his property towards the frontier. Dewan Deenanath has secured his family and all he possesses on the ot[illegible] side of the river. Yesterday a Loodiana Ukbar presented as usual to the Maharajah, and o[illegible] read in the hearing of the Court, it was [illegible] that the Governor General had ordered an ar[illegible] assemble at Agra, but that some days pa[illegible] order had been suspended and the destination of the army changed from Agra towards Loodiana with the view of invading the Punjaub. This intelligence created considerable alarm amongst the courtiers and especially in Heera Singh, who became very thoughtful on the subject. This morning the Maharajah was taken in a Buggy by Rajah Heera Singh to inspect the Troops.

Strong rumours prevail of the intention of Dost Mahomed to take immediate advantage of the troubles in the Punjaub, and Mahomed Ukbar Khan has already proceeded to Jellalabad and is there collecting Troops for an advance move upon Dakka, and little doubt is entertained that he will be able to take possession of Peshawur."—Delhi Gazette, Oct. 25.

GWALIOR.

"The whole Lushkur, since the 26th, has been in a general state of riot; the Maharaj Cumpoo having again revolted, and the troops composing the grand jinsee having joined them. They have mounted heavy guns on an eminence adjoining the palace, and taken up positions commanding both flanks. On the night of the 26th, the Khasgee ordered Anunt Ram, whom he lately appointed to Baptist's Battalions, to attack the rebels. Anunt Ram with the Alijah and Light Battalions, a mounted Regiment, and twelve guns, moved out, took up a position, and raised his batteries; he was then on the point of retiring, when the sepoys of the Cumpoo made a sally and captured the guns, nishans, and drums; the commandant's horse, and all the paraphernalia of his cavalcade; they then bound the native officers, and, after "jootee-marring" them, carried them off captive, and compelled the sepoys to drag the guns, which they had captured, after them, calling them at the same time cowards and traitors. Anunt Ram fled, at the first onset, and concealed himself in a Bunneya's shop,—he was followed by a number of the rebels, who threatened to pull down the different houses if the inhabitants did not indicate his hiding place. While this was going on, Anunt Ram disguised himself in woman's apparel, but, before he could escape, the sepoys rushed into the house with massauls, and after some search, found him in a privy The sepoys dragged him out and beat him till he was senseless; not satisfied with this, they stripped him naked, bound him to a gun, and thus dragged him to their Cumpoo. On the morning of the 27th, their commandant Seetoleea endeavoured to bring them to reason, but they were inexorable, declaring that they were faithful servants of the guddee, and that they were determined to punish the Khasjeewalla and his followers for creating disorder and anarchy in the country, depriving it of the residency, and bringing the British troops in to settle the country,—they concluded, by solemnly protesting, that they would not rest until they had seized the Khasgee, and punished him for his crimes."—Hurkaru, Nov. 7. For subsequent events see our summary.

SCINDE.

"All is now tranquil both in Upper and Lower Scinde, a few depredations are however committed by small parties of Beloochies. The other day a body of twelve Belooch horsemen came down at mid-day, at a place a short distance from Shikarpore, and selecting five and twenty of the best camels of a batch that were feeding, belonging to the villagers made off with them. A large "Kafila" is daily expected at Shikarpore from Candahar, and though the public proclamation of Lord E. talks of all "transit duties" being done away, yet a paper called a circular was sent to officials, letting them know that that article of the treaty or proclamation was suspended till further orders." Now this "Kafila" will be pounced down upon and they will have to pay 15,000 Rupees as "Town duties." A new name for an old exaction. Shikarpore gives our Government annually now about one lack. The latest news from Candahar are that the fugitive Shere Mahommed has been seized by the Kardars of Candahar and will be kept in durance vile till he pays them two lacks of Rupees, as some say, others affirm all he has, devilish little that must be, and little likelihood of their getting satisfied in either demand from a pice-less homeless fugitive. If this is correct, and there is every probability it is, from the source of informa tion,—the native news writer must have made, the "Delhie" a deluded victim to credulity from the reports he gave him. Shikarpote is a very large and has been before our "dealings" with Scinde and Affghanistan a wealthy place. They are so [illegible]ed in manufacture that Broad Cloths [illegible] here. Two of the richest native bank[illegible] have been ruined by having transacted [illegible] great amount for Affghanistan, when we [illegible], they have all been refused, protested, [illegible]d these men are ruined.—Calcutta Star,

MARWAR.

The Marwar succession question is at last settled in favour of Ahmednuggur: the choice, however, appears to have fallen, not as we, in a late Editorial, surmised it would, on the young heir of that house, but upon his father. Our accounts state that Tukht Singh has been unanimously elected King of Marwar, and his son accompanies him as Prince Royal Writing, as we do, in ignorance of the particular circumstances connected with Tukht Singh's accession to the petty principality of Ahmednuggur, we cannot but think that the intelligence we have received is not wholly correct; for the general law of succession in Rajpootanah precludes any member of royalty, who shall have accepted as his portion, a provision in land, from ever succeeding to the throne. Thus the history of Rajwarra often presents to us the anomaly of sons or younger brothers ruling countries in which their sires or elder brothers are but jagheerdars; these latter having Esau-like sold their birthright for a mess of pottage. Our doubt, however, on this point must soon be cleared up.

The claims of the late rival candidates may be briefly noticed as follows:—those of the Ahmednuggur heir upon his descent from Rajah Juswunt Singh; those of the Siwah upon his descent from Umra, the elder brother of Juswunt, but who, having been formally disinherited by his father Rajah Guj Singh, never ascended the Marwar guddee; those of the Edur upon his descent from Anund Singh, third son of Rajah Ajit, but who likewise never possessed the guddee; and lastly, those of Dhoukul, which are too notorious to require recapitulation. Of the above noticed claims, that of Ahmednuggur certainly appears to be the best, and as the chiefs are unanimous in their selection from that house, we congratulate Marwar upon the fair prospects of prosperity which a firm consolidated rule will secure to it. The affections of the Chiefs will naturally incline towards the King of their choice; and the pride of the people will be gratified in being ruled by a descendant of the heroic Juswunt, whose prowess shook the stability of the Mogul empire, and carried the renown of the Rhatore name to the base of the Hindoo Koosh. Had Dhoukul succeeded, he would naturally have regarded with partiality and favour the Pakurn faction, and all others who espoused his cause when fighting for the throne, and thus the State would have become a prey to internal discord; but his game is up, and he is free to return whence he came or roam whither else so ever he will.—Delhi Gazette, October 28.

SHEKAWATEE.

The disturbances in Shekawatee continue, we regret to say, are likely to prove more serious than was at first apprehended, and will afford some sharp work to the Joonjnoo force. Ram Nath Perohit, the Kamdar on behalf of the minor Sovereign of Khetree, has been forcibly ejected from his appointment, and his place occupied by the Dhabye who is supported by a very large assemblage of insurgents. Every means, save force, have hitherto been tried to disperse the armed mob, who are in possession of the pass, the town and the fort of Khetree. About 3000 men occupy the two first posts, and about 2000 more are in the hill fort. Many men have arrived from [illegible] and the neighbouring small States (J[illegible] especially named,) to assist in the row. Major Forster has been encamped up to the 21st at Singhana with 3 companies, 2 post guns, and 2 Ressallas. On the 21st he proceeded from that place towards Kotepootlee to commence operations on a fort there which has a gun or two, and which will therefore call into operation some heavier guns which Major Thoresby is sending from Jeypoor, as it would not be very wise in Major Forster to court a possible repulse by attacking the enemy with the very small guns he has with him. It may even be necessary to obtain assistance from Nusseerabad. This, however, will be obviated should the detachment of the Shekawatee Brigade at Joudpoor be in time to assist the head quarters, and this is probable as the Omerkote detachment of the Joudpoor Legion was expected to return on the 23d or 24th inst., when the former would make all haste to proceed to the scene of action.—Delhi Gazette, October 28.

COL. STODDART.

On the 6th of Sept, last a messenger named Luteef from Col. Stoddart arrived at Hyderabad (in Scinde) where he made himself known to a British Officer late in Political employ, having left Bokhara eighty days previous. He travelled by the Kandahar route in hopes of finding some British Officer there to whom he might deliver his letters, some of which were addressed to Major Todd by certain chiefs in Toorkistan, others being from Colonel Stoddart himself. He was most unfortunately robbed of all these papers in the Pisheen valley by Meer Dil Khan, by whom he was beaten but suffered to proceed on his way. He states that he left the Colonel alive and well, though a prisoner in the citadel of Bokhara. It seems further that on Captain Conolly's arrival in Bokhara from Kokan, Colonel S. and he lived together, first in the house of Summund Khan, and afterwards in a house supplied by the king in the city. About 60 days after Conolly's arrival came the news of the Kabul disasters, when both officers were immediately seized and imprisoned in the citadel. Their servants were at the same time confined in the common prison. One of these was considered an European, and was called Yousoof Khan. After two months the latter were released, but Yousoof Khan being discovered intriguing to convey letters to his master, he and three others were put to death by order of the Ameer. The latter now waged war with the Khan of Kokan, of which country he possessed himself for a time, but was eventually defeated. The Khan of Khiva availing himself of this circumstance overran a portion of the Ameer's country and defeated his army in action. Returning after this to his capital, the Ameer put Captain Conolly to death, but was induced to spare Stoddart's life by the earnest expostulations of that officer. This happened about 6 months after the death of Yoosoof Khan and the rest.

The story of Luteef is corroborated by a letter received by Colonel Sheil from Abdool Summund, the Topcheebashee at Bokhara, in whose house Stoddart and Conolly were living previous to the seizure, and who claims 3000 tillas which he had lent the latter, as a voucher for which Colonel Stoddart had supplied him with a leaf out of Conolly's journal; this was safely delivered to Colonel Sheil. Stoddart would hardly have done this had Conolly been alive at the time. Abdool Summund's letter did not actually mention his death, but referred Colonel Sheil to the messenger, Mirza Rujjub Ali, for full information on all points. Colonel Sheil, however, seems to have received the letter by some other hand, so we have yet to learn the Mirza's vivâ voce news.

The Ameer of Bokhara was apparently actuated partly by revengeful and partly by political motives in putting Capt. Conolly to death so immediately after his own defeat by the Khan of Khiva, who was well known to be Conolly's staunch friend; and he may have suspected the two of being in league together against him. Luteef visited Herat on his way to Scinde, and confirms the murder of Kamran by Yar Mahomed, which was perpetrated at Ghorian. We trust soon to have further particulars to add.—Delhi Gazette, October 28.

COL. STODDART.

"The day before yesterday, a Jew presented himself at my house who had just come from Bokhara, and recounted to me the following interesting story, which I transmit you with a view to its being made public. The man's name is Michael Barenstein, born in Poland, but since established at Jerusalem, and having an elder brother a Rabbi in London. This Michael informed me that he had met and conversed with me nine years ago at Makarief in Russia, that is at Nishni-Novogorod, during the fair; and in order to prove the truth of his assertions mentioned that I had made a bad speculation in furs, which was true enough. Since then he had visited Persia, and had proceeded to Bokhara in company with the Bokhara Ambassador, and there was an eye-witness of the miserable execution of four Europeans, viz. Colonel Stoddart, Captain Conolly, a young German Officer, and a baptized Jew who had come to instruct and discipline the troops, and who, with an attendant Jew, was beheaded There is therefore no longer room to doubt that the Indian journals have been correctly informed respecting the death of these officers. There is at present at Bokhara an Italian named Giovanni, who manufactures clay figures for his maintenance and is also a clockmaker. He was captured at Kokan during the war with the Bokharians, when the Ameer of Bokhara defeated the Khan of Kokan. He is now the only European at Bokhara—one Jew traveller having quitted it eight months ago."—Bombay Times.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PUSEYISM.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Will you favour me by replying to the following querries.

Is the proper designation of the established Church of England, when named in a religious ceremony such as the laying the first stone of a new Church, THE APOSTOLIC REFORMED CHURCH of England and Ireland;" or to what Church does this title apply?

Secondly, when necessary or convenient to read the "Gloria in excelsis," is it canonical to do so in the Latin language or in the vernacular?

I lately heard both the above done, and they struck me as peculiarities savouring of the doctrines of "the Times," but I am very likely mistaken, not being learned in the Canon Law. Hence this reference, which pray excuse.

If I am right and these are not canonical, is it not rather St. Omer-ish to ask for subscriptions to build a Church, and on it's foundation, to pray that it may be the means of disseminating tenets of which not one of the subscribers approve and whose near approach to those of Rome many of those subscribers are strongly opposed to? I am not learned as I said before, but like to understand my prayers, and to know the reason of the faith that is in me.

Your obedient servant,

LOYOLA.

Note by the Editor.—We hope some of our Episcopalian readers will furnish Loyola with a reply to his letter. The subject derives importance from the increasing number of Puseyite Clergymen, who are finding their way out to India, to the no small annoyance of the Diocesan.

DRUNKENNESS IN THE ARMY.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—It appears by a late vindicatory Circular of the Bengal Medical Board that the Court of Directors are desirous of seeing Temperance Societies more generally established throughout their European Army, and even wish the Governor General to call the particular attention of the Commanding Officer of the Company's European Regiment to the subject.

It is much to be regretted that the Medical Board have not echoed to this call by requesting their Medical Officers attached to European Corps to furnish specific returns of the number of cases of men admitted into Hospital either in a state of intoxication, or from diseases predisposed, or directly caused by it.

The necessity of such Societies would then be sufficiently apparent, but at present I am unable to put my hand on any Medical Report containing more than general remarks that such and such an inflammation or neuralgia was induced by it.

The subjoined report though embracing for conciseness sake only the sick of a single Company of the — Regiment for a quarter of the year, 1843, will prove in some degree without wishing to enforce the saying "ex uno disce omnes" that the evil is no trifling one.

By 'Drunkenness' is not to be understood that every man was admitted in the stage of excitement or stupor for while some had been placed in confinement before being sent to Hospital, others had remained in Barracks drinking daily to excess, until seized with a sudden attack of illness;

some men also had been scarcely a week out of Hospital before they were re-admitted for a relapse brought on by a fresh act of inebriety.

The Quarterly average numerical strength of the Company was, 70.

| | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Total number of admissions into hospital during the Quarter, | 54 which | × by 4 | will give | 216 | per annum. |
| Ratio per cent of admissions to strength .. .. | ,, ,, 77 | ,, × by 4 | ,, ,, | 308 | |
| The number admitted from Drunkenness during, &c .. | ,, ,, 27 | ,, × by 4 | ,, ,, | 108 | |
| Ratio per cent admitted from drunkenness to strength, .. .. | ,, ,, 39 | ,, × by 4 | ,, ,, | 156 | |

The following return shewing the number of admissions from the abuse of drinking ardent spirits is carefully compiled from the Orderly Sergeants admission tickets.

| Description of Patients. | Had been drinking. | Sober. | Total. |
|---|---|---|---|
| From Barracks, | 9 | 20 | 29 |
| From Off. Duty, | 1 | 2 | 3 |
| Dry Room Prisoners, | 1 | 5 | 6 |
| Quarter Guard Prisoners,.. ... ... | 16 | 0 | 16 |
| Total, ... ... | 27 | 27 | 54 |

That this vice is not confined to the privates is proved by the fact that five of the above drunken admissions were of Sergeants and Corporals.

As my present object is not to make a medical return, I will merely observe that Inflammations of the Stomach, Bowels and Liver, were the most frequent results seen in these cases.

The conclusion to be drawn from the above statement will be, that in a Company of one hundred men, one-half of whom are supposed to be of sober habits, the other half will individually have been three times a year admitted into Hospital for either actual drunkenness, or diseases immediately produced by it.

That in all European corps in this country, drunkenness prevails to an equally proportionate extent is not probable, nevertheless in the words of the concluding paragraph of the Honourable Court's letter, "we are well persuaded that whenever, as in the case of Her Majesty's 26th Regiment, good arrangements for the internal economy of the corps are adopted and maintained, evil habits amongst the men will be kept within comparatively narrow limits."

Your's truly,

M. D.

Note.—We think our Correspondent is perfectly correct in saying that though drunkenness prevails to a fearful extent in the European army in in India, no station presents such a lamentable picture as that of Dinapore. It is perhaps the very worst station in India for European Soldiers, from the facility and cheapness with which Toddy—the intoxicating juice of the date tree may be obtained. Two pice worth of this deliterious liquor is sufficient to turn a man into a beast.—Ed.

Puseyism.—We have reason to believe that the question as to whether or not the principles held by Dr. Pusey and his disciples are in accordance with the rubric and cannons of the Church will, in the course of a few months, be brought before the proper ecclesiastical tribunals.—Observer.

The Scottish Episcopal Church.—Sir William Dunbar accepted the charge of St. Paul's Chapel in Aberdeen, on the 26th May 1842, which had been offered to him by the constituent members of that chapel, with whom lay the power of presentation.

Prior to this, the congregation of St. Paul's had formed a junction with the Scottish Episcopal Church in January 1841. Up to this period, through a course of 120 years, it had existed as an English Episcopal congregation, entirely independent of, and unconnected with, the Scottish Episcopal Church.

When Sir William entered upon his charge, he found this junction completed under a document, entitled "a Deed of Union, &c." This deed, contained the conditions of union on the one side and on the other. When, therefore, he was called upon in July 1842 to sign the Canons of the Scottish Episcopal Church, it is manifest that his signature could never with justice be interpreted in such a manner as to involve an infringement of the conditions of union.

One of these conditions secures to the congregation of St. Paul's, all the "rights and privileges" which they enjoyed before the union, as English Episcopalians; and farther declares, that any infringement of them on the part of the Scottish Episcopal Church shall, ipso facto, dissolve the union. During the last few months, Sir William has found these conditions infringed in several particulars of vital moment.

I. The Bishop censured him, and threatened further proceedings, because Sir William refused to be present at, or to take any share in, the administration of the Lord's Supper according to the formula of the Scottish Episcopal Church.

II. The Bishop refused to administer the rite of confirmation in St. Paul's Chapel, but only in St. Andrew's, where at least one service totally and vitally distinct from the services of the Church of England is used.

III. Sir William was farther threatened with ecclesiastical censure, unless a collection for the Scottish Episcopal Church Society were made in his congregation, which collection the managers of St. Paul's (who, by the constitution, as confirmed in the Deed of Union, had full powers in this respect) refused to sanction.

In consequence of these utterly unjustifiable encroachments upon the "rights and privileges" of his congregation and himself, Sir William found himself placed in this dilemma. He must either submit to these encroachments, and so be the instrument of making the conditions of the Deed of Union a dead letter, or he must withdraw his signature from the Scottish Episcopal canons, as enforced by the Bishop, which had been proved to be utterly incompatible with such union.

Sir William could not, and did not, hesitate as to the alternative. He withdrew himself, on 12th May 1843, from the jurisdiction of a Bishop, who, by his pressing, unqualified submission in certain points, infringed the conditions of the Deed of Union, binding equally upon himself and Sir William.

On the 21st of June 1843, the constituent members of St. Paul's Chapel met, and by a very large majority resolved, that "the Deed of Union between this congregation and the Scottish Episcopal Church is, from this date, annulled and void," and "that the thanks of the constituent members of St. Paul's Chapel are due to the Rev. Sir William Dunbar, for his conduct in defending their rights."

The whole case, therefore, lies in a nut-shell. Sir William had his call from the constituent members of St. Paul's. He was "duly elected" by them; and in terms of the constitution, "THEREBY HAD right to exercise his functions, and to receive the emoluments of his office." He immediately thereafter entered on his pastoral duties;—he preached, he administered the sacrament, and solemnized the rite of matrimony, BEFORE he was inducted by the Bishop (which, according to Canon IX. of the Scottish Episcopal Church, he could not have done, had his ministerial authority been derived from, or dependent upon, that Church.) On discovering afterwards that the conditions of the Deed of Union, which he was bound conscientiously to maintain, were infringed, he did nothing more than, in consistency with his own principles, and in honesty to the constituent members who gave him his call under the Deed of Union, he was constrained to do;—he returned to the position which he occupied before he was inducted; he preached, he administered the sacraments, and, solemnised the rite of marriage, as he had formerly done under the same legal authority, viz. the constitution of the chapel, and under the same ecclesiastical authority, viz. his letters of English orders; and for THIS, and nothing more, with a character unstained, and with unquestioned devotedness in his Master's cause, he is thus openly branded as an outcast from "the mystical body of Christ," beyond the pale of the communion of saints, so that no one shall join in sacraments or prayers with him!! Truly, this is the very height of spiritual despotism,—a very precious imitation of Popish intolerance,—a very remarkable specimen of Episcopal insanity!

Had "we, William Skinner," *&c. &c., merely de*clared that, Sir William Dunbar was no longer a minister of the Scotch Episcopal Church, and had ceased to have any authority or interest therein, no person would have thought twice of the document. But when he proceeds deliberately to stigmatise him as an alien from the Catholic Church, and charges all the faithful to avoid him as a moral pestilence, we ask in perfect amazement, who is this "We, William Skinner," that he should dare thus to point his spiritual artillery, as if he were armed with all the powers of this world and of that which is to come. And let it be distinctly noted, that he does by this miserable piece of would-be Popish dignity,—this wretched assumption of a monstrous exercise of power which belongs neither to him nor to any man,—not only prove his zealous hatred against Sir William Dunbar, but he likewise with sufficient clearness indicates his opinion of every other minister of God, who, in Aberdeen, does not submit to the absurd pretensions of "We, William Skinner."

But we have taken some pains to look into the canons of the Church which rejoices in this "We, William Skinner," as its "Primus," and we do not hesitate to affirm, that the gentle Bishop has broken the laws of his own communion in this matter of excommunication.

I. Had he intended to proceed against Sir William Dunbar, he was bound to summon the culprit before himself, sitting in Synod, to let him know what he was doing, and to give him at least the opportunity of defending himself, or of arresting judgment. This was altogether omitted; and the very first intimation which Sir William received of any procedure against him, was the handing in to him of the bull aforesaid which was ugly enough, though without horns.

II. The Bishop has no power to proceed to excommunication on his own authority, or on that authority conjointly with his Synod. He might have excommunicated Sir William, as far as "We, William Skinner's" diocese was concerned; but as to the other, he is usurping a power which the Bishops assembled in Synod alone claim to possess; and it is earnestly to be hoped that the "Primus" may receive a proper rebuke from his colleagues, for giving way so hastily to temper, and forgetting cannon law.

Meanwhile, however, it is gratifying to know that Sir William Dunbar is steadfastly holding on his way, despite of bishops sitting in Synod with their clergy, and their childish imitation of Romish thunder. The blow which bigotry aimed against him, has recoiled upon the infatuated men who originated it. Nothing which they could have devised, could possibly tell with greater effect in Sir William's favour than this absurd manifesto. Strong as his position always has been, this has made it stronger still. It was intended to frighten him, but, in truth, it has made him feel that the last shot of his opponents has been fired, and very blank cartridge it is. It has convinced him of the rectitude, nay, the necessity of all that he has done, and has nerved him with renewed vigour to hold fast the important position which has been so providentially assigned to him. His people likewise, as they will always be when led on by sound scriptural zeal and uncompromising faithfulness, are confirmed in their attachment to their pastor, and have made his struggle their own. The number of his congregation has been nearly doubled since the beginning of the year, and the bishop's bull has tended still farther to its increase. Blessed be God for the testimony which minister and people are raising for "pure and undefiled religion," against all the shapes and shades of the "mystery of iniquity."

For the last few months, Scottish Episcopacy has been on its trial. It has been found miserably defective; its latent spirit has been suddenly and rudely developed; and the manifestation is one which must cause every Christian mind to mourn, and every enemy to rejoice. It has evidenced too close an affinity to "the mouth speaking great things." It is, however, accomplishing the portion of work set down for its achievement;—it is tending to the wider separation every day of those who love the form better than the power of godliness. It has begun its warfare, first with Mr. Drummond in Edinburgh, then with Sir William Dunbar in Aberdeen; and singularly enough, while thus engaged, symptoms of uneasiness manifest themselves in the very camp. Mr. Montgomery of Glasgow thinks it better to give up Scottish Episcopacy, and retire to England, whence he came; and Mr. Bagot of Edinburgh, having arrived at the same conclusion, has already bent his steps homeward again, to his native land, the Emerald Isle.—Witness.

"Gold, Purple, Scarlet, and Fine Linen—A Sermon."—It is notorious enough, that there are among the Clergy of this Kingdom many Odd Fellows of various descriptions; but our readers may not be aware, that there is an Order of Odd Fellows, which numbers beneficed Clergymen among its initiated members;—a Society having its pledge, its mystic colours, its charitable fund, and we know not what else, and resembling, apparently, in its ostensible object, the Masonic brotherhood; though we cannot tell but these Odd Fellows may be a lay order of Protestant friars, whom it comports with the Puseyite schemes to revive. We have had transmitted to us a Sermon on "Gold, Purple, Scarlet, and Fine Linen," "preached before the Elloughton Lodge of Odd Fellows on the Second Sunday after Trinity, in All Saints Church, Brantingham, by the Rev. G. Filer Townsend, M. A., Vicar:" and printed for the Loyal Victory Lodge, Elloughton. The Dedication, "to the Members of the Order of Odd Fellowship," states, that the Sermon is explanatory of the colours of the Order; and it is subscribed "by theirs in the Bonds of F. L. and T." Taking for his text, Exod. xxxv. 4, 5, 6, in which occur the words, "gold, and silver, and brass, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen," &c., the Reverend Odd Fellow, after drawing a parallel between their fraternity and "another Society," viz., the Church, proceeds to explain the meaning and purpose of the various colours in which his audience were arrayed; to "prove that each and all of them are fraught with some Divine truth, and are typical of some hidden grace or virtue;" and "that these graces and virtues can best be obtained through the ordinances, sacraments, and ministrations of that Society into which they were admitted at baptism!" The white, with which the new members of the Odd Fellowship are invested, teaches them to seek after purity; the blue, the ornament of the more advanced members, is to teach them to look upward to Heaven for grace; from the use of the scarlet or crimson among the ornaments of their Order, they are to learn never to depart from the faith of Christ crucified; and the gold is the symbol of the heavenly reward. After this edifying explanation of [illegible] meaning of the emblematical furniture of the Tabernacle and the corresponding ornaments of the Odd [illegible]ship, the Preacher sums up in the following [illegible]—

"[illegible]nd I would, in conclusion, impress on you, that [illegible] best attain these graces and excellencies [illegible]d out by the ornaments of your order, by your [illegible] adherents to that holy society, the Holy Catho[illegible]urch, of which you were made members at your [illegible]ism. You should never forget that you are not heathen men, to whom the Gospel is preached for the first time. You have been once arrayed in a robe of innocence, you have been at your baptism washed clean in the laver of regeneration. Born a member of this wicked world, you became at baptism a member of Christ's body, the church: born a child of wrath, you became at baptism a child of God; born an inheritor of Satan's kingdom, you became at baptism an inheritor of the kingdom of God. You may have soiled—and who has not soiled?—your robe of innocence; but you may remember whence you have fallen, and repent, and do the first works. 'The grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after baptism; but after we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given, and fall into sin, but by the grace of God we may arise again and amend our lives.'"

Comment upon this solemn mockery, this heterogeneous jumble of foolery, Gospel, and priestcraft, is superfluous. Had such a sermon been preached by an illiterate Ranter—we will not suppose it could have been delivered from a Dissenting pulpit—what would not have been said of its vulgar fanaticism by the "Church Magazines and Tory Journals!" The Preacher is, however, no vulgar or obscure person. He is the son of Prebendary TOWNSEND, and, alas! the "grandson of a respectable Dissenting Minister; and is looking forward to high preferment, for which his theological views, his Church-extension zeal, and his cordial hatred of Dissent, will form his recommendations. He has just succeeded in obtaining the vote of a majority for building a new church in which to propagate his peculiar notions. The Roman Catholics in the neighbourhood are delighted with him, and have encouraged the building of his new church, as they are quite satisfied with his progress. The Sermon is a sample of the food with which he has been supplying the people; and it is a specimen too, we fear, of the sort of instruction by which Puseyite teachers are, in too many instances, beguiling the minds of the simple. Such are the fruits of Oxford scholarship and Puseyite theology! A bad education that must needs be, which leads a man into such odd "fellowship;" but it cannot be denied, that the Vicar of Eiloughton is true to the colours of his Church. "And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet, and decked with gold, having a golden cup in her hand."—"Gold, Purple, Scarlet"—all but the "fine linen, which does not belong to either.—Pat.

ADHESION OF THE MISSIONARIES TO THE JEWS AT PESTH TO THE FREE CHURCH.—We, the undersigned, Robert Smith, William Wingate, Alexander S. T. Saphir, and Frederick Th. Newhaus, having carefully considered the Protest read by Dr. Welsh, and adhered to by other Commissioners to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, indicted to meet on the 18th of May 1843; and the Act of Separation in prosecution of the same, adopted by the said Commissioners, in conjunction with other ministers and elders in General Assembly convened, by which, in their own name, and that of all who adhere to them, they separate from and abandon the present subsisting Ecclesiastical Establishment in Scotland—cordially approve of the said Protest and Act of Separation, and dissolve, as they hereby do, all connection with the said Establishment accordingly. Further, we declare it to be our desire to be employed by the Free Protesting Church of Scotland, in the same department of Christian exertion, and in the several capacities in which we have hitherto laboured, praying, with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, that the Lord would honour her, through our instrumentality, in bringing back many of the lost sheep of the House of Israel to the fold of the Chief Shepherd.

THE ORIGINAL PRESBYTERIAN SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT.—Perhaps the most interesting of all the historical objects in the Museum of Antiquities, of the Leeds Exhibition is "The Solemn League and Covenant" of the Scotch Church,—an original document, which remains as a memento of one of the greatest and most important events connected with the Reformed Church of Scotland. Unlike the Reformation in England,—which, effected by Sovereigns, substituted the supremacy of a monarch for the supremacy of a Pope, and retained several features of the Romish system,—that in Scotland, effected by the nobles and the people, in a day of bolder principles, asserted the sole supremacy of Christ, and banished every vestige of Romish superstition and royal and episcopal domination. The Scotch Church, divested of so large a share of dignified pomp and ceremony, and founded on a basis of comparative simplicity, was long the unceasing object of attack by the English Episcopalians, and was often called upon to adopt the most determined and decisive measures to repel their innovations, enforced chiefly by two unwise and arbitrary monarchs—James the First and Charles the First. The pedantic James, (previously the Sixth of Scotland,) after he crossed the Tweed, notwithstanding his previous profession of unshaken attachment to the Scottish Church, imbibed a remarkable relish for bishops and for the English ritual. Influenced by this taste, and by his high monarchical principles, he pertinaciously attempted to introduce the Episcopal Church into Scotland. With still greater zeal, King Charles (James's successor) prosecuted the same object, and succeeded, despite the generally adverse feeling of the people, in 1633, (having just visited Scotland,) in settling thirteen bishops over the Church, with a view to the government of the clergy, as in England. But on attempting, in 1637, to introduce into the Scotch churches a new Book of Common Prayer, a strong spirit of resistance filled the breasts of the people; and on the Liturgy being opened in the principal church at Edinburgh, the congregation, rising with feelings of violent indignation, threw at the minister the clasped Bibles in their hands, and the very stools on which they sat,—thus putting an end to all worship, until expelled by force from the church. Fearing the recurrence of similar scenes, the Scotch officers of state withdrew the obnoxious Liturgy till they had consulted with the King, who ordered its reading to be continued, and directed that the civil force should be employed in protecting the clergymen. Such injunctions, in the face of a united people, it was found impossible to obey. Committees assembled at Edinburgh, as representatives of all classes in the country—nobles, ministers, gentry, and burghers—with a view to deter the King from persisting in the late innovations. To avoid a submission which he conceived to be so humiliating, Charles exerted every means in his power. At length, provoked and harassed by the obstinacy of the King, the leaders of the Scotch Presbyterians resolved,—as a decisive measure for the restoration of their religious liberties,—to enter into a sacred bond—The Solemn League and Covenant—to resist the King in every attempt to introduce amongst them the errors of the Romish church, of which character they conceived to be the forms of worship and ecclesiastical government imposed by Charles upon their country. For the signing of this solemn League and Covenant, the first day of March, 1638, was appointed, and on that day 60,000 Presbyterians congregated in the churchyard of Greyfriars, Edinburgh. Here, after solemn service and prayer, the Covenant was read aloud to the assembled multitude, amidst the most profound and reverential silence. The preliminary solemnities being over, the Earl of Sutherland stepped forward and attached to the Covenant the first signature; and subsequently it was subscribed by all the nobles who were then in Scotland (except the Lords of the Privy Council and four or five others), many adding to their names "till death," some signing with their blood, and the whole multitude swearing by the dearest and most sacred ties of nature and religion to abide by the Covenant for ever. Various plans were pursued by Charles to induce the people of Scotland to renounce the Covenant, amongst which was the sending of his favourite Scotch councillor, the Marquis of Hamilton, to treat with the Presbyterians. Nothing, however, would satisfy them but the calling of a General Assembly of the Church, by whom the disputes were to be settled. The famous assembly, of which Alexander Henderson was moderator, assembled in Glasgow, Nov. 1638, and, after a sitting of twenty-six days, instead of being swayed by the King, they nobly asserted the sole headship of the Church to be vested in the Lord Jesus Christ, and confirmed the Presbyterian government of the Church, formally purifying it from all the late innovations, and expelling the bishops.

[The above valuable document (occupying glass-case G, and for which 400 guineas have been refused,) is the property of Mrs. Brown, of Glasgow.]—Leeds Mercury.

NEW ZEALAND.—The annual Reports of the different stations in the northern district for the year ending June 30, 1842, have at length been received. They all contain expressions of strong satisfaction at the arrival of the Bishop. They refer to a degree of anxiety and excitement which prevailed very generally in the minds of the natives, on account of exercise of British authority in the trial and execution of a Heathen Chief of high rank, who had been guilty of a horrid murder; but these feelings soon subsided. They speak favourably of the continued progress of the Gospel; though they lament a degree of indifference to further instruction, which is manifested by some of the Christian natives.—Church Missionary Record.

THE POPE AND THE PENINSULA.—The following paragraph in the Univers manifests the point of view in which the Papal See regards all political movements:—

"The face of things in the Peninsula is changed; Spain has reconquered the right and the power to return into a right way, and at the same moment the reconciliation of Portugal to the Holy See is perfected. The Patriarch of Lisbon has received the Cardinal's hat from the Queen, and at the same time the Bishop of Lisbon was consecrated. The administration of this rite to the Archbishop of Braga, and the Bishops of Oporto, Beja, and the Algerias, was to follow within a few days."

How soon Ireland and England may return into a right way who shall tell! How soon a Puseyite patriarch shall receive a cardinal's hat, or Daniel O'Connell become grand inquisitor, may be difficult to calculate. But there is no difficulty in seeing what they all drive at.—Dublin Statesman.

THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES OF PRUSSIA.—A correspondent communicates the following in a letter from Berlin: "Hitherto the psalms, canticles, and responses in the Protestant churches of Prussia, have been sung and chanted in the old simple music, accompanied by a single organ. Last year, the king, wishing the church music to partake in the modern improvement of the art, appointed Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy to be director general of sacred music in the kingdom, with the express intention of effecting the reform required by his Majesty. On Sunday last, being the one thousandth anniversary of the treaty of Verdun, the service in commemoration of the day, in the cathedral of Berlin, at which the king and royal family attended, was performed in music composed by Mendelssohn Bertholdy, consisting of chants, recitatives, concerted pieces, and choruses, sung to accompaniments by an orchestra with two organs and other instruments, performed by 600 artists and amateurs. The effect produced was very fine. When the service was ended the king sent for the composer, and expressed his satisfaction in the most flattering terms."—Sentinel.

JOHN HENRY MERLE D'AUBIGNE, D. D., was born in Geneva in 1794. His family is descended from Huguenot ancestors. He was educated in the "Academy" of his native city. The Theological Faculty, when Dr. Merle was a student, was wholly Socinian; but it pleased God to send a faithful servant to Geneva about the time he was completing his theological training. This was Mr. Haldane, of Edinburgh. He invited a number of the men to his hotel, and endeavoured to teach them the glorious Gospel. God blessed his efforts to the salvation of ten or twelve of them, including M. Merle. One of these was Felix Neff, of blessed memory. Another was Henry Pyt. The greater part of them, however, still live. Not long after his ordination Dr. Merle set out for Germany, where he spent a number of months, chiefly at Berlin. On his way to that city, he passed through Eisenach, and visited the castle of Wartburg. It was whilst gazing at the walls of the room which the great Reformer had occupied, that the thought of writing the "History of the Reformation" entered his mind. From Berlin, Dr. Merle was called to Hamburg to preach to an interesting French Protestant Church. In that city he spent five years. From Hamburg he was invited to Brussels, by the late King of Holland, to preach in a chapel which he had erected in that capital for Protestants who spoke the French language. In the year 1830, a revolution took place in Belgium. The priests joined De Potter and the other "patriots" in their revolutionary measures. The Dutch were driven out; and all who were considered friendly to the king, or intimately connected with him, were in no little danger. Among those who were in this predicament was Dr. Merle. He escaped from Belgium to Holland, where he spent a short time, and thence went to his native city. The return of Dr. Merle to Geneva was most opportune. The friends of the truth had been steadily increasing in number, since the year 1816, and had begun to think seriously of founding an Orthodox School of Theology, in order that pious Swiss and French youth, who were looking to the ministry of the Gospel, should no longer be forced to pursue their studies under the Unitarian doctors of the Academy. The arrival of Dr. Merle decided them for immediate action. The next year (1831) the Geneva Evangelical Society was formed, one of whose objects was to found the long-desired seminary. In this movement Dr. Merle took a prominent part, and was placed at the head of the new school of theology. His intimate friend, the excellent Mr. Gaussen, so favourably known in this country for his Theopneustia, and in Switzerland for many other writings, took an equal part in this important enterprise, and was chosen Professor of Theology. The publications of Dr. Merle have been numerous. Besides the History of the Reformation, he has published thirteen others on various subjects, of from twenty to two hundred pages. But Dr. Merle's great undertaking is his History of the Reformation in the XVIth Century. The author is now engaged on the fourth volume, in which he is well advanced. It treats of the Reformation in Great Britain, and is expected with very different feelings, by different religious parties in England. The fifth and sixth volumes will not be published for some years.—Wesleyan Chronicle.

EDICT OF THE INQUISITION OF ANCONA AGAINST THE JEWS.—We, Fra Vicenzo Salina, of the order of Preaicatori, master in theology, general inquisitor in Ancona, Siniga lia, Jesi, Osinio, Cingoli, Macerata, Tolentino, Loreto, Recanati, and other towns and districts, &c.

It being deemed necessary to revive the full observance of the disciplinary laws relative to the Israelites residing within our jurisdiction, and having hitherto without effect employed prayers and exhortations to obtain obedience to these laws in the Ghetti (Jewries) of Ancona and Sinigaglia, authorised by the despatch of the Sacred and Supreme Inquisition of Rome, dated June 10, 1843, expressly enjoining and commanding the observance of the decrees and pontifical constitutions, especially in respect to Christian nurses and domestic servants, or to the sale of property either in towns or country districts, purchased and possessed previously to 1827, as well as subsequently to that period, we decree as follows :—

1. From the interval of two months after the date of this day, all gipsy and Christian domestics, male and female, whether employed by day or by night, must be dismissed from service in the said two Ghetti; and all Jews residing within our jurisdiction are expressly prohibited from employing any Christian nurse, or availing themselves of the service of any Christian in any domestic occupation whatever, under pain of being immediately punished according to the pontifical decrees and constitutions.

2. That all Jews who may possess property, either in town or country, permanent or moveable, or rents or interests, or any right involving shares in funded property, or leased landed property, must within the term of three months from this day, dispose of it by a positive and real, and not by any pretended or fictitious contract. Should this not be done within the time specified, the holy office is to sell the same by public auction, on proof of the annual harvest being got in.

3. That no Hebrew nurses, and still less any Hebrew family, shall inherit the city, or reside in or remove their property into any town or district where there is no Ghetto (place of residence for Jews); and that such as may actually be there in contumacy to the laws must return to their respective Ghetto within the peremptory period of six months, otherwise they will be proceeded against according to the tenor of the law.

4. That, especially in any city where there is a Ghetto, no Hebrew must presume to associate at table with Christians, either in public houses or ordinaries, out of the Ghetto.

5. That in a city which has a Ghetto no Hebrew shall sleep out of the Israelite quarter, nor make free to enter into familiar conversation in a Christian house.

6. That no Hebrew shall take the liberty, under any pretext whatever, to induce male Christians, and still less female Christians, to sleep within the boundaries of the Ghetto.

7. That no Hebrew shall hire Christians, even only by the day, to work in their houses in the Ghetto.

8. That no Hebrew, either male or female, shall frequent the houses of Christians, or maintain friendly relations with Christian men or women.

9. That the laws shall remain in force respecting the decorum to be observed by the Hebrews who may absent themselves from their Ghetto, to travel in other parts of the state.

10. That all Hebrews are expressly prohibited from trafficking in sacred ornaments, or books of any kind, and from purchasing, reading, or keeping possession of prohibited books of any sort, under the penalty of 100 scudi and seven years imprisonment; and they who may have such articles in their possession must surrender them to the tribunal of the Holy Inquisition; and in case of failing to do so, they will be subject to the above-mentioned penalty.

11. That the Hebrews, in conveying their dead to the place of burial, shall not observe any pomp or ceremony, and must especially abstain from singing psalms, or carrying torches or lighted tapers through the streets without the boundaries of the Ghetto, under pain of forfeiting the torches and tapers, and suffering other punishments, to which the nearest relatives of the deceased will be condemned.

They who violate the above articles will incur some or all of the penalties prescribed in the edicts of the Holy Inquisition. And, in order that no one may be ignorant of the dispositions above decreed, they shall be formally communicated to the deputies and representatives of the Israelite community of this Ghetto of Ancona, with the injunction that the same shall be published in the synagogue, the present edict being affixed thereto; and these dispositions are to be enforced in the same manner as if they were made known to all and every one, and notice must be given forthwith to the Hebrews residing out of Ancona, but belonging to this Ghetto.

Given at Ancona, in the Chancellory of the Holy Inquisition, on the 24th of June 1843.

Fra Vicenzo Salina, General Inquisitor.

Don Vitaliano Burattini (for the Chancellor.)

A great sensation has been created amongst the Hebrews in London, by the promulgation of the edict of the Pope by the Inquisition of Ancona, which they consider tantamount to the banishment of their countrymen from the Papal States. Such a measure was totally unexpected by them in the present age in Europe, and the General exclamation is, that did the power exist, co-equal with the will, the same anathemas would be issued against Protestants. The Jews continue to be almost the only merchants in the Papal States, so that it will, to a considerable extent, derange the channels of intercourse with Italy.—Witness.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE QUEEN AND THE DUKE.—At her Majesty's recent departure from Southampton, the preparations at the companion ladder of the yacht, and those for the barge having been unexpected, occupied some time, and for a quarter of an hour the whole cortège was at a stand-still, amidst a most unhappy drizzling rain. During this time, the Duke of Wellington and Captain Lamprey, governor of the magazines at Marchwood, were close to the Royal carriage, and the Queen chatted with his Grace familiarly, first insisting that the duke should get into her carriage out of the rain; his Grace replied, "It was nothing; it would not hurt him; it was his duty to attend her, and the rain gave variety to the landscape." Her Majesty laughingly inquired why the duke did not put up the umbrella he held in his hand; in reply to which the duke pointed to the thick cloth of his surtout. This light chat was continued by the Queen and the Duke till all was ready for her embarkation, her Majesty repeatedly begging his Grace to take some kind of shelter. "It is my duty to take care of your Majesty till I have delivered you up to the care of Haddington, and I shall not resign my post till I have done so," was more than once said, varying the words, by the Duke. As we have observed in another part of this account, the circumstances are too trivial for record, except as showing the delightful ease her Majesty throws into her intercourse with those around her. Had a stranger witnessed the scene and not known the parties, he would have imagined he beheld a fond father and an affectionate daughter laughingly chatting together.—Hampshire Advertiser.

THE KING OF HANOVER took his departure on Saturday on his return to his own dominions, after a sojourn of three months in this country, his Majesty having arrived on the 2nd of last June. Previous to taking his departure, his Majesty took leave of his establishment, and wished that God might bless them with health and every happiness. His Majesty embarked on board a Government steamer, which awaited his arrival at Blackwall, and which took its departure about midnight. The King leaned on Lord Bloomfield's arm when he descended the steps of the Brunswick Pier to embark in the Dover. His lordship and Sir Francis Collier remained on board with his Majesty, by particular request. When the Dover steam-vessel arrived opposite the dock-yard, Woolwich, Lord Bloomfield and Sir Francis Collier came on shore, after parting with his Majesty, who entered into conversation with them during their progress down the river in the most affable manner. The King was dressed in plain clothes.—Post.

THE NELSON PILLAR.—The works at the Nelson Pillar continue to advance rapidly. The metal employed in fixing the several castings which form the Corinthian capital have completed that part of the work. The whole of these castings are of the best bell metal, weighing several tons. They are fastened together by the insertion of immense hooks into proportionate eyes, and strongly rivetted. Next, several more tons of stone will be raised to the summit to form the plinth, upon which the statue is to be placed. The full-length figure of the hero is in a considerable state of forwardness. It is hewn out of two pieces of Craigleith stone of great hardness. When joined, it will stand seventeen feet in height, and some idea may be formed of its proportions, from the fact that the foot from toe to heel measures three-quarters of a yard. It will be some time before the statue is placed upon the pedestal.—Record.

SYON HOUSE.—This residence of the Duke of Northumberland was formerly a nunnery, founded by Henry the Fifth. At the dissolution of the religious houses by Henry the Eighth, the nuns of Syon retired to Flanders, and, after several changes, they settled finally at Lisbon, where the nunnery still remains. None are admitted to the Society who are not natives of England. The nuns, on leaving England, carried with them the keys of Syon House and the iron cross from the top of the church, by way of keeping up their claim to this property. These they conveyed with them in all their changes of habitation, and still retain at their present House of Syon in Lisbon. The late Duke of Northumberland paid the nuns a visit at Lisbon, and presented them with a model in silver of the present Syon House at Isleworth. They told him they still had the keys of Syon House. "But," said the Duke, "I have altered the locks since then."—Record.

THE IRON TRADE.—A movement for the better may now be taken not merely as indicated but actually made and confirmed. At the last Quarter Meeting it is known a reduction of 10s. per ton manufactured iron took place. This reduction may now be considered as abrogated. Hence the price stands as it was about eight or nine weeks ago. Every check to retrogression is of course negative improvement; and every advance from a state of depression is necessarily an improvement, and possibly a vast one; but the character of the present improvement remains to be determined by its effects, and these are by no means sufficiently developed to warrant the sanguine representations we have seen put forth. We do not doubt that the recurrence to the old price will be maintained—we have not the slightest apprehension of a return to the price of the last few weeks; but we know that well-informed iron-masters fear that the rise may prove a serious check on the demand. However it has been made and obtained, while some establishments, without saying more than that they expect prices to advance, decline taking orders except at next quarter's rates. All the forges and mills, speaking generally, may be stated to be actively employed; but we do not hear that any additional blast furnaces have as yet been set to work.—Wolverhampton Chronicle, August 29.

TRADE IN YORKSHIRE.—The following is an extract from the monthly circular of Messrs. M'Nair, Greenhow, and Irving, of Manchester:—"The evidences of returning prosperity are becoming gradually more conclusive. Hitherto they have been mainly confined to the production of this district; now they have reference not only to the chief seats of the cotton manufacture, but to those of the woollen, iron, &c. From the West Riding of Yorkshire all the accounts concur in evincing a condition of decided improvement as regards its respective manufactures. In that quarter, as well as in this country, the favourable complexion of commercial accounts from the United States will have an improving influence. The home trade, during the last fortnight, has been much better; and suitable goods, though not commanding higher prices, have been much easier to sell. In the Liverpool cotton-market a very extensive business has been done during the month, based upon the opinion, that prices had reached their lowest point, and that the forthcoming crop would be a deficient one. The latter, in our opinion, is not entitled to much attention. Manchester, Aug. 31."—Record.

Sir Charles Morgan died at his residence in William-street, Lowndes-square, last week. He was the author of several books of no great value, but was better known as the husband of Lady Morgan. Sir Charles was knighted by the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland in 1811.—Ibid.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?—IRELAND AND WALES.—What is to be done, what ought to be done, —by the Government, by the people? It may be said, that we have found fault with the Press for proposing nothing definite, for recommending no salutary measures, while we have suggested nothing ourselves. Shall we reply with the present Premier, when leader of the Conservative Opposition?—"We have not yet been called in: we cannot prescribe without a fee." This same plea has been urged in excuse of the reserve maintained by "Her Majesty's Opposition" during the recent Session: "It is not our business, but that of Government, to originate measures." This is not, however, our doctrine. We regard with extreme jealousy the assumption, by the Executive, of the exclusive right to originate legislative measures, and the disposition manifested of late to concede the monopoly of legislation to the Minister of the Crown. It is one of the many indications of the tendency which all Government has to despotism. The proper business of an Executive Government is administration. Legislation, which means, in plain English, altering the laws, is what no wise Government will undertake, except in compliance with the demands, and to redress the grievances of the people. And all sound legislation has been dictated to the Government by the people. The theory of our representative Government is, that concessions to the claims of the people should be the condition of granting the supplies. The necessary condition of political liberty is, that the laws rule, and that the people are a party to the making of the laws. These trite and old-fashioned axioms seem in danger of being practically forgotten. The people expect too much from the wisdom and spontaneous generosity of their rulers and legislators, when they expect reforms and concessions to be yielded to anything short of a pressure from without, amounting to moral compulsion. To expect aristocrats to divest themselves of their exclusive privileges, monopolists to part with their unjust patents, patrons to renounce their prerogatives, priests to concede religious freedom, or any class of men to part with power,—is as absurd as to expect fox-hunting squires to understand the laws of Commerce and the principles of Trade, or officers of the guards, naval captains, and men of fashion, to understand questions relating to Religion. Yet all this is [illegible] from what is, by courtesy, called the wisdom [illegible]ment.

[illegible] present difficulty does not consist in determin[illegible] ought to be done, but in finding how it is to [illegible]mplished. For instance, to begin with Sir [illegible] Peel's great difficulty, Ireland. Is there any [illegible] of opinion respecting the real grievance, the [illegible] evil, which afflicts that country? Some well [illegible] persons may, indeed, regard Popery as the [illegible] evil; but that is itself a symptom, not the cause, of the depression of the peasantry, who, had they been inspired with the free spirit of Protestantism, would assuredly have given their lords and rulers far more trouble, if they had not, long ere now, worked out their social emancipation. The evil is this; that Ireland is an agricultural country, and that its agriculture is in a barbarous state, owing to the entire want of that protection which it is the first duty of Government to give to the dependent and working classes against the lords of the soil. The tenant, the cultivator, the labourer, has, in Ireland, no efficient protection from the State. There are many good landlords, just and beneficent individuals; but there is no protection against bad ones. The State has failed, in this respect, in its primary duty,—the protection of the weak, the doing of justice, which is the basis of a people's allegiance. But this evil is older than the Union; and the Repeal of that Union would not effect its cure. Mr. Sharman Crawford, than whom, by the consent of all parties, a more truly patriotic and single-minded man has not a seat in the House of Commons, has, in his Landlord and Tenant Bill, struck at the root of the evil. That Bill was withdrawn, on the promise of the First Minister of the Crown, that the subject should, during the Recess, receive the consideration of the Government. An abstract of it has since been printed, accompanied with "Observations addressed to the landlords and tenants of Ireland," by Mr. Crawford; in which he puts it to the landed proprietors, whether they can ensure to themselves the payment of their rents, even with the extraordinary powers they possess, if, by a perseverance in injustice, they organize a combined resistance. "The Irish tenantry," Mr. Crawford proceeds to say, "will honestly and cheerfully pay their rents, if they have even the smallest measure of justice; but it is not prudent to try to the utmost extent to which the patience of a people under want and wretchedness will endure, a system which cannot be defended on any principles of justice or policy."

Now, here is an evil known to have been the primary cause of discontent and misery in Ireland; men of all parties have admitted it; and yet, successive Administrations have done nothing to provide a remedy. Why? Because it would involve an interference, by a compulsory enactment, with the landlords, with the aristocracy. Why, the very purpose of a Government is to interfere with the Aristocracy, without which there can be no law but that of might. Anything, however, but this. Catholic Emancipation, Education, Emigration, Registration, Municipal Reform, Workhouses, and jobs of all sorts, have been conceded,—some of them soothing and salutary measures, yet of small benefit to the peasantry: the only thing which it has not occurred to the wisdom of Parliament to enact, or which neither Whig nor Tory Ministers have had the honesty and courage to attempt, is a law to secure to the cultivator of the soil protection against extortion and robbery, and to the labourer his equitable rights. "It is said, and, perhaps, with some truth," remarks Mr. Crawford, "that the Irish tenant is indolent, as respects the management of his own concerns; but he is not indolent in his exertions to make money, by his labour, on the English soil. Why is he indolent at home? Because he is heart-broken; he is oppressed; he has no security that he shall reap the rewards of his industry on his own soil; give him that security, and you will give him a stimulus which will show itself in the rapid improvement of the habits of the tenant, and the prosperity of the country."

As to the mere labourer, experience, we think, shows, that his condition can be essentially improved, only by improving the condition of the tenantry, so as to increase the fund for employing labour. In Ireland, however, there is small distinction between the tenantry and the labouring class; and the poorest peasant depends upon his potato-ground for the means of subsistence. The abolition of the cottier system, and the substitution of a judicious extension of the allotment system in its stead, would follow with other improvements, upon the legislative adjustment of the relations between landlord and tenant, which is the principle of Mr. Crawford's Bill.

The existence of the Established Church in Ireland, we hold to be both a moral and a political evil, an unsightly incubus upon Protestantism, a gross misapplication of public revenues, a great hinderance to Evangelical truth, an insulting badge of conquest, a perpetual blister upon the popular mind; but so is the Established Church in Wales, and in Lancashire, and more or less everywhere else; and an abatement of this ecclesiastical nuisance would but soothe the feelings,—it would not improve the social condition of the Irish people.

Another remedy for "the real monster evil of Ireland" has been proposed in a recent pamphlet, by Mr. Stapleton, formerly Private Secretary to the Right Honourable George Canning; namely, the annual expenditure of four millions of public money for public works, during four years, by which time the monster "destitution," and its twin evil, "turbulence," would, it is presumed, be vanquished. This is an idea conceived in the true spirit of that State jobbing which has mocked the miseries of the Irish people. Has the expenditure of many more millions upon English Railways prevented the destitution of our agricultural peasantry? Has the building of Union Workhouse in Ireland mended matters there? Quite the reverse.

To turn from Ireland, and come nearer home; let us look at Wales. Is there any mystery about the causes of discontent there,—any room for a difference of opinion as to the necessary remedy? The grievances are palpable; and the poverty of the people is equalled only by their patience under aristocratic oppression under State neglect. Sir James Graham has been deservedly ridiculed for sending down a Bow-street officer to put Rebecca into a watch-box; but Lord John Russell's mode of dealing with Welsh Chartism was not much wiser. The six hundred and fifty-eight gentlemen who spend eight hours out of the twenty-four, for half the year, in legislating, are, however, as much to blame as either, for allowing peaceable peasantry to be harassed by every form of aristocratic, ecclesiastical, and fiscal exaction. The tithe in Wales, is a worse grievance than it is now in Ireland; the Church-rate is worse than the Vestry-cess; the taxes and tolls are a heavier burden; and the English lord and Anglican priest are, in language and religion, not less alien from the peasantry, than "the Saxon" in Munster and Connaught. What the Welsh demand is, relief from fiscal extortion and feudal tyranny, a larger measure of both political and religious freedom, fair representation and the free exercise of the franchise. We hope that they will never be quiet till they obtain them.

The wants of Society, the claims of the people, are, in other parts of the Kingdom, more complicated; but we are prepared to show, that the main difficulty of legislation is the same;—that Education, Colonization, Church Endowment Bills, Poor-law Amendment Bills, and Factory Bills, are but empirical measures—mere palliatives, at best, which do not touch the real evil arising from commercial restrictions and feudal monopoly. But we must reserve our further remarks for another Article.—Pat.

A YOUNG PRINCESS.—The Princess Christophe, of Hayti, gave birth to a daughter on Tuesday last, the 29th of August. Mr. Elkins, surgeon-accoucheur of Foley-place, Portland-place, was in attendance. The Princess Christophe is only sixteen years of age, very interesting, and pretty; and, we believe, this is the first instance of an African Princess giving birth to a child in this country.—Ibid.

PEW CIVILITY.—In the practice of politely bowing strangers out of a pew where there is still room to spare, is there not a lack of even wordly courtesy? "Have you not mistaken the pew, Sir?" blandly said one of these Sunday Chesterfields, as with emphatic gracefulness he opened the door. "I beg pardon," replied the stranger, rising to go out, "I fear I have; I took it for a Christian's."—N. Y. American.

CANADA.—It is said that measures are in progress to effect the removal of Queen's College from Kingston to Toronto, where it is to be united with King's College. We shall sincerely rejoice if our Presbyterian friends accomplish this object, for it will tend to destroy the present prelatical monopoly of the Toronto University. It is, at the same time, to be earnestly hoped that the way will be opened for other denominations, if they choose, to share in like manner in the immunities and benefits of that great Establishment, which legitimately belongs to the Province, and not to Prelate Strachan and his friends. In negotiating for his own college, Dr. Liddell will, we trust, generously bear in mind that other bodies as well as the Kirk have a deep interest in the measures that are pending, and would be happy to aid him in effecting so patriotic an object as the destruction of the existing monopoly.—Montreal Register.

SPAIN.—The Espectador publishes the following despatch, addressed to the Regent by M. Mendizabal on the 22d July last, after the loss of the battle of Ardoz, and which was intercepted and suppressed by the chiefs of the insurrection:—"I believe from the very bottom of my heart," wrote M. Mendizabal, "that it is contemplated to deprive us of our institutions. That deep conviction places me under the necessity of proposing to the Council—1st. That an appeal be made to all Spaniards of good faith who wish to preserve entire the constitution of 1837, not to suffer themselves to be deceived, and to maintain their imposing attitude, but without consenting to the proclamation of any other principle than that of the constitution, liberty, Queen Isabella II., national independence, and respect for the authority of the Regent, Duke of Victory, until the meeting of the Cortes. 2nd. That the status quo be maintained until the Cortes shall appoint the person or persons who are to assume the direction of the government of the nation. 3rd. That the elections of the deputies and senators be immediately proceeded with, so that the Cortes may assemble at the latest on the 15th of September next. 4th. That their re-union and installation shall take place in the Royal residence of Aranjuez, without allowing any troops to be stationed there, or within a distance of six leagues around. 5. That the Duke of Victory, in the act of installation, shall, either personally or in writing, tender his resignation of the post of Regent of the kingdom, which he has resolved upon, and which he postpones until then, merely with a view not to surrender his power to anarchy,' wishing, on ceasing his functions, to leave open the sanctuary of the laws, to secure the future liberties of our country. No Spaniard attached to his country can, in my opinion, object to so honourable a means of conciliation, the only becoming one that exists, if it be intended to respect the law; otherwise we can only anticipate misfortunes, the loss of our liberty, and the prospective of being the tool of intriguers conspiring to destroy our nationality. Such is my view of affairs, and the only mode suggested to me by my ardent desire to save the nation, and of extricating the country from the present deplorable crisis. May the laws and our institutions be saved; such is my most fervent wish."

The Queen had arrived at La Granja on the 23rd.

The English Government has sent an order to Mr. Aston to recognise the new Government Mr. Aston will quit Madrid immediately after having installed Mr. Jerningham, his secretary, as Charge d'Affaires.

There is no longer a doubt that Senor Olozaga refuses office and resumes the Paris embassy.

Our accounts from Madrid this morning are of the 24th ult. The Queen and her sister still continued at La Granja. General Claveria had been appointed Captain-General of Navarre, and General Roncali of Valencia. The authorities of Cadiz had been obliged to adopt severe measures to maintain public tranquillity, which was constantly menaced by the partisans of the late Government. Mr. Aston was expected to leave Madrid on the 1st instant. The Gazette announces, that 'with a view to cover the enormous deficit in the finances, occasioned by M. Mendizabal's suppression of the tolls levied at the gates of twenty-eight cities and three seaport towns, and of other oppressive burdens, the Ayuntamiento of Madrid had assumed the administration of the tolls, with the intention of ameliorating the tariff, and reducing the entrance duties, particularly on articles of the first necessity; and that wishing, moreover, to lessen the sum to be paid by the capital of the kingdom, it had fixed it at 9,600,000 reals until the Cortes should decide on the subject.

A letter from Senor Celestino Garcia de Paredes appears in the Madrid Gazette, contradicting the statement of General Concha, adopted by the Government, that the Regent had carried off with him from the Puerta de Santa Maria, the military chest of the army. The writer shows that the whole disbursements had been according to rule; and he appeals to regular vouchers in the Paymaster General's office.—Pat.

ITALY.—The Augsburg Gazette of the 27th ult. publishes the following extract from a letter dated Coire, 25th of August:—"An insurrection has broken out at Bologna, which has ramifications through the entire of central and lower Italy: 500 or 600 armed men, mostly composed of political refugees and smugglers, having failed to surprise the authorities at Bologna, fled to the mountains. Amongst the leaders are said to be the Marquis Tenara, the Count Zambecieri, and M. Melara, an ex-officer in the Piedmontese army. A captain of gendarmerie, who pursued them, was killed at Savigno, with several of his men. The treasury chest of Bologna had been removed to the head-quarters of the Count de Salis-Zisere. Three companies of the 18th Regiment, and forty men of the Foreign Regiment, have been despatched in pursuit of the insurgents.—Ibid.

FRANCE MUSQUETRY.—An experiment was made on Thursday last at Vincennes, in the presence of Generals Sibastiani and Rostolan, on a newly-invented musket loaded with what are termed by the patentee cylindrospherical balls. The experiment was completely successful; the gun, the barrel of which is only fifteen inches long, having thrown balls twelve hundred yards beyond the target.—Pat.

The Prussian Finance Minister, M. Fodelschwing, has just published certain financial returns. According to them, 11.644 vessels entered Prussian ports in 1842, of which 6354 were foreign, and 5,310 Prussian. The Prussian vessels were of 469,000 lasts, the foreign shipping but of 393,000. The population of the Prussian monarchy is declared to be 15,300,000 souls. It appears that Holland is about to yield on the great question of the free navigation of the Rhine.—Frankfort Journal.

TAHITI AND FRANCE.—Queen Pomare's letter stirs up the bile of certain of the French journals of Friday. As the poor Queen necessarily received her education from the English missionaries, it is natural that her style and expressions should be somewhat biblical. A few words of this kind in the letter are quite sufficient for these headlong reasoners of Paris to conclude that the said letter must have been written by a missionary; and hereupon the National, that worshipper of freedom and liberty of conscience, proposes that all missionaries be sent away from Tahiti! The remarks of other liberal papers are much in the same vein.—Chronicle.

GOVERNMENT NOTIFICATIONS.

The Honourable G. R. Clerk, Lieutenant Governor of the North Western Provinces, having communicated his intention of proceeding to England, J. Thomason, Esquire, is appointed Lieutenant Governor of the North Western Provinces from the day on which the Government may be delivered over by Mr. Clerk.

Mr. F. Currie to officiate as Secretary to the Government of India in the Foreign Department.

28th October, 1843.

The Right Honourable the Governor General in Council is pleased to direct the publication of the following engagement lately entered into with the Nawaub of Bhawulpore, regarding the levy of duties on merchandise in transit through that State.

Regarding the levy of duties on merchandize in transit through the Bhawulpore State (excepting the merchants and mercantile firms, the proper subjects of the Bhawulpore State) the following Articles have been agreed to between the British and the Bhawulpore Governments.

On Boats freighted with merchandize going up or down the river through the Bhawulpore country, the duties shall be only one-half of the present fixed rates.

2dly. On merchandize passing in any direction by land, no other duties shall be levied than the following, viz.

| | Rs. | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| On a Hackery laden with merchandize, | 2 | 0 | 0 |
| On a Camel ditto ditto ditto, | 1 | 0 | 0 & |
| On a Mule, Pony, Bullock, or an Ass, ditto ditto, .. .. .. .. .. .. .. | 0 | 8 | 0 |

4thly. If any Merchant buy or sell the merchandize at any place or Town on the road, he will have to pay there the usual local duties.

5thly. As there exist no pukka wells and caravansaries for the use of travellers on the road from Bhawulpore to Sirsa, the Bhawulpore Government will, throughout its jurisdiction, at every stage, prepare pukka wells and caravansaries for the comfort of travellers, as well as a road along that route, and keep it in order by taking constant care to keep it in repair.

6thly. This agreement has been drawn up in accordance with the friendship subsisting between the two Governments, and in order that merchants may satisfactorily and in full confidence engage in the trade.

Dated 15th Shabun 1259 Hijra, corresponding with 11th September 1843 A. D.

23d October, 1843.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal directs that the copy of a Despatch from the Honourable the Court of Directors in the Public Department, dated the 30th August, No. 17 of 1843, be published for general information of the Members of the Civil Service.

Despatch dated the 12th October 1842, No. 34.

Submitting question as to construction of the Absentee Regulations in case of a Civil Servant who has visited Europe on Sick Certificate before he is qualified by residence in India for a Furlough coming again to Europe after being so qualified.

It was not our intention to depart from the Regulations regarding the Absentee Allowance to such of the Members of our Civil Service as are compelled by sickness to visit Europe. The advantages enjoyed by them in having an early furlough upon an allowance secured to them free of charge for passage home, and a second Furlough upon an allowance should their health require it, preclude the grant of further benefits to that class.

23d October, 1843.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal has been pleased, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Assam, to raise the Salaries of the undermentioned Darogahs of that Province in the following manner; viz.

Resolution.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal is pleased, with reference to the foregoing Report, and to the Resolution of the Honourable the Vice President in Council bearing date the 6th November 1839, to assign the five available Furloughs to the five Senior applicants on this date, viz.

1 C. D. Russell, 2 C. Fraser, 3 Honourable G. R. Clerk, 4 J. T. Rivaz, 5 G. W. Bacon.

With respect to the Furloughs that will fall in before the end of March, 10 in number, they will be granted as they become available according to Rule II. of the Resolution above mentioned; first to applicants on Medical Certificate, of which at present there are five on the list; viz.—1 M. Smith, 2 C. Raikes, 3 W. Vansittart, 4 J. Brewster, 5 G. D. Wilkins, and otherwise according to seniority to the following gentlemen:

6 S. Fraser, 7 G. Gough, 8 C. Gaytis, 9 C. G. Mansel, 10 N. H. E. Prowett.

In event of any of these applicants not availing himself of the Furlough that will be allotted to him according to the foregoing arrangement, the vacancy will be appropriated to the Senior of the other applicants not included in the distribution, unless claimed by a qualified candidate on Medical Certificate.

For the information of these Gentlemen, the Secretary's Report will be published in the Calcutta Gazette, with a copy of this Resolution of the Honourable the Deputy Governor.

Ordered, that a copy of the foregoing Resolution be accordingly published in the Calcutta Gazette, and a copy transmitted to the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor of the North Western Provinces for information.

Head Quarters, Allahabad, 9th October, 1843.

REMARKS.

The Commander-in-Chief has disapproved of the finding in the instances specified, for the following reasons.

In regard to the 3d instance, it appears that the sums therein mentioned, were not entrusted to Pay Master Routh as a deposit, but lent to him on interest, by Serjeant Major Tarleton in behalf of his troop; and though Mr. Routh is indebted in the amount stated, which is not forthcoming, he cannot be said to have "fraudulently misapplied" the money under such circumstances. On this instance the verdict should have been an acquittal.—In regard to the 8th, 12th and 14th instances, because the proof of these rested on letters or extracts of letters from agents at Madras, which are not evident: and in regard to the 13th, and 15th instances, because no sufficient formal proof of them was adduced.

His Excellency has observed, that the date of deposits alleged in the 4th charge is not established; and that the evidence shews the total amount misapplied, as alleged, in the 9th instance of the 6th charge, to be Rupees 4910-9-5.

Under the provisions of the 8th section of the mutiny act, the total amount of loss or damage is directed to be ascertained by the Court, in cases such as the present; and the Commander-in-Chief is of opinion that that usage should not have been departed from in the present case.

It is with extreme reluctance, and only under the impulse of a stern duty, that His Excellency feels himself called upon to cause the sentence of the Court to be carried into effect. The name of Pay Master Routh, will accordingly cease to be borne on the rolls of Her Majesty's 15th hussars, from the date on which this order may be received at Bangalore; and the necessary measures will be taken to send Mr. Routh to the presidency of Fort Saint George, under the orders of the Most Noble the Marquess of Tweeddale, Commander-in-Chief at Madras.

Head Quarters, Camp Allahabad, 12th October, 1843.

No. 10.—1. With reference to the General Order dated 8th August 1839, and to the General Order by the Honourable the President in Council dated 29th July 1839, and republished by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, on the 11th November 1839, the Commander-in-Chief directs that the following paragraph from a despatch from the Honourable the Court of Directors No. 39, dated 5th July 1843, forwarded to His Excellency by the Right Honourable the Governor General of India in Council be published for the information of Her Majesty's regiments in India:

"Para. 3. We are exceedingly desirous to prevent any disappointment from occurring in the timely receipt by the families in this country of officers and soldiers serving in India, of the remittances made for their benefit, and with this view we authorize the transmission of a supplementary quarterly roll by the mail next after the dispatch of the regular quarterly rolls, in cases where the returns from distant stations may reach the presidency too late to be included in the General Rolls."

The Commander-in-Chief requests the strictest attention to, and observance of, this order on the part of regimental Pay Masters.

2. The Commander-in-Chief's attention having been called to the neglect of officers in forwarding to the Audit Department, within the prescribed period, their bills for command allowance of detachments and of the depots of regiments. His Excellency directs that a copy of the following order by Government shall be given by commanding officers to all officers proceeding on detachment, or remaining in charge of the depot of any regiment. The Major of Brigade H. M. Forces will also furnish a copy of this order to all officers proceeding from the presidency to the Upper Provinces in command of detachments. His Excellency directs this particular manner of carrying out the orders of Government, (the neglect of which has tended to unnecessary correspondence and inconvenience in the settlement of public accounts) to prevent any excuse on the part of officers so employed, as His Excellency cannot in future recommend any claim to the consideration of Government, whether for command allowance or on any other account, which is not forwarded as prescribed, except in very special cases when delay may be unavoidable:

Extract Pay and Audit Regulations, Page 642, Para. 143.—"Any bill or demand not presented to the proper Pay Master within three months after the same becomes due, shall be totally rejected, on the sole ground of delay on its presentation.

3. Ensigns Swettenham, Stewart and Fitzgerald, of the 3d regiment (or Buffs) will, upon arrival at Calcutta, proceed by water to Allahabad, for the purpose of joining their regiments.

4. The following orders are confirmed:

By His Excellency Lieutenant General Sir T. McMahon, Bart. K. C. B. granting leave of absence to Captain Chute, 22d foot, to England for 2 years from the date of embarkation, at the recommendation of a Board of Medical Officers.

By His Excellency Major General Sir C. Napier, K. C. B. dated Hyderabad, 17th May 1843, directing Captain Napier, 25th foot, to assume the appointment of Aid-de-Camp on the personal staff of His Excellency, from the date of his arrival at the Head Quarters of the force.

5. Leave of Absence.—3d Light Dragoons.—Lieutenant Colonel White, C. B., and Captain Jones, to Landour, from the 1st October to the 1st November 1843, on medical certificate.

9th Lancers.—Captain Dyer, prolonged from the 27th October 1843, to the 1st January 1844, to enable him to join his regiment.

16th Lancers.—Assistant Surgeon Pilleau, from the 1st October to the 31st December 1843, to Calcutta, to appear before a Board of Medical Officers.

9th foot.—Captain Edmonds, from the date of his departure from Subathoo, ditto ditto ditto.

40th foot.—Lieutenant Miller, from the 1st October to the 31st December 1843, ditto ditto ditto.

22d foot.—Lieutenant Stopford, to England, for one year from the date of embarkation.

31st foot.—Captain White, prolonged from the 15th October to the 5th November 1843, to remain at Simlah, on medical certificate.

47th foot.—Lieutenant Skrine, (recently exchanged from the 78th Highlanders) to Bombay, for 1 month from the date of embarkation at Kurrachee.

86th foot.—Lieutenant Stuart, from the 1st November 1843 to the 1st March 1844, to enable him to join his regiment.

By order of his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief,
H. G. SMITH, Major General,
Adjutant General H. M. Forces in India.

Bentinck 15th March, .. 1844.
Hindoostan 12th May,.. .. 1844.

To parties proceeding to Europe, the advantages offered by the Overland route need no comment as independently of the certainty of arriving in England within two months, they are saved both the trouble and expense of fitting up Cabins and providing a large outfit of clothing which on their arrival at home is quite useless. Any further information can be obtained by applying at the Co.'s Office, No. 11, Strand.

J. R. ENGLEDUE,
Superintendent and Agent.

24th August, 1843.

PARCELS OVERLAND.

AS many persons have complained of delay in the delivery of their parcels, and as such delay arises from the parcels not being sent through the proper office. J. R. Engledue requests the Indian Community desirous of availing themselves of the Overland route to send their packages direct to his office in Calcutta, Captain Biden, Madras and to Captain Twynham, Point de Galle, and to instruct their Booksellers, Tradesmen and friends in England to send them to the following offices in London, viz.

James Hartly and Co. 16, John St. Crutched Friars and 44, Regent Street, Piccadilly.

James Barbar and Co. 17, St. Mary Axe.

All orders accompanied by a remittance will be promptly attended to.

J. R. Engledue will receive dividends and remit by order payable at sight upon Jas. Hartly and Co. London.

J. R. ENGLEDUE,

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

A LADY of high respectability and accomplishments, residing in a healthy part of the Coast of Kent, wishes to receive four Girls to board and educate with the advantage of living in a private family. The Lady is a mother, and having been for some years in India is well acquainted with the treatment for young persons of delicate constitutions. If desired too, she would have no objection to take charge of one or two little Boys up to 7 or 8 years old, in any case where parents were unwilling to separate brothers and sisters. The terms will be moderate varying according to the age of the pupil, but always for a specific sum annually, including extra charges of every description.

Cards of address, and other particulars will be given by the undersigned, and parties writing Home may communicate with Messrs. J. Cockburn and Co., No. 11, New Broad-street, London.

FREE-CHURCH BUILDING-FUND.

THE Committee feel called on to express their very grateful sense of the liberal manner in which their appeal for aid in the erection of a "Free Church" place of worship in Calcutta—has already been responded to by the Christian public. They would at the same time beg to remind their Friends that the sum hitherto collected, is scarcely one half of what will ultimately be required on the most moderate scale to accomplish the end in view—in a metropolitan locality—where labour is high—and the value of land, relatively, exorbitant.

But the Committee are persuaded that one generous, strenuous effort of Christian beneficence, is all that is needed to attain the object desired.

The result of that effort will be permanent and great, the erection of another House for the service and worship of God in Calcutta—the effort itself but single and transitory, and even where greatest, will soon cease to be felt.

Nor let it be overlooked by those Catholic friends who take a special and deep interest in the Free Church Missions, how much the local resources of those missions must ultimately depend on the Church status, which they may be enabled to secure in this place—and that nothing here can tend more to their consolidation, than the erection of a Church in connexion with that National Body, to which the missions themselves now stand ecclesiastically related.

The Committee of the Free-Church Building-Fund, renew therefore their appeal, under these circumstances, with greater earnestness than hitherto. They are much encouraged in doing so, by being able to announce that more than one of their earliest Subscribers, have already doubled their original Donations impressed with the views now respectfully urged on the Christian public in general.

The members of the Committee, in addition to the five Scottish Missionaries in Calcutta, namely the Revd. Dr. Duff, the Revd. W. S. Mackay, the Revd. D. Ewart, the Revd. J. Macdonald, and the Revd. T. Smith, are as follows:—

THE PUNJAB.—The present mail will take home a contradiction of the reports of all the atrocities said to have been committed in the Punjab, since the murder of Rajahs Shere Sing, Pertab Sing, Dhyan Sing, and of their assassins, Lena Singh Sundhanwalla and Ajeet Sing. All subsequent murders with which the public ear has been filled, from time to time, have been perpetrated only by the newspaper reporters. The Delhi Gazette candidly acknowledges the gross deceit which has been practised on the Editor in the intelligence department of the paper, which appears to have been characterized by more than the usual amount of Native infidelity. For the benefit of friends at home who may have been misled by these misrepresentations, it appears judicious to recapitulate the various items of information which they are now desired to dismiss from their minds, as being equally fabulous with the Arabian Night's Entertainment.

It was stated that Shere Sing, the deceased ruler, in the summer excursion which he made into the hills before his death, had visited the mountain domains and the impregnable fortress of his minister Dhyan Sing. It is now discovered that the account was altogether fabricated to blind the eyes of our contemporary and his readers. The King did not approach the territory of Jumboo.

It was said that after Ajeet Sing had put Shere Sing to death, he went into the Zenana, and massacred all his wives, and all the women in it, sparing not even the children. The tragic death of the youngest, only a few days old, was described in the most heart rending terms. It is now discovered that the whole story was pure fiction. The women and children are safe, and the former have not been dishonoured.

It was said that Sawun Mull, the viceroy of Mooltan, had been assassinated, as a kind of supplement, we suppose, to these murders, and various speculations were thereupon advanced as to the chiefs of the province assisting the fugitive Shere Mahomed to wrest Scinde from us, and thus involving our Government in a war with the Punjab. Sawun Mull is alive and well, and governs his province with much ability and discretion: and it is far from improbable that when the kingdom of Runjeet shall be resolved into the original elements of which it was constructed, this Sawun Mull will become the independent sovereign of Mooltan.

It was said that Lena Sing, Majeteeah, one of the ablest chieftains in the Punjab, and who seems to divide the authority at Lahore with young Heera Sing, the Regent, had stabbed him to death, in a dispute which arose out of the distribution of fiefs and posts. Wrong again. Heera Sing, according to the last accounts was well and active, and presided at the last meeting of the Privy Council at the capital; Duleep Sing, the king, being in the nursery.

It was said that Raja Golab Sing, the brother of Dhyan Sing, had been murdered. He is alive.

It was said that Raja Golab Sing had left his hill territories at Jumboo, and was advancing to Lahore with 20.000 bold hardy mountaineers. He has never left his fastnesses, because he finds enough to do to curb his refractory subjects; and as long as he can draw his rents from his vast estates in the plains, he will not descend from his own eyrie, to mingle in the strife at Lahore.

It was said that the young king, Duleep Sing, aged seven, had fled with the magnificent diamond, the Koh-i-noor, and that he had taken refuge in our own territories. It is now known that he has never quitted the Palace; that the inestimable jewel is yet at Lahore; that the lad has been ill, and in the hands of his nurses, and is now convalescent.

It was said that Dost Mahomed had been shot to death by order of the Prince of Believers, the Khan of Bokhara, and that Cabul was in a state of anarchy. The last accounts from beyond the Indus, give information of his movements quite incompatible with any idea of his death; and before the express goes out on the 21st, we expect the report will be distinctly contradicted.

After such a monstrous collection of what we are much tempted to call lies, all in a single month, we can scarcely expect that any great dependence will be placed on the statement we are about to send to our English friends by the out going Mail. Perhaps however they may give us some portion of their confidence when we assure them that in reference to all statements made in India, we think mistrust much safer than credulity, and measure our mistrust by the circumstantiality and positiveness with which assertions are made. The Punjab is in a very ticklish state, and Heera Singh, the youthful son of Dhyan Singh, is in any thing but an enviable situation. He is the Prime Minister in a Court in which Duleep Singh is the nominal monarch. He is very young and has little experience, and may be cut off when he least dreams of death. The Dogur family, of which he is now the most prominent and exposed member, is hated by the Sikhs, who would gladly extinguish them and their power. Suchit Singh, his uncle, a brave soldier, seems to keep aloof from the Court. The chief friend and adviser of Heera Singh appears to be Lena Singh, of whom the "Adventurer in the Punjab" gives us rather an exalted opinion. The troops in and about the Capital are numerous, rapacious, and disposed to mutiny; and there is no master spirit to curb their licentiousness. There seems to be no obstacle to their shortly upsetting the central Government at Lahore; upon which the kingdom would in all probability be broken up into a number of little principalities. Golab Singh would in that case retain Jumboo and add Cashmere to it, keeping possession, as far as possible, of his rich acres in the plains. Peshawur would again fall under Mahomedan sway. Sawun Mull would found a dynasty in Mooltan, and every petty chief in the Punjab, would endeavour to establish his independence. Such a state of things would not of course last ten years in the presence of the paramount power in Asia. At present however, we have no pretext, for interfering with the affairs of the Punjab. If the security of our own territories was disturbed; if Lahore had become, like Cabul, the centre of intrigues hostile to our interests, we should have a solid reason for marching into the country and anticipating our enemies. But there has been no irruption into our provinces, and the de facto Government of Lahore, shows the strongest disposition to keep on good terms with us. Government therefore limits itself to the establishment of a strong force on the frontier. [illegible] there is every reason to suppose that the dissolution of the administration at Lahore—and it has a most precarious existence—would be the signal for encroachments on our provinces. It is scarcely possible but that some occasion of strife should arise, to carry our banner across the Sutledge, and plant it on the Indus. This is a consummation much to be desired, not only for the welfare of these distracted and oppressed provinces, but also for our own advantage; since we could maintain the government of the Punjab with nearly the same number of troops we are now required to keep up in order to guard the frontier against Seikh aggression. The expense of them would in that case fall on the Country of Waters, instead of being drawn from our own provinces.

For our parts, we have no dread whatever of the bugbear of territorial aggrandisement. The limit of our empire is the Indus, and the absorption of all the little independent principalities within that river is a question of time, not of principle. Our Government would be a real blessing to the people, and injurious only to the oppressive Chiefs, from whom we should take away the power of raising armies and putting people to death at their own pleasure. We could govern the whole of India cheaper, and better, than we now govern parts of it, while they are intersected by independent states. The idea of charging our Government with ambition, whenever it is obliged, by the current of circumstances, to extinguish any of these little independent powers, is absolutely ludicrous. Every independent state within the Indus exists only by our sufferance. An army of ten thousand foot and five thousand horse, with a due complement of artillery, could annihilate every independent sovereignty from Cape Comorin to Cashmere. These states exist upon the right of treaties, which we hold sacred; but the moment any treaty is violated by the ruler, his independence should cease for ever. It will be the happiest time for India, as the late Dr. Carey used frequently to observe, when no sword is drawn or spear lifted without our command, when all the little petty satraps and tyrants we uphold are put on the pension list, and our own system of administration is established all over the country.

THE ASSAM STEAMER, AND THE DITCH IDEA OF COMPETITION.—The Steamer which the Assam Company ordered out from England to bring down the Tea which they intended to manufacture in Assam, has been found to be utterly unsuited for the navigation of the Berhampooter, and they have resolved to run her with freight between Calcutta and Allahabad. An experimental trip was made last month, which is said to have succeeded; and she has now been advertised for a second voyage; the tonnage to be disposed of by public auction if the demand exceeded the supply. This is the first attempt which has been made to wrest the monopoly of the navigation from the hands of Government, and it has been hailed with joy by some of our contemporaries. It has so happened, however, that the Controller of Government Steamers timed the despatch of one of his vessels to correspond with the departure of the Assam steamer, and advertised the sale of freight at the same hour [illegible] e auction to be held for her freight. [illegible] arrangement has been severely comment[illegible] by a portion of the Press, and Govern[illegible] is said to have acted ungenerously in thus [illegible]ing to put down competition, when com[illegible]n would be so advantageous to the public interests.

We must confess that we cannot see the force of this reasoning. Competition every where, except within the Ditch, means, the attempt to afford a superior article at the same price which an inferior article has borne, or to sell the same thing at a cheaper rate. Now the Government minimum rate for freight is, One Rupee eight annas the cubic foot; the lowest rate of the Assam, has been fixed at Two Rupees the foot. At these respective rates the freight of the vessels is to be put up to sale. If therefore the Assam Company is to be considered in the light of a competitor, it must be altogether on a new plan which no man ever dreamt of; since it proposes to compete with a rival, by offering precisely the same thing thirty-three per cent. higher. How this kind of competition is to be beneficial to the public interests, we are at a loss to conceive. To our simple understanding, it seems evidently more advantageous to society to obtain freight at a Rupee and a half from Government, than at two Rupees from its rival; and the Controller of the public steamers appears to have consulted the interests of the community by preventing the necessity of their paying a higher price for the article. The competition of the Assam Steamer, must of course fail, because it is based upon an erroneous principle; and the competition of Government must and ought to succeed because it goes upon the soundest principle. The remedy is in the hands of the Assam Company. They have only to reduce their charge for freight from the exorbitant price at which they have thought fit to fix it, to a rate a little under that of the State steamers, and those vessels may then be started on the same day and hour with that of their new rival without doing him any injury. There would in that case be no necessity for the papers to raise an outcry about the want of generosity in Government. A feeling of self interest on the part of the public would cure the evil. The Government Steamer would get no freight till its cheaper competitor was full. If the Directors of the Company find that they can obtain no return for their capital under two Rupees a foot, they had better retire from the field at once. The public would rather continue to pay the more moderate rate of freight to the Government establishment, even though it should bear the odious name of a monopoly. If the Company can afford freight at a cheaper rate, but wishes to take advantage of the present demand, and make the interests of the public subservient to their own, they have a right to do so, but they have no right to cry out against a competitor who proposes to cut them out of the market by the superior cheapness of his wares, except upon the principle that every man has a right to make himself as ridiculous as possible.

GWALIOR.—Information was received in the middle of last week that the reign of the Kashgee at Gwalior, who had usurped the office of Prime Minister, and obtained possession of the Royal family, had been brought to a close. The insurgent troops defeated those which had been sent against them, and, following up the blow, seized the Usurper himself. This change in the state of affairs at that Capital will, it is said, render the advance of our troops unnecessary; and rumours were last week afloat that the Governor General had relinquished the idea of proceeding to Agra. On Saturday, however, this statement was contradicted, and it was given out that Lord Ellenborough, notwithstanding this change, had resolved to join the Commander-in-Chief, and superintend the new arrangements which were to be introduced into Scindia's territories. Ten days more will enable the public to determine which report is correct.

The most important of these arrangements, that which refers to the suppression of the rabble soldiery, and to the substitution of a subsidiary force, officered from our own army, appears the most objectionable. It will, it is true, give us the complete military command of the country, and remove all anxiety regarding the safety of our frontier districts; but it will indefinitely increase the misery of the poor inhabitants, whom it will leave at the mercy of a Native administration, and deprive of all hope of relief. This contingent force will be employed equally in resisting any foreign aggression and in putting down any internal commotion. In all Native states, the only check on misgovernment is the dread of a reaction on the part of the sufferers. When the oppression becomes insupportable, they rise en masse, sacrifice their tormentors, and often subvert the Government. The possibility of such an occurrence produces that salutary feeling which induces some degree of moderation. But when the military power is lodged in our hands, all chance of a successful insurrection is taken away. At the same time, the infallible support afforded by our troops, gives an additional stimulant to extortion and cruelty. No provinces in India are in a state of more utter and hopeless wretchedness than those in which we have the power of the sword, without the responsibilities of the administration. Of this, Oude and Hydrabad are pregnant examples. Were we to pension the King of Oude and the Nizam, and incorporate their territories with our own, a general outcry would be raised in England against the rapacity, injustice, and ambition of our Indian functionaries, and patriots would set themselves to draw up articles of impeachment. Yet the absorption of these two territories would be an act of superlative mercy. For all political purposes these principalities are as much under our own absolute control, as the Isle of Man is under that of the English Crown; but the poor inhabitants, the wretched cultivators of the soil, are denied those privileges of protection and justice which our own subjects enjoy; and are exposed to a greater degree of wretchedness than the subjects of those states which are not cursed with our system of military interference and civil non-interference. We ought either to interfere in both respects or in neither. If we take away from the people the natural power of resistance,—which we do by the presence of an irresistible force—we ought to take away from the rulers the power of oppression. It is to be feared that the same erroneous policy which we have adopted in reference to the two states just named, will be put in practice in the present instance in Gwalior, and that we shall extinguish the military power of Scindia's family, and thus purchase the security of our own frontier, at the expense of the dearest interests of the inhabitants.

THE PUBLIC FERRIES.—Mr. Dampier's Report of the State of the Police which we reviewed last week, gives us some important notices regarding the public Ferries which have been the subject of a recent arrangement. The reader need scarcely be reminded that the ferries were incorporated with the establishments of the state about twenty years ago, when it was stipulated that all the surplus funds should be expended in improving the means of communication by land and water. These surplus receipts however have been allowed to accumulate in the General Treasury, and they amounted at the close of 1841, to more than eight lakhs and a half of Rupees. About two years ago, Ferry Committees were organized in every district, to whom the management of the funds, both as it regarded the collection and the expenditure, was committed. A new interest has therefore been given to this trifling matter of income, in which the public has more of an individual concern than in the millions which are annually raised by the state, in as much as it is the only fund specifically devoted to local improvements. It is not without some feeling of humiliation we allude to the fact that of the land, salt and opium revenue of the Bengal Presidency, which seldom falls short of six millions sterling a year, nothing, or next to nothing, is devoted to the construction of commercial roads and canals and bridges and the general improvement of the means of internal intercourse. It is the opprobrium of our rule that no portion of the public revenue should be consecrated to this national object but the candle ends and cheese parings furnished by the surplus ferry funds. The great Benares road is scarcely an exception to this rule of parsimony; for it is much more a military than a commercial highway, and ought no more to be credited to the public spirit of Government than the Cannon foundery at Cossipore. While such is the case, and the six crores of revenue belong to Government, and the lakh and a half of the ferry funds to the public, it is natural that the public should look at the augmentation and judicious distribution of its own peculiar income, with feelings of peculiar interest.

The Police Report for 1838 gives us a statement of the funds obtained from the Ferries in that year, and we are thus enabled to compare it with that, for 1841. And although the new arrangement of Ferry Committees had not come fully into play in this latter year, yet the improvement of the income is highly gratifying. In 1838 it amounted, only to the sum of 86,403 Rs.; in the latter, to 1,42,594 Rs. This increase is so unequally contributed by the various districts as to demonstrate the great extent to which abuses had grown up under the old system. We find that in the 24-Pergunnahs the increase has been trifling; 9292 Rs. in 1838 to 11,449 Rs. in 1841; while in the district of Sarun the augmentation is almost incredible; the sum raised in 1838 having been only 1506 Rs. while in three years under more honest control it rose to 14,215 Rs. Chumparun, Fureedpore and Chittagong did not yield a farthing in 1838; in the latter year, they gave respectively, 918, 1081, and 3031 Rs. Tirhoot and Hooghly have changed places; why, we cannot say, except that the management in the one is good; in the other defective. The revenue in Hooghly has fallen off from 23,936, to 16,096 Rs.; in Tirhoot it has risen from 14,589 to 23,315 Rs. But the most unaccountable discrepancy between our natural expectations and the actual result of the fund, is exhibited by the statement of the 24-Pergunnahs, which district includes the ferriage of the extensive suburbs across the water. In the year 1841, as we have stated, it was only 11,449 Rs. not one-half the receipts from the district of Tirhoot! If we suppose that each passenger pays half a pice every time he crosses, it would appear that only 4000 persons use the ferry daily, that is, only 2000 cross and the same number recross it, in the twenty-four hours; which is utterly incredible. Five times that number would be much nearer the truth. We cannot therefore adopt any other conclusion than that the smallness of the return arises from the existence of great abuses.

The same abuses doubtless exist, though not to the same extent, in other districts. Indeed when we are told that there are only about 300 ferries belonging to the state, and 1800, of which the profits are usurped by private individuals throughout the country, there can be no doubt, that there is large room for vigilance, and that with due diligence, even the higher receipts of 1841, may be doubled. In this case, the ferry funds under the Government of Bengal, may be made to produce as much for the improvement of the roads, as the One Per Cent. of the Land revenue of the Western Provinces, which was appropriated to that object at the recent settlement, is found to yield. Our gross land tax may be estimated at a little more than three crores, and the ferries under efficient management, ought to yield more than three lakhs. But since Government has, at length, Committees in every district employed in securing the judicious outlay of these funds in objects of public improvement, and there is no longer any dread of waste in the application of them, it would be highly advisable to augment the funds at their disposal, in every possible way. The profits of all Canals should be considered sacred to new improvements, and entrusted to the local Committees. Judicial fines ought to follow the same rule; so should all waifs, and all property belonging to those who die without heirs. A respectable fund of five or six lakhs of Rupees a year might thus be formed, which, judiciously applied, would produce wonders in a land in which, compared with our means and responsibility, we have done—nothing. Nor should it be forgotten, that the wise application of the fund will tend to its annual increase. Nothing is more likely to augment the receipts from the ferries, than the construction of good roads to them.

But what is to become of the 8,66,000 Rs. of surplus funds, which at the end of 1841, were lying unproductive in the public Treasury? Without meaning the slightest disrespect to the Sub-Treasurer, we venture to say that the Treasury is the most unsafe of all places for the precious deposit. A single draft from a Commissariat Officer on the banks of the Sutledge, may any day sweep away this accumulation of twenty years. We really think it would be wise in the Deputy Governor to rescue this fund from its present perilous position, and place it beyond all farther risk, by devoting it to objects of public utility in the provinces under his charge. The Ferry Committees will of course see that no sums are hereafter put in the same jeopardy. They will consider it more judicious to anticipate, if necessary, the funds placed at their disposal, than allow them idly to accumulate till they become an object of political cupidity. Our anxieties will not cease till we learn that the eight or nine lakhs have been drawn from the Treasury and dispersed over the country.

While we are upon the subject of the Ferry funds and Ferry Committees, we may as well hint that the utility of the Committees is occasionally cramped, and the public interest injured by a clashing of their functions with those of the Military Board. Our high roads are, as we have said, Military roads, and, as such, are under the superintendence of the Board; the Ferry Committees are not allowed to touch them. The consequence is that in the Midnapore and Burdwan, and possibly the Bancoorah, districts, the metalling of the roads by means of the Kunkur which nature has so liberally provided in those Zillahs for their construction, is prevented. There lies the Kunkur in rich abundance; and there are the ferry funds ready to be employed in spreading it on the roads, but there is a hitch, through the want of a clear understanding between the Board and the local Committees, and the consequence is that nothing is done, and improvement is at a stand.

Something we were going to add to this rambling article about the Bridge across the creek at Bali, in which we in particular are greatly interested, as well as the country at large. The cost is estimated at about 30,000 Rupees. A large sum was raised by public subscription towards the erection of it some two or three years ago, and the Zemindars of the district offered to supply one-half the expense, if Government would furnish the other half. But Lord Auckland balanced the matter so long that the Cabul disasters came before he had made up his mind, and the project miscarried altogether. We have heard incidentally that Mr. Bird has taken an interest in it, and ordered it to be forthwith constructed, and will not be happy to quit India until it is fairly begun. We hope the intelligence is authentic; for it would be difficult to imagine a more judicious and laudable application of a portion of the Seventy-four thousand six hundred and sixty-two Rupees of surplus ferry funds belonging to this district, which has been entrusted to the keeping of the Sub-Treasurer. The responsibility now rests with the Military Board, and if they do not speed on the Engineer, they may look for a touch of the Editorial flapper.

THE DISTRICT OF DINAGEPORE appears to have been marked out as the scene of oppression from the first establishment of the British authority in Bengal. It was in this district that those charges of tyranny and torture were laid, which afforded Sheridan so appropriate an opportunity for the display of eloquence during the trial of Warren Hastings; and although it was discovered by the Commissioners appointed by the Government of Bengal to investigate them, that they were greatly exaggerated, and that the harrowing description of tortures inflicted upon the people, at the recital of which several ladies fainted away in Westminster Hall, was altogether fabulous, yet the grinding of the poor to the dust by the rich Native Agents of Government was fully substantiated. The district, from its unhealthiness, has always been in disfavour with Civilians; who seldom extend their visits much beyond the neighbourhood of the station. It contains few European residents except the public officers, and its internal condition is little known and rarely attracts public notice. Within the last four years however it has become the object of a very unenviable notoriety, from the cases of oppression which have been discovered and brought home to some of the Native officials. These cases, as usual, have given birth to much party feeling, which has been carried to such an extent, as to lead to a denial even of their existence; and it is therefore with some feeling of satisfaction that we welcome testimony which appears to be impartial, and worthy of confidence.

It was affirmed by the Officer who occupied the post of Magistrate in the first six months of 1841, the Police Report of which now lies before us, that, an extensive confederation existed among the Natives, who occupied some of the highest offices in the Civil and Criminal Courts, nearly all of whom were from the town of Cogmaree, in the district of Mymensing. Some of them, who came to the district without a cowree, had amassed wealth and purchased large estates. No Native, as every one knows, has ever bought an estate out of his official salary, since the time when Lord Cornwallis obliged the Europeans and Natives to change places in regard to their public allowances, by raising those of the former to the highest pitch, and depressing those of the latter to the lowest level. From that time onwards, the Natives have been indebted for their fortunes to the judicious exercise of their influence and power—just as the Europeans were before them, when placed in the same circumstances. The Cogmaree League made money as other Sheristadars and Peshkars, and men in power are now doing in every district; but with this difference that in few if any districts, does there exist a combination of Native officers so inimical to the general interests of society; in no district have they so completely succeeded in filling up inferior situations with their own relatives and creatures. The opinion which the Magistrate had formed of the existence of this League, and of its pernicious effects, as well as of his own duty to resist it, brought on a discussion between him and the Judge, in which the Junior Officer was believed by the Sudder Court to have been wanting in that respect which was due to his official superior, and he was removed from the district and for a time placed in an inferior situation. The condition of the Police in any district, as we know from bitter experience, is always the most ticklish and dangerous subject an Editor can approach. We have been threatened with prosecutions just five times since we begun our labours nine years ago, and in every instance the threat has arisen from remarks on the unsatisfactory state of the Police. Hence we have been sometimes driven to the conclusion that the Reform of the Police can come only from the special interposition of Divine Providence, in ways which man could not divine. On all occasions, we have resolved that our remarks should be general and not particular. We refrain therefore from offering any remark on the subject of these dissensions between the Judge and the Magistrate of Dinagepore, further than that they ended in the removal of the latter, and created some degree of mistrust regarding the existence of the formidable League, which in his opinion paralyzed the efforts of the European Officers. Mr. Dampier's Report on the state of the Police however seems to put the matter beyond all doubt. In the following extract he gives the stamp of his own high authority to the fact that such a confederation did exist in the district, and that during its existence, "the most able Judge and Magistrate could hardly carry on its duties properly."

In this District there has been for years a regular family and district combination amongst the Amlah of all the Courts, which has had a great effect in impeding the administration of justice concealing the corruptions and mal-[illegible] of the Mofussil Amlah, and inflicting injury on [illegible]; whilst it has afforded a rich harvest to the [illegible]mlah, many of whom have become possessed of [illegible]led property in the District, to an extent which [illegible] not have procured by honest means. Nos. 2 and 10 are connected with the Sessions Sheristadar, Nos. 1 and 8 are Brothers, and all more or less connected with each other. In the Thannahs where the Sessions Sheristadar, Foujdarree Sheristadar and Foujdarree Peshkar have their Estates either the Darogah or the Mohurer, and in some both these Officers were from the same parts of the country, whilst I understand that the greater number of the Mookteears employed about the Courts, come from the same place.

Now I am sure that His Honor will perceive what indescribable mischief a league like this must bring on a district. The heads of it being Landholders, requiring services in that capacity inconsistent with their duty from the subordinates, who again receive protection and influence from them in cases where they are concerned. The most able Judge or Magistrate could hardly with such a combination carry on his duties properly—the influence and intrigue out of Court would baffle all his endeavours whilst in there, and in the papers before him, all would be made to appear correct, and the people of the District would have to submit to the oppression and exaction of this body.

It was recently announced in the papers that Government had directed the Head of the League to be divested of his office; and the man threatened a brother Editor with a prosecution for some remarks on the subject which were any thing but complimentary. We now learn that he considers his removal an act of great injustice and has lodged an appeal to the Government of India, which we sincerely hope will fail, as it ought to do.

A correspondent of the Hurkaru, who appears evidently to be acquainted with the state of the district, has endeavoured to exculpate the Sheristadar, with whose removal he is much displeased. This effort, though dictated by the purest motives, only affords another instance of the facility with which natives of great tact are enabled to blind the eyes of Europeans to their true character. There is an especial muntur, or Holy text, in the Vedas for bringing others within the circle of one's influence. The practice has therefore the sanction of the highest antiquity, and is one in which the gods are supposed to afford assistance. Whatever rules of the Vedas have fallen into disuse, this precept has been acted on without interruption, through the four yogus, and long practice seems to have given the natives such aptitude that they seldom or ever fail. Mr. Dampier informs us that even the infamous Badul Beg, the Dinagepore Daroga, who "in the brutal treatment of persons seized by him, respected neither age nor sex," was considered by Mr. Halkett, the late Magistrate, his best Daroga. This wretch, convicted of having practised the most revolting tortures, who, if we may adopt the language of Burke, "ought to have fattened the region kites with his offal," contrived so effectually to delude his official superior, as to induce him to declare that "he was the only daroga in whom he could place confidence." How many instances of this misplaced confidence does not our administration furnish. How many cases are known of men, who have succeeded in gaining the blind side of their masters by their oily tongue, their fawning obsequiousness, their inimitable powers of deception, and are believed to be faithful, honest, even benevolent servants of the state, while at the same time they are the terror of the district from their venality and oppression. These are usually men, in whom great diligence, and great talent is combined with the sharpest discernment of character, and the highest tact. They worm themselves into the confidence of the European, gradually obtain an ascendancy over him, which it is their great aim to conceal, in which they are generally so successful that those who are most entangled in their toils, consider themselves most independent.

A wily native, who has thus obtained the ear of his master, gradually fills up all subordinate offices with his relatives or his creatures, and daily enlarges the basis of his authority, till it comes to be felt through every town of the District. When a new Official arrives, his mejaj, —his character—is studied with all the ability of LaBruyere; his weak points are soon discovered, and they become the means of retaining the same influence under his administration. The man now becomes the centre of hope and fear in the district; he is the channel of communication between the people and the Hakim; no representation reaches 'the presence,' which does not pay him toll. Every office has its price, and whoever may be appointed to a public situation, finds it necessary to conciliate the great man by a fee. The district is now in his hands; and the whole business of it is bonâ fide settled at his evening levée, and the next day, ratified in Court. We do not mean to apply this picture to the district of Dinagepore; it was the remarks of Mr. Dampier, which brought up recollections of facts and scenes, in other districts, on which we have often reflected, and which have led us to remark how fully the Natives have avenged themselves on their European conquerors for monopolizing all nominal power, by securing to themselves the enjoyment of all real power in the internal administration,—as well as that wealth which power ever commands.

DEATH OF THE HON. J. R. MORRISON, ESQ.—We record with feelings of deep regret the death of the Hon. Mr. Morrison at Macao, on the 28th of September last. We have been favoured with full particulars of his illness, decease and interment from a common friend. It will be found in another column and be perused with a painful interest. Mr. Morrison was the son of the late Revd. Dr. Morrison, the founder of Protestant Missions in China, from whom he imbibed that knowledge of the Chinese language which formed the basis of the eminence to which he rose. This knowledge was afterwards improved by deep study and extensive intercourse with the people. We believe no man in China was better acquainted with the language, and the literature, the habits and the feelings of the Chinese, as well as with all the punctilios of Chinese intercourse than our deceased friend. His services therefore as a linguist were found invaluable by the conductors of the expedition which has for the first time established British influence in China. But he had higher qualifications than those of an interpreter. He possessed a large acquaintance with men and things, a vigorous intellect, and a clear and independent judgement. The favourable opportunities for observation which his official position amidst the military undertakings, and the political negotiations of the period afforded him, had been sedulously improved. These natural and acquired advantages seemed to point him out as a man eminently fitted to occupy a high and important position in our future transactions with the Chinese empire. His merits were not overlooked by Sir Henry Pottinger, and they had just received their first reward from her Majesty's Ministry, by his appointment to the Council, when he was cut off, in a week, by a fever, in the prime of life, and in the first budding of his earthly prospects. But his claims to regard were not confined to those qualities which had recommended him to public honours. In private life, he exhibited all the amiableness, and in his public career, all the consistency, of the Christian character. He was a warm friend to the Missionary cause, which is so closely identified in China with his name, and the ardent and generous supporter of all public institutions designed for the temporal or spiritual relief of his fellow creatures. His loss both as a private Christian and a public servant, will long continue to be deeply felt, and will not easily be made up.

POSTAGE OF LETTERS IN EUROPE.—We alluded a fortnight ago to the sarcastic remarks of the Editor of the Bombay Times on the Post Office administration of the City of Palaces, in consequence of the continued notification, that letters sent viâ Marseilles would be charged two shillings and eight pence, when the French Government nearly four months ago took off a shilling from the postage of each letter. We were in hopes that the hint would be taken and acted upon, more especially as the Hindoostan was about to be despatched with the packets, and it might be of considerable service to the public, to be made officially cognizant of the reduction. But the Steamer took her departure yesterday, without any notification of the kind from the Post office. It is said that the Post Master General is employed in constructing a new kind of vehicle to take the Governor General up the country; and we naturally conclude that the publication of the Notice is to be postponed till that conveyance is completed. It will be given, we hope, before the next Mail.

We suppose it is in consequence of the non-appearance of this notification that the proportion of letters sent by Falmouth continues to be as large as it was when the French postage was two and eight pence. In January there were 22,000 letters sent by Falmouth to 8700 sent by Marseilles; at the beginning of this month the numbers were still 22,000 through the former, and 7700 through the latter channel. It is scarcely credible that men should continue to send so large a share of their letters by the longer route of Falmouth, when they could send them by the more direct and rapid route of Marseilles, without subjecting their friends at home to more than an extra charge of eight pence, if the alteration was sufficiently known.

FREIGHT BY THE HINDOOSTAN AND HER SISTER VESSEL.—In our notice last week of the arrangement made by the Peninsular Company regarding the transmission of Parcels, from England by their vessels we fell into a grievous error, which as it may possibly mislead some of our readers, we hasten to correct. We said that the charge would be Two Rupees a Pound. For Rupees read Shillings; the charge is Two shillings or One Rupee a Pound.

SLAVERY IN CEYLON.—About six weeks ago we offered a few remarks on the state of Slavery in the Island of Ceylon, founded upon the information furnished by the Columbo Observer. We are happy in being able to publish a contradiction of the statement from the Ceylon Herald, the Opposition paper. It is thus that the sparks of truth are elicited by editorial friction.

We regret that the Editor of this latter journal should have indited his article under the supposition that the community in India are as intimately acquainted with the measures of the local Legislature as he is. We are obliged to confess our entire ignorance of the Ordinance of the 7th of October 1842, to which he alludes, and in this respect we do not stand single. It is only since the establishment of the Hindoostan Steamer on the route from Calcutta to Suez which embraces a call at Point de Galle, and since our citizens have begun to visit the Island, that its affairs have excited an interest among us. The article which we have quoted would have been all the more valuable if the Editor, compassionating our ignorance, had given us in a few words, the leading provisions of that Act, to which we are now left to grope our way in the dark. We gather, however, that it directed the Registration of every slave before the 31st of December 1842, and ordained that any slave not thus registered, should be free on the 1st of January 1843. It is stated by the Herald that at the period of passing the Act, there were 23,500 slaves, in the Maritime Provinces, not one of whom was registered according to the provisions of the ordinance, and that they were accordingly, ipso facto, emancipated at the close of the year, and that there is not at present a single slave in those Provinces from Dondra Head to Point Pedro.

We find some difficulty in reconciling the purport of the ordinance, as we have assumed it, with the assertions of the Editor regarding the state of slavery in other parts of the Island. He says that there were 1633 slaves registered in other parts of the Island, but that at the first triennial examination of the Records in December 1841, the numbers were reduced to 379. It would appear therefore that there were previous laws regarding registration, the neglect of which entailed the manumission of the slave. If the Editor will overlook the culpability of our ignorance, we would ask him for a few editorial remarks which shall present the progress and result of legislation in regard to slavery, in a clear point of view to our benighted minds. The subject is one in which we have a national interest. It is the glory of England to have taken the lead in redressing this, the most outrageous evil of this civilized age. We are naturally anxious that there should not be a single exception to the proud boast that wherever the flag of Britain waves, it waves over freemen. We are rejoiced to find that the number of slaves has been reduced from 25,000 to less than 400; and still more happy to think that the community of this rising colony and the local Government are alive to the importance of reducing the number from 400 to a cypher.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9.

— We record with deep regret the death, by cholera, of Major Debude of the Engineers, and Secretary to the Military Board, at the age of 44. He was well on Tuesday morning and buried on Thursday morning. In him the service has lost one of its most distinguished officers, and society one of its most amiable and esteemed members.

— The latest accounts from Simlah state, that the Hon. Mr. Clerk is quite out of danger and is doing well; but the severity of the remedies it was found necessary to use, have reduced him to a state of the greatest debility, and rendered his return to Europe more than ever necessary.

— We stated a week or two ago that the number of labourers sent to the Mauritius since our ports were opened to emigration, amounted to 20,000. As the statements given in the Star differed somewhat from our estimate, we were supposed to have overrated the number. The Cerneen of the 30th September, a Mauritius paper, however, fully bears out our figures. It states that since the raising of the prohibition, 19,684 men, women and children had arrived at the Mauritius. The number likely to be sent before the 1st of January next, when the restriction recently imposed comes into effect, will probably be more than 5000; and it is quite possible that with the increased activity which the new Act will give to private enterprise, in the six weeks that remain for its exercise the number may possibly rise to 10,000.

— The Star of this morning states, that at the last meeting of the Asiatic Society, the President the Hon. W. W. Bird said that "an application had been made to the Home Authorities for the services of a practical geologist and experienced miner for the sole purpose of exploring the reported mineral sites unworked in Bengal, and developing generally the mineral resources of Bengal." This affords another corroboration of the assertion we made some months ago, by way of correcting an erroneous notion of Mr. George Thompson, that almost every effort at improving the condition of India and developing its resources had originated with the local Government. The most eminent geologists in England have long been striving to prevail on the Court of Directors and the Board of Control to adopt the wise plan of the Emperor of Russia and submit India to a scientific geological survey. The advice appears to be unheeded. It is now sent from India, and will doubtless be attended to.

— We stated last week that a disturbance had been raised in the Shekawuttee territory, and that body of insurgents amounting to 5000 had seized upon a fort." We now learn that the insurrection is at an end. Major Forster marched upon the fort with a detachment of his brigade, and the insurgents fled, leaving six pieces of cannon behind them.

— The ashes of Rajah Shere Singh, of his son, and of Rajah Dhyan Singh which are on their way from Lahore to the sacred spot at Hurawar, have been received with honour by the Rajah of Puteeala, who went out six miles to meet the procession, and presented 250 gold mohurs.

— The Governor General has given 500 Rs. to the Sailor's Home.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10.

— We publish among our extracts a most distressing account of an attempt to take the ship Harriet Scott, by the convicts who [illegible] on her, from Penang to Bombay. The Captain was barbarously murdered, and several of the mutineers fell, some in the scuffle, while others were shot, we were going to say in cold blood by the chief mate, but he was in such a state [illegible] ment from the scene he had witnessed [illegible] wounds he had received, that it became [illegible] to put him in irons. This is the third C[illegible] who has been murdered by convicts [illegible] last four years in consequence of their [illegible] sent without any guard. Surely it is ti[illegible] vernment to look into the matter; if [illegible] done, the Insurance offices must do their duty, and refuse to underwrite any vessels sent with convicts without a guard.

— The Star states, that Mrs Leach, the actress, who was so severely injured by her clothes catching fire on Wednesday week last, lies dangerously ill, and that some doubts are entertained of her recovery.

— The Hurkaru hints that the men of the 2d European Regiment shewed some signs of mutiny on the day of their marching from Meerut. They refused to carry their knapsacks, and destroyed or left on the ground nearly the whole of them. The ringleader had been seized.

— A meeting of the Magistrates was held as usual yesterday. That municipal body, like other municipal bodies in England has raised a loan—a loan of Twenty thousand Rupees,—on their own responsibility. But they separated without doing any thing to lay the dust.

— A large additional subscription has been raised for the proposed Church at Darjeling, of 39 names, 37 are from Calcutta which speaks well for the attachment of the Ditchers to their Sanatarium, as it is very properly called. But, the resort to Darjeling will never be what it ought to be, until greater facilities are created for invalids to reach it. The road between Caragola ghat and the Sanatarium must be improved, that people may be enabled to embark in a Steamer, and land at the ghat, which is within a little more than a hundred miles of the place.

— The Englishman states that orders have been issued to countermand the progress of those who had been sent up the country to precede the Governor General; and that his Lordship has abandoned the idea of leaving the Presidency.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11.

— The Bombay Papers received yesterday, give a gloomy account of the state of the troops in Scinde. The Steamer Indus had brought intelligence from Kurachee to the 25th of October. The thermometer in tents had risen to 105° H. M. 28th had 230 men in hospital. On the 22d there were 40 admissions; on the 23d, 39.

— Huree Holkar, the descendant of chiefs renowned in Indian history, died at Indore on the 24th. He ascended the throne in 1834 after fourteen years' imprisonment. His affairs soon became inextricably involved; his expenditure exceeded his income by six or eight lakhs of Rupees. The year after his elevation, he married a woman of obscure birth and poor circumstances; a single child, the fruit of the union, has since died. The prince himself had long been sunk in sloth and disease, and was surrounded by low and debauched companions. This is a faithful picture of half the chiefs, who rule over the independent principalities in India. The greatest blessing their subjects could enjoy would be the annexation of the territories to the British dominions.

— The Officers belonging to the Indian Navy at Bombay have given a splendid entertainment to Commodore Parker, of the United States Frigate Brandywine, which has recently arrived in the harbour, and is waiting to convey the Honourable [illegible] ..rican Ambassador, to Pek[illegible]

— [illegible] ..gers proceeding by the At[illegible] ..ombay to Suez, in the pr[illegible] We hear the number al[illegible] Hindoostan amounts to si[illegible] ..obably the month when th[illegible] ..ay be expected to leave Indi[illegible] will arrive in England at the very worst [illegible] the year, in the depth of winter.

—The Hurkaru of this morning contains a letter from Mr. W. T. Law, corroborating by the [illegible] ..stantial details the treatment inflicted [illegible] Taylor by the syces on Cook and Co's. Establishment. There is every reason to [illegible] that his death was occasioned by their assault. They, and the grooms in the [illegible] of Hunter and Co., are the most ferocious and unruly body of men in Calcutta, and we hope such an example will be made of them, as shall effectually check their violence in future.

— The Penang papers last received, are very sanguine about the extensive production of Sugar in that Colony. A Mill, to be worked by a Steam Engine of fourteen horse power had been imported by one enterprizing firm. This, and another machine previously received, were expected to produce in the ensuing year, a sufficient quantity of sugar to draw attention to the capabilities of the Island. Some of its sugar had already been sent to England and was said to be equal to the best West India and Mauritius sugar. We have placed the article among our extracts.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 13.

— Capt. Scott, while conducting the Irawaddy Steamer from Calcutta to Dacca, through the Sunderbuns, fell in with the Nacoda and two men of the Arab Ship Soliman Shaw, on the 5th instant. They were exhausted and confused, but said there were 20 more men and four women somewhere about, and that the vessel had been wrecked in the Roymungul River. Capt. Scott immediately proceeded with the steamer in search of them and succeeded at length in falling in with them. They were sent on to Calcutta from Koolna, all but the Nacoda, who is gone with his two brothers, his wife and a servant to Dacca, where he says he has money to receive.

— Saturday night's Gazette gives furlough to Cols. Graham and Oliver, thus disproving the report that all furloughs were to be suspended in the prospect of approaching hostilities.

— It is now said that Lord Ellenborough positively goes up the country after the arrival of the October Mail.

— The Star states, that the Commander-in-Chief was expected at Agra on the 18th instant, and Mr. Thomason the day before, when it would be determined whether the army was to move towards Gwalior or not. The Army of Exercise is to assemble on the 24th.

— Mr. J. S. Stopford is to be Sheriff of Calcutta for the ensuing year, and Mr. Frith, Deputy.

— Some wag has been quizzing the Editor of the Hills, by sending him a letter from Abdool Ghias Khan, the cousin of Akhbar Khan, in which was enclosed a denial on the part of the good Samaritan, of his having ever flayed any man at any time. It is said that Sirdar Ameer Khan has been induced to make this affidavit in consequence of the charge preferred against him to that effect in Lady Sale's Book. The hoax, though clumsily contrived, deserves record. The affidavit runs thus: "I, Mahomed Akhbar, son of Ameer Dost Mahomed, do hereby declare most solemnly on the Koran, that I never flayed or ordered to be flayed any man at any time whatever, either Mahometan, Christian, Jew, or Pagan.

Sworn before me,
HAFIZ JEE, Head Moolla,
Son of SYAD AMEY,
MEER WAIZ.

— The following notice appears in this day's Hurkaru: "Two duffadars have just been convicted, and fined by the Magistrate, Mr. Blasquiere. In this case there were three duffadars charged with decoying away thirty-six individuals from Gyah, by the practice of the usual deceit upon them. These men recounted the story of having been brought down on false pretences, false imprisoned, and ill-treated. On the evidence produced, two of the three duffadars were convicted of the charge against them, and fined in the sum of fifty Rupees each."

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 14.

— Mr. George Thompson is coming down to Calcutta. He was to have left Delhi on the 7th instant.

— The narrative of the Jew Barenstein, who declared that he saw with his own eyes the execution of four Europeans at Bokhara, of whom two were Col. Stoddart and Captain Conolly, is declared by the Delhi Gazette to be an entire fabrication. A friend of the Editor, on hearing of it, made enquiries regarding its probability at Lahore, and learned that the man was an impostor.

— We stated yesterday that Capt. Scott, proceeding in the Irawaddy Steamer to Dacca, picked up the Nacoda, or Commander of the Soliman Shaw, and a number of the crew, at the mouth of the Roymungul, one of the rivers that run through the Soonderbuns into the sea. The Star of this morning has a long and interesting article,—too long however for our space—on the subject, in which he more than hints that this vessel of Six Hundred Tons could have had no business in such a locality, except for the purposes of contraband traffic, with the marts of Koolna and Dacca. He states that there is every reason to believe that such a contraband traffic is carried on. The matter will furnish an interesting subject of investigation. We may also add that nothing but the vigilance of the Protector of Coolies at the Mauritius prevents these vessels running up the unfrequented mouths of the Soonderbuns and transporting a rich cargo of kidnapped Coolies to the Mauritius, or to Bourbon.

— Capt. G. T. Green, of the Corps of Engineers, has been appointed Secretary to the Military Board in the room of the late Major De-Bude.

—The Hurkaru of this morning contains a statement of another brutal attack made on the two servants of a European Gentlemen by the native grooms of Cook and Co. the Stable keepers. They appear to be the most unruly set of ruffians within the town. On the present occasion the Police of the two neighbouring thannas did nothing but dispute whose business it was to go into the stables and rescue the men.

— The regular post from Calcutta of the 22d of October was in time for the Steamer which left Bombay on the 1st instant. The express which was despatched on the 21st, was of course in time.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 15.

— A Native correspondent wishes us to publish that a brahminy bull has goaded a man to death, near the village of Agraparah. He thinks "a wise and enlightened Government ought to provide for the suppression of these evils." It is not quite so easy to take these bulls by the horns as our correspondent thinks; but the "wise and enlightened" Baboos who let them loose to prey on society, might easily cure the evil, by dropping the custom. This would render the interference of Government unnecessary.

— The accounts from Sukkur extend to the 20th ultimo, and are very deplorable. Upwards of 600 patients were in each of the Native Infantry Hospitals. Of 164 European Artillery men, 35 had died since May, and the remainder are quite incapacitated from continued sickness.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the following sums for the Friend of India:—

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

ILL-TREATMENT OF THE LATE MR. TAYLOR.

To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.

DEAR SIR,—My attention was called to the death of Mr. Francis Henry Taylor, by a letter in this morning's Hurkaru, signed J. R. L., stating that a murderous assault had been committed on Mr. Taylor in one of the Livery Stables, in Calcutta, and that, subsequently, an Officer of Her Majesty's 10th, had also been assaulted in the same manner, and was now lying at death's door.

Of the latter case, I know little or nothing; of the former, I know the whole particulars, and give you them as I had them from Mr. Taylor, a few hours after the affair happened.

Mr. Taylor came into my Office about 12 o'clock, and told me, that the night before he had been out to a Champaigne Party, and went to Messrs. Cook and Co.'s, about 11 or 12 at night, to get a fresh horse to take him home.

The syce was a long while changing, and Mr. Taylor gave him one box on the ear, saying, "juldi, you b—te," on this the syce called out to the others, and, a few minutes afterwards, Syud Hussein's son came up to Mr. Taylor, and struck a blow at his neck with a dagger. Mr Taylor raised his arm to guard it off, and the dagger grazed across his arm, and then on the side of his neck. Thirty or forty syces then attacked him with latties, knocked him down, and kept beating him for some minutes,—they then put horse-dung and other dirt in his mouth and face, and, after some time, left off. Mr. Taylor, too, then rose up, and one of the syces recognized him, and called out "Taylor sahib," on which they all ran away, he being an old customer of Messrs. Cook and Co. Mr. Taylor, then went up to his friend, Captain Norris, who had accompanied him in the buggy, and found him almost insensible with two of his ribs broken. Mr. T. then scrambled up into Mr. Ross's room, and stated the case, asking, if this were proper treatment.

This is the fact of the case, as told me by Mr. Taylor, the day after it happened. Mr. Taylor showed me the marks of the dagger, and those of the latties; as also, to another gentleman in my Office, who can testify to the whole of the above. Mr. Taylor also stated, that he had passed blood all night, and felt very sore and ill from the treatment he had received.

Three days after this, the gentleman who was with me, when Mr. T. told me the particulars, called on him and found him ill in bed and quite insensible; some times calling him by one name, and then five minutes after, addressing him as another person,—he continued ill and was sent on the river to try a change of air, but it was of no avail, and he is now dead. It is my firm conviction, that the assault was the primary cause of his death; and, any one that knew him can judge what treatment he must have received, to have affected him as it did; for, he was, perhaps, one of the finest and strongest men in the country.

As people may ask, why the Magistrates were not informed of this before, I will tell them. Mr. Taylor would not tell a lie—he had a little too much Champaighe, and was afraid, that this circumstance might bring him into disgrace. He desired me not to let the authorities know anything of it, and I kept it quiet for fear of injuring him; but now he is beyond the power of mortals to do him harm, I think it right to speak out: and trust, something will be done to the villains who have MURDERED him, for it is homicide without a doubt.

I call upon his Assistant to corroborate my story. I call upon the Gentleman who heard it from his own lips; and I call upon the Barrister to whom he went to come forward and state what they know of the case.

I think it was to Mr. Leith, that he went. If I am wrong, that Gentleman can state so. If I am right let him say what he knows. In conclusion, I give you the names of the parties, I call on for their testimony as to the truth of the above—

Mr. Adam George, at Messrs. J. A. Currie and

Co. and Mr. Hare, Assistant to the late Mr. Taylor.

I am not quite sure of the last name, as I only saw him once; but, I think, you will find it right.

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

WM. TREVOR LAW.

COOK AND CO.'S EXPLANATION.

Messrs. Cook and Co. respectfully beg leave, in reply to an Editorial Leader in the Englishman, and to a Letter signed "J. R. L." in the Calcutta Star and Bengal Hurkaru of the 10th instant, and one signed "William Trevor Law" in the Bengal Hurkaru of the 11th instant, to state that they are equally, nay more, interested in the discovery, apprehension and conviction of the assailants of the late Conductor F. H. Taylor, whose death they deeply and unfeignedly lament, (but believe to have been produced by other causes than the assault charged on their Syces, and which unfortunate circumstance occurred in July last at a late hour at night, and of which they were informed the ensuing morning by Mr. Taylor, and not at night as stated by Mr. Law) than the Calcutta public themselves, for whose long continued support they feel most grateful and trust ever to deserve. In proof whereof they hereby announce their perfect readiness, with grateful thanks, to afford any aid in their power, and to pay themselves any rewards in money, which the Magistrates and Police authorities of Calcutta may be graciously pleased to prescribe to them, to promote the detection of the real culprit. In respect, however, to the Officer of H. M.'s 10th Foot, likewise referred to by "J. R. L.," Cook and Co. beg most solemnly to disclaim all knowledge of the same, and positively to the best of their knowledge and belief, to aver that none such were ever assaulted within their premises, or by their servants; if such therefore did ever actually occur, which they do not presume to question, it must have been by other persons and elsewhere.—Cal. Star, Nov. 13.

GENERAL ELPHINSTONE'S OPINION OF COL. SHELTON.

Memorandum found among the effects of the late Major-General Elphinstone, C. B., in his own hand-writing.

Excuse of the falling off in the spirit of the troops.

Ditto ditto in discipline.

Dilatoriness in carrying orders into effect.

Neglect of ditto.

Contumacy.

Want of support and assistance.

Cause of our failure against Mahomed Shereef's fort.

Ditto ditto Bemaroo on the 22d November.

Ditto Ditto ditto on the 23d.

Ditto partial failure on the 13th November when the enemy's guns were captured.

Ditto of the troops not being in readiness at the time appointed on different occasions.

I was unlucky in the state of my health, as during the whole siege I was not able to move without difficulty except on horseback, and then not easily. On the evening of the 2nd (November) going round the guards I had a very severe fall, the horse falling on me I was obliged to return home therefore, I then asked Captains Paton and Grant if they thought all had been done and told them to see that Brigadier Anquetil made the arrangements in the mission compound, and it was a great loss to me that shortly after his coming into Cantonments he was taken ill, by which I was deprived of his assistance which he would have so cordially afforded me.

The extent of the cantonment, the unfinished state of every thing in it, its indefensible position, commanded as it was on every side, particularly the facilities afforded the approach of matchlocks, added much to our difficulties. The troops were on half rations, and the whole of them on duty every night and often all day from threatened attacks. The want of Artillery Officers, notwithstanding Captain (Lieutenant) Eyre's volunteering Captain Waller being wounded early in the business. On the 9th (November,) not finding myself equal to the duties, particularly at night when I could not get about on horseback, I recalled Brigadier Shelton from the Bala Hissar but I regret to be obliged to declare that I did not derive from him that cordial co-operation and advice I had a right to expect, on the contrary, his manner was most contumacious; from the day of his arrival, he never gave me information or advice, but invariably found fault with all that was done and canvassed and condemned all orders before Officers, frequently preventing and delaying carrying them into effect; this and many other instances of want of assistance I can corroborate by the evidence of several Officers still living. Had I been so fortunate as to have had Sir R. Sale, than whom from my short acquaintance I never met any Officer more disposed to do every thing for the public service, (here occurs a hiatus.) I wish I could say the same for Brigadier Shelton; he appeared to be actuated by an ill-feeling towards me; I did every thing in my power to remain on terms with him, I was unlucky also in not understanding the state of things, being wholly dependent on the Envoy and others for information.

The above valuable document appears in a very interesting letter from Lieut. Eyre published in the Delhi Gazette, in vindication of his book. We have not room for the extract; but the memorandum, which gives General Elphinstone's view of Col. Shelton's conduct will be found to possess a melancholy interest.—Editor.

SUGAR CULTIVATION.

We are happy to observe that our Sugar Manufactories are still progressing notwithstanding the capriciousness of the Indian Government to check the concern by withholding from us the benefit of the Sugar Act.—Mr. Donnadieu of Jawee Estate, we understand has recently received a Mill to be worked by Steam of 14 Horse power, which is expected to be put up and ready in a month.—This with that belonging to Messrs. Bacon and Co. we believe will come into operation about the same time, both of which are capable, with the addition of the various minor Mills already at work to produce for the ensuing year a supply sufficiently extensive to excite an interest in our Island as a sugar producing Colony, when nothing will be wanting but the Sugar boon to raise the Island to prosperity and importance; but however disheartening matters may appear at present, we yet, under these misgivings, hope in the end to have our petition granted, by reason that we cannot perceive any tangible grounds, the Government have for refusing to comply with a request so essentially necessary as it is for the welfare of the country, and so much in opposition to its own interest, forming as it will be one of the staple articles of produce from which a considerable revenue would accrue to the State and much derivable advantage to commerce and the country generally.

The Sugar manufactured at Province Wellesley of which a considerable shipment was made in the Camieu for England was tested by competent and experienced persons and found to be of superior quality and equal to any West India or Mauritius Sugars.—The soil from its great fertility, is well adapted particularly, for this species of cultivation, and from the facilities the country affords for communication, intersected as it is by rivers, these localities present advantages which it would be in vain to look for in any other portion of the Straits, and which we are confident would be readily availed of by other adventurers, if the restrictions were removed.—There is also another impediment which retards the progress of agricultural pursuits, that is, the disadvantageous terms upon which lands are granted for cultivation.—The recent Government Notification regarding "Landed Tenures," granting lands in perpetuity, which was hailed with pleasure, but not officially announced at Penang, we were in hopes would have come into operation and remedied the evil, but as we have not learnt that the local authorities have acted upon it, or any sales of lands being offered upon such terms, we believe the Document has been since withdrawn. This subject has however been so ably handled by Halbert Restalrig in his report upon the agricultural Policy of Government, which has attracted so much Public attention, that we can have but little to say in addition. To Colonel Butterworth's active business, habits and conscientious disposition, we therefore look forward with much sanguineness for the amelioration of our agricultural condition, which under the present state of things so heavily depresses the agricultural prosperity of the country.—Penang Gazette, Oct. 14.

MURDER OF THE CAPTAIN OF THE HARRIET SCOTT BY CONVICTS.

"It is our most painful duty to report a very daring and outrageous attempt which was made on Monday morning last to take the Ship Harriet Scott, at sea, by a party of fourteen Malay convicts that had been embarked and sailed on board of that vessel from this port on the preceding Friday, under sentence of transportation to Bombay; in which attempt the commander, Captain Beynon, was most cruelly murdered, and the Chief mate, Mr. McFee, and three of the crew were severely wounded. It appears that between 4 and 5 o'clock on Monday morning after the watch had been relieved, a squall took the Ship, and while the crew were engaged shortening sail, the fourteen convicts made a rush out of the long boat (in which they were lodged and accommodated) towards the quarter deck, armed with capstern bars, pump break, crow-bars, pump spears, &c. upon which the Captain immediately got into the cabin and procur[illegible], with which he attacked them, and [illegible] joined by the Chief mate, they were kept [illegible] for a short while until their [illegible] when the Captain received a [illegible] on the [illegible] which felled him while anot[illegible]ocked [illegible] the Chief mate, who howeve[illegible] into the cabin and barricaded the door, by which means the convicts were fired upon through the sky light and other available parts of the cabin. One was shot dead, and three mortally [illegible] and the remainder finding it impossibl[illegible] nue in the ship, although they had pos[illegible] her nearly five hours, got into and low[illegible] Quarter boat, and escaped.—After they [illegible] ted the vessel, the Captain was discove[illegible] on the deck almost lifeless with extensive [illegible] veral wounds on his head, and his body [illegible] ly mutilated. He was removed into [illegible] and every other attention paid to him [illegible] died about half an hour afterwards and his body subsequently preserved in a cask to be interred here, for which purpose, and the weakly and reduced state of the crew several of whom besides the Chief mate were wounded and required medical treatment, the ship was put about and returned to this port.

Nothing was subsequently seen of the Quarter boat with the convicts in her but it appears that they were picked up on Tuesday afternoon by the Grab Brig Harsingar bound to Calcutta in sight of this Island, when they were recognized, and brought back as prisoners into port.—Had it not been for a very intelligent Native, named Hyder Ally who reads and writes English and who was a passenger on board of the Harsingar, it is very probable that the tale which the Convicts gave out of their having been shipwrecked would have been credited, and they carried on to Calcutta, but the names of the Ship and Captain being painted on the stern sheets of the boat, immediately discovered to Hyder Ally who they really were, and it was at his recommendation that the Nacoda secured the villains and conveyed them hither.

There have been so many instances on record of these awful outbreaks on board of Ships by Convicts who are sent without any precautionary measure of being accompanied by a guard, that it is high time now, the authorities should adopt some better system in the future management of transporting them in order to secure the safety of the Ship in which they are embarked. In this melancholy affair, the bold conduct of Mr. McFee the Chief Officer has been most conspicuous and should not be passed unnoticed, who with the unfortunate Captain Beynon seemed the only two that resolutely encountered the Convicts, and it was the stand and defence they made by killing and wounding several of the ruffians which reduced and disabled their number, that the Ship was saved from being absolutely carried. The war yells with which they started in the work of murder and destruction showed evidently that they were pirates in their proper element who were accustomed to deeds of daring and barbarity.

"The notice which our last number contained regarding the murder of Captain Beynon of the Ship Harriet Scott by a portion of the convicts consisting of Malays who were proceeding in her to Bombay under sentence of transportation, was written entirely from recollection of the circumstances as given in evidence on the Coroner's Inquest held on board, upon which we were empanelled as one of the jury, without our having had an opportunity after its proceedings were closed very late the same evening of perusing the depositions to enable us to submit a more detailed statement. It now appears that the mutiny broke out and the murder of Captain Beynon which followed took place precisely as we have already described but after it had subsided by the convicts quitting the ship, one of their number was found killed on deck, and three others wounded, supposed mortally, upon which they were immediately shot by some person or persons belonging to the Ship "to put them out of their misery;" while a Bengally convict who seems to have taken no part whatever in the mutiny, and was discovered in the long-boat with a Chinese fellow convict, both perfectly quiet with their fetters on their legs, was ordered out of her and shot by Mr. McFee, the chief mate!—According to the evidence of the second Mate and Mr. Cort, a passenger, Mr. McFee was at that time labouring under a state of the greatest excitement, owing no doubt to the painful effects of his severe wounds, great loss of blood, the circumstances of the [illegible] gedy, the murder of his Capt [illegible]. Such indeed was the frenzy [illegible] have overpowered Mr. McFee [illegible] consultation between the [illegible] and some of the crew, it was [illegible] forthwith to put him in irons [illegible] mischief! but towards the evening [illegible] by the Carpenter, and did [illegible] perfectly recover his senses until [illegible]. Mr. McFee was on Mon[illegible] before the Magistrate to answ[illegible] exhibited against him, and after a long and patient examination was, we understand, committed to take his trial at the next Sessions. We forbear offering any remarks upon the unfortunate and melancholy fate of the Ben[illegible]ly convict, and leave our readers to form their opinions on the subject."—Penang Gazette [illegible] and 30th Sept.

SLAVERY IN CEYLON.

[illegible] considerable time ago an article on this subject appeared in the Observer, which various circumstances prevented our noticing at the time.

Our attention was again drawn to it by the Madras Editors, not merely copying the article, but adding commentaries of their own, in which the Editor of the Record shewed so much knowledge of the Island, that he says "in the maritime provinces of Ceylon, or as they are usually called the Kandian provinces! Slavery of the very worst description exists even at the present day."

A third time it now haunts us in the shape of a commentary, threatened by the talented Editor of the Friend of India. Trusting that his geographical knowledge is more accurate than the above quotation, it is important that we supply him with facts, on which he may rely, otherwise he may commit himself, and take some trouble in vain. Now it would be easy to prove that if we can do little, the cause of speedy emancipation in this Island will be materially advanced, if we say less.

It is easy to make people at home believe any thing—they will believe that "Slavery in its worst form" does exist in Ceylon, and that it is something more than a name. This is sure to result from ignorance of the facts, on the part of the Editor of the Observer, combined with not less ignorant, but more excusable commentaries of strangers. The whole affair reminds us of the story current here the other day, of the total loss of the Sunderer. A soldier's wife dreamt that a friend of her's was lost, who went home in that ship, and what with commentaries and inquiries from anxious friends, in the course of a few hours the ship, the cargo, the passengers and the crew were drowned with one exception, who was merely left to tell the tale.

In like manner the Observer gives us his dreams about Slavery in Ceylon, which are read or passed without remark here, but a laugh arises on the coast, and what the Observer says is believed, viz., that "the ancient Kandian Laws are still in force, Kandian Provinces, who may be seized by their not only on the Natives, but on Europeans in the Kandian creditors, and made slaves or tortured with hot irons!"

By the time such a rumour reaches England it will not unlikely be said, and be believed, that we nourish Coffee plants with cooley carcases, which is the reason of bandy loads of cooley skulls being found on the high road.

Such relations ad absurda, ought to have opened the eyes of sensible men to the likelihood of something being wrong, somewhere in the argument, and to prove this we submit our commentary on the article in the Observer, which will consist of facts, rather than arguments.

Very nearly twelve months ago the Editor of the Observer told us, that slavery in Ceylon was merely a shadow, and from his evident dexterity in fighting with shadows, it might be supposed that the excitement produced, had disturbed his ratiocinating faculties. If this is not the case, we seriously assure him that nothing has occurred since last year, more calculated to make slavery substantial, and to protract its duration, than the article on the subject published by him. The sure way to keep up the flickering existence of Slavery is to administer strong stimulant doses, and make all the fuss imaginable on the subject. We shall prove this, and in case our commentary is not thought better authority than the original text, we wish some member of the Legislative Council would call for printed returns on the subject, to be laid on the Council table, shewing the exact state of Slavery in the Colony, since the passing of the Ordinance No. 7, of 1842. Our contemporary does not once allude to this Ordinance, thereby leaving people in ignorance that any thing was done since 1837 on the subject.

The Editor of the Observer said on the 24th August.

"We lately pointed out, and we trust satisfactorily, how little the local Government had done towards the abolition of Slavery within the Maritime Provinces of this Island; we will now shew, in a very few words, not only that it has done nothing towards effecting that object within the Kandian Provinces, but that laws revolting to humanity are still allowed to remain there in force.

Although the Kandian Provinces came into our possession in 1815 yet no legislative enactment in respect to Slavery was made till 1837 (nearly a quarter of a century) when an Ordinance (No. 7, of 1837) was passed, requiring all persons in charge of Slaves to enregister them; but the ancient Kandian laws regarding slaves were left untouched."

We shall be very brief in answering this, we "trust satisfactorily," for we challenge our contemporary to produce A SINGLE INSTANCE OF SLAVERY IN THE MARITIME PROVINCES with the exception of himself, or some other slave of a delusion. We affirm that the little that has been done by the local government, has effectually and for ever, extinguished Slavery in the Maritime Provinces, from Dondra Head to Point Pedro.

In the whole Island there were about 25,000 slaves, but it was chiefly in the Northern Province that slavery prevailed. In that Province there were about 23,500 in 1842, every one of whom, by the little that has been done, is now in a state of perfect freedom, from the most remarkable fact that not ONE SLAVE was registered, in terms of the Ordinance in any one district, of the North, and slavery ceased there in consequence, on the 31st December 1842.

We announced this fact as far back as the month of January last, and as we have no relish for the shadowy strife, we proceed at once to shew that the local government has not only done something towards the extinction of Slavery in the KANDIAN PROVINCES, but also that "Laws revolting to humanity" are not in force there.

We have already seen the remarkable success of the Registration system in the Northern Province, as well as in the Southern portion of the Island. Let us see how it has operated in the Kandian dominions. From inquiries we have made, there were 343 slaves registered in the town of Kandy, while at the first triennial examination of the Records in December 1841, there were only 176, or say just one-half.

In the rest of the Kandian Provinces, viz. the different Korles, Matelle, and Badulla there were 936, or if we include Saffragam in the South, there were 1,237, but at the first triennial examination of the Records, the numbers were reduced by 1034, leaving only 203!

Instead of between 25 and 26,000 slaves, there are only 379, in the whole Island by the simple operation of the "little" that has been done, and we look for the great rejoicings of the Observer, merely as an agreeable change in the monotony of his notes and observations. Let it be recollected that this has been accomplished without costing the country or the Colony one farthing, without inflicting injustice, without causing even a murmur of complaint.

We appeal to our contemporary's professional experience to say, whether Natural or Artificial remedies for disease are the best—we appeal to his common sense to say, whether it is not better to wait quietly a little longer, and see whether slavery will not die a natural death, unless he prefers trying to impress the natives with the idea of getting Parliamentary compensation, some five years after this, in which case he ought to rouse their attention to the subject.

The next examination of the Records must show a considerable diminution, for strange as it will appear to those who give credence to the assertions of our contemporary, the natives do not seem to consider slaves worth the value of the one SHILLING stamp required to prove the Registration. A reason for this will be expected—we can only assign one, which leads us to the last point proposed in discussing the question, viz., that Laws revolting to humanity are not in force in the Kandian Provinces.

The only slave case we have heard of for a very long time, was in May last, and Mr. Staples the District Judge in Kandy declared "that there was no Law which empowered the Court to inflict any punishment," on a slave. So that slave property is of NO VALUE.

Such being the decision of as able a Judge as we have on the District Bench—such being the fact in the minor proposition, the right of Slave owners to punish their Slaves—can any absurdity be greater than the major proposition; that Europeans are exposed to Slavery and to torture by hot irons?

Finally, when we see the effect of Registration, when we see that Slave owners far from having the power of subjecting Europeans to the horrors depicted by the Editor of the OBSERVER and echoed by the Indian Press, have not even the power of punishing their Slaves as Slaves, we trust we shall not be supposed to advocate the continuance of Slavery, (altho' we are occasionally accused of all sorts of absurdities) if we say, that those who want an instantaneous extinction of the little speck upon the reputation of this Colony—those who want this bar sinister removed from the escutcheon, should come forward and subscribe for it, and we warrant it that a much smaller sum will suffice, than that spoken of by the Editor of the RECORD who thinks that Parliament would not grudge the small sum of one million! for such a purpose. We agree with him in thinking that it would not grudge it, WERE IT NECESSARY.—Ceylon Herald.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

DEATH OF THE HON. J. R. MORRISON.

[Communicated by a friend at Hong Kong.]

In the opening of this new settlement, which every distant eye seems to look upon as a sure and permanent location for family residence and mercantile pursuit, and to which all Western speculators are flocking as the open port to a New World of riches and wealth,—the Providence of God presses upon us the lessons of our frailty and of the uncertain tenure of all earthly possessions. "This is not your rest." Such we regard to be the prominent feature of instruction in the solemn scenes, that have this season so frequently passed before the eyes of our community.

By the death of the Honourable JOHN ROBERT MORRISON, Esq., the Foreign Community in China have been called to suffer intense grief and a mournful gloom has been cast abroad, on the face of our society.

When we look at the present crisis of our improved intercourse with China and see that in Mr. Morrison, we have lost one, compared with whom none was so well acquainted with the policy of the Chinese Government,—so familiar with the peculiar forms, etiquette, and intricacies of diplomatic correspondence with the Imperial cabinet,—so thoroughly and so accurately versed in the Geography, manners, and language (especially that used in official correspondence) of the country,—so sound in his views of and suggestions for the prudent management of this people,—so high in the esteem and confidence of the two Governments, now standing upon an equal footing, the Chinese and the British—we cannot for a moment question the justice of the view which H. M. Plenipotentiary has taken of the event, when he says "In a public point of view, Sir Henry Pottinger considers the death of Mr. Morrison to be an irreparable national calamity, and he doubts not but as such it will be received and viewed by his sovereign and country."

While we deplore his loss as a national calamity, we feel it the more deeply as affecting our community. Among us he was our oracle. We felt the worth of his counsel, the weight of his opinion, the goodness of his heart, and all appealed to him for advice and aid. The Benevolent Institutions that have risen up among us and of which he was the mainspring will feel the stroke to be specially severe; and none will suffer so much by his death as "the Morrison Education Society," unless his friends will rally round that promising Institution and, by their hearty and full support of it, make it the monument of their esteem for his merits and so raise the Institution to be a lasting memorial both of the Father and of his son.

Our country has lost an active servant,—one of her best. Our community has lost a member,—one of her most useful. And every man who knew him has lost a friend, respected, esteemed, beloved—one on whose charity he could lean, on whose judgment he could rely, on whose good services he could depend, on whose religious principles he could calculate, in whose acquaintance he had pleasure, in whose friendship he had profit. And every man has mourned for him apart.

It was on Sunday, the 20th of August when, on returning from divine service, he was seized with a severe chill. This was followed by a burning fever which with frequent intermissions hung about him for the following three days, until the 24th when a very sharp attack of it demanded the most prompt and decisive treatment and called for an immediate change of situation.

He was, accordingly, on the afternoon of that day, removed from the house of the Morrison Education Society on Morrison Hill, where he had been lying from the first hour of his sickness, and carried on Board the Steamer "Proserpine," which was under orders to proceed instantly to Macao. Attended by Dr. Woosnam, Secretary to H. M.'s Plenipotentiary, and by Rev. S. R. Brown, Head of the Institution on Morrison Hill, our departed friend landed at Macao on the morning of the 25th and entered the residence of his bosom friend Dr. Anderson,—where he enjoyed not only his Medical advice, but all the tenderness of a brother.

But the fever increased in aggravated form upon him, and, on the afternoon of the 28th, symptoms were of such a character as to preclude all hope of recovery. During the last night of his illness, he seemed to be aware of his approaching end and, with a calmness that indicated he knew in whom he had believed, committed his spirit into the hands of the Son of God; and, on the morning of the 29th—the Anniversary of the Signing the Treaty of Peace at Nanking—having with his own hands adjusted his pillows around him and raised himself upon his couch, he fell asleep and gently breathed out the breath of life.

That his friends at Hong Kong might have the opportunity of attending his remains to the grave, the interment was deferred to the evening of the 30th and H. M's. Plenipotentiary, at that time on a visit to Macao, dispatched the Steamer "Proserpine" to Hong Kong to bear the melancholy tidings and to convey across to Macao any who should feel at liberty to leave their post for a day to mourn over the grave* of their departed and valued friend.

On the evening of the 30th a large assembly of foreigners met at the Protestant burial ground and we recognized mingling with them several Chinese the dependants of the deceased.

The order of the procession was as follows:

Chaplain.

Rev. E. C. Bridgman, D. D.

Chief mourners.

M. C. Morrison, Esq. Sir Hy. Pottinger, Bart.

Hon'ble J. A. Johnston, Esq. Capt. G. Balfour, Madras Artillery.

The Rev. Dr. Bridgman having performed the Services, the Sexton and his men began to fill up the grave. But no one seemed to think of moving. Every one was rivetted to the spot, and a long silence reigned, during which no sound was heard but that of the grave digger's spade and of the falling clods of earth mingled with the sobs and sighs of a mourning multitude,—a silence the depth of which, we doubt not, impressed every unconcerned spectator, if any such was present, with the full conviction—"Behold, how they loved him!"

* It lies side by side with the tombs of his honoured Father and his beloved Mother, the first Mrs. Morrison.

AMERICAN TREATMENT OF COLOURED PREACHERS.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

MY DEAR SIR,—In your issue of the 28th of September, there is an account of a coloured preacher who made a visit from America to Surrey Chapel at which time he made the following remarks: "In America, if I were disposed to do so, I could go either to the Roman Catholic, or Socinian places of worship and be kindly received; but I could not go either to the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregational or Baptist Churches, without being reminded that I was the coloured man, and therefore not permitted to enjoy the privilege of worshipping God with them as I have done with you."

It is further added that the "esteemed Pastor of Surrey Chapel, anxious to show his American Brethren, "a more excellent way" invited Mr. D. to his pulpit, and on the morning of the 2d Sabbath in June, we preached an admirable sermon to a large and attentive audience."

Allow me to send you, in answer to the declaration of the coloured Preacher, a short account of a Farewell Missionary Meeting, and by noticing the date, we may also learn who was first to show "a more excellent way."

Farewell Missionary Prayer-Meeting.

"A Meeting for prayer will be held this evening (April 11th, 1843) at half past seven o'clock in the Canal-street Church, Rev. Dr. Dickinson's, in reference to the departure in a few days of the Rev. Messrs. Wilson and Priest, as Missionaries to Africa, under the care of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions."

I was pleased with the terms of this notice, and I trust I feel it a privilege to pray for Missionaries. I therefore concluded to be present at the Meeting and yet as I understood that it was announced only in the few Churches of our body in this city, and especially as most of those thus modestly invited would be aware that the service was to be held for coloured Missionaries, I must confess to many misgivings on my way down to Church about the attendance. Judge then of my surprise and satisfaction at seeing the large Church well filled; while the appearance of the congregation showed that they came together not from curiosity but for prayer.

In the pulpit, I observed with pleasure the Rev. Dr. Phillips, the Secretary of our Foreign Board, the Hon. W. Lowrie, and afterwards the Rev. Dr. Krebs. The Pastor of the Church, I understood was out of town, and the services were conducted by the Reverend gentleman first mentioned. We had the reading of the Scriptures, singing, addresses from the Secretary, and the Missionaries, and prayers which were appropriate and solemn, and the whole service was one which will not soon be forgotten by those who were present. I wish your readers could have heard the addresses, particularly of Messrs. Wilson and Priest. The Dr. first gave us some good remarks on the two-fold aspect of Missions in West Africa, as they related to the natives, and the Colonists—the former extremely ignorant, and destitute of the Gospel, the latter in circumstances substantially those at some of our domestic missionary fields, after mentioning that Rev. Mr. Priest would proceed to the station at Lettrakrov and Rev. Mr. Wilson to the neighbouring Colony of Srioce, he concluded with a strong appeal on behalf of Africa. Its millions are included in the Saviour's great commission, "Go ye into all the world," &c. We must practically restrict the limits of that commission. We cannot be indifferent to the wretchedness of this people, &c. I make no attempt to "report" these impressive remarks.

Rev. Mr. Priest followed, referring to his former visit to the African coast to the degraded condition of the natives, their worship of Greegrees things which he had himself seen, and concerning which he mentioned some interesting facts. He then expressed his thankfulness that he was connected with a Missionary Church (Presbyterian) and his confidence, that though the pecuniary pressure is severely felt, yet the cause of missions would not be suffered to languish by the people of God, and concluded with requesting an interest in the prayers of Christians. Rev. Mr. Priest is quite an agreeable speaker, having a good voice and a dignified and pleasing manner. The whole matter and manner of his address would certainly have done credit to many a white preacher of the Gospel.

Rev. Mr. Wilson then made a short speech, commencing with a very brief but handsome acknowledgment of the kindness he had received from the Churches, and then taking as his subject the claims of Africa on the American Church. He mentioned first the Scripture promises made to Africa, which he applied with much point, as showing that God had foreseen all the discouragements which would attend the efforts of his Church at for the salvation of that people, and had made special provision to counteract the despondency which would be felt. Second, that Africa has a claim for indemnity. She has been robbed of her children, "and though we, perhaps I should say ye, have not been yourselves engaged in carrying her sons into cruel slavery in distant lands," yet our country in former days was more or less involved in that dreadful robbery. He illustrated the obligation of indemnity by a brief, but pertinent reference to the claims of our Government on France a few years ago, and especially by the enactments of the Jewish law, that four-fold should be restored. "Now we do not ask," said he, "that you should send back four times as many to Africa as were taken away, but we entreat that at any rate some may be sent," &c. Rev. Mr. Wilson's manner of speaking is animated, and accompanied with frequent though not always graceful gestures; his remarks evinced a vigorous intellect, and the impression made by them was decidedly good. I was certainly much pleased with this Missionary Meeting. Its various services, of which I have given a very imperfect outline, were interesting, and impressive. And the general character, and object of the Meeting could not fail to awaken devout emotions in every serious mind. Those brethren are of a different complexion from ourselves, but they belong to Christ's family, they are worthy and attached members of our Presbyterian fold, and they have had grace given them to go forth in the Master's name, and in his cause to occupy posts of danger and hardship. May the blessing of God abide with them, and their families, and rest upon all their labours. We shall not probably see them again in the flesh, but we shall hope to meet them in a better world. It seemed like a foreshowing of the worship of the upper sanctuary, where the distinctions which are of the earth, earthy, shall no more exist, to see these coloured servants of Christ, who are just entering on their ministerial course, and the honoured men, who are among the leaders of our Israel, sitting together in the same pulpit, engaged in the same religious duties, with one heart, and one mind, worshipping God, and desiring to promote the glory of their common Redeemer.

So shall it be in heaven. So may it be everywhere on the earth.

A SPECTATOR.

Rev. Mr. Wilson is a member of one of the Presbyteries of New Gersey. Rev. Mr. Priest a member of one of the Presbyteries of Kentucky, America.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE LADY OF THE LAKE.—In June last some enterprising gentlemen in Glasgow had conveyed o Loch Katrine a small steam-boat, for the accommodation of tourists visiting that romantic quarter. Hitherto the only means by which visitors could be conveyed along the lake were by open boats. Additional hands were put upon the sailing boats, to maintain a speed equal, if possible, to that of the steamer. The fares of these Boats were also reduced to one half of those previously charged. Last week, the steamer was moored at the east end of the lake, where it was always placed for the night; but on the return of the crew early next morning it could nowhere be found

The sail and some other articles belonging to the vessel were found to have drifted on the shore near the island; and there can be little doubt that it must have been scuttled and sunk at this part of the lake, which is understood to be very deep. Information of this circumstance having been communicated to the authorities of Dunblane, we understand the sheriff-substitute and procurator fiscal proceeded to the spot, and that they are pursuing an investigation, which we hope may lead to the discovery of the perpetrators of an act which, however characteristic of the doings of a former age, must be viewed as a disgrace to the present.—Glasgow Paper.

WHAT A WILLING GOVERNMENT COULD DO TO ABOLISH DUELLING.—Few opportunities are given to monarchs, in these unchivalrous days, to gain immortal renown. Such an enviable opportunity is, however, happily afforded to Queen Victoria and her amiable husband. Let them determine to rescue the country, if not the age, from a practice which is like an outrage upon religion and a violation of the first principles of humanity. Such an act would be as consistent with the character as becoming to the sex of our gracious Sovereign; and we have no doubt that if the resolution were taken, and uniformly acted upon, it would be successful. Perhaps duelling cannot be entirely suppressed except by the establishment of tribunals, composed of men of high station and unimpeachable honour, for arbitrating those grievances which, though beyond the reach of courts of law and equity, should not be left unsettled, nor be determined only by the parties involved. To such tribunals, however, we will not now farther allude: our present suggestions are of a more directly practical nature, and depend for being carried into full effect only upon the pleasure of the Queen and her responsible advisers.

Let a Proclamation be issued, and its provisions be strictly and invariably executed, to the following purposes, and duelling will soon become as vulgar, unpopular, and unfashionable, as it is unchristianlike, inhuman, and illegal.

I. Any person holding a commission or office, or being employed in any department in Her Majesty's service, civil, naval, or military, of any kind or degree whatsoever, who may act as principal or second in any duel, should be dismissed from his office or employment, and be incapable of being reinstated, or of holding any other employment under the Crown, or in the public service.

II. All other persons advising, abetting, or in any manner countenancing a duel, should be suspended from their office for the space of five years.

III. All persons, of whatsoever rank or degree, who may be concerned in a duel, whether as principals or seconds, or as aiders or abettors of such a proceeding, should be forbidden from again appearing at Court, or elsewhere in Her Majesty's presence.

IV. Notifications of each dismissal, suspension, and prohibition from appearing at Court should be repeatedly published in the London Gazette; and a general list of the dismissed, suspended and proscribed persons, should be published twice every year in the said Gazette.

"If it be said that such measures would be too severe, let it be remembered that a fatal duel is in law a murder, and that a murderer and the abettors of murder, ought not to be intrusted with public duties; that those who have shown themselves to have no control over their own passions or temper, nor sufficient greatness of character to bear unreserved obloquy without taking the law into their own hands, are unworthy of public confidence, and are therefore unfit for employment in the public service: that men whose hands are stained with the blood, or who, from a spirit of revenge, have sought the life of a fellow-creature, are unfit to appear in the presence of their Sovereign; and that it is proper to denounce such men in the most public manner, not only as a punishment, but that they may be avoided by the peaceable and well-conducted part of the community.—Spectator.

GEOGRAPHICAL DISCOVERY.—Some time since a very important memoir was forwarded by Captain Harris, then on a mission to Shwa, in Abyssinia, to the Bombay Government, relating to a magnificent river, said to disembogue itself about two degrees north of the line, on the east coast of Africa. Lately an intelligent young officer of the Indian navy (Mr. Christopher) was despatched by Captain Haines, from Aden, for the purpose of surveying that part of the coast. He has discovered a river to the northward of the river Jub, which he entered and traced 130 miles from its mouth; as he advanced he found it increased in width and depth, which, from the report of the natives, whom he found civil and obliging, it continued to do so for 400 miles higher up. The breadth was from 200 to 300 feet, and the depth about sixty feet; a clear, meandering stream, with the banks in a high state of cultivation, and grain of all kinds plentiful and very cheap. It was named by Mr. Christopher the Haines River, after the able Superintendent of Aden.—Colonial Gazette.

MR. O'CONNELL AND HIS FOREIGN ALLIES.—The cause of Repeal maintains its ground, if it does not gain strength in Ireland; but foreign subsidies come in very slowly and it does not appear likely to reap much benefit from either Gallican or Yankee sympathizers. The whole amount contributed by France is about 100*l.*, while, in aid of French Propagandism, the Irish subscribed, in 1841, 8,000*l.* The exchange is terribly against the Repealers. At the last weekly meeting but one of the Repeal Association, Mr. O'Connell handed in 270*l.* from Newfoundland, and 20*l.* from Massachusetts! Magnificent contribution! Brother Jonathan is too sharp to part with his money for nothing; but this is not the sole reason of his niggard offering on this occasion. The great Agitator, to his honour be it spoken, has repudiated with scorn the proffered sympathy and support of the American slave-holders. The celebrated speech of Mr. O'Connell, delivered to the Loyal Repeal Association in Dublin, May 11th, has, says the Anti-Slavery Reporter, "fallen like a thunder-bolt among the slaveholders of the United States; and its effect has been to break up the Associations formed among them in aid of the objects aimed at by the honourable gentleman at home." The passages which appear to have given the greatest annoyance are the following:—

"I am afraid," said Mr. O'Connell, "they" (the American slaveholders) "will never give up slavery, until some horrible calamity befalls their country; and here I warn them against the event, for it is utterly impossible that slavery can continue much longer. But, good Heaven! can Irishmen be found to justify, or rather to palliate—for no one could dare attempt to justify—a system which shuts out the book of human knowledge, and seeks to reduce to the condition of a slave, 2,500,000 human beings—which closes against them not only the light of human science, but the rays of Divine revelation, and the doctrines which the Son of God came upon earth to plant! The man who will do so, belongs not to my kind. Over the board Atlantic I pour forth my voice, saying, 'Come out of such a land, you Irishmen; or, if you remain, and dare countenance the system of slavery that is supported there, we will recognise you as Irishmen no longer! (Hear, hear, and cheers.)

"No! America, the black spot of slavery rests on your star-spangled banner; and, no matter what glory you may acquire beneath it, the hideous, damning stain of slavery remains upon you, and a just Providence will, sooner or later, avenge itself for your crime. (Loud and continued cheers.) Sir, I have spoken the sentiments of the Repeal Association. (Renewed cheers.) There is not a man amongst the hundreds of thousands that belong to our body, or amongst the millions that will belong to it, who does not concur in what I stated. We may not get money from America after this declaration; but even if we should not, we do not want blood-stained money. (Hear, hear.)

"But the criminals and the abettors, those who commit and those who countenance the crime of slavery, I regard as the enemies of Ireland, and I desire to have no sympathy or support from them!"

To this noble declaration (for such we must deem it), the liberty-loving, slave-exporting Republicans of Maryland have returned the following reply:

"Resolved,—That believing the doctrine of Abolition to be inimical to the welfare and perpetuity of our republican institutions, calculated to rupture, if pushed to the extreme, our happy Union, and dismember the confederacy, this Association, laughing to scorn Mr. O'Connell's cry of shame and disgrace, will maintain its proud attitude as the uncompromising friend of that Union, and hurl back with indignant contempt the degrading epithet of 'faithless miscreant,' as unmerited and rash, insulting and undeserved."

The pro-slavery party in the free State of Ohio have also denounced Mr. O'Connell in the following Resolution, passed at the "Repeal meeting" held at Cincinnati on the 3rd of July, at which the late Vice-President of the United States, Colonel R. M. Johnson, a large Kentucky slave-holder, presided:—

"Resolved,—That in the intemperate and insulting language used by Daniel O'Connell, we recognise designs that, if carried into effect, would sever this happy Union, and drench our land with blood, and that, too, without benefiting the unhappy class to which he alludes; and that we can only excuse this celebrated man by attributing his language to a deplorable ignorance of the subject of slavery in America."

Similar meetings have been held at Philadelphia and other cities of the Union, at which Mr. O'Connell has been denounced in most vehement and passionate terms. Among the Abolitionists of America, his speech has of course raised his reputation as a man who has refused to sink the philanthropist in the patriot, and who, amid all his political delinquencies and inconsistencies, has, upon this one point,—an uncompromising abhorrence of slavery—maintained what appears to be a conscientious and disinterested consistency. At the present moment, to say a word in justice to the great Repealer, may subject us to reproach in some quarters; but we should have deemed it mean and dishonourable to suppress this proof of his sincerity; for, from the American Abolitionists, he cannot expect to receive any funds in support of political agitation.

The rebuke which he has given to the slaveholding sympathizers with the wrongs of Ireland, cannot but have the best political effect as a quietus upon the war party whose insane hatred of England displayed itself in exciting the Repealers to seek an absolute separation from this country. They have been reminded, that there are other legislative unions than that between Great Britain and Ireland, which are in danger of repeal. "Our happy Union," say the Baltimore Slaveholders, "is in danger of being ruptured by the doctrine of Abolition, if pushed to the extreme." Precarious, indeed, must any Union be, which a doctrine that asserts the rights of man as man, endangers; but, in this case, the very doctrine that is reprobated, pushed to the extreme, is the fundamental proposition of the American Constitution, which the Founders of the Federal Republic placed in the front of their reasons for asserting their independence.

Mr. O'Connell is a most extraordinary living paradox,—the most loyal rebel, the most orderly agitator, the most open, honest conspirator that ever was. He is determined to fight the battle of Repeal single-handed. He has cast off the Whigs; he defies the Tories. He will have nothing to do with slave-holding Americans, and wishes French emissaries to stay at home. "An American Editor appeared, in propriâ personâ, at the Dublin Corn Exchange, and procured Mr. Thomas Steele to hand up his card: the Liberator looked at his guest; spoke at him a short and bitter denunciation of his paper as an infamous journal, and wished him away: the American, who had mistaken his mission, decamped." Mr. O'Connell, it is remarked, seems at present determined that Repeal shall bear no sins but its own. This is at all events a prudent, not to say, an honest and commendable determination.—Pat.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The following communication has been addressed by the British Minister at Washington to the American Secretary of State:—

"Washington, June 25.

"Sir,—Her Majesty's Government, previously to the departure from England of the last steam-packet, had already received information, though not officially, of the provisional occupation of the Sandwich Islands, in the name of Great Britain, by the officer commanding Her Majesty's ship Carysfort.

"I am directed by the Earl of Aberdeen to state to you, for the information of the Government of the United States, that the occupation of the Sandwich Islands was an act entirely unauthorised by Her Majesty's Government; and that with the least practicable delay, due inquiry will be made into the proceedings which led to it.

"The British Government had already announced to certain Commissioners, who arrived in Great Britain in March last, on the part of the King of the Sandwich Islands, that Her Majesty had determined to recognise the independence of those islands under their present chief.

"To that determination Her Majesty's Government intends to adhere. At the same time, however, it is right that it should be understood that the British Government equally intend to engage, and if necessary to compel, the Chief of the Sandwich Islands to redress whatever acts of injustice may have been committed against British subjects by that Chief, or by his ministers or agents, either arbitrarily or under the false colour of lawful proceedings.

"Instructions which, during the past year, were addressed by Her Majesty's Government to the British Consul residing in the Sandwich Islands, and to the naval officers employed on the Pacific station, enjoined those officers to treat, upon all occasions, the native rulers of the Sandwich Islands with forbearance and courtesy, and while affording due and efficient protection to aggrieved British subjects, to avoid interfering harshly or unnecessarily with the laws and customs of the native Government.

"It has been the desire of the British Government, regulating the intercourse of its public servants with the native authorities of the Sandwich Islands, rather to strengthen those authorities, and to give them a sense of their own independence, by leaving the administration of justice in their own hands, than to make them feel their dependence upon foreign powers by the exercise of unnecessary interference. It has not been the purpose of Her Majesty's Government to seek to establish a paramount influence in those Islands for Great Britain, at the expense of that enjoyed by other powers. All that has appeared requisite to Her Majesty's Government has been, that other powers should not exercise there a greater influence than that possessed by Great Britain.

"I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

FRANCE.—The tour of the Duke and Duchess of Nemours through the western departments of France had been attended with no striking incident until their arrival at Mans, the chief town of the department of the Sarthe His Royal Highness was there met at the gates of the city by the Mayor, who, instead of addressing mere felicitations to him, recapitu-lated the grievances of the department against the central Government, spoke of the attachment of the people to the dogma of national sovereignty proclaimed by the revolution of July, of the advantages of conciliation, of the necessity of the Orleans dynasty accepting with sincerity the representative institutions, and upholding abroad the dignity of France; and he concluded by reminding the Prince of the cruel trials his family had already undergone, of the vicissitudes of royalty, and of the gratitude of nations for the great citizens who have given glowing proofs of their devotedness to the glory and prosperity of France. Although M. Basse, the deputy of the department, who waited upon the Prince at the head of the elite of the population, made up in adulation for the harangue of the municipal functionary, he did not think proper to prolong his stay in the town beyond three hours; and we find by the National that M. Trouve Chauvel, the Mayor of Mans, Messrs. Sevin and Jadin, the adjoints, and the librarian of the town, had been dismissed by a royal ordinance!

The French Government have determined that the Duc d'Aumale shall be Governor of Constantine, independent of the Governor of Algiers; the Spanish Government, that Seville shall bear the cognomen of "invicta."

The Gazette de France states that M. Adolphe Barrot, brother of M. Odilon Barrot, is about to proceed to Hayti, as Royal Commissioner, and that his mission is supposed to relate to the execution of the treaty of indemnity, and the commercial conventions with that Republic.

The Constitutionnel states, that the Maritime Prefect of Brest had received orders to prepare the frigate Belle Poule as quickly as possible for sea. Her destination is said to be China, where an ambassador is to be sent from France. It is thought that the command of the Belle Poule will be given to M. Hernoux, a captain in the navy, unless the Prince de Joinville wishes to retain the command of his frigate, in which case he will have the command of a squadron.—Pat.

A French paper contains a letter from Goritz announcing that the health of the Duke d'Angouleme was seriously impaired. He has lived for the last few years on milk and vegetables, with the hope of allaying an irritation of the bowels from which he constantly suffered, but that regimen has so weakened him that it was found necessary to give it up. Since that time, the irritation had greatly increased, and the Prince is now reduced to a state of complete emaciation.—Record.

SPAIN.—It will be seen, from another part of our paper, that Espartero has fairly landed in England; and we are glad to observe, from the speech of Sir Robert Peel, that he is likely to get a very different reception here from what he got at Lisbon, and one more worthy of the man whose only fault as a Governor was, the being a century in advance of the people he was called on to govern. There can be no doubt that the defeat of Espartero is a severe blow to liberty, and a victory to the extreme Roman Catholics. As an evidence of this, by the latest accounts from Madrid, on the 15th inst., high mass was celebrated in the Royal chapel, and Te Deum chanted, in honour of the victory of Terrejon. The Queen assisted at the ceremony, seated on a throne, which had never been occupied since Isabel the Catholic. It will be seen, however, from our foreign news, that the necessary consequences of a revolution effected by a junction of so many naturally contending elements, are already showing themselves. Barcelona is again in a state of rebellion. The Government officer has been expelled, and the insurgents are preparing to form themselves into another junta in opposition to the Government. Espartero had drawn up, on the 30th of July, on board the Betis, a protest, signed by him and those who accompanied him, against all that had been done, and might be done, contrary to the Constitution. This was a wise step. If the present commotions go on for a short time, the people of Spain may soon come to know that they have treated with ingratitude the only man fit or desirous to protect their liberty and the Constitution. "The troops betrayed us," said a companion of Espartero to one of his countrymen, "but who knows what they may do against those who bought them? Time is an excellent physician for evils like ours"—Witness.

BERLIN.—The unfortunate differences between Prince Albert of Prussia and his consort, Princess Marianna of the Netherlands, sister of the reigning King of Holland, form the general topic of conversation. Domestic disagreements of the most serious nature rendered it expedient that there should be a separation, though not a formal divorce. With this view the Princess was recommended to go to reside with her father, the ex-King of the Netherlands, who was then at the Hague, and it was determined that she should not return to Berlin until after Prince Albert's departure for his journey into the East, which was expected to occupy at least two years. The Princess did not return to Berlin until after the departure of the Prince, her husband, whose travels in Syria and Palestine, and visit to the Court of the Sultan have recently been reported in the journals. It would seem, however, that these travels and receptions have not afforded the illustrious Prince so much gratification as might have been expected, for it is understood that he is preparing to return to Berlin. No sooner was the intended return of the Prince made known here, than preparations for the departure of the Princess were immediately set on foot. It is the intention of her Royal Highness to proceed with her two children to Italy.—Brussels Paper.

THIRTEENTH MEETING OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION, CORK.—FIRST DAY—THURSDAY.—SECTION A.—MATHEMATICS AND PHYSICS.—Professor M'Cullagh, on taking the chair, stated the objects of the section and those reasons which had induced the Association to combine the study of physics with that of mathematics. The matter which would be first submitted to the meeting was an astronomical report made by Mr. Bailey, which would be read by Dr. Robinson, who would preface it with a few remarks.

Dr. Robinson explained the nature of the catalogue of stars, and its scientific and practical utility.

Sir William Hamilton remarked on the extreme service which had been rendered to science by this catalogue, and the anxiety with which its publication was looked forward to by all astronomers.

A communication from Professor Powell on the Elliptic Polarisation of Light reflected from various substances, was read by Professor Lloyd.

Professor Kane read a communication from Professor Draper, of New York, on a newly discovered property of the rays of light. The object of this communication was to state some experiments which proved the existence of a certain matter which accompanies solar light, and exercises a chemical action on natural bodies. Chlorine gas, on exposure to light, becomes capable of combination with hydrogen, with which it will not unite otherwise. The change produced is permanent, and results from the absorption of rays, whose refraction index corresponds to that of the indigo rays of the spectrum. This is shown by the fact that, when the beam of light has produced its effect when passing through a mixture, it is incapable of again producing it; the power must have been therefore lost in the transmission. The effect is positive from one end of the spectrum to the other, and differs only in intensity, the maximum being in the indigo towards the blue.

Professor Robinson stated what seemed to him to afford some confirmation of Professor Draper's views, being the result of an attempt made by him to delineate the surface of the moon by the Daguerrotype process. A prepared plate placed in the place of the second mirror of a Cassegrainian telescope had received scarcely any impression at the expiration of half an hour. Moonlight must have therefore much less effective agency than the direct or reflected rays of the sun, as if this chemical effect were absorbed at lunar surface, as we know heat is.

Professor Kane described some experiments which proved that power is lost by rays in passing through chlorine.

SECTION B.—CHEMISTRY AND MINERALOGY.—A letter was read from Dr. Lyon Playfair, relative to the grant of money for collecting gases from furnaces.

Mr. Robert Hunt read a paper on Chromatype,—a new photographic process. He stated that, in making some researches on the influence of the solar rays on the salts of different metals, he discovered an easy method of producing a positive photography by the use of chromates. Several chromates may be used; but he prefers the chromates of mercury or copper,—the latter producing much more certain results, and in a shorter time. He prepared his paper in the following manner:—Good writing paper is washed with a solution of sulphate of copper, and partially dried, and then washed with a solution of bi-chromate of potash, and dried. When thus prepared, the paper may be kept for any length of time. Though not delicate enough for the camera obscura, they answer very well for taking an engraving, botanical specimens, &c. When exposed to the sunshine from five to twenty minutes, according to the intensity of the light, a negative picture is produced, which, when washed over with a solution of nitrate of silver, produces a beautiful deep orange picture, upon a grayish, or sometimes a white ground, which becomes fixed by washing with pure water. When concentrated solutions were used, a negative picture was at first produced; but when largely diluted with water, the sun's action at first darkened the paper and then rapidly bleached it, producing a faint positive picture, which was brought out by per-nitrate of silver. When a positive picture is placed in solution of common salt, the image fades, leaving a faint negative outline; if it be then washed with a solution of nitrate of silver, and left to dry in the dark, a strong negative picture is the result; but if, when taken from the solution of salt it be exposed to the sunshine, a positive picture of different shades of lilac, according to the strength of the solution used, will be produced. Mr. Hunt supposes these effects are produced by rays which lie between the least refrangible blue and the extreme limit of the violet rays of the visible prismatic spectrum,—the maximum darkening effect being produced by the mean blue, and the bleaching effect by the least refrangible red. He also stated that when an ordinary prepared photograph is washed with corrosive sublimate it becomes perfectly white, but when washed with hypo-sulphite of soda it is again restored. In connection with the above facts, he made the following very curious observation:—if an amalgamated plate be placed about an eighth of an inch above some iodine of silver no effect is produced, but if a little nitrate of silver be mixed with it, the plate, in the space of about 24 hours, is blackened as if exposed to the light.

Mr. Hunt read a second paper on the influence of light on the growth of plants. He states that he has confirmed all the conclusions which he had already come to in a previous report, namely, the injurious influence of luminous rays in preventing germination, and in destroying the health of the young plant,—that plants grown under the influence of red rays bend away from the light, and that the blue or chemical rays quicken the growth of plants. But he finds that blue light, though it increases the vigour of their growth, may exert too powerful a stimulus, by causing them to expend their whole energy in the production of a large foliage; and it was only by the interposition of red light, that he could bring plants grown under such influence to flower or seed. Under the influence of green rays plants are as much deteriorated as if grown in the dark.

SECTION C.—GEOLOGY AND PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY.—President.—Richd. Griffith, F. R. S. E., &c.

The Chairman said he felt his inadequacy to fill such a situation, when he saw himself surrounded by gentlemen who had done so much for the science. One gentleman had just returned from America, another from Russia, and another from Poland. He had been chosen to fill the office of chairman, having been the author of a work on the geology of Ireland, to which he had devoted thirty years' labour and inquiry. The paper about to be discussed on the geology of the Apalachian Mountains was one which had been brought before the Association at Manchester, but for want of the illustrations it was impossible to do it justice. The Chairman then called on Mr. Lyell to explain Professor Rogers's theory.

Mr. Lyell said that the brothers, Messrs. Henry and William Rogers, had been employed by the American Government in a survey, which occupied them a period of five years although assisted by engineers. The Apalachian hills extend from Canada to Alabama, running along the Atlantic border. The paper was intended to illustrate the manner in which their peculiar structure had been produced. There was a simple law which had been made out by the Messrs. Rogers, which held universal with regard to this mountain chain, and gave a clue to their internal organisation. In travelling from the Atlantic to the Alleghanies, or Apalachian hills, for they are called by both names, some low plains are passed, of the Tertiary class, full of organic remains, sometimes rising a few feet, at other times up to 200 feet. This low chain is composed of parallel flexures of equal height, running north-east and south-west. Each ridge is composed of anticlinal axes. Here the oldest fossil strata appear, called Silurian by Mr. Murchison. Towards the Mississippi are coal fields of vast extent, some as large as Great Britain. As the horizontal coal field approaches the mountains it begins to undulate, and the undulations increase in amount, till in the centre of the chain the strata become nearly vertical. This explains the structure. The coal in this chain is sometimes anthracitic, and on the steep side of the undulations is crushed into soot, while that at the other side is in a perfect state. Sienite and the other intrusive rocks, of igneous origin, occur in the central parts of the chain.

The Secretary then read the paper of Professor Rogers on the phenomena and theory of earthquakes. In the Apalachian chain, the anticlinal flexures are attributed to a billowy movement of the earth's surface, like the phenomena attending an earthquake. He was led to consider the nature of earthquake motion, and two remarkable earthquakes which occurred within the year furnished laws confirming in a striking manner the supposed origin of the Apalachian chain. All earthquakes consist of a remarkable motion, which is not simultaneous, but progressive, and which moves parallel to itself from the source of disturbance. The author referred to the observations of Captain Fitzroy and Professor Mitchel, in confirmation of his views, and dwelt on the phenomena attending the earthquake at Guadeloupe and Antigua, and also the earthquake at Lisbon. The zone of undulation extended in all directions, and at sea the sympathy seemed to be indicated by huge waves remarkably isochronous, propagated at the rate of five minutes after each other.

This theory would explain the carrying of boulders without resorting to the ice theory.

The Secretary read a paper on the earthquake in Guadaloupe, furnished by the Hon. Captain Carnegie, R. N.

The Chairman then addressed the meeting, giving an account of the erratic blocks or boulders combined with gravel and clay, which occur in different parts of Ireland. He stated that the principal mountain ranges of the country had a direction from north-east to south-west, while the direction of the drift, containing the gravel beds, gravel hills, and boulders, was at right angles to them, namely, from north-west to south east. He observed that the drift of Donegal and north of Tyrone, was composed of rolled masses of mica-slate and quartz, mixed with clay, which rarely present any stratiform arrangement, the whole being huddled together in a confused mass. To the south-east of Tyrone and Donegal the drift was composed of rolled limestone, presenting masses of unequal size similar to the foregoing. This drift occurred in great quantity throughout the whole of the limestone country, and was also found resting on the western sides of the slate hills of Armagh and Down, and likewise on those of Wicklow and Wexford, where they sometimes reached the elevation of nearly a thousand feet, and where the mountains exceeded that height, they interrupted the current, and in that case no drift was found to the east. Granite boulders, known by their composition to be derived from the granite of Galway, are found strewing the surface of the country for a distance of forty miles to the south-east of the granite district of that county. Hence, judging from these facts, we arrive at the conclusion that in an extensive district all the gravel, drift as well as the boulders, must have been transported by a current running from the north-west to south-east. In the north part of the counties of Mayo and Sligo, the current was from south to north, as is indicated by boulders of red sandstone from the Corlew mountains having been transported to the northward across the limestone valley of Ballymote to the base of the Ox mountains; and also, by large boulders of granite from the Ox mountains, some of them weighing upwards of 100 tons, being now found in great numbers on the surface of the limestone country to the north as far as the sea coast at Easky. Blocks of such large size were probably transported on ice, though it is remarkable that, in this case, their direction was from south to north.

Mr. Lyell observed that floating ice was capable of carrying larger blocks than any found here. When they melted they might drop these blocks in any place. This process was going on every day in large parts of Europe. The shells in Ireland and Scotland are found 700 feet high.

Mr. Murchison agreed with Mr. Lyell as to the floating powers of ice. The great northern plains of Europe offered strong proofs of this. In Germany he had found large blocks on slight acclivities, bedded in earth.

Mr. Griffiths said the discussion showed the importance of the British Association meeting to ascertain the cause of transport of these blocks.

The several papers read were illustrated by large and beautiful maps and diagrams, coloured to represent the different formations.

GENERAL MEETING.—The general Meeting of the association was held at the Corn Exchange on Thursday evening at eight o'clock. The great room was well filled with nobles, baronets, learned professors, and ladies, besides many of the county gentry and citizens.

The Marquis of Northampton, in absence from illness of Lord F. Egerton, was called to the chair, and said that in the absence of the late President, it was his duty to give up the chair to their and his noble fellow-countryman, for he did not acknowledge that England and Ireland were not really one. (Loud cheers.) The sea might divide them, but their hearts were united. (Continued cheering.) They all knew the merits of the Earl of Rosse, whose labour, time, pains, and money were employed for the great advancement of astronomical knowledge.—(Hear, hear.) They knew of the great instrument which he was constructing,—an instrument destined to carry his name to the uttermost points of the world, from the knowledge it would diffuse of the remote parts of space. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of Rosse, on taking the chair, assured them that no one felt more deeply sensible of the kindness of the Noble Marquis, who condescended to notice him, and his humble exertions in the cause of astronomical science, while no one could feel that the complimentary language made use of was entirely undeserved, more than the individual before them. Men of the world engaged in the busy scenes of life, who watch the acts of men, and cast an occasionally passing glance at science, the effects of which they view with wonder, could not fail to look with surprise on a meeting so large as this, composed as it was, of men of all parties, and of the highest order of talent, assembled in this country under such circumstances and feelings. Here they saw no angry conflict of opinions, no feeling of bitterness, no enmity to each other, no foolish contest between man and man. Here they had people of all classes in the country, and of different nations, all proceeding in the same course, or nearly so, still there was no struggle for power—no struggle for dominion of man over man—(hear)—to gain the material things of this world, and who, joining on one side, was lost to the other; but here was the contrary, whoever they joined there was no loss to any other, for the object of the contest was an increase in the means of knowledge, which had dominion over the material things of this world; and it was plain, therefore, that the objects they had in view, they were all equally interested in, and the contest was friendly, the reward being an increase of the gifts of a bountiful Providence for the benefit of man, to an extent almost unlimited. (Hear, hear, hear.) The Noble President having continued to address the meeting in a fluent and eloquent strain, concluded in the following words:—It had been remarked by a modern traveller of considerable depth of observation, that he always found in the children of the fields a more determined tendency to religion and piety than amongst those who dwelt in towns and cities, and he conceived the reason to be obvious, that the inhabitants of the country were less accustomed to the works of man's hands than to those of God. Might not the observation be of more extensive application than at first sight appeared? and if it were true that where they dwelt constantly in large cities, the mind was liable to be led astray by the habitual contemplation of the works of man forced upon it imperceptibly by the continual succession of ideas,—all of the same character,—all originating in objects which have been shaped and fashioned by man,—might it not also be true that they were equally liable to be led astray where they concentrated their ideas, and whole attention, and exerted their whole energy without relaxation in the contemplation of the greatest of all human works, that which the labourer of so many ages had raised up—the structure of abstract sciences? And if that were so, what was more calculated to unbend the mind, and to divert for a season the current of ideas to other channels than this particular meeting, where, in the proceedings of every section, matter would be found of the deepest interest to every true philosopher, and where, however dissimilar the facts, however varied the inferences, the result would every where be still the same,—that of putting forward more prominently in bold relief the wonderful works of creation? (Cheers.) If he might presume to offer an opinion on such a subject, it appeared to him that the continual progress of discovery was destined to answer objects far more important than the mere improvement of the temporal condition of man. (Cheers.) Were there a limit to scientific discovery, and had they reached that limit, they should be in the condition of a man who, with the most splendid landscape before him, was insensible of its beauty, because the change of novelty had passed away. Each successive discovery, as it brought them nearer to the first principles, opened out to their view a new and more splendid prospect, and the mind, led away by its charms, was carried beyond and far above the petty and ephemeral contests of life: but the more rapid the discoveries the more powerful the charm, and therefore great was the motive for exertion: and in labouring in this cause there was this gratifying reflection, that their labours could not injure their successors, for the region of discovery was rich far beyond the powers of conception—(Hear, hear,)—and, however much they might draw from it, they should not leave its treasures exhausted—no, not even diminished, because they were infinite. (Hear, hear.) This Association had already accomplished much, and he felt persuaded it would accomplish much more; but of this they might rest assured, that however long it might endure, and he saw no principle of endurance that other societies had which was here wanting, they would find an ample and enlarging field of useful employment. (The Noble Earl sat down amidst loud cheering.)

Mr. Taylor then read the statement of the funds,—

The property of the Association consisted of value for the £496 4s. 11d.; money in the Consols £5500; and the value of public reports on hands £1025, making in all £6704 19s. 10d. The money received in Cork amounted to about £600.

Sir William Hamilton returned thanks on the part of the Irish members for the visit of the Association.

Mr. Murchison rose to reply, and in the course of his observations, said that he was quite convinced, when coming to Ireland, that they would meet with that hospitality for which the land was celebrated, and what had occurred fully bore out his expectations, and to enjoy which he had travelled from Poland and Russia. He begged to be allowed to say that in the city of Cork, five-and-thirty years ago, he first began his career as an humble military man, under their illustrious countryman, the Duke of Wellington. (Loud cheering.) There was something in this sentiment, not as regarded the humble individual, but as regarded what a military man might aspire to in future life. He was then only a young soldier, and his earliest and dearest feelings were associated with that period; and now, with the feelings of an old soldier who attempted to become a hammering geologist, he begged leave to express, most emphatically, his thanks, on the part of the British Association, to the Mayor and Corporation, and Messrs. Clear and Kelcher, for the reception they had provided.

The Mayor returned thanks for the Corporation, and the meeting soon after adjourned.

SECOND DAY.—FRIDAY. SECTION A.—MATHEMATICS AND PHYSICS.—This day's proceedings commenced with a report of the Meteorological observations made at Plymouth, by Mr. Snow Harris. He had used Mr. Whewell's anemometer to determine the direction of the general current of air during the years 1841 and 1842. The general tendency during that period was from north to south. To determine its velocity, he made calculations by a certain number of revolutions made by the fly of the anemometer, and from this deduced that the mean rate of motion was five miles per hour.

Dr. Harris, in noticing the influence which the local condition and state of the atmosphere exercised on the barometer, remarked that they had found at Plymouth, that if during the night the temperature fell and the barometer rose, they were sure of fine weather and clear skies, and vice versa.

Mr. Graham Hutchison read a paper on the nature and cause of the diurnal oscillations of the barometer. In tropical climates the height of the barometer is greatest between nine and ten o'clock in the morning, least between four and five in the afternoon, and again increases between nine and ten. This holds only to about sixty-five degrees of latitude, after which the times of maxima and minima are reversed, and become exactly contrary. There are likewise two maxima annually in spring and autumn. The reasons heretofore assigned for this appeared to him insufficient. The influence which the rotatory and orbicular motions of the earth produced on the atmosphere when acting in same or in opposite directions, producing lateral pressure, seemed to him to account accurately for the phenomena. The great difficulty which he experienced in his theory was accounting for the reversed or negative effect, which he could not explain.

Mr. Nott's paper on electricity and terrestrial magnetism was the next subject which engaged attention.

Mr. Harris had concluded from an examination of the accounts of 300 storms in log books of the navy, that a thunder storm invariably occurred at the place where two opposite currents of wind met, and, as it were, neutralised each other's effects; thus the atmosphere for the space of two or three miles was in a disturbed state, in which the wind blows from nearly every point, and within this space the storm occurs. The dark surface of a cloud is only as it were the coating of a charge, and between it and the earth the air was in a state which has been termed polarised, and the phenomena called thunder and lightning are merely the discharges made in order to establish equilibrium.—Witness.

THE PUNJAB AND GWALIOR.—We present below in one view the various items of news, authentic or fabulous, which have been given to the public, during our last editorial week, relative to the state of things in the Punjab and Gwalior.

In the Punjab, we are told that the dissensions between Lena Sing Majeteah, and Heera Sing at Lahore have ripened into open hostility; that the latter has shut himself up in the fortress, and that the former has a force of 10,000 men under his command, and is watching opportunities; according to another statement, he has besieged the fort to which Heera Sing has retired. Of Golab Sing's movements nothing is rumoured; and we only hear that his nephew has importuned him to advance speedily to Lahore and support the authority of the government, as lodged in the hands of the Dogur family. There can be little doubt that this upstart, but powerful, family is regarded with great jealousy by the other Seikh chiefs, and it is not improbable that if Lena Sing should be led to try conclusions with Heera Sing in the field, his army will be swelled by the accession of many from their number; and the struggle may soon assume the character of an attempt to overthrow the power which this family has so long usurped. Whether Golab Sing will quit his principality in the Hills, and risk the loss of it, with the view of maintaining the family supremacy in the administration, is a question there is none to answer. He may find it for his own advantage to remain where he is, and erect a separate Government for himself in the strong position he now occupies. It is said that all the troops now at Loodiana and Ferozepore have been ordered to hold themselves in readiness for immediate service. But this can have reference only to the prospect of aggressions on our own territories, which may follow the breaking up of the feeble Government at Lahore.

Dost Mahomed, as we stated last week, is not dead. It is doubtful whether he has been wounded, or even fired at. The Khan of Bokhara is not in the vicinity of Cabul; but Akbar is said, and apparently with much truth to have advanced to the mouth of the Khybur on his way to Peshawur. His progress may be arrested by the mountaineers, with whom plunder is the first object. Once at Jumrood, he would soon be master of Peshawur, for the Seikh troops are dispirited by the convulsions which distract their own country. Heera Sing has made great efforts to send on reinforcements, but the troops are refractory, and will not move without large payments, the receipt of which will only make them more reluctant to thrust themselves into danger. Were they however to march immediately, they would scarcely reach Peshawur under six weeks; and should the place have surrendered in the meanwhile, and its defenders be met on their retreat, the advancing troops would be more likely to return with them, than to push on for the recovery of the place. Besides, it may reasonably be expected, in the present state of affairs, that some new revolution will recal them to the Capital, before they can reach the Indus.

Although Gwalior lies so much nearer to our own territories, being only 80 miles from Agra, yet we have but a very indistinct account of the actual state of parties, and the reports are often contradictory. Last week it was stated, and correctly, that the insurgent troops had revolted against the existing government, and seized the Khasgee; and were prepared to submit to all the demands of the British Government. We now learn that the Regent, the Baee, has contrived to collect a large force around her to resist them, and that there was every probability that the two parties would come to blows. The troops are said to have declared that the first shot fired at them by the Baee will be the signal for striking off the head of the Khasgee. It is evident that we know little of the actual state of parties, their designs, their strength, or their resources; and to indulge in any conjectures as to the future course of events would be idle. From the orders issued by the Commander-in-Chief to the troops composing the Army of Exercise, to march immediately to their respective positions without delay, after he is said to have desired them to stand fast, we gather that there will be something for them to do. This idea is strengthened by the fact that an officer is employed in surveying the fords of the Chumbul, and that each soldier is furnished with a hundred rounds of ball ammunition. Sir Hugh Gough would in all probability reach Agra by the 15th, and Lord Ellenborough, leaves Calcutta by the 25th. It is difficult to suppose that the Governor General and the Commander-in-Chief, should both be present with an army of more than 30,000 men, and yet nothing come of it.

After these remarks were in type, we received the Delhi Gazette of the 15th instant, which furnishes us with this important addition to our stock of information, that a treaty has been presented by the British Government for acceptance to the Lahore Durbar, and that its provisions are such that they will most probably not be accepted, and that on the refusal to accept it, ulterior measures will be based. If the Editor of the Delhi Gazette did not speak in such positive language of this treaty, we should be much disposed to question the authenticity of his information. Indeed we doubt whether any impression however strong of the veracity of his informant is sufficient to give credibility to such a statement. The Seikhs have as yet given us no actual provocation; they have only been cutting one another's throats, and destroying the sinews of war which Runjeet Sing had collected with so much diligence; but there has been no positive aggression; nor has the country yet reached that degree of disorganization which threatens the security of our own frontier provinces. As yet there does not appear to exist any political necessity for us to interfere and extinguish the fire in our neighbour's house, because it endangers the safety of our own. Lord Ellenborough is reported to have said in a speech made at one of the Military dinners lately given him, that he would do wonders with the Army. If his Lordship should annex Gwalior, and the Punjab, as well as Scinde, to the British dominions before he returns to England, he will indeed have done wonders; the work of a quarter of a century in a single lustrum.

CAPT. R. ENGLEDUE has lost caste, and he can regain it, according to oriental usage, only by a good dinner. We advise him therefore to embrace the opportunity which may be afforded by the expected arrival of the Bentinck, to give a magnificent repast on board her, not forgetting to invite the Conductors of the Calcutta Press. This is the way in which a Hindoo and Mahomedan gets back into his caste, and as the English have a national affection for the pleasures of the table, we think the experiment is not likely to fail.

Capt Engledue has refused to furnish a complete list of the passengers who embarked on the Hindoostan on Thursday last. The refusal took us by surprise. We knew that a partial list had been furnished of those who had engaged passages ten days previously; that no concealment had ever been practised before, either in this country or in England; that no object was to be acquired by the refusal except the general disgust of society; we were therefore quite at a loss to account for it. We made many enquiries on the subject, and believe we have at length obtained a clue to this apparent perversity of conduct. We learn that on Wednesday last, the day of despatch, when the Agent had not a second to spare, he was besieged by ten or fifteen persons, who, with the usual imprudence of the Ditch, had given credit, unwarily, and who insisted upon having a list of the passengers that they might increase the confusion on board the vessel, by the addition of a few constables. Capt. Engledue was vexed at the interruption; perhaps nettled also at the cause; and hesitated to give up the names of his passengers. The dunning creditors then insisted upon it, and menaced him with the terrors of the press, if he persisted in his refusal. Whether he lost his temper or not on this trying occasion, we have not heard; judging from his usual urbanity we should think not; but being thus menaced, there was but one course for a man of spirit to pursue. He absolutely and point blank refused to give up the names at all; not because he wished to screen the debtors, or to annoy the public, but because he thought that "if reasons were as thick as blackberries, he ought not to give them on compulsion."

Whether the Agent of a ship is by law bound to give up the names of his passengers on the demand of any private individual, to enable him to capture any debtor of his who may be found in the number, is a question which as a lay Editor we shall not take upon ourselves to decide. The Star enjoys the benefit of an Editor learned in the law, and we must refer the subject to his judgement. But we are certain that Capt. Engledue is the last person to requite the kind and warm hearted cordiality with which he and the enterprize of which he is the Agent, have been welcomed here, by a rude and unobliging refusal of what he must know will prove a great gratification to the community. We would advise him therefore to send all the journals a list of the passengers—a day or two after the vessel has left town. Thus the public will be gratified, and the creditors taught the necessity of more caution. We are happy in being able to claim for these our remarks the credit of perfect disinterestedness, for all the subscribers to the Friend of India whom the Hindoostan took away from us, paid up punctually to the end of the year, and ordered the paper to be sent after them viâ Marseilles, a good example, which we hope will not be lost on those who are likely to follow them.

CHINA.—Intelligence has been received from China by the Rob Roy to the 24th of October. Hong Kong continued very sickly, but the cause appears as much hidden from view, as the cause of mortality in Scinde. Trade is said to have been dull at this new settlement, and almost stagnant at Canton, which still continues to be the centre of commercial operations. This inactivity is ascribed to a demand made on the Hong merchants—whose mercantile vigour has survived the loss of their official character,—of nearly four millions of dollars, on the strength of some document to which they affixed their signatures on the capture of Canton, and which they were told at the time would be regarded as a mere formality. But the trade on the eastern coast appears to be increasingly brisk; and it is surmised that it will not be confined to the five authorised ports, but be extended to every accessible place on the line. It must be manifest that Canton, which has hitherto monopolized the trade of China, must gradually dwindle and decay as other marts are opened to the mercantile enterprizes of the civilized world. All the staple productions of the provinces lying within reach of the coast, will cease to be sent by a tedious and expensive route to Canton. They will be sold to more advantage at their own sea-gates, which will also admit European and American manufactures the more cheerfully, as they will be presented at a cheaper rate.

The papers received by this opportunity mention the death of Lin, the Imperial Commissioner, at an advanced age, and,—notwithstanding the threat of banishment,—in the full enjoyment of the Emperor's favour. An Imperial Edict issued on the occasion, celebrates his various virtues, and confers public honours on him and his family. It is however altogether silent about the events which have given him so much celebrity throughout Europe. Perhaps there is political wisdom in thus omitting all reference to those transactions which have led to the humiliation of the Tartar dynasty and constrained the haughty Emperor to admit the outside barbarians upon terms of equality. There may be some object also in thus extolling the man who boldly resisted the English authorities, and extorted twenty thousand chests of opium, and destroyed them under their eyes. Lin appears to have been a man of rare energy and determination. The edict speaks of him as having died at an advanced age. He must therefore have been a very old man when he adopted that vigorous line of policy which involved his country in a war with England, the result of which has proved so disastrous to the dynasty, and will prove, we have no doubt, so beneficial to the people. His name may be lost among the herd of Mandarines in the Chinese annals, but it will be preserved in lasting remembrance, in European history, in connection with events of which it is impossible to foresee the consequences.

How-qua, the Prince of Chinese merchants, the head of the Hong, has also been gathered to his ancestors at the age of 75. He is said to have died worth twenty millions of Dollars, notwithstanding the repeated "squeezings" he had received from the various functionaries of government. Much of this property is said to have been deposited in foreign funds. His death will probably contribute to break the commercial power of the Hong merchants, and, in conjunction with the opening of new ports to foreign enterprize, to hasten the dissolution of this important body, which but lately enjoyed much the same influence and consideration in China which the Honourable the East India Company did in England.

The papers now before us mention that the French Consul, the Count de Ratti Menton had been received with much distinction by the public authorities at Canton, and even by the Imperial Commissioner. The Chinese, having now been humbled by the British, will doubtless have the sagacity to cherish with more than their usual benignity those strangers who are independent of us, and who may at some future time be found useful, should a second resort to arms on our part be rendered necessary. But the Emperor has evidently no wish to receive the Embassadors of foreign powers at his Capital in the spirit of equality, still less to admit of their constant residence there. It is said to be owing to this determination that he has conceded to them the same commercial privileges which the English have wrung from him. When therefore Mr. Cushing may request permission to present himself at the Imperial Durbar, he will probably be put off with the specious reply that the object of his mission has been already anticipated, and that the American Trade has been put on the footing of 'the most favoured nation.'

THE CASE OF THE NATIVE CHRISTIAN AND HIS WIFE.—An interesting and important case, involving the welfare of Native Christians, has recently been discussed in the columns of the Hurkaru; on which we now propose to offer a brief remark or two.

We are told that a Native on embracing Christianity some three, four or five years ago, was deprived of his wife by her father, who took her out of Calcutta and refused him all access to her. At length, he heard through some friends that she wished to rejoin him, but that he must come prepared to resist force. He went accordingly and secured his wife, and, as it was alleged, committed an assault. A day or two after, while his wife was residing with him in Calcutta, an officer appeared from the Magistrate of the 24-Pergunnahs commanding him to deliver her up. He did so; and was summoned to attend the Magistrate's Court, where he was sentenced to two month's imprisonment for the assault.

One of the parties in this discussion censures the disproportion of the punishment to the offence. That the Magistrate was bound to take official cognizance of the charge of assault, and to decide its turpitude according to his own judgement, is admitted on all sides; and however we may think two months' imprisonment rather a severe punishment, for a breach of the peace, which may have arisen from an attempt to recover so dear a treasure as a wife, yet without a full knowledge of the aggravating circumstances of the case, it would be unjust to pronounce an opinion. There may have been only a little gentle violence, or there may have been heads broken and blood shed. No principle is involved in the measure of punishment awarded in this instance, and we pass on to the more important features of the case.

Was the Magistrate justified in taking the man's wife away from him and delivering her over to her father and friends? Ruat Cœlum, the other party in the discussion, says "Surely by all rules of common sense, the Magistrate is justified in replacing the wife in the position in which she was before, leaving the prisoner to the remedy which the law gives him."—"If when the Christian's wife was taken from him, he had applied to the Magistrate, he would have had the same justice meted out to him as has been given to his father-in-law in this case." In the last letter published he states, "The law is thus—If a Christian convert has been deprived of his wife, the Magistrate, provided the claim be preferred within a month of the abduction and the wife be nothing loth, will restore the wife to the husband and punish the party who took her away. If those provisos are wanting, the Magistrate will refer the husband to the Civil Court. In a suit in the Civil Court the case would turn upon this point, viz. whether the woman were a Christian or a Hindoo? If the latter, she would be entitled to have the case tried by the Hindoo law. The Bywusteh of the Pundit would declare her released from all obligation to her husband and the marriage void."

We think Ruat Cœlum will see cause, on a farther examination of the case, to adopt a different conclusion. In the first place, the Magistrate does not appear to have any jurisdiction in the matter. It is quite true that Act IV. of 1840 "for Relief in cases of forcible dispossession," directs the Magistrate to call the parties complained against to appear before him and make defence, and if the complaint appears to be substantiated, to order the complaining party to be put again into possession of the subject of dispute, and maintained till the right to possession be determined by a competent Court. If this be the law on which Ruat Cœlum founds his argument, it will be found that the Magistrate has neglected one of its most important provisions;—that is, if the facts of the case be as stated—in as much as he is said to have ordered the subject in dispute, the woman, to be taken away before he had caused the party complained against to appear and make defence. But the Act applies solely to Land, Premises, Water, Fisheries, Crops or other Produce of the land, and not to human beings who are free agents.

The Sudder Nizamut has long since ruled, that a Magistrate cannot interfere in such cases, and that they are cognizable only by the Civil Court. If Ruat Cœlum will turn to the 1st Volume of Constructions, he will find the following case at page 46.

"The Magistrate of Allahabad, on the complaint of A, ordered that B should give up to him his daughter, whom A alleged that he had married. The Benares Court of Circuit, considering that the case was not cognizable in the foujdary court, rescinded the magistrate's order, leaving the complainant the option of suing to prove his marriage in the regular suit in the civil court. On a reference by the Magistrate, the Court of Nizamut Adawlut, on 31st March, 1814, concurring with the Court of Circuit, stated it as their opinion that all suits or complaints relative to marriage were to be heard in the civil courts."

Now if the Magistrate cannot interfere to constrain a father-in-law to deliver up his daughter to her husband, still less can he constrain a husband to give up his own wife to her father. Both cases come within the category of

"suits or complaints relative to marriage" which the highest Court in the country has declared to be only within the province of the Civil Courts. If then the Magistrate directed the woman to be separated from her husband, and restored to her father, he took on himself to decide "a question of marriage," which is entirely beyond his jurisdiction.

And as the case is of the nature of a Civil suit, the complaining husband who has been deprived of his wife, is not debarred from all remedy, unless he institutes an action within a month after the abduction. He has twelve clear years before him, and, according to the law, may obtain redress even after the expiration of that period, if he can give "good and sufficient cause" that he had been precluded from previously obtaining it.

Supposing the case now brought before a Civil Court, must the husband be absolutely deprived of his wife from the mere circumstance of his having become a Christian? Ruat Cælum seems to think that the decision would turn upon this point; viz. whether the woman were a Christian or a Hindoo. "If the latter, she would have the case tried by the Hindoo law. The Bybusta of the Pundit would declare her released from all obligation to her husband and the marriage void." We scarcely think this view of the case will stand the test of the Regulations. No man can be deprived of his ancestral or self acquired property by forsaking Hindooism and embracing Christianity. This equitable law we owe to Lord William Bentinck. The great leading object of the Hindoo Law of Inheritance, as delivered by Munoo and enforced by subsequent jurists, is to perpetuate Hindooism for ever in India by providing that property shall descend only to those who perform the rites and ceremonies enjoined by the Shaster. The Muhomedans laid the Hindoo law without ceremony on the shelf as soon as they had conquered the country, and for Six hundred years, no Hindoo sat on the Bench, and no case was decided by Hindoo Law. In 1772, the British Government gave it a resurrection, without, we fully believe, being aware of its intolerance; and for sixty years, it continued to be the law of British India that any man who became a Christian was, ipso facto, deprived of his paternal inheritance. In 1832, Lord William Bentinck enacted that whenever in a civil suit, the parties to the suit should be of different persuasions, when one party should be of the Hindoo, and the other of another religion, the law of the Hindoo religion should not be permitted to operate to deprive such party of any property to which, but for the operation of such laws, he would be entitled. Reasoning from analogy, it appears to us clear that if a Christian cannot be deprived of his property by the Hindoo law for embracing Christianity, neither would the same law be allowed to operate so as to deprive him of his wife. "In all such cases," says the Regulation, "the decision shall be governed by the principles of justice, equity and good conscience." And, according to these principles, the Civil Court would neither compel the woman to follow her husband and embrace Christianity, nor prevent her doing so by consigning her over to her Hindoo relatives. They would recognize her as a free agent, and leave it entirely to her own option to join his new connections, religious and social, or to return to the bosom of her family. Such is our impression of the present state of the law. We give it however with great diffidence, and sincerely hope that, some legislative provision may be made, which shall set the question for ever at rest, and afford the Courts and the Missionaries, a clear and unerring guide for their conduct.

The Herkaru's Loaded Pistol.—The Hurkaru thus comments on a little political speculation of ours last week appended to an article on the state of the Punjab.

"Our cotemporary reminds us of the gentleman alluded to, in one of Sir James Mackintosh's letters. "B—follows or leads the mob in Wellesleianism, and writes me that moderation is cockney cant." We have no doubt, that the Friend of India, thinks that we are guilty of "cockney cant;" but we really must say, that the above, in our opinion, is monstrous. "Every independent State within the Indus exists only by our sufferance." And this fact is considered sufficient warrant for our robbery of that State. Is justice nothing—is honesty nothing—is liberty nothing? Are the laws of nations nothing? Our worthy cotemporary says, that the Punjaub exists only by the sufferance of the British. Why, if it comes to that, he himself exists only by our sufferance. Any hour, that we were pleased to put a loaded pistol to his temples, we could blow out his brains. We conceive, that the act would be just as lawful, as the annihilation of the independence of the Punjaub. The cool way, in which our cotemporary talks of the British Empire being "obliged by the current of circumstances to extinguish any of these little independent States" is worthy of—we will not say whom—certainly, most unworthy of the Friend of India—most unworthy of any liberal journal. "These States" says our cotemporary "exist upon the right of treaties, which we hold sacred." Indeed! Why—did not they exist before we had any treaties with them to hold sacred? They do not exist by the right of treaties—they exist, by the law of God, which it will be infamy in us to violate. If they offend us, that is another matter—but we protest against our cotemporary's reasoning. It is arrant profligacy; nothing better; and may be used in defence of the deepest crimes.—Bengal Hurkaru, Nov. 17, 1843.

Our contemporary tells us that what we have written is "monstrous;" that it is "arrant profligacy," which "may be used in defence of the deepest crimes." What can we say to these charges except that they are somewhat severe? He says he has no doubt we shall think he is guilty of "cockney cant" when he asks "Is justice nothing—is honesty nothing—is liberty nothing? Are the laws of nations nothing?" We are not thinking any thing of the kind, but have been thinking that the writer must just have risen from the perusal of that celebrated letter which Junius addressed to Sir William Draper in which he says, 'Is the ordnance nothing? Are the Blues nothing? Is the command of the army with all the patronage annexed to it nothing?' And as to the Hurkaru's having been guilty of cockney cant, if his own conscience does not accuse him of it, we shall not. We make it a rule to eschew the word cant, because of its too great affinity to hypocrisy, with which we have no right to charge any man but on the most satisfactory proof of his being a villain. We had said "every independent state within the Indus exists only by our sufferance" and he says this fact is considered sufficient warrant for our robbery of that state. By whom is it so considered? not surely by us, for we have said nothing of the kind. We have never advocated the doctrine that the strong have a right to despoil the weak, because they have the power to do so. We have the same moral and patriotic abhorrence of it as the Hurkaru. He says that the annihilation of the independence of the Punjab*—without provocation—would be as lawful as his, that is, the Editor's, putting a loaded pistol to our temple and blowing out our brains. We have always thought the same thing, only we have never succeeded in putting it in so clear and striking a point of view.

But with the exception of the Punjab, and perhaps one or two minor states, with whom we have never tried issue in the field, all the other states in Hindoostan retain their independance by our sufferance, in whichever sense the term is used. As the paramount power in India, their independence is prolonged, not because we have not the power to absorb it, for as we have said, an army of fifteen thousand men, could annihilate all independent authority in the country; but because of our own moderation. This assertion was used by way of contrast to the rapacity of our predecessors on the throne of India, who left no crown independent which they had the power of subverting. But these states exist in another sense by our sufferance. There is scarcely one of them we have not been at war with,—a war not provoked by us,—and which our triumphs in the field have not placed entirely at our mercy. By the laws of war, we might have annexed the conquered territories to our own, but in the majority of instances we have restored them, and entered into treaties with the Chiefs. "These treaties we hold sacred," and while they are faithfully observed by the Native ruler, we have no right to subvert the independence of the state. We believe that in all these cases experience shews that this compassion of ours to the fallen greatness of the Chiefs, has been cruelty to their subjects; and that it would have been for "the greatest good of the greatest number" if we had incorporated these territories with our own, and extended to the people the blessings of British institutions. For defective, highly defective as those institutions may be, and susceptive as they are of indefinite improvement, still they are vastly superior to any which exist among the Native states. Hence it is our most ardent wish and hope that whenever these treaties may be annulled by the transgression of the Native power, they may never be renewed; but that our administration, civil, criminal and fiscal may be extended over the country. "If they offend us, that is another matter," says the Hurkaru. Just so. We have no right to invade the country while they are perfectly inoffensive; but whenever by their offences they oblige us to draw the sword, then comes the time for relieving the people from their oppressions. We would begin the work of absorption just at the time fixed by the Hurkaru, and not a week sooner.

The Hurkaru says, "the cool way in which our contemporary talks of the British Government being 'obliged by the current of circumstances to absorb any of these little independent states,' is worthy of—we will not say who—certainly most unworthy of the Friend of India—most unworthy of any liberal journal." Now here the Hurkaru is utterly at fault in the offence he has taken, for we endeavoured to use the mildest expressions we could think of at the moment. But we will give him full satisfaction; we will write worthy of the most liberal journal in India—we will write worthy of ourselves. We ask the reader therefore to expunge the sentence, the coolness of which displeases our contemporary, and to substitute this glowing passage in its stead; "The idea of charging our Government with ambition, when it is obliged by the treacherous and wanton aggression of such a little state as Kythul, or by the contumacy, the unheard of cruelties, the unparalleled perfidy of such a petty chief as the lord of Coorg, to extinguish the lamp of any of these little principalities, and to put it out of the power of the fools or villains that rule them, to annoy us, or oppress their subjects, is superlatively ludicrous."

* We are candid enough to confess, that we were not at the moment thinking of the Punjab, when we said that every state within the Indus existed only by our sufferance, upon the strength of treaties. For Indus read, Sutledge.

Should the Hurkaru continue the discussion, we shall be happy to furnish him with our Political Creed, about which he appears to labour under a mistake.

Bombay Dhurmu Shubha.—From an extract we have made from the Oriental Christian Spectator, published at Bombay, it would appear that the Brahmuns of that city, alarmed by the baptism of a Hindoo youth who attended the Seminary of the General Assembly, have agreed among themselves to withhold their own children from farther attendance, and to prevent all those who are under their influence from sending their children thither. They have also established a Standing Committee, to watch over the interests of Hindooism, which may eventually take the form of a Dhurmu Shubha. The Prubhakur, a native paper, which does not appear to be on the Christian side of the question, reasons justly on the subject, and predicts the miscarriage of this attempt to prop up Hindooism by social and religious pains and penalties. It is quite natural that the Brahmuns should combine for the preservation of those interests which they hold most dear to themselves; and so long as their opposition is confined within legitimate bounds, we have no right to complain, however much we may deplore the misapplication of their zeal. But they are almost sure to overstep the boundary of lawful exertions, and to overstrain the authority till it is felt to be tyrannical, and produces a reaction.

The Bombay Brahmuns can hardly establish a greater despotism than that which the Dhurmu Shubha set up in Calcutta, nor can they be expected to command the services of a more active and zealous Secretary, than Bhobanee Churn, the Editor of the Chundrika, or one more fertile in resources; yet our Calcutta Society has split into two hostile parties, and has thus lost its strength and vigor. It has been successful in no one object for which it was established. It has not restored the rite of Suttee. It has not arrested the progress of liberalism among the educated classes; it has not been able to stem the growing contempt for Hindooism, nor has it succeeded in preventing the voluntary attendance of the children of respectable parents at those Missionary Seminaries where Christian truth is inculcated. Neither will the Bombay Association do more than thin the ranks of Christian schools for a time. Its first effort in this line of opposition will be its strongest; the children whom it may be the means of withdrawing, will gradually return, and every succeeding attempt to interrupt their attendance will be marked with increasing feebleness, till the threat of excommunication becomes as idle a fancy as the threat of an Interdict from the Vatican would appear at this time of day.

Public Characters of the Punjab.—Three years ago a series of letters appeared in the Delhi Gazette, entitled "Passages in the life of an Adventurer in the Punjab." The writer has since published them in a separate volume, with a copy of which we were favoured some little time ago, and which we have read with the greater interest as the time appears to be approaching when our connection with the country he describes is likely to be more intimate. In order to give greater interest to the subject, he has thrown his observations together in the form of a little Romance, of which Col. Bellasis, a foreign adventurer, is the hero. He arrives at the Court of Runjeet Sing, into whose service he is received with a cordial welcome. Soon after he is appointed to the command of a brigade, and entrusted with the Hill fortress of Kangra, with orders from Runjeet to hold it "against all comers, be they who they may, my son, minister or servant; bear they my sunnud or not; no one gains admission, not even myself, until thrice I have thrust my head in at the wicket, and thrice thou hast examined my beard: then and then only, may the gate be opened." He proceeds to the fortress, puts it in a state of defence, disciplines his troops, and endeavours to promote the agriculture and commerce of the district. At no distance of time, Suchet Sing, the brother of the late Dhyan Sing, approaches Kangra, with an army of 12,000 men, and presents a perwanna from the Maharaja, ordering the delivery of the fort and territory. Bellasis refuses to obey the royal perwanna, pleading the express orders of Runjeet Sing that it should be delivered only to him in person. Suchet Sing attacks the fortress and is beaten off; but the contumacy of the foreign officer in resisting a Royal order is applauded at Court. Meanwhile, the young and lovely daughter of the ruler of Kangra whom the Sikhs had disinherited, is introduced with her mother to Bellasis, who at first entertains towards the girl, no other feeling but that of sympathy for her forlorn condition; but finding that her mind was occupied with more tender feelings towards him, he determines to make her his wife. While the two lovers are thus enjoying the most endearing intercourse, a hostile body approaches the fort through the mountain defiles. Bellasis plants his troops in the most advantageous position, and pours a destructive fire on them from the heights. They are entirely discomfited, and flee; but on his return to Kangra, he finds that his betrothed wife and her mother have been carried off by some villain. Search is made for her in every direction, but in vain. At length, he discovers that they had been conveyed by an emissary of the Dogur family to their inaccessible Hill fortress at Raj-ke-kote. Thither he despatches a confidential servant, and this enables the writer to describe minutely the position, and the resources of Dhyan Sing and his brother. The girl is afterwards restored to him, through the influence, it is believed, of the Durbar; and they are married according to Christian rites by a clergyman from Loodiana, with the full consent of Runjeet Sing. Bellasis is present at the meeting between Lord William Bentinck and the Maharajah at Roopur. He is subsequently appointed to inspect the Seik possessions on the south bank of the Sutledge, and eventually to arrange the whole border from Mooltan to Peshawur. While he was preparing to proceed on this latter commission, and was lying in his boats on the Sutledge, the boat containing his baggage is set on fire; he hastens to the spot; an armed body of two hundred men rush during his absence into his own vessel, and after a severe engagement with his servants, in which the villains were most roughly handled, succeed in their object by causing the death of the young bride, who is either thrown out of the window by them, or rushes out to avoid their violence. Bellasis who had been attacked and bound, contrives to extricate himself towards the morning, and is then informed of the tragic end of his wife. The river is dragged, and her body recovered two days after. He soon after relinquishes the service of the Maharaja, and the curtain drops on the last scene.

The chief attraction of this work consists in the valuable information with which it furnishes us, relative to some of the men who are now taking an active share in the affairs of the Punjab, and the character of the troops disciplined by European officers, whom our own army may soon be called to meet in the field. The various opportunities for observation which the writer has enjoyed, combined with his intimate knowledge of the native character, give a peculiar value to his remarks, and enable us to receive them with much confidence. The description he gives of Runjeet Sing, of his mode of conducting business, of his deep penetration, of his debauched habits, we have not room to refer to. They must be familiar to the reader, through the labours of previous writers, and Runjeet Sing himself now belongs to the province of History, not of Politics.

The following is the account which the writer gives of the origin of the Dogur family:

The men in highest confidence were Rajah Dhyân Singh and Jemadâr Khushiyâl Singh with the faqîr Azizûdin. The rise of the two first was not by the most respectable road. I believe there is little doubt that as ministers, and even victims of Runjeet Singh's debaucheries, they both first obtained favour. Gulâb Singh, and Suchet Singh, brothers to Dhyan Singh, are likewise wealthy and powerful; the territory and treasure of these brothers are not much inferior to those of His Highness himself. Although the family is of good blood, it was in obscurity, and Gulâb Singh was only a common sawâr: in a feud he killed a man, and being close pressed by the friends of his victim, he took refuge in the Maharajah's tent, then pitched in the plain, as was his custom when reviewing his troops. Runjeet was pleased with the refugee's appearance, pardoned, and took him into favour: he soon introduced his brother, who, in turn, brought in Suchet Singh. Each in turn endured the Maharajah's familiarities, and being men of business and courage, made their way into his permanent favour. All three became Rajâs, acquired jagirs and contracts that have enriched them beyond count, and the command of troops and territory that, with their own ability, make them dangerous subjects.

It was always a matter of astonishment to the well-wishers of Runjeet Singh, that wise and wary as he is, he allowed this fraternity such formidable power. Dhyan Singh knew the public feeling, and was ever on the spot to prevent its reaching his master's ear; or in his brief absences, had trusty followers to watch every avenue. But somehow, a little bird got access, and asked the Maharajah why he permitted such doings? "Why," said the king, "it is my fate—I threw myself on them—it is my destiny." And so it is—Dhyan Singh has the door-way; he has monopolised the office of Prime Minister, Commander of the forces, and chief aide-de-camp to His Highness: he has shut out almost all access; and though, as I before said, a supplicant does usually make his way into the presence, and raising the cry of "dohai," obtains a hearing; yet he is so soon hustled out, that, however gracious may have been his reception from the sovereign, he has seldom courage or ability to try a second hearing. Suchet Sing and Gulab Singh are seldom at Court, but are in the provinces, commanding large bodies of troops, and administering the territory they hold in farm: the latter holding the salt contracts, interferes directly with the bread of every man in the country.

Dhyan Singh, though slightly lame, is a fine looking man, of a noble presence, polite and affable, of winning manners and modest speech. He sits on the ground, and rather behind the Maharajah, while others, his inferiors in every way, are seated on chairs. The Raja decidedly is, next to his master, the ablest man in the Punjab; though, like him, so illiterate as scarcely to be able to sign his name.

Of Suchet Sing, who is now said to keep himself aloof from Heera Sing, we are told:

To do him justice, Suchet Singh was a bold and a gallant looking young man, a perfect soldier in appearance: he had many of the qualities necessary to a Commander, and with a handsome person and showy habits, was much the man to gain the hearts of a rude soldiery, and in reality he was a very popular leader, the more so indeed that not being very particular himself as to meum and tuum, he looked little to the discipline of his men, regarding every thing as light, but devotion to himself, and obedience to his commands. Such a chief, having funds to pay his troops, has but to raise his banner in any corner of the East to be quickly joined by crowds.

In the following extract the writer describes the parental fondness with which Raja Dhyan Sing regarded his son Heera Sing, now raised to the invidious eminence of Prime Minister, and de facto ruler of the Punjab.

Presently he emerged from the Zenanah with the boy, Hera Singh, by his side; he was a lump of a lad, with nothing striking in his features, which were smooth, of ordinary cast, and, if any thing, had a disagreeable pampered expression. He was, however, the pet of him who ruled the Punjab, and the darling of his father, the wise and calculating Dhyan Singh, who was now indeed a Raja of Rajas; in that Runjeet had lately conferred the princely title on the boy, Hera Singh. Emerging from the anderun with the boy, and addressing him with every endearing epithet, Dhyan Singh went up to one of the Halwais, or confectioners, a score of whom, with their temporary ovens, were hard at work in the inner area of the palace, preparing sweetmeats for distribution to the thousands who would be assembled at the approaching nuptials of the little Raja. It was, indeed for this purpose that the father had obtained leave of absence from Court; and it was in the hope of accomplishing the first wish of his heart, and securing an heir to his house, that he was now about to unite his first born darling to a daughter of one of the oldest families in the hills.

Caressing the child as he walked along, the ambitious father murmured half aloud, "Is it not for thee, my darling, piärra, my tota-myna, that I do all this? that I tread the slippery paths of ambition, and watch the pillow of that drivelling dotard? For thee I toil; wilt thou ever repay my labours, requite my love? Oh for one peep into the future!"

The gradual increase of the wealth, territory, and power of the brothers, is thus described:

Of late years such has been the audacity, ability and influence of the brotherhood, or rather of the two elder, that no year has passed without an extension of their territorial acquisitions; a fair sample of their doings is the fact that the first intimation Runjeet Singh received of operations on the Ladâk frontier was the announcement of the occupation of Ladâk itself by Zorawar Singh, the General of Gulab Singh's troops.

Raj-ke-kote mentioned below, is the mountain fortress of the Dogur family, in which Golab Sing, we believe, resides. Immense sums have been expended by Dhyan Sing in endeavouring to render it impregnable.

I saw but little of Raj-ke-kote, yet it was enough to shew how impregnable is its position, and that man has done for it almost as much as nature. The rock, isolated still more than that of Kangra, has more ample resources, is approachable only by means of baskets or ropes, let over a tremendous precipice; it is then bristling with guns, manned by European deserters, and is garrisoned by hill-men and the Rajah's choicest troops. The Maharajah has never seen the place, and Dhyan Singh will take care he never does.

In a supposed conversation with his servant Chandu, at Raj-ke-kote, Dhyan Sing thus unfolds his visions of ambition, which have been extinguished by his tragic death, just at the moment when he had attained the object of his long cherished desires.

No, these walls are built for other purposes; the Maharajah is weak and worn out, he may die to-morrow, he may be dead this moment, who then guides the States? Who is there, among the besotted, cowardly, drunken crew, to hold the government for one day? To keep friendship, or rather, peace with the farangis? to command the respect of the provinces; and above all, to restrain and curb our own soldiery; that mass of ruffians that it has been his Highness' pleasure to collect, and that he alone can compel? They are now deeply in arrears, and many of the leaders very unpopular, some of the best, as well as some of the worst. Runjeet Singh's death would be the signal, if not for total anarchy and a rush on the tosha khana, at least for much bloodshed and many masters. And then who would be safe? Certainly not those who had neglected to prepare for their own safety. I am saying more than perhaps is wise; but you have a nose and tongue, Chandu, you are prudent, and will not run the chance of losing them.

The writer, in the following sentences which he puts into the mouth of a Native, gives his own opinion of the value of that system of tactics which the foreign Generals had introduced into the army of the Punjab.

"Why Sahib, I think, as do most others, that it's all fudge, well enough to look at, and for display, but useless beyond this; the Sikhs have never used it yet, and never will; if ever they are induced to charge, it will be in a tumultuary manner, and the straight parade-line system will be entirely forgotten or despised in the hour of action; they themselves say it will do for parade, but not for battle, you may therefore judge of what use all the drilling has been. But it has had one good effect, it has called attention to the state of the army, their arms and their physical appearance; and as the troops of their neighbours have always been worse found and numerically inferior, the Seikh power has spread, but, in the Iron Battalions of the farangis, they will find other stuff, and the day that the two armies meet in the field, the Seikh Raj will end; their very discipline and conceit will ruin them; their affectation of equality will seal their destiny."

"Yes, I hear, that the English are highly disciplined and efficient troops."

"They are Lions, Sahib, each soldier is in himself a host, and their equipment and their guns are so unlike the tagrag and bob tail of our Maharajah's turnout, that it is a pleasure to go to Ludiana to see them."

The conversation of the Muha Raja refers to the same subject.

One day I was summoned to a private interview with the Maharajah, the fuqir alone being present; Runjeet was evidently nervously anxious as to the figure he and his troops should cut before the English, and he questioned me earnestly on my opinion. "Tell me," he said, tell me Bellasis, do you think these farangis would face my men, if it came to a fight? You look disconcerted, but you ought to know enough of me to understand that, when I ask an opinion I want one; not a mere echo of my own words." I was, and could not help appearing a good deal taken aback: I was averse to offend, and did not see how I could reply without touching the Maharajah on the most tender point. But I stuck to my principle, and replied sincerely "that I did not think his army could successfully confront one with European discipline."

"But why, Bellasis? see my guns—look at my infantry—count my Cavalry—and then measure the numbers of these farangis."

"Your Highness' servant wishes well to the Khalsa, and to the Government whose salt he eats, but he answers honestly, and says what he thinks."

"Then tell me, man, why you think so? Fear not, speak out."

"I may be wrong, but there are many reasons; the Europeans have superior discipline and better leaders, and their gradations of rank are more complete."

"But we could bring four times their number into the field."

"Which force you have no one to handle—it would therefore destroy itself."

"What! could not Ventura, or Court, or Avitabile? Could you not yourself? but perhaps you would not: is that your meaning?" and the old Chief's single eye glanced fire. This was the point that I had feared the conversation would come to; however I replied respectfully that I trusted there was no occasion for asking the question, and that the friendship between him and the Company would remain unbroken. But he was not to be so answered, and said impatiently, "that is no reply to my question." "Please your Highness, I would neither offend nor deceive, but since you ask me I must answer, that I could not fight against the English." "You should have told me so before," exclaimed the Maharajah, violently—"you have deceived me—you have eaten my salt, only to fail me when most wanted."

Of Lord William Bentinck, the writer gives us the following opinion;

He had then just weathered the half-batta storm; a campaign more trying perhaps to British interests than any they had yet undertaken, and which nothing but the right feeling of the majority of the officers, and, perhaps, want of decided leaders, prevented ending in open and wide spread mutiny; he was right in not yielding to the loudly expressed cries of the military; but he was wrong in the manner in which he executed his invidious commission; and more wrong still, in not separating himself from the unjust act by putting himself on half-batta too. But enough, and peace to his ashes; he meant well, and may the odium rest on those who calmly and coldly, from across the ocean, sent out such orders, and again and again repeated them, as not one of themselves would have dared to enforce.

THE LATE MAJOR CRAIGIE.

[From a Correspondent.]

During the past month the service has lost one of its most efficient, and zealous officers by the untimely death of Major Patrick Craigie, Deputy Adjutant General of this Army.

In recording a tribute to the memory of departed worth, a friend is apt to exceed the bounds of moderation, a fault which the writer of these feeble lines is in little danger of committing being conscious of his total inability to do justice to the lamented subject of his humble eulogium.

Distinguished at an early period of his service by laudable ambition for professional advancement, Major Craigie obtained employment on the staff, where his ability soon made him conspicuous as an officer of the highest promise.

As Assistant Adjutant General of the Meerut Division he gained the confidence, and unqualified approbation, of General Sir Thomas Reynells, and the late Commander-in-Chief, Sir Jasper Nicolls, and was ere long called to a more extended sphere of usefulness by removal to the Department of the Adjutant General of the Army.

From his nomination, to this responsible and honourable position until the hour of his death he devoted himself entirely to official duties, gaining the confidence of all under whom he served—he was selected by Sir H. Fane as principal staff to the army of the Indus and Lord Keane duly appreciating his services, recommended him in the strongest terms on his return to India. His perfect knowledge of the multifarious details of the service, wonderful facility in transacting business, constant anxiety to improve the discipline of the Army, pleasing urbanity, and invariable readiness to afford every information to those who sought it, peculiarly fitted him for this important situation.

The promptitude and activity displayed by him in the field, equalled his intelligence and assiduity in office, rendering his services invaluable in every capacity.

His energies were straitened to the very last, and even when the hand of death was upon him he was with difficulty persuaded to quit his post, thus terminating a career of extensive usefulness; alas too suddenly; though fully as honourably as had he fallen on the field of battle,—furnishing a noble example of untiring zeal for the welfare of the army of which he was so bright an ornament, and leaving a name which will ever be held dear by many who knew his value as an officer, and his worth as a friend, he evinced in his dying moments a manly fortitude, and Christian resignation the true characteristics of a well spent life.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16.

— The Hindoostan steamer left Calcutta yesterday morning punctually at sunrise, with about seventy passengers. The Star says that it has been customary to supply a list of the passengers, but that for reasons not unfolded all information on the subject has been refused.

— The state of affairs at Gwalior does not appear to be satisfactory, notwithstanding the capture of the usurper. Last week, says a letter from Cawnpore, in the Star, the Commander in Chief directed all corps warned for future service, to stand fast with the exception of the detachments of Artillery. This order we may suppose was issued on the report of the revolution which upset the authority of Khasgee. On the 8th instant, orders were issued to put the whole force in motion, and they were to commence their march on the 13th, 14th, and 15th. This counter order may have been occasioned by the fresh revolution, which divided the troops into two hostile parties. Whether we advance, or the differences are compromised, it is understood that the occupation of the ... our troops will cease. It is scarcely to be supposed that they will lay down their arms and retire to beggary and starvation, without something like a struggle.

— The Madras papers notice the augmentation of the Corps of Engineers by two Captains and four Subalterns.

— The Delhi Gazette of the 8th states that Dost Mahomed was at the date of the last accounts from Cabul, in good health. He may have been fired at, but was neither shot nor wounded. The Hill tribes demand the release of Ameenoolla, the "infamous Ameenoolla," but the Dost refuses to comply with their wishes, well knowing that the man, if set at liberty, would breed an insurrection.

— We are happy to see among the Orders of the Lieut. Governor of the North West Provinces the appointment of Capt. Cautley, as Superintendent of Canals in the Dooab, and Director of the works on the Ganges Canal.

— The following notice appears to be the latest intelligence from Gwalior. It is from the Hurkaru, and rather serves to neutralize the prospect of an early adjustment of differences.

Nov. 6. "I have not thought it worth while to write to you, since I gave you the result of the Maharaj Cumpoo's doings in the seizure of the Khasgeewalla. The Baee and her party have, however, organised such troops as continue on their side, and commenced entrenching themselves against the rebels.

"The latter defy them and threaten that, on the first shot, off goes the Khasgee's head, and then war to the knife. How far they will carry their threat into execution depends on the resoluteness of the Baee, for if she gives in, there will be an end of all the trouble, until some determination is come to, with regard to the proposals made by the British Government—the ultimatum having, I am told, been received, and a short time allowed for reply."

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 17.

— The Star states that Lord Ellenborough starts for the North West Provinces on the 25th Instant.

— From the same paper we learn that the Lord Bishop was expected to arrive at Patna, in the course of the day on the 10th Instant, and that the Chief Justice of Bombay is so extremely ill, as to be under the necessity of quitting the Presidency immediately.

— It has been matter of no small surprise that the Court of Directors to whom the general question of Lotteries was submitted more than six months ago, when the state Lottery in Calcutta was extinguished, should not have hastened to express their entire concurrence in the measure and to desire that the reform might be completed by passing of an Act which should make lotteries as illegal in India as they are in England. In consequence of their backwardness in the cause of public morals, various lotteries, to a very large amount,—indeed to an amount almost equal to that of the State lotteries—are advertised from day to day in the papers. One of them, belongs to Methold and Co., who state that the prize of a lakh of Rupees had fallen to the lot of Baboo somebody, and that of 20,000 Rupees to the number held by General Fast. We are now informed in the Star that the General has commenced an action for the recovery of it; and there can be no doubt that the Baboo, if he should ever hear of his good fortune, would do well to imitate the example. Why does not the Court deliver us from these nuisances?

— The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states that Major Parker, of H. M. 28th, has put a period to his existence in a delirium arising from a severe fever.

— The Puteeala Rajah, says the Hurkaru, after having been repeatedly summoned, has set out for Lahore to present himself at the Durbar? Puteeala is the largest of the Seikh states, on the left bank of the Sutledge which is under the protection of the British. We thought this protection carried with it independence of Lahore; but the notice in the Hurkaru shews that we were mistaken.

— The Agra Ukhbar alludes to a very valuable collection of ancient silver and copper coins made by Capt. C. H. Burt, of the 64th Regiment, during the late campaign in Affghanistan which he has presented to Lord Ellenborough and which his Lordship has sent to the British Museum. This collection will be particularly valuable in consequence of the utter loss, in the disastrous retreat, of several noble collections which had been made by our own officers. We believe Lady Sale's collection, which was of peculiar value, shared the fate of all the others.

— A letter from Sandoway in Aracan, dated the 31st October, informs us that a severe shock of an earthquake was felt there on the morning of the 30th; but no injury was done. The same letter states that Lieut. Hopkinson had been deputed to make a geological survey of the Island which was thrown up out of the sea sometime ago near Cheduba.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18.

— The Star informs us that the Church to be built by subscription at Darjeling is on the point of being commenced. The subscription both at the station, and from individuals who take an interest in the Sanatarium, and from those who have already derived benefit from it, has been very liberal.

— The Englishman's Overland Summary states that the enterprizing firm of Aylwin and Co. have taken to shipping rags from India to England, a branch of trade hitherto monopolized by the Italian States. Not so. England is chiefly supplied with rags from Hamburgh. The Italian rags for the most part find their way across the Atlantic; but as the Natives of India never quit their clothes till they are rotten, and even then make them up into quilts, the speculation is not likely to be profitable.

— The Bombay Times states, that preliminary steps have been taken to establish a branch of the Bombay Bank in Calcutta, and that business will commence as soon as a sufficient number of shareholders have been found to form a Board of Directors.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20.

— The dawk edition of the Hurkaru, on Saturday, gave an extract of a letter from Lahore, the purport of which was that Heera Singh, and Lena Singh Majeteea had quarrelled; that the former was in the fort, and that the latter with the father of Now Nehal's widow, had attacked it with a large force and upwards of a hundred guns But after the specimens we have had of spurious information systematically despatched from the Punjab, we are constrained to receive all news from the scouts, with some mistrust.

— The Agra Ukhbar has revived the report that the Governor General intends to establish the Supreme Government, at Agra. The Supreme Government is coveted both at Bombay and at Agra, but the present Ruler has no idea of removing it, and we question whether its seat will be disturbed for a very long time to come.

— At the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, the Governor General has added a Corps to be styled the left wing, to the Army of Exercise, and this has rendered a new disposition of that army necessary, for which however we cannot find room. All appointments are to date from the 25th instant. It was said a day or two ago that some of the corps had been ordered to stand fast, but it is now understood that they march without delay to their stations. Yet the question of peace and war seems undecided. At any rate, the Gungajulee Treasury is to pay the expense, all the expense of this gathering; not a farthing of it is to fall on the British Government, which is perhaps the reason why the 5 per cents. are looking so ambitiously up to nine per cent. premium.

— The Military Board has been recast. The Chief Magistrate's services are dispensed with,—indeed it would be difficult to tell why he ever had a seat at it. The Commissary General is to be a member, and his department is incorporated with the Board. The following arrangements are made in consequence upon new model.

17th Nov.—The Governor General of India in Council is pleased to make the following Arrangements and Appointments:

Lieut. Col. Burlton, Commissary General, to have a seat at the Military Board, which he will join under instructions from the Military Department.

From the date of the Commissary General taking his seat, the functions of his office will be transferred to the Board.

Under the foregoing arrangement the number of stipendiary members attached to the Military Board may be conveniently reduced to one, and the next vacancy that may occur, will not be filled up.

The Governor General in Council is also pleased to relieve the Chief Magistrate of Calcutta, for the future, from the duty attached to his appointment as ex-officio member of the Military Board.

To provide for the due superintendence of Commissariat arrangements on the transfer of the services of the Commissary General to the Military Board, His Lordship in Council has decided on augmenting the number of Deputy Commissaries General, and Lieut. Col. Francis S. Hawkins, C. B., of the 38th N. I., is nominated Joint Deputy Commissary General.

Capt. G. T. Greene, Garrison Engineer of Fort William and Civil Architect at the Presidency, is appointed Secretary to the Military Board, in the room of Major Henry DeBude, of the Corps of Engineers, deceased.

— The Star continues to follow up the scent after the Soliman Shaw, which he says belongs to a very stoical Jew in Calcutta, who affirms she was consigned from Muscat with a cargo of salt, dates, and sundries, which renders her appearance at the estuary of the Roymungul still more suspicious. The Star states that there was long an intimate intercourse between the Imam and the Nabob of Dacca, and that so low down as 1770 the Nabob solicited aid in arms, and munitions of war from the Imam to resist the English. "The correspondence was discovered, and the proceedings instituted against the Nabob on that occasion constitute the first of the causes celebres, in which a feudatory had been arraigned for bad faith." The circumstance is quite new to us, and we should take it as a favour if the Star would note the work in which it is to be found.

— The Great Gun has been mounted upon a stone base in front of Government House, but there is no Dragon. The mouth of the cannon points directly at the statue of Lord Hastings. The Star is pleased to be facetious on the occasion and makes the gun spout puns as if he were an editor; but we really wish some of our brethren in the City of Palaces would tell the benighted inhabitants of the interior, where the gun came from, what it is intended to represent, and why it is put up in its present position.

— H. M's. 13th Light Infantry reached Loodiana on the 6th instant. A letter from that station published in the Hurkaru, states that orders had arrived from Head Quarters requiring every man in the division, the 9th Foot excepted, and even including the 13th, to be in readiness for immediate active service. The sick to be left behind with a small guard from each Regiment. Is the 13th to be employed in gathering a few more laurels before it embarks for England?

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 21.

— The Star has intelligence from Ferozepore to the 10th instant, which confirms in a great measure the statements which had been previously received regarding the state of affairs in the Punjab. A deadly enmity has, it is said, sprung up between Lena Sing and Heera Sing; the former is said to have assembled an army of 10,000 men, with which he is watching an opportunity for action. It is expected that Raja Golab Sing will march down upon Lahore to settle matters; but while his back is turned, matters will probably be unsettled at Jumboo. Dost Mahomed, it is now said, has been wounded, not killed; and Akbar Khan is at the western mouth of the Khyber ready to march upon Peshawur. Meanwhile the Seikh reinforcements who have been ordered thither, refuse, they say, to march.

— The only arrival yesterday was the Hindoo from Liverpool. She reports having seen eight vessels at sea making for Calcutta eight days ago. Among these we hope are the Agincourt and the Southampton which have now been overdue a whole fortnight. The Hindoostan, which left Madras a month ago, is still missing. We hope the week will bring in a whole fleet of ships long expected as well as the Bentinck and the Mail.

— The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states, that the Persian Government has resolved to send troops to occupy Karrack, and have pledged themselves to support one of the Seikhs of Bahrein who has asked their assistance.

— The Englishman states that Baboo Mootee Lall Seel has, by an act of great munificence and yet with a modesty that would do credit to any one, liberated all the debtors of the Great Jail. We wish the Editor would tell us the amount; after the fact is known, there can be no harm in stating the sum. It is one of the most remarkable features of society in Calcutta, that all these acts of munificence which are done with such blushing modesty, that the man would not have them whispered for the world, always find their way into the public newspapers.

— The Hurkaru gives an account of the Governor General's visit to the Company's dock yard at Kidderpore last week, with which his Lordship seemed to be much gratified; but his Lordship was of course quite shocked to find, that after so large a sum had been expended on the establishment, there was not a dock large enough for the first class of steamers, and that Government was still dependent on the private dock yards for their accommodation and repairs. We have heard that another has been contemplated. Why not make it large enough for the largest, for an 1800 ton Steamer, if necessary?

— The Hurkaru gives an account of another batch of returned Coolies, recently brought by the Water Witch. They were not in so plump and flourishing a condition as those which preceded them. Nine died on the passage; four others immediately after landing in the Howrah Hospital. They were also poor, three of them having had only 27 Rupees each. Government should look into the matter and make it the subject of special reference to the Mauritius authorities. It is quite possible that the deaths may have been occasioned by neglect.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

— No Mail yet—the 22d—the Bombay Steamers are become insufferably dilatory, and the sooner the Court of Directors adopt the common sense plan of employing the Steam Navigation Company's vessels from Suez to Galle, Madras and Calcutta with a branch vessel from Aden to Bombay, the better.

— The Maidstone is announced this morning, from the Cape in a month and twenty-one days. She is one of the best London vessels, and we hope her arrival will be the precursor of all the other vessels which are now due.

— The Star states that the Coolies to whom the Hurkaru alluded yesterday have returned from Demarara, and not from the Mauritius, and that they returned rich, only those of whom the Hurkaru heard returned poor. Of 222, thirty-seven died on the passage. Of the 37, eight left from 150 to 215 dollars each; eight from 99 to 149 each and ten from 30 to 99 each. This report is unsatisfactory. We have not the Anti-Slavery Reporter by us; but if our memory does not greatly deceive us, they were said in the Demarara journal to have left the Colony with much larger sums.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

ATTEMPT OF THE BRAHMANS IN BOMBAY TO RETARD THE SPREAD OF TRUTH.

Since the recent baptism of Narayan, a pupil connected with the General Assembly's Institution, discussions connected with it have been keenly carried on in the Native papers. The Dnyana Sindhu, which is the organ of the high Brahmanical party, has been especially violent. But in addition to this, the whole matter of conversion and the spread of Christianity has been reviewed in a grand Assembly of the Brahmanical inhabitants of Bombay convened at one of the chief temples. The following extract from the Prabhakar of 24th September contains their own statement of the result of their deliberations and determinations.

"On the 14th day of September 1843, all the Brahman inhabitants of Bombay met together and passed the following resolutions:—

"Whereas, Christian Missionaries, otherwise called Padris, having come into this country to make known their religion, distribute Christian books, and preach in various ways, to induce the people to embrace their religion, and for this purpose have also established numerous schools; and whereas the children of Hindus attend these schools for instruction, and being ignorant of their own religion and hearing the Missionaries constantly abusing the Hindu religion and praising Christianity, some of them have lost their reason, and forsaking their own good religion, founded on the Vedas, have become Christians; and whereas should the same course continue to be pursued, others will be converted hereafter, and thus the Hindu religion suffer injury; therefore for the preservation of our own religion, it becomes necessary to make the following rules:—

1. "No Brahman shall ever attend the school of the Christian Missionaries to learn their religion, or to hear their instruction, nor shall they allow their children, or any under them, to attend their schools; and if any Hindus revile their own religion or preach the Christian religion, means must be taken to prevent their doing so.

2. "All Brahmans must follow the above rule; and whoever does not follow it, must be regarded as out of caste.

"To carry these resolutions into effect, and to assemble another meeting of the whole company of Brahmans, should any cause arise, officers have been appointed."

The editor of the Prabhakar thus expresses himself in connexion with these doings. (We may take his opinions on the point as the opinions of a pretty large section of the Native community.)

"We have one word to say to the Brahmans. They are free to send their own children where they please, or not to send them where they do not wish them to go. They are also free to warn those, who are walking contrary to the Hindu religion, and in this way induce them to forsake their opposition. But if they endeavour to do more than this, and try to frighten those who are serving the Missionaries for pay, by threatening to put them out of caste, the consequence will be that they will meet with twofold opposition and difficulty; they will not be able to accomplish their desired object, and will be laughed at for their folly."—Bombay Oriental Christian Spectator, for November, 1843.

CHINA.

Lin is dead,—and here is an obituary notice issued by his Celestial Majesty. You will doubtless suppose it reflects severely upon that stirring period of his life when in conflict with the Barbarians, he robbed them of their property, as afterwards acknowledged by the Court, and for which he was to have been banished to the "Cold Country." Not one single word about the matter, either in praise or censure!

Energetic he was, in rash and ill judged measures, patriotic in his thorough hatred of every thing not Chinese, and refined in the arts of cruelty and mendacity; and having conceded so much to him, let us proceed to the perusal of a panegyric by his master.

An Imperial Edict.—The great statesman, Lin-tsih-sen, preserved an undeviating line of rectitude, and the principles of probity and uprightness were rooted in his nature. In manner he was plain and affable, and his singleness of heart was even eminently displayed. In the reign of Kea King, having been honoured by an Imperial examination he was raised from the rank of Hanlin (the highest literary graduate) to a seat in the Cabinet. We, upon coming to the throne, and observing his patriotic spirit, his despatch in business and his extensive and varied experience, ordered his presence about the Imperial person, in which capacity he remained for upwards of ten years without a single instance of default. Last year we sent him to the province of H[illegible]-nan to superintend the embanking operation. [illegible] Yellow River in the Seang-hoo district, were conducted and completed with his zeal and energy. Our Council then recomme[illegible] us to take his age into consideration, and be[illegible]g fully aware that nature with him was on the decay, we granted him a double term of holidays (20 days). As however he petitioned for a prolongation of this period we gave him a month in addition to rest his mental as well as physical powers.—On recovering, he immediately returned to his duties, but only a few days after, he suddenly departed this life in the Palace, while in the act of preparing a document for our inspection. Our grief was extreme, for he had a strong claim on our gratitude, and we therefore now confer honors according to his rank as a statesman and scholar. As a proof of our affection we shall offer sacrifice to his departed spirit in the Temple of the Virtuous. We have conferred upon him the To-lo king cover for his coffin and now appoint the Princes Tsae tuy and Tae-ling with ten officers of the Imperial body guard on an early day to pour out a libation before him. Let a donation of 1,500 Taels of Silver be given for his funeral expenses, and let his body lie in state in the Imperial cemetry, for in his official capacity there is not a single instance in which he deserved reprehension. His Grandsons Lin-tseen, Lin-ching, and Lin-yung when arrived at the years of maturity (16) are to be presented to the Civil Board, that we may confer our favours upon them and thus shew our grief for the deceased. When the usual ceremonies on this occasion have been performed, let them be duly reported.—Respect this. —No date.—From a Correspondent of the Singapore Free Press.

China.—We have at last received China papers up to the 30th ultimo. From these it would appear that the aspect of affairs is not so promising as might have been expected. Obstacles have been thrown in the way of the trade at Canton, from the refusal of the Hong Merchants to become the recipients of goods, but chiefly from the exorbitant demands made by the Linguists for their services. These the merchants have in some measure been obliged from circumstances to comply with, but it is clear that if the Linguists are allowed to dictate their own terms to the Foreign merchants that it will neutralize the benefits which were expected from the new state of things, if not altogether stop the trade. We have made very copious extracts on these subjects as they cannot but be of much interest to all our readers. Some fatality would appear to attend Hongkong which seems destined to nip her rising greatness in the bud. First,—instructions are received from England which virtually put an end to her existence as a free port; and now a malignant fever has visited her shores working havock among her inhabitants. We are not furnished with any detailed accounts of the first appearance or progress of this fatal sickness, but we find that its ravages have been very extensive. We are still without some of our papers so that we are not in possession of a complete list of the victims. Amongst the deaths however are those of Mr. Alexander Scott, late of Singapore—Mr. William Scott, Merchant—Hon'ble Mr. Morrison, Chinese Secretary and Member of Council—Mr. Elworthy and Mr. Dyer, late from England—Mr. Mercer, of the establishment of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co. —Capt. de Haveland of H. M. 55th Regt. Asst. Surveyor—Mr. D. Bates, a native of New York —Mr. W. Smith, Mr. J. B. Kent, Capt. J. M. Hight, late of the Brig Antares. At Amoy—Capt. D. G. List, late Commander of the Barque Sir E. Ryan.—Singapore Free Press, 12th Oct.

Howqua—the Senior Hong merchant expired at Canton on the 4th instant. His biography would include all the important events connected with the Foreign trade during the last thirty years; hence we shall confine ourselves to a few remarks on the character and conduct of the deceased.

Howqua, was descended from a respectable Fo-Kien family, long resident in the principal Black-tea district, and his grandfather was one of the Amoy Hong, who with the progenitors of the Canton Hong merchants Poon-ke-qua, Chunc-qua, and Min-qua were ordered by the Emperor to remove to Canton, when all intercourse was forbidden with the English and Dutch, at the Port of Amoy.

Howqua had attained his seventy-fifth year when he died, and for a long time has been in a feeble state of health, with an extremely attenuated frame, but with unimpaired intellectual vigour up to his last illness. His fortune is estimated variously, but it is believed he has large investments in the British and Foreign funds, and we know that a twelvemonth since, one of the most intimate of his foreign friends expressed his belief that Howqua was then worth at least twenty-five millions [illegible] [illegible]ars : except a small portion, the whole i[illegible] [illegible]ult of his own industry and entreprise.

[illegible] attack on Canton during the last war in[illegible] considerable injury on Howqua, the value o[illegible] [illegible]e Pack houses and their contents, which were then destroyed ; amounted alone to one million of dollars, and Howqua used to affirm, that the war had inflicted on him a loss of two millions of dollars. His proportion of the Canton Ransom was £800,000. It was after this event that he prayed the Emperor, to be permitted to retire from his position as a Hong Merchant, respectfully tendering at the same time what he called all his wealth, viz. 2,500,000 taels which he said, all accrued to him from the Emperor's bounty, and supplicated the Imperial will to accord him such portion thereof, as its heavenly benevolence deemed fit to maintain him during the wretched remnant of his life. This petitior was refused.

It must however be observed, that the Chinese Government had the greatest confidence in Howqua, who to the last, retained an inveterate aversion to new customs and modern fashions, whilst he clung with the most conservative tenacity to the old corrupt system, by which his vast wealth was mainly accumulated.

Howqua was the guardian and comptroller of the Kong-soo fund, and the organ of communication between the Government and the Foreign Merchants. He possessed vast power and influence among his countrymen, was a large landed proprietor, and had founded and endowed a temple to Buddha in the suburbs of Canton. It was supposed that the refusal of Howqua's prayer to retire into private life, was owing to the late war, and the claims which the Government might have on his services at such a crisis, we believe the truth was, that besides the undeniable influence Howqua possessed, yet his notorious wealth and success was the cause of his detention. The local Mandarins, and perhaps also some at Pekin, were well aware that Howqua was made of squeezable materials and as long as he occupied his onerous post, they could often test his qualities in that respect.

As a Merchant we believe the deceased could be favorably contrasted with the most eminent that Europe has produced. It seems almost incredible, but not less true, that to the last, he directed his vast and complicated trade which almost encircled the globe—alone. His knowledge, and even familiarity with mercantile details connected with the trade of Foreign ports was truly astonishing, sound judgement, true prudence, wary circumspection, and a wise economy, were distinguishing traits of his mercantile character.

By our countrymen Howqua was not liked, his predelictions were American, and justly so, we think, seeing that he was indebted in an early stage of his career to a citizen of that country, for information he sought in vain from the English ; and moreover the monopoly of the East India Company rendered an American association preferable in a pecuniary sense to any English connexion.

It is alleged by his friends that Howqua would never consent to evade the duties, or smuggle any kind of goods, we doubt this, as he had branch houses at Soochow, Ningpo, Shanghai, and other opulent cities in China ; it is hardly credible that he could successfully carry on his business there, with competitors who did smuggle whenever they had the opportunity. and which the notorious venality of the Authorities rendered quite the rule, rather than the exception.

In conclusion we are glad to record a gratifying fact which will embalm the memory of old Howqua. Since the difficulties about the Opium Trade, he has wholly abstained from touching the "unclean thing." Directly or indirectly, he has uniformly refused again engaging in this traffic, although he might have added millions upon millions to his treasure. This is no mean testimony to his patriotism, and his respect for the laws and regulations of his country. As a type of the old regime—as a Chinese conservative of the "purest ray serene" the death of Howqua will perhaps be deemed by his sovereign and country, as a positive national calamity.—Friend of China, Sept. 14.

THE OFFICIAL RECEPTION OF THE FRENCH CONSUL AT CANTON.

We learn by letters from Canton, that the Charming Country House of Poon-Ting-Qua, has served lately, for the scene of the presentation, by Monsieur, the Count de Ratti Menton, the French Consul in China, of his credentials, to His Excellency the Viceroy of Canton.

This ceremony, which was preceded by several visits, to the French Consul, and Captain Fornier Duplan, from the Kwang-Chow-Foo, and a delegate from the Imperial Commissioner, and to which the Chinese Authorities seemed willing to give an eclat, as marked as it was novel, may be considered another progressive step in the events which have lately taken place. Towards 8 o'clock, on the morning of the 6th inst., two boats from the French Corvette Alcmene, with their crews in full dress, and having the national flag flying, left Canton, for the place of meeting. They contained the French Consul, Captain Fornier Duplan, the Chancellor of the Consulate, eight Officers of the Corvette, an Interpreter chosen by Captain F. D. J. A. Durran, a French Merchant, and several other distinguished persons who had expressed a desire to be present at the ceremony.

After an hours pull, amidst numbers of boats, the inhabitants of which, saw for the first time with curiosity and astonishment, so many French uniforms, they reached the House of Poon-Ting-Qua. The large halls, were at once placed at the disposal of the Captain and the Consul, where they received a visit from a delegate of the Imperial Commissioner, the Kwang-Chow-Foo and several other Mandarins. At near the hour fixed upon, a message came from the Commissioner, by an Officer, wearing a Chrystal button, that he was prepared for the interview. Monsieur the Consul de Ratti Menton, and the Captain, accompanied by those persons, already referred to, and preceded by a Mandarin, descended to the reception room, where they found the High Chinese Officers and a number of other functionaries wearing blue and white buttons.

After a little complimentary conversation on both sides, the French Consul, presented his credentials, from the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, to His Excellency the Viceroy, who handed them, to the Imperial Commissioner, who, took note of, and returned them, to him, when this ceremony was concluded, many questions were put, concerning His Majesty, the King of the French, of France generally, and its Ministers : M. Guizot particularly, became the subject of conversation. This continued for more than an hour, and did not interrupt a delicious collation, offered in the mean time, by the Chinese Authorities to their numerous Guests.

The many marks of attention of which Captain Fornier Duplan, the Consul, were the objects, in presence of nearly two hundred Chinese who composed the suites of the numerous Mandarins, would lead us to suppose that an important change, is beginning to operate, in their ideas with reference to Europeans. Such a disposition, managed with care, would appear to augur an approach to an entire friendly understanding between the Celestial Empire and the various European Governments.—Communicated.—The Friend of China, Supplement, Sept. 16.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CAPT. NICOLSON.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Under the Weekly Epitome of news of the 9th Nov. you state that of the officers who served with honour under Lord Auckland—and were subsequently proscribed, there remain unrewarded only Col. Outram and Majors McGregor and Pottinger. May I therefore be permitted to ask is not Captain Peter Nicolson one of the officers who rendered eminent services during the Affghan campaign? I am, Sir,

Yours obediently,

Jungle Mehals. S.

The omission of Capt. Nicolson's name was quite accidental. We have good reason to believe that the present Governor General will not be long in placing on the political staff, one who has committed no misdemeanor but that of having served with zeal, fidelity and honour, the Government of the time. Capt. Nicolson will cease to regret our having omitted his name when it has been the means of informing him that his services live in the remembrance of a Native of great intelligence in the Ultima Thule of Bengal, the Jungle Mehals.—Editor.

MESSRS. TULLOH AND CO.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—On Monday last the 13th inst. a gentleman was sued in the Calcutta Court of Requests for a debt said to be due by him to Messrs. Tulloh and Co. The gentleman, it appeared, declined to discharge one of the Bills of Messrs. Tulloh and Co. when presented to him on the 24th October last, because it was not accompanied with the necessary Voucher or Receipt, as the other Bills were, for the article said to have been supplied to him a year ago, viz. in November 1842. The case came on before Russomoy Dutt. The defendant, together with an attorney at law, and other gentlemen present, strenuously urged that it would have been altogether preposterous to pay a demand made against him after the lapse of such a length of time, without the satisfaction of seeing and taking back his receipt or voucher for the article for which the claim is made against him, but Russomoy Dutt resolved that it was not necessary that the Bill against the gentleman should have been accompanied with the requisite voucher or receipt, as it was not the practice with Messrs. Tulloh and Co. to send invariably such receipts or vouchers for articles supplied by them. After saying so, Russomoy Dutt entered his Colleagues' room, Mr. Brietzcke, and on coming out soon again, said that his Colleague Mr. Brietzcke fully approved of his judgement, and accordingly Russomoy Dutt decreed the case with costs against the defendant.

Should you, Sir, think as I do, that this is a palpable instance of an act of abuse in the administration of justice in the Calcutta Court of Requests, you will please to notice the case in the Friend of India for public information.

I remain, Yours faithfully,

AN INHABITANT OF CALCUTTA.

Calcutta, 18th Nov. 1843.

Our correspondent will excuse us for not exactly agreeing with him. It appears that the receipts or vouchers of a number of Bills were presented, one was missing. It is more reasonable to suppose that it was lost, than that the charge was fictitious. If the objector had denied the receipt of the article, that would have been another thing ; but it appears that he refused payment simply because there was no receipt. A receipt is valuable as conclusive evidence, but there may be other evidence not less valid. We should consider the party to have been aggrieved if he had stated his constientious belief that he had never received the goods. Tulloh and Co. must sell some two hundred thousand lots a year ; and in a country where natives have been intolerably careless from the time beyond which the memory of man extendeth not, if one fourth the vouchers were lost, we should only be surprized at this extreme moderation of negligence. Indeed to us, who know something of the country, it appears almost as marvellous how Tulloh and Co. contrive to get on from year to year, without breaking down altogether as—to compare small things with great—how Napoleon's Commissariat fed 450,000 on the banks of the Vistula.—Ed.

THE ABKAREE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—You may remember that about two years ago Government, having been convinced of the neglect that attended the operations of the Abkaree department under the Collectors of land revenue, appointed, by the suggestion of Mr. Parker, then a member of the Board of Customs, Salt and Opium, a Commissioner for its superintendence. The system was made experimental and Government reserved to itself the option of extending it to all the Zillahs under its jurisdiction, when a reasonable degree of success should be known to mark its progress. But, Sir, you will be glad to hear that by the exertions of such efficient officers as Messrs. Palmer and Donnelly, the revenue in the districts of 24-Pergunnahs, Punchanongram, Hooghly, Burdwan, Nuddeah, Bancoorah, Maunbhoom, Jessore and Backergunge has been raised to double the sum realized by the Collectors of land revenue. This is owing to the efficiency of the system, for, every district, being under the supervision of four or more responsible Darogahs acting under the guidance of an Assistant and a Superintendent who receive the periodical instructions of the Commissioner, must yield a revenue proportionate to the increased official vigilance by which it is superintended. After such brilliant effects, when we see Government counting double revenue, illicit sales of excisable articles prevented, oppression on the subjects discontinued, and a regular road pointed out for the transaction of business, you will not doubt the efficiency of the system and will concur with me in the opinion that Government ought not to delay the transfer to the Commissionership of the other Zillahs and Calcutta, in particular, which has suffered most from an inefficient system in spite of its peculiar convenience for the realization of a large amount, and has always proved detrimental to the revenue of the 24-Pergunnahs. Mr. Editor, I have been persuaded to address you on this subject by an article I read some time ago in turning over a number of the Bengal Spectator in which it is stated that Government intends the transfer proposed. If that be the case, as I have cause to believe it to be, then Government ought to do so in this season of the year so very convenient for effecting a settlement, you may recollect that when the experimental system was introduced the new settlement was effected in November which all experienced persons acknowledge to be the most proper time.

Yours truly,

Calcutta, Nov. 3d, 1843. AKKAR.

P. S. Furthermore, Government ought to transfer other districts without delay because the officiating Commissioner from whom originated the report to Government on the subject may have an opportunity of carrying his views into execution.

THE ASSAM STEAMER.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to an article in the last issue of your paper, permit me to correct a statement it contains that the Assam Steamer has been found utterly unsuited for the navigation of the Berhampooter, for which she was originally intended: On further enquiry you will find this not to be the case. The Assam has made two successful voyages up the Berhampooter, to the extreme point the purposes of the Company required, and on the last occasion in September 1842, when commanded by Captain Smith, the Assam proceeded some miles beyond Dikho Mookh, being considerably further I believe than any Steamer ever went before in that direction, and nothing occurred to warrant the assertion that the vessel is unsuited for the navigation of that river. The last trip made by the Assam to Allahabad afforded another proof of her perfect efficiency for river navigation, the period of her absence from Calcutta being only 32 days, including a detention of a day and a half at Dinapore, and two days at Allahabad. The next Government Steamer occupied ten days more in the trip.

With regard to your remarks upon the advantage afforded to the public by Government in receiving freight at the moderate rate of 1 Rs. 8 As. per foot, whereas the Assam Company charge the exorbitant price of 2 Rupees, permit me to say it is very seldom the public have the opportunity of securing tonnage at that rate, the average of the Government sales being far above it, but I am aware that it has happened singularly enough on the two occasions of the Assam Company's Steamer being advertized for Allahabad, that the public have been able to obtain tonnage in the Government boats at the minimum rate of 1 Rs. 8 As per foot, although the demand did, I am told, on the first of these occasions exceed the means of supply.

I am, Dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,
R. H. BUCKLAND,
Secretary Assam Company.

From the officers, Non-Commissioned Officers and Privates of H. M. 62d Regiment not only with the view of promoting the accomplishment of so vitally important an object, but also to evince their gratitude, however inadequately, for the kind and generous succour and hospitality experienced from the gentlemen at Bhagulpore, on the occasion of the lamentable disaster, which befel the Head Quarters of the Regiment on the 6th September 1842.

THE CHURCH AND STATE QUESTION ON THE CONTINENT.—We adverted, in our last Number, to the recent Manifesto of the Archbishop of Cologne upon the subject of the Relation between the Church and the State. Our readers must have in recollection the long dispute carried on by that Prelate with the Prussian Government, which terminated in his deposition. The questions raised have, however, by no means been set at rest. So far from it, that the courageous Archbishop, whom the Prussian Police dragged from his See, in 1837, has, from the place of his exile, raised them anew, and traced them to their first principles.

The Statesman of the 9th inst. contains an analytical notice of that important publication, of which we shall avail ourselves, in order to put our readers in possession of the present state of the Church - - State question, as between the Civil Government and the Romish Hierarchy in the Continental kingdom.

The work is entitled, "Of Peace between Church and States, followed by Remarks on the position of Facts published at Berlin. By CLEMENS AUGUSTUS DROSTE DE VISCHERING, Archbishop of Cologne." 8vo. (2nd edition,) Munster, 1843. Two editions were disposed of in a few weeks. It is not, however, to be regarded as a publication got up on the spur of occasion. The Rt. Rev. Writer affirms, that it is the fruit of the meditations of more than twenty years, during which he has applied himself to the task of presenting his ideas in the shape most likely to render them acceptable. If, remarks our Contemporary, this avowal is to be received as the interpretation of his conduct, it gives an unexpected significance to the events which have recently taken place on the banks of the Rhine; and if, as is not improbable, his present publication has been concocted with the POPE, we may infer from it upon what grounds the policy of the Holy See will hereafter be based, in its relations with Prussia and the other Protestant Governments. The Archbishop of COLOGNE begins by combating the idea according to which the Church is considered as a society within the State. The smaller the State, the more palpable the absurdity, according to his view, of this representation of the Church. "What!" he exclaims, "the One Church, the Church Catholic, within the State, subdivided according to the frontiers of great or small States! That which is immoveable contained within that which is essentially and incessantly moveable!" If the Church is not in without the State. The learned Prelate points us to the Church dishonoured, despoiled, persecuted, and yet remaining always the same, while tribes and nations pass and disappear one after another. This is the Church Ideal of the Papist and the Puseyite. Its catholicity and its perpetuity are alike fictitious; but there is grandeur in the fiction, and it is the counterfeit of a sublime reality.

The great problem which the Archbishop undertakes to solve, is, how to maintain peace between the Church and the Civil Power. Two descriptions of persons appear to him to be the natural adversaries of this peace; first, the Rationalists, who have an interest in the gradual repression of the activity of the Church by the State in order that they may be able the better to disseminate their principles, by which they labour to subvert alike Government and Religion; and, secondly, Demagogues, who, finding the Church an obstacle to their designs, aim at destroying its influence, particularly by gaining possession of the schools by which she acts upon the people.

Even where the rulers, or a large proportion of their subjects, do not belong to the Catholic Church, Governments ought still, our Author contends, to respect her rights; and in order to know what these are, we must ascertain what are the limits of those of the State itself. The State, according to M. DROSTE DE VISCHERING, cannot require the Church to submit to whatever laws it may be pleased to make, but only to those which result from the very notion of a State. These he calls Staatsgesetze (State-laws), in opposition to laws of the land (landesgesetze), which, though emanating from the constituted authorities, have not this character: the former only are obligatory, in his view, when there is any conflict between the Church and the State, and they alone are always legitimate. The Church ought to recognise and respect, in its relations with the State, all the rights inherent in the nature of a State; while the State ought, on its part, to recognise and respect, in its relations with the Church, all those which inhere in the nature of a Church. The two institutions being ordained of GOD, each has a right to Independence. The Archbishop explains what he intends by this term, by adding, that a Society is independent, only when, not having required a previous consent in order to exist, it stands in no need of approbation or concurrence in order to act; so that, being sovereign (summa potestas) in the province which it embraces, it possesses the right of doing all that is requisite for its preservation, prosperity, and the realization of its object, without foreign interference, so long as it does not trench upon the rights of other parties.

Having applied this definition of Independence to the Church, M. DROSTE DE VISCHERING reduces its obligations to the State, to the respecting of those rights which appertain to the nature of a State. All that the Church owed to the Pagan NERO, to JULIAN the Apostate, to CONSTANTIUS the Arian, all that she would owe in the present day to the Emperor of CHINA, she owes every where to the Prince, but she owes him nothing beyond this. Whatever obligations the Apostles and their first successors were under, she still binds

ing on the ecclesiastical authorities of our day, but no others. Now the Apostles and their successors were independent of the State. "To admit the subordination of the Church to the State," exclaims the Archbishop of COLOGNE, "is to say, that the SAVIOUR has made his Church ancillary to the State; in other words, that he has not founded a Church; for a Ch[illegible] that was not independent, that was subordi[illegible] the State, would not have been founded by [illegible]

[illegible] this mutual independence alone, the Archbi[illegible] contends, can peace result. This being assured, [illegible] rights of the one party will never clash with those of the other, since the two Societies, with their distinct rights, proceed equally from GOD; and there must needs be harmony between the institutions which he ordains.

Two words sufficiently express, in our Author's view, the mutual relations for which he contends: "Jus cavendi et Obligatio Tuitionis." The former imports the right of self-defence against all that trenches upon its proper independence, and the duty of respecting, and, in case of need, protecting against its own members, the independence of the other institution. There ought to be, in this twofold respect, a perfect reciprocity between the State and the Church. All encroachment, in whatever sense it may take place, ought to be prohibited. To give only one instance: M. DROSTE DE VISCHERING considers it to be as exorbitant an abuse on the part of the State, to subject to its approval the nomination of pastors and bishops, as would be the pretension of the Church, were she to demand that the choice of Civil Functionaries and Ministers of State should be submitted to her for confirmation.

One imprescriptible right of the Church appears to our Author to be, that of having Schools and Educational Establishments dependent exclusively on herself. Without inquiring whether the State ought to interfere with Education, he thinks that the influence of the State and that of the Church cannot be brought to bear upon the same establishments, inasmuch as the Church can realize her object, only by being sole mistress in those which she originates. It ought to be lawful for her to confide the direction of these to whomsoever she thinks proper, whether to Jesuits or any other parties. The schools of the Church ought to be accessible to the representatives of the State; but the State ought not to lay claim to either the oversight or the direction of them.

Among the rights of the Church, he comprises also that of receiving from the faithful the assistance she needs. "The State," he says, "compels, when necessary, the contributions of its subjects: the Church confines herself to informing believers of her necessities and their duty, convinced that, wherever faith exists, charity will be found also." He does not admit that the Church may receive assistance from the State. In countries where the Catholic Clergy are paid out of the revenues of the State, it is only as an indemnity for the spoliation of property alienated from the Church, or as restitution, that they accept of it: they could not accept a stipend, properly so called. M. DROSTE DE VISCHERING examines, with equal attention, the question of Patronage and Benefices. He does not reckon only upon ancient foundations to meet the actual necessities of the Church: the rights of the Church may be disputed, or, where they are acknowledged, the resources resulting from them may be insufficient; but his confidence would remain unshaken: he entertains no doubt that the Church, if free, would obtain all that she required.

In Prussia, the Church is far from being free as yet: this is the very reason why the Archbishop of COLOGNE has taken up his pen. The dependence of which he complains is not, indeed, more absolute than that of his Church in the other great countries of Europe; but this is precisely what gives so much importance to his work. He has stated the question in terms which admit of its general application to France and the whole of Germany; and our Contemporary hails the Archbishop as an unexpected auxiliary to the cause of the Separation of Church and State;—"a cause which has, within a few months, passed, in many countries at once, out of the region of theory into that of facts."

We have no room for extended comment upon this abstract of the Archbishop's Protest. It is curious to find him, upon some points, symbolizing with the claims to independent and co-ordinate jurisdiction put forward by our High-church Presbyterians; upon others, adopting a language in accordance with the Oxford Puseyites; while, again, he seems in some respects to favour the Voluntary system and that broad separation between things civil and things sacred which is an essential condition of Religious Liberty. The grand fallacy which pervades his reasoning, lies in his giving the name of the Church to a Polity, a Jurisdiction, a Thing of worldly elements, rather than to that which the New Testament denotes by the Church which is the Body of CHRIST. And, in contending for the separation of Church and State we are in some danger of forgetting that we are in using the word Church in an improper sense. In this country, the Church political is but a branch of the State, and its jurisdictive powers could not exist separate from the State. Ecclesiastical power is either a delegated power derived from the State, or a usurpation of the power which belongs only to the Civil Government. But reduce the Church to the character of a strictly religious and voluntary society, and all, or nearly all, that the Archbishop contends for, becomes just and excellent.—Pat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE AT BIRMINGHAM.—The ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of "the Queen's College of Medicine at Birmingham" took place on Friday last, in the presence of a numerous assemblage of the inhabitants of the town, Professors, and a large body of students. The ceremony was opened by the Rev. C. Craven, Incumbent of St. Peter's, offering up a prayer for the success of the undertaking, after which the High Bailiff, S. Kempson, Esq., deposited in the cavity of the stone a case, hermetically sealed, containing copies of the Royal charter of incorporation of the College, of the Warneford prize trust-deed, of the various address delivered by the Rev. Chancellor Law, Mr. Sands Cox, the Rev. Vaughan Thomas, and Dr. John Johnstone; the prospectus of the College, with the list of Professors and the fundamental laws of the Queen's Hospital, together with the coins of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen Victoria. The Principal, Dr. Johnstone, then affixed a brass plate. The stone having been lowered with the usual formalities, the Venerable Doctor addressed the assembly at some length upon the benefits of the Institution, and announced that a gentleman, whom he did not name, in addition to his former unbounded munificence, had placed in the hands of the Rev. Chancellor Law, the Rev. Vaughan Thomas, and Mr. Sands Cox, the sum of 1,000*l.* for the foundation of four Scholarships of 10*l.*, to be held for two years, to be conferred upon students who shall have resided in the College twelve months, and who shall have been distinguished for their regularity and good conduct, and especially availed themselves of the moral and religious instruction of the Warden.—Record.

It appears from the statistical Reports issued by the Registrar-General, that about one-fifth of the total mortality of England and Wales is attributable to pulmonary consumption.

Cavalry and infantry barracks have been commenced at Newport, Monmouthshire. The area within the walls will be about ten acres, and the estimated cost of the erection is reported at from 40,000*l.* to 50,000*l.*—Ibid.

RAILWAY BILLS.—By a Parliamentary Return just issued some interesting information is afforded respecting the number of Railway Bills brought into the House of Commons, with the number of Acts which have been passed since the close of the year 1839. In 1840, the number of Bills was 27; in 1841, 24; in 1842, 23; in 1843, 31; total, 105. It appears from the Return, that of the Bills introduced in 1840, 23 became Acts of Parliament; in 1841, 19; in 1842, 21; and in the present session, 25. The Return further shows the number of plans deposited for the last three years, at the Private Bill Office. The number was 62.—Ibid.

NUMBER OF HOUSES IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.—By a Parliamentary return just issued, the number of inhabited houses in England is stated to be, 2,753,295; the number uninhabited, 162,725; and the number building, 25,882. In Wales the number inhabited is 188,196; uninhabited, 10,133; building, 1,769. In Scotland the number of inhabited houses is put down at 503,451; uninhabited, 24,295; building, 1,763; making a total of about, 3,454,101 inhabited; 198,049 uninhabited; and 30,634 houses building throughout the United Kingdom, Ireland excepted, which is not included in the return.—Ibid.

It happened a few weeks since to a gentleman in his travels through Cornwall in his gig, to stop at a turnpike-gate, the toll-keeper of which was a parchment-faced dame of the most ancient kind, with all the peculiar shrewdness known to that order, and the Act of Parliament at her fingers' ends. On pulling up with—"What's to pay?" and tendering a shilling—"8d." was the reply, and 4d. returned. "How's this?" says the traveller, "2d. more at this gate than at any other in the county—why what makes this difference?" E'es, 'tis so, and that's enuff! 'tis 6d. for four-wheel vehicles, and 2d. more for two." "Why that's strange," was the reply.—"E'es, but that's the law; look above to the board and there ye'll see 'tis painted up." Such, on looking at it, was found to be the case, and after some further parley the reason was inquired, when our dame, eyeing our informant with much acuteness, and in her own quaint style, replied—"That the only thing 'twas made so for was, that our two justices that live nigh by drive four-wheeled gigs, and that was the particular clause that they should not be charged more than 6d., and the 6d. to gigs was made 8d., and the 8d. to four-wheels were made 6d."—Exeter Paper.

PINE-APPLES.—There are now selling in the London shops pine-apples, from one of the Bahama islands. They are pulled up by the roots, and appear to arrive in very good order, and sell at a moderate price.—Record.

"YOUNG ENGLAND."—The members of "Young England" are in open revolt against the Premier. Mr. Smythe read him a severe lecture on Wednesday night; and Mr. D'Israeli declared, that as Sir Robert Peel was unable to guide them, they should endeavour to find a path for themselves. Mr. Smythe complained that the right hon. baronet said to them, "You have no right to pursue any course except that which I—I—I may entertain." At the repetition of the I's the House burst into a roar of laughter, excited, no doubt, by recollections of the Premier's dogmatical egotism; though, by the way, he has of late, since he has experienced so many failures, given up the I, and adopted the we, when speaking of the ministry. It is no longer my policy and my measures, but our policy and our measures. No man who has attended the House for the last two sessions can fail to be struck with the altered demeanour of Sir Robert Peel.—Pat.

IRISH NATIONAL BOARD OF EDUCATION.—By the Ninth Report of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, for 1842, it appears that the National Schools had increased, during the year, from 2,337 to 2,721, and the children on the rolls from 281,849 to 319,792; the number of children having tripled since 1833, and that of the schools being nearly fourfold.—Record.

IRELAND.—The following document was lately agreed to at a meeting of the Irish members in London:—

"TO THE PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN.

"We, the undersigned representatives of Irish constituencies, impressed with earnest solicitude respecting the present state and future destiny of our country, deeply sensible of its wrongs, and resolved to leave no effort untried to obtain their redress, feel it our duty, before we separate, to place upon record our solemn remonstrance against the fatal policy which has alienated from your Government and institutions the minds of a large portion of our fellow-countrymen.

"Deep-rooted and increasing discontent pervades the nation whose interests are intrusted to our charge. Feelings of estrangement are rapidly supplanting those affections which kindness and justice would have placed at your command. Despairing of redress from the Legislature, the people of Ireland now rely upon their own strength and resolution for the attainment of those rights which they have sought from Parliament in vain.

"The voice of the civilised world lays to your charge the guilt of having produced this exasperation of national feeling. For centuries our legislation and government have been subject to your control; on you, therefore, lies the responsibility of having failed to secure the welfare and contentment of the Irish people.

"Our social condition is replete with elements of disorder. The connexion between landlord and tenant, deranged as it has been by a long course of vicious legislation, wants that mutual confidence which is essential to the development of productive industry. The labouring population, unable to obtain employment, live habitually on the verge of extreme destitution. Notwithstanding our connexion with a nation which boasts to be the wealthiest, the most enlightened and the most powerful in the world, our commerce, our manufactures, our fisheries, our mines, our agriculture, attest, by their languishing and neglected condition, the baneful effects of your misgovernment.

"A church Establishment is maintained for the exclusive benefit of one-tenth of the nation.

"Our representation in the Legislature is unjustly disproportionate to the population and resources of Ireland.

"Our Parliamentary franchises are wholly inadequate to secure a true reflection of the opinions of the mass of the nation.

"Our municipal rights are abridged in comparison with yours. Our corporate franchises are limited by needless and harassing restrictions.

"The pecuniary exhaustion, occasioned by absenteeism, is aggravated by the mode in which the proceeds of taxation are applied.

"An anti-Catholic and anti-Irish spirit of exclusion governs the distribution of official appointments.

"Our local wants are not duly considered in the Imperial Parliament. Yet adequate powers of self government for local purposes are not afforded in the constitution of our fiscal and administrative institutions.

"We have applied in vain to the Legislature for redress. Our complaints are unheeded—our remonstances are unavailing. We now appeal to that higher tribunal of public opinion which creates and deposes parliaments and administers, and we ask your intervention to enforce our claims.

"We demand, in behalf of our country, the adoption of measures calculated to improve the condition of the industrious classes, and to develop the resources of Ireland.

"We demand the recognition of perfect equality in regard to ecclesiastical and educational arrangements between the several religious communities into which the population of Ireland is divided.

"We demand a more ample representation in the Legislature.

"We demand franchises adequate to give full expression to public opinion.

"We demand the assimilation of municipal rights in both kingdoms.

"We demand that Ireland shall participate more largely in the benefits of the public expenditure.

"We demand, in regard to administrative government, that the profession of the Roman Catholic faith shall no longer be made a ground of virtual, as it has ceased to be one of legal, exclusion from official station; that in the general administration of the affairs of the empire, Irishmen shall be called to take part in a proportion commensurate with the extent to which Ireland contributes to its greatness; and that the management of our local affairs shall be confided as much as possible to those who are identified and acquainted with the interests of our country.

"We demand that the principle of self-government, subject to popular control, shall be applied, wherever practicable, in the organisation of our local institutions.

"We recognise in you no superior title to political rights. We demand perfect equality, as the only secure and legitimate foundation upon which the union can permanently rest. So long as these claims are denied, so long will continue the struggle of the Irish nation against injustice and misrule.

"Should this remonstrance be successful, we cannot indeed promise the immediate restoration of those feelings of attachment which a few years had begun to expel from the national breast—sentiments engendered by centuries of oppression. We can only express our conviction, that those who confide in the influence of justice will not have misplaced their trust. It may still be in the power of a Government which shall merit the confidence of the Irish people to win back their forfeited affections; but we warn you that every day's delay increases the difficulty of the task, and gives additional strength to those who maintain that there is no hope of good government for Ireland except in the restoration of her national Parliament.

"Should this warning be neglected, upon you, not upon us, be the responsibility of future events.

IRELAND.—ARBITRATORS.—On Wednesday, at the adjourned meeting of the Repeal Association, Dr. Gray rose to bring forward the report of the committee for a plan for the establishment of arbitrators throughout the country, in consequence of the dismissal by the Government of the magistrates in whom the people had confidence. The report recommended that the dismissed magistrates, as well as those who had resigned, should be appointed in the first instance.

The following is a copy of the report:—

"REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO CONSIDER AND REPORT ON THE ADOPTION OF A GENERAL SYSTEM OF ARBITRATION THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.

"Your committee, having carefully considered the several questions referred to them with respect to the introduction of a system of arbitration throughout Ireland, with a view to the better adjustment of all such disputes as may from time to time arise among such of the inhabitants thereof as may be disposed to refer the same to arbitrators, beg leave to offer the following report thereon for the adoption of your Association:—

"Your committee are strongly of opinion, that inasmuch as many of the magistrates who possess popular confidence have been deprived of the commission of the peace because of their attachment to the cause of legislative independence, no unnecessary time should be lost in carrying into practice the principle of arbitration as already approved of by the unanimous vote of the Association. In order, therefore, to secure the perfect and harmonious working of such a system, your Committee recommend that standing committee be immediately formed to arrange the necessary details, prepare the requisite forms, and superintend the practical working of the system, after it shall have been put in operation.

"Being farther of opinion that the system of arbitration should be as universally applied as the circumstances of each locality will admit, your committee recommend that for that purpose the several counties be appointed into districts, and that three or more arbitrators be recommended for each district, the number to be determined by the extent, population, and such other local circumstances as may seem to bear directly thereon.

"In defining those districts, your committee would suggest that advantage be taken of the divisions at present established for the purposes of the petty sessions courts, and recommend that those districts be adopted, inasmuch as the peasantry are in general familiarised thereto.

"Your committee suggest that the dismissed magistrates and such repeal justices as have resigned, be in the first instance recommended as arbitrators in their respective districts; and that a dismissed magistrate, or one who has resigned if present, be in all cases chosen as the chairman of the court of arbitration.

"Your committee are strongly impressed with the conviction that in selecting persons to be intrusted with such high and important functions as those that will necessarily devolve upon the arbitrators, the utmost diligence should be used to procure persons not only of high moral character and local influence, but who also possess the full and complete confidence of the several classes upon whose cases they may have to arbitrate. For this purpose they would suggest that the repeal wardens resident in the several districts be called upon to recommend to the Association such persons as may seem to them the best qualified to act as arbitrators, and that they be directed, in making their selection, to request the aid of the repeal clergy and gentry in their several districts. That the names of the persons so selected and approved of, be transmitted to the Association through the provincial inspector of wardens, and be accompanied by a report from him, on the qualifications of the persons so recommended, and that such recommendations and reports be referred for consideration to the standing committee.

"In giving the sanction of youn Association to the recommendation of any arbitrator, your committee suggest that it be given by vote of the Association, at one of the ordinary or adjourned public meetings, on special motion made, and that of such motion it be necessary that at least one week's public notice be given.

"They further recommend that each arbitrator, on the vote of the Association being formally notified to him, shall promise, as a Repealer, that he will arbitrate impartially on all cases that may be referred to his decision.

"Your committee would also suggest that the repeal wardens of the district be requested to recommend a person qualified and willing gratuitously to act as secretary to the district arbitrators, and that it be the duty of such secretary, as may be approved of by the Association, to keep, under the direction and superintendence of the arbitrators, a book in which proper minutes be kept of all proceedings had before the court of arbitration.

"Your committee are also of opinion that due publicity should be given in each district to the names of the arbitrators and the places of arbitration.

"With respect to the mode of conducting the proceedings of the courts of arbitration, your committee recommend that the arbitrators sit publicly, in a place or places to be named, in their respective districts, on a certain fixed day, each week or fortnight, according to the peculiar circumstances of the localities; and that any person having any difference with or claim upon another shall serve a notice upon that other, calling upon him to come before the arbitrators upon the next day of sitting, and submit to have the matter in dispute arbitrated upon, and that there shall be appended to the said notice a further notification, signed by one of the district arbitrators, notifying that the arbitrators would sit for the adjustment of differences on the day specified.

"It is the opinion of your committee that the presence of three arbitrators should be declared necessary, to arbitrate upon each case, and that all questions be decided by vote, the majority determining the decison; and that should a greater number than three sit to arbitrate in any one cause, and that said number be an even number, that then the chairman should have two votes; but that in all other cases, a majority of the votes of the arbitrators shall determine.

"Your committee recommend that the parties be permitted to avail themselves of professional aid, whenever they consider it adviseable.

"Your committee recommend that after the parties shall have appeared before the arbitrators, a deed of submission be respectively signed by the parties, and duly witnessed, consenting to leave the matters in dispute to the decision of the arbitrators, and to abide by such award as they may make. That the arbitrators having heard the case and evidence adduced, on both sides, make their award, which award shall be final and conclusive; and that they endorse the same upon the deed of submission, and see that a proper entry of the proceeding be made in the minute book by the secretary, and that a copy of the award be given to such party, and that the original deed of submission and award be preserved.

"Your committee also recommend, that after the publication of the award, should either party refuse to comply therewith, the party so refusing shall be reported by the arbitrators to the Association, and that the standing committee do then proceed to inquire into the cause of said refusal, and that, unless the party so refusing fail to give satisfactory reasons ' mittee for such his refusal, the committ mend that the party so refusing be expelle. Association by a public vote.

"Your committee would suggest that, for ter working of the system, the secretaries be requ ed quarterly to forward to the Association for inspection the minute-books, and further recommend that blank forms of notice, deeds of submission, minute-books, and other such books and forms, be forwarded in the requisite quantities to the several districts, free of expense; and that there be no charge made, or fee received by the arbitrators, or any of them, or by their secretary, for any notice, deed of submission, award, or copy of award; and that all forms be supplied, cases heard and arbitrated on, awards made, and copies thereof given to the parties, free of all cost and charges whatsoever.—Pat.

LONG-LIVED PARISH FUNCTIONARIES.—The united ages of the minister, precentor, session-clerk, and sexton of the parish of Kilbirnie, amount to 314 years.—Ibid.

THE SPEAKER IN A PREDICAMENT.—In addressing the Queen, on the prorogation of Parliament, it is the duty of the Speaker to enumerate and to laud the measures brought forward by the Government, and passed during the session. What was he to do at the close of the present session? Great curiosity was felt to discover how he would overcome the difficulties by which he was surrounded. "During a laborious session our attention has been directed to various important questions of domestic policy—to the improvement of our institutions, and to the beneficial alteration of some branches of the law." A breathless impatience was here manifested to hear how these questions of domestic policy had been disposed of. When, lo and behold! the right honourable gentleman, knowing that although the attention of the House had been directed to these subjects, he could say no more, as they had all been overruled or neglected, went off at a tangent, and deeply lamented "the unhappy divisions which have occurred in the Church of Scotland, and which have led to the secession of many of her most valued ministers." Notwithstanding the solemnity of the scene, the ridicule of this abrupt transition was irresistible, and there was a general litter among all the Lords present, on both sides in politics, as well as among the Commons themselves below the bar. This was observed by the Speaker, who was so much discomposed by it that he several times hesitated and stuttered, notwithstanding his usual flowing style and graceful elocution; and there was some apprehension that he might have broken down before he reached the much-desired goal, when he was to present to her Majesty the last Bill of Supply, and to ask for it her Majesty's most gracious assent.—Chronicle.

O'CONNELL'S PLAN FOR THE RENEWED ACTION OF THE IRISH PARLIAMENT.—FIRSTLY.—The Irish People recognise, acknowledge, maintain, and will continually preserve and uphold upon the throne of Ireland Her Majesty Queen Victoria, whom God protect! Queen, by undoubted right and by hereditary descent, of Ireland, and her heirs and successors for ever.

"The people of Ireland recognise, acknowledge, maintain, and will continually preserve and uphold all the prerogatives of Her Majesty and of her heirs and successors, belonging to, and inherent in, the Imperial crown of Ireland; and they will true allegiance bear—pure, undivided, and indivisible—to Her Majesty, her heirs, and successors, for ever.

SECONDLY.—The people of Ireland acknowledge, and will maintain and preserve for ever, the privileges, hereditary and personal, of the Peers of Ireland, together with the legislative and judicial authority of the Irish House of Lords, and the exercise of the prerogative in augmenting and limiting the peerage, as the same did of right exist before the year 1800.

"THIRDLY.—The people of Ireland do firmly insist upon the restoration of the Irish House of Commons, consisting of three hundred representatives of the Irish people; and claim, in the presence of their Creator, the right of the people of Ireland to such restoration.

"They have submitted to the Union as being binding as a law; but they declare solemnly that it is not founded on right, or on constitutional principles and that it is not obligatory upon conscience. They agree with the Tory Attorney-General, Saurin, that the only binding power of the Union is the strength of the English domination. They also agree with him that 'resistance to the Union is in the abstract a duty, and the exhibition of that resistance a mere matter of prudence.' They will, therefore, resist the Union by all legal, peaceful, and constitutional means.

FOURTHLY.—The plan for the restoration of the Irish Parliament is as follows:—1. That the county Members should be increased to 173, in the manner hereinafter specified. 2. That there should be 127 Members returned from cities and towns, in the manner hereinafter mentioned. 3. That the county of Carlow, being the only county in Ireland with less than 100,000 inhabitants, should get an increase of one Member, so as to have three representatives. [illegible] other county having above 100,000 inhabitants [illegible]ld get an increase of two Members. That [illegible] unty ranging above 150,000 inhabitants, [illegible] ct an increase of three Members.

[illegible] at every county ranging above 250,000 inhabitants, should get an increase of four Members.

"That the county of Tipperary having more than 400,000 inhabitants, not less than 500,000, should get an increase of eight Members.

"That the county of Cork having more than 700,000 inhabitants, should get an increase of ten members.

"FIFTHLY.—With respect to the towns and cities, it is proposed that the city of Dublin, having more than 200,000 inhabitants, should have eight representatives, four for the part north of the Liffey, and four for the part south of the Liffey.

"That the University of Dublin should continue, on the basis of its present constituency, to send two Members.

"It is proposed that the city of Cork, having more than 100,000 inhabitants, should have five Members.

"That the city of Limerick and town of Belfast having respectively more than 50,000 inhabitants, should send four Members each.

"It is proposed that the town of Galway and the cities of Waterford and Kilkenny, having respectively more than 20,000 inhabitants, should send each three Members to Parliament.

"That other towns, having about 7,000 inhabitants, should each send two Members to Parliament, and that forty-nine other towns, next highest in the ratio of population, should send one Member each.

"The following schedule of the different places to return Members to the Irish Parliament will show their relative population, and the number of Members to be assigned to each."

[Then follows the list of Irish counties, with the population of each; and the proposed number of Members to be assigned to each.]

"The population is taken from the returns of 1831, which having been made for a different purpose, and without any reference whatever to the repeal of the Union, furnish a scale of unquestionable impartiality.

"SIXTHLY.—It is proposed that the right of voting should be what is called 'household suffrage,' requiring six months' residence in the counties, with the addition in the towns of married men, resident for twelve months, whether householders or not.

"SEVENTHLY.—It is proposed, that the mode of voting for Members of Parliament should certainly be by ballot.

"EIGHTHLY.—The Monarch de facto of England, at all times hereafter, whoever he may be, shall be Monarch de jure in Ireland. And so, in case of a future Regency, the Regent de facto in England to be Regent de jure in Ireland.

NINTHLY.—The connexion between Great Britain and Ireland, by means of the power, authority, and prerogatives of the Crown, to be perpetual, and incapable of change, or any severance, or separation.

"The foregoing plan to be carried into effect according to recognised law and strict constitutional principle.

"Signed by order,
DANIEL O'CONNELL,
"Chairman of the Committee."—Record.

BARBADOES.—STATE OF THE COLONY.—We extract, from the speech of the Governor, Sir Charles Grey, to the Barbadoes House of Assembly, delivered on the 15th of June, the following paragraph respecting the state of the colony, viz.:—"In offering to you these suggestions for the further improvement of the condition of this island, I find, with peculiar pleasure, after sixteen months' residence in it, that, so far, all my anticipations of your tranquillity and happiness have been realized. Hitherto you surely have been eminently fortunate; the seasons have been genial and salubrious; the crop of 1842 considerably exceeded that of the preceding year, and the present one will surpass that of 1842. The island was never before in so perfect a state of cultivation; the imports were never so large. The society of Barbadoes is in a moral and improving condition. Amongst the labouring classes and the poor there is as little appearance of vice as I have ever seen in any part of the world: their habits are industrious; and their disposition, in most respects, is excellent. Nor has the past year been unproductive of some marked events, which may be noted as gradations in the improvement and consolidation of your social system."

CROPS.—The bountiful rains with which we have been blessed during the last seven days have been, we are happy to learn, generally felt throughout the colony; and the benefit conferred thereby on the young crops is immense. The thunder appears, also, to have been of advantage to us, for the weather has since been clear and cool. The quantity of sugar already shipped from this island (including the cargoes now on board the Higginson for Liverpool, and the James Holmes for London) amounts to 17,647 hogsheads, 850 tierces, and 560 barrels. We should also say there is now another 1,000 on board the ships now loading, which brings shipments of sugar for 1843 to about 19,000 hogsheads. On an average, the increase of sugar of this year over that of last will be nearly 5,000 hogsheads.—Barbadoes Globe, 30th June.

UNITED STATES.—The plea of insanity set up by Mrs. Gilmour has been put aside, sufficient evidence of her criminality having been adduced to justify her apprehension and warrant her being surrendered. Mr. Commissioner Rapelyea had delivered the following decision in her case:—

"I, Silvanus Rapelyea, a Commissioner of the Circuit Court of the United States, in the second circuit, for the southern district of New York, do hereby certify that upon hearing the 'evidence of criminality' 'in the matter of Christina Cochran, otherwise Gilmour, charged with the crime of murder in Scotland,' and after carefully considering the same, do decide, that 'according to the laws of the place' where she was found and arrested sufficient evidence has been adduced to justify her apprehension and commitment for trial."

To this decision, the prisoner's counsel excepted, promising to take, in the course of the day, some action, the nature of which he did not explain. He was, however, supposed to allude to a writ of habeas corpus, said to have been issued by Judge Kent. The Commissioner having declared his functions terminated with the giving of the decision, it was moved, on behalf of the British Consul, that the prisoner be committed, to await the decision of the executive at Washington. The papers state, that the prisoner did not appear at all excited, but listened to the decision with apparent indifference. The opinion in America is, that she will be returned to this country, to take her trial here.

In several parts of the Union the approaching election of the future President was exciting considerable attention. Daniel Webster is spoken of as the probable successor of John Tyler.

The Americans seem awakening to a sense of shame for their disreputable doctrine of repudiation, and are beginning to inquire how their state debts are to be paid off. The impression is, that Congress will be obliged to do something effectual immediately, and to this duty the public press is calling it.—Pat.

1st Lieutenant Robert Ferrie, of the 13th Regt. N. I.

Serjeant William O'Farrell and Gunner Alexander S. Martin, of the 1st Company 6th Battalion of Artillery, are appointed Officiating Assistant Overseers in the Department of Public Works, and placed at the disposal of Captain Cautley, the former for employment on the Ganges, and the latter on the Doab Canals. Serjeant O'Farrell and Gunner Martin are transferred to the Town Major's List.

No. 239 of 1843.—The following paras. of a Military Letter from the Honourable the Court of Directors, to the Governor General of India in Council, No. 10, of the 5th July 1843, and annexment, relative to the collection and distribution of the Effects of Officers and Soldiers in Her Majesty's Service, or in the Service of the East India Company, dying in the East Indies, are published for the information of the Army; and the Governor General in Council is pleased to direct, that the opinion therein communicated, of the Law Officers of the Crown and the Company, upon the Statute of the 6th Geo. 4th Cap. 61, and also upon the Act of 3d and 4th Vict. Cap. 37, Sec. 52, be at once given effect to, and acted upon at all the Presidencies:

"Para. 1. We have lately received through the Board of Commissioners for Indian Affairs a representation from Her Majesty's Secretary at War, complaining of the obstruction which still exists in India to the collection by Regimental Officers of the Effects which may be left by Soldiers dying in that Country.

"2. In our Military Letter to Madras dated 29th July 1842, No. 44, (copy of which was forwarded to your Presidency,) we observed that by the Act of the 6th Geo. 4th Cap. 61, Sect. 1. it is rendered lawful for all Officers or persons who may be employed or required by or under the Authority of any Articles of War in force to take care of or collect the Effects of Officers and Soldiers dying on Service out of the United Kingdom, without taking out any Letters of Administration in like manner as if such Officers had been appointed Executors or had taken out Administration, and by the Article of War founded upon it, viz. Sect. 129, the Officers who are required to collect the Effects of Soldiers deceased are authorized to collect all these Effects without any limitation being specified as to the place where they may be deposited, and are required after payment of Regimental Debts and Quarters to pay the balance, if any, to the Regimental Pay Master, such balance to be by him paid to the heir or legal representative, if present at Head Quarters, or if not, to be remitted to the Regimental Agent for payment to the legal representatives under the direction of the Secretary at War.

"With this explanation, no difficulty can occur hereafter in the payment by any of our Officers to the party authorized by the Act and Articles of war, as above specified, to collect the same, of any sum or sums, or securities, which may be in their hands, or under their control, belonging to the Estates of Soldiers deceased. The responsibility of requiring Probate or Administration to the Estate to be taken out by the persons to whom the surplus is to be paid, resting, altogether, as it appears to us, with the party authorized by the Act and Articles of War to collect the property.

"3. Notwithstanding these directions, objections have been made at all the Presidencies to paying over certain portions of the Estates of Soldiers to the Regimental Officers entitled to collect them, founded in some instances upon legal opinions obtained in India of the inadequacy of the above Act to authorize such payment. In consequence of recent representations on this subject, received from Madras and Bombay, We have lately obtained the opinion of H. M.'s Advocate, of the Attorney and Solicitor General, and of the Company's Standing Counsel, upon the interpretation to be put upon the above Statute of the 6th Geo. 4 Cap. 61 and also upon the Act of 3rd and 4th Victoria Cap. 37 Sect. 52. The opinion of these learned persons determines that Officers entitled to collect Soldiers' Effects are authorized by these Acts to take possession of all the personal property of every description of deceased Soldiers, without reference to its amount or value, or to its being invested in Notes or other Securities, or to its being in Camp or Quarters elsewhere."

"DRAPER'S HALL,
23d May, 1843.

J. C. MELVILL, ESQ.

SIR,—In obedience to the directions of the Honourable the Chairman and Deputy Chairman which I received through you on the 22d ultimo, transmitting a copy of Mr. Baring's letter of the preceding day which forwarded the copy of a letter from H. M.'s Secretary at War, dated the 11th ultimo, with its enclosures, from the Marquis of Tweeddale relative to the difficulties which are still alleged to exist in the collection of the Effects of H. M. Officers and Soldiers dying in India, I lost no time in laying the necessary case before Her Majesty's Advocate, the Attorney and Solicitor General and the Company's Standing Counsel for their opinion, as well upon the points directly raised in the papers transmitted from the War Office as upon those of the same class which appeared to arise out of the various communications received last month from Madras and Bombay in reference to the construction to be put on the Mutiny Acts and Articles of War as to the Administration of the Effects of Officers and Soldiers both in Her Majesty's and the Company's Service dying in India.

The questions which thus arose appeared to be the following, viz.

1st. Whether the Officers respectively appointed under the 128th and 129th Articles of War for Her Majesty's Forces and under 110th and 111th Articles of War for the East India Company's Forces to collect the Effects of the Officers and Soldiers therein respectively described are respectively entitled to demand and (without taking out Letters of Administration) to receive and take possession of all the personal property of every description of such deceased Officer or Soldier without reference to its amount or value, or to its being in Camp or Quarters or elsewhere, and whether in this latter respect there is any difference between the case of a deceased Officer and that of a deceased Soldier.

2d. Whether in the event of part of such property of a deceased Officer or Soldier consisting of a Promissory Note or other transferrable Security of the East India Company, or of one of their Governments expressed to be payable to the deceased being at the time of his death in the hands of the Government Agents for his use, such Government Agent can lawfully and safely deliver over and are bound upon demand to deliver over such Promissory Note to the Officer so appointed under the Articles of War, and whether the amount of such Note or other Security makes any difference in the case.

3d. Whether such Officer can by indorsement or otherwise as effectually transfer or give a discharge for the amount secured by such Note, as if he had been appointed Executor or had duly obtained Letters of Administration of the Effects of the Payee or last Indorsee of the Note. And whether in the event of the East India Company paying the amount of the Note to such Officer when so endorsed, they are in any way responsible for the due appropriation or distribution by the latter of the amount which they shall have so paid.

4th. Whether the Officer so collecting the Effects of a deceased Officer or Soldier under the respective Articles of War referred to, or whether the Military Secretary, or any other Officer at either of the Presidencies in the East Indies is authorized under any circumstances to require the Registrar of the Supreme Court of such Presidency to take out Letters of Administration there in respect of the surplus which may remain in the hands of the collecting Officer, and whether such Registrar is in any case lawfully entitled to take out Letters of Administration in respect of such surplus.

In reply to these questions the Law Officers of the Crown and the Company have given the following opinion.

1st. We think there is a difference between the case of a deceased Commissioned Officer and the case of a deceased Non-Commissioned Officer or Private Soldier.

With respect to a deceased Commissioned Officer there appears to be no substantial question, since the Articles of War applicable to the case of Commissioned Officers only authorize the collection of Effects in Camp or Quarters.

With respect to the case of a Non-Commissioned Officer or private Soldier, we are of opinion that both in the case of Her Majesty's Forces and in the case of the East India Company's Forces, the Officers appointed to collect the Effects of the deceased Soldier are entitled to demand, and without taking out Letters of Administration to receive and take possession of all the personal property of every description of such deceased Officer or Soldier without reference to its amount or value, or to its being in Camp or Quarters or elsewhere. We consider that the Officers who by the 129th Article of War for Her Majesty's Forces and by the 111th Article of War for the Company's Forces, are directed to act in the matter come within the first Section of the Statute 6th Geo. 4th C. 61, and are clearly enabled by that Statute to ask, demand and receive any of the deceased's "Effects," an expression which we think reaches and includes any of his personal Estate.

2d. Our opinion on the first question supersedes this question as respects the case of an Officer.

In the case of a Soldier not being a Commissioned Officer, we are of opinion that the Government Agents may lawfully and safely deliver over, and are bound upon demand to deliver over a Promissory Note of the kind described to the Officer appointed under the Articles of War, and that the amount of the Note or other Security makes no difference in the case. This answer however should be qualified by noticing that, if there were a legal personal representative demanding the Note, we think the Government Agents would be warranted in delivering the Promissory Note to such legal personal Representative in preference to the Officer.

3d. We are of opinion that the Officer may by indorsement or otherwise as effectually give a discharge for the amount secured by the Note as if he had been appointed Executor or had duly obtained Letters of Administration of the Effects of the Payee or last Indorsee of the Note. We are also of opinion that the East India Company paying the amount of the Note to the Officer, when indorsed, are not responsible for the due application by the latter of the amount which they shall have so paid.

We do not understand that under this third question an opinion is required from us as to the right to indorse the Note for the purpose of negociation generally as distinguished from an indorsement for the purpose of obtaining payment of it. It would not however appear to us that there would be any difference between the two cases.

4th. Upon this point, (viz. the interference of the Registrar,) there appears to be a difference between the case of an Officer or Soldier in the Service of Her Majesty and Officer or Soldier in the Company's Service.

With respect to the case of an Officer or S[illegible] Service of Her Majesty, we are of opinion th[illegible] acting in respect of the deceased's Effects m[illegible] Registrar to take out Letters of Administra[illegible] of the Surplus in question, and that upon su[illegible] and not otherwise, the Registrar is lawfully e[illegible] take out such Letters of Administration. This is [illegible] of the Act 6th, Geo. 4th, C. 61, Sec. 1.

With regard to the case of an Officer or Soldier in the Company's Service, we are of opinion that under the Statute 3d and 4th Vict. C. 37 Sec. 52, the Registrar cannot in any case be required, and is not in any case entitled to take out Letters of Administration in respect of the Surplus in question. He may however, if required and authorised so to do, but not otherwise, take out Administration and interpose in respect of the Estate before it is collected.

Head Quarters, Camp Allahabad, 10th October, 1843.

It having been found necessary, as a precautionary measure, to strengthen the frontier stations, keeping a strong support at Umballa, and as, from the recent extreme sickness of many of the corps in the Sirhind division, this relief and support must be taken from the regiments at present composing the Meerut division, and which it would be inexpedient to displace from under the command of the General Officer of that division, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has, at the suggestion and with the concurrence of the Governor General in Council, directed Major General Sir R. H. Dick, K. C. B., and K. C. H., to take upon himself, during the period the corps of his division may be stationed on the north western frontier, or until further orders, the command of the forces both in the Sirhind and the Meerut division.

The usual reports and returns by the corps now composing the Sirhind division will, as heretofore, be sent to Major General Fast, but the whole force, as well of the Sirhind, as of the Meerut division, will obey all orders issued by Major General Sir Robert Dick.

Major General Sir Robert Dick will take up and remove his Head Quarters, from time to time, to such points as he may deem best calculated for carrying into effect the views of the Governor General in Council.

The following orders are confirmed:

The Benares division order of the 29th ultimo, directing Ensign T. A. Carey, at present doing duty with the 22d, to join and do duty with the 47th regiment of native infantry, on the march of the former corps from Benares.

The Dum-Dum artillery division order of the 23d ultimo, directing Gunner E. Farrell, of the 4th company 3d battalion of artillery, to act as pay Sergeant to the detachment of European infantry recruits, under the command of Captain F. Trimmer.

The presidency division order of the 23d ultimo, directing Ensigns J. Govan and W. F. Fawcett, recently admitted into the service, to join and do duty, the former with the 8th regiment of native infantry at Jaunpore, and the latter with the 22d native infantry at Benares.

The Kurnaul station order of the 16th ultimo, appointing Assistant Surgeon A. H. Cheek to the medical charge of the 72d regiment of native infantry, during the indisposition of Surgeon A. W. Steart, or until further orders.

The Delhi garrison order of the 19th ultimo, directing the Commissariat to furnish six hackeries, for the conveyance of the sick, and spare arms of detachments of the 38th and 53d regiments of native infantry, proceeding to rejoin the Head Quarters of their respective corps at Meerut.

The Ferozepore station order of the 20th ultimo, directing Assistant Surgeon W. E. Pollard to proceed forthwith to Sukkur, making over charge of the artillery and recruit depot to Assistant Surgeon C. McCurdy, of the 19th regiment of native infantry.

The presidency division order of the 23d ultimo, appointing Assistant Apothecary J. Stenson to do duty with the detachment of European infantry recruits at Dum-Dum, under the medical charge of Assistant Surgeon W. Craddock, and directing Native Doctors Shaick Emdad Hussain and Joomuck Lall to proceed to Dinapore, and do duty under the orders of the Superintending Surgeon of that division.

The Agra garrison and station order of the 24th ultimo, directing hospital apprentice J. Mervin, attached to Her Majesty's 39th foot, to act as Assistant Apothecary and Assistant Steward with the detachment of European artillery proceeding to Kurnaul, and transferring apprentice G. J. Cooper, from the hospital of the 3d battalion of artillery, to that of Her Majesty's 39th regiment.

The Sirhind division order of the 22d ultimo, directing Assistant Surgeon W. S. Comberbach, of the 7th light cavalry, to repair forthwith to Kurnaul, and Assistant Surgeon C. Horton, M. D. to proceed without delay to Umballa, and assume medical charge of the European invalids proceeding to the presidency.

Hospital Apprentice R. W. Cline, at present acting as Assistant Apothecary with Her Majesty's 3d buffs, is discharged the service, at his own request.

Sergeant Major David Henderson, of the 47th regiment of native infantry, is, at his own request, remanded to the regiment of artillery, in the rank he held previous to his transfer to the Town Major's list.

The leave of absence, to visit the presidency, on private affairs, preparatory to applying for furlough to Europe, granted to Lieutenant and Brevet Captain J. Trower, of the 9th company 7th battalion of artillery, in General Orders of the 7th ultimo, is cancelled, at the request of that officer.

Corporal C. H. Crutcher, of the sappers and miners, is transferred to the Town Major's list, and appointed to the local Sebundy corps of sappers and miners at Darjeeling, vice Belford remanded to the artillery.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence:

4th Company 7th Battalion Artillery.—Captain H. N. Pepper, from 29th October to 1st February 1844, to visit Cawnpore and the presidency, preparatory to applying for furlough to Europe, on private affairs.

Commander, and Bentinck 2,000 tons and 540 horse power, Kellock, Commander, will leave Calcutta for Suez, touching at Madras, Point de Galle, and Aden; on the following days:

Bentinck 15th December, 1843.
Hindoostan 13th February, 1844.
Bentinck 15th March, .. 1844.
Hindoostan 12th May,.. .. 1844.

To parties proceeding to Europe, the advantages offered by the Overland route need no comment as independently of the certainty of arriving in England within two months, they are saved both the trouble and expense of fitting up Cabins and providing a large outfit of clothing which on their arrival at home is quite useless. Any further information can be obtained by applying at the Co.'s Office, No. 11, Strand.

J. R. ENGLEDUE,
Superintendent and Agent.

24th August, 1843.

PARCELS OVERLAND.

AS many persons have complained of delay in the delivery of their parcels, and as such delay arises from the parcels not being sent through the proper office. J. R. Engledue requests the Indian Community desirous of availing themselves of the Overland route to send their packages direct to his office in Calcutta, Captain Biden, Madras and to Captain Twynham, Point de Galle, and to instruct their Booksellers, Tradesmen and friends in England to send them to the following offices in London, viz.

James Hartly and Co. 16, John St. Crutched Friars and 44, Regent Street, Piccadilly.

James Barbar and Co. 17, St. Mary Axe.

All orders accompanied by a remittance will be promptly attended to.

J. R. Engledue will receive dividends and remit by order payable at sight upon Jas. Hartly and Co. London.

J. R. ENGLEDUE,
Supt. and Agent P. and O. S. N. Co.

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY MORNING.

No. 465. Vol. IX.] SERAMPORE: THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 30th. 1843. { Price 2 Co's. Rs. monthly, or 20 Rs. yearly if paid

Gwalior and the Punjab.—His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief reached Agra on the 18th. The troops composing the Army of Exercise, the scene of whose manœuvres will lie beyond the Jumna, in the territories of Scindia, are rapidly marching to their respective rendezvous, and the whole army will probably be ready to take the field by the beginning of December. Nothing has transpired regarding the plan of the campaign, nor is it exactly known whether Sir Hugh Gough will take the command in person, or indeed whether there will after all be any necessity for a campaign at all. The fords of the Chumbul will not be passable for another month, but the distance the troops will be required to traverse, is so inconsiderable. that no disadvantage would result from a delay of four weeks. Lord Ellenborough left Calcutta on the 25th, and though the vehicle which conveys him is calculated to travel at the rate of six miles an hour, yet the long period allowed for halting every day, will probably bring on the 10th of December before his Lordship is at the side of the Commander-in-Chief. We may perhaps not be wrong in our conjecture that nothing will be done before Lord Ellenborough's arrival at Agra.

Of the state of affairs at Gwalior, there seems to be no authentic account. We were told some days since that the capture of the Khasgee by the troops would obviate the necessity of an armed interference, because they were determined to submit to the demands of the British Government. We were next informed that the Regent had succeeded in drawing over a part of the troops to her party, and had a respectable army at her disposal, which was likely to try conclusions with the insurgents. The last accounts however state that the Baee was ready to accede to the wishes of our Government, but that the troops were unwilling to be disbanded and disrated, than which nothing can be more natural. It is certain however that the proposals of our Government, which if admitted, would extinguish the independence of the State, must be equally distasteful to all those likely to be affected by them; equally unpleasant to the Regent who will become a cypher, and to the troops who will be turned adrift, to beg or to steal. Those proposals have not been received at the Durbar in such a spirit as to encourage the hope of a peaceful resignation of authority. It is just possible that, when it is seen that our terms are backed by the argument of three armies, and that the Governor General is so completely in earnest, as to have repaired to Agra in person, they may be viewed in a different light. The Maharattas however may yet shew fight, and resolve to make one stand for independence before they bend to the 'force of circumstances.' Ten years ago, the army consisted of 14,000 infantry, 10,000 cavalry and 250 pieces of Artillery, independent of the garrisons in forts. The whole army of the state may possibly amount to 30,000 men, and the British troops about to be assembled with an eye to Gwalior, cannot fall very far short of this number.

At Lahore, a complete change has been effected by the arrival of Raja Golab Sing with 22,000 mountaineers. It was not believed that he would venture to leave his domains in Jumboo, and his departure from thence shews great confidence in his own strength. On his arrival at the Capital, all power seems to have passed into his hands by a natural transition; and Heera Sing's authority at once ceased. He is therefore de facto the ruler of the Punjab, while Duleep Sing, the nominal sovereign, remains with the women. He has peremptorily refused to yield to the insolent demands of the Sikh soldiery for more pay and gratuities; if they continue refractory, he has the means of coercing them. A strong Government appears therefore to have been at length established there, which will make itself feared at home and respected abroad, and which is fully capable of sustaining all the responsibilities of sovereignty. If our Government has made any proposals to the Sikhs inimical to their independence, or derogatory to their honour, they could not have reached Lahore at a more inauspicious juncture. Golab Sing is known to be any thing but favourable to the British. He is now in fine feather at the seat of authority, surrounded by a bold and brave army, and is little likely to brook a proposition which shall curtail the independence of the Punjab. To any such overture he would probably return a haughty reply, such as the British lion has not been in the habit of receiving without resentment. This may precipitate a war, which would admit of little or no defence, for the vigorous administration of Golab Sing will check any attempt to make incursions into our own provinces—the only ground on which our interference can be based.

The November Mail. after having taught us a great moral lesson of patience for five days, at length made its appearance on Friday morning last. The intelligence it brings is insignificant. The Imperial Parliament was not sitting and the Irish Parliament had not been elected. Her Majesty returned to England after her visit to France, and immediately started in her new steam yacht for Belgium, to visit her Uncle, the King. She was received in all the towns she passed through with the utmost enthusiasm. These visits, independent of their beneficial effect on Her Majesty's health, will probably produce a good political effect, and contribute to soften down those national asperities, which when left without any check, ripen into hatred, and lay the foundation of hostilities.

The repeal agitation in Ireland does not appear to have abated. Some of the papers state that the meetings had been less numerously attended, but the truth of this assertion may well be questioned. O'Connel has not abated a jot of his audacity or his self confidence. On the contrary he appears to be gradually preparing his arrangements, with consummate skill, for the assembly of his Parliament, and will be ready to call it together, though under another name, a little before the time fixed for the assemblage of the Parliament of Great Britain. He has gone too far to recede without risking for ever the loss of his honour and consequence; and there appears no reason to doubt that he will make an effort to carry into effect the plan he has been so long maturing, and not confine his exertions to mere speeches. The ardour of his followers does not appear to have been in the smallest degree diminished; and the expectation of Her Majesty's Ministers that the agitation was too violent to last, and that itself, it would gradually die out, has realized.

The disturbances in Wales have increased in violence. The animosity of the insurgents is no longer confined to the tolls, but embraces every tax, civil and ecclesiastical, against all of which they have declared open war. The country still continues to be occupied with troops, who are however altogether unable to extinguish the outrages which are daily committed. It has been proposed—so say the papers—to proclaim martial law through three counties. Martial law will only tend to inflame the minds of the disaffected and to swell their numbers. Though the more peaceably disposed inhabitants are opposed to the lawless violence which has raged for some time, there is evidently a general sympathy throughout the country with the people, and a universal impression that the institutions under which they live are oppressive, and require to be altered. Some measures of a healing nature must be adopted by Parliament before tranquillity can be restored.

Scotland, hitherto so peaceful, has become the scene of violence. In some parishes, the induction of Ministers in the room of those who have seceded, has been openly resisted, and the public authorities set at defiance. It has been necessary even to call in the aid of the military. These events have given far more distress to the Free Protesting Ministers than to those who remain in the Kirk. Dr. Chalmers and his friends have done every thing in their power to repress this burst of opposition. but the old spirit of the Covenanters appears to be up, and it will not be easily allayed.

But while the three kingdoms are thus agitated from causes altogether dissimilar, England appears to enjoy profound repose. Trade is on all hands admitted to be reviving; the manufacturers are no longer idle, and the general aspect of things seems to denote the return of comfort, though not of plenty.

Abroad, there is little deserving of notice. There has been another revolution in Spain, the object of which it is not so easy to perceive; but it appears that the party which is anxious for the restoration of Espartero to power, gains strength. In Greece, there has been a bloodless revolution, and the people have compelled King Otho to dismiss the foreigners whom he had employed in the public service to an extent which caused national irritation. and to place Natives in their stead. There is positively nothing from America, beyond the discovery of a new animal, in shape like a Kangaroo, with horns on its head and which the Indians call ke-ko-ka-ki; and the commencement of the excitement which attends the election of a new President.

The Magistracy.—We publish, not without some misgivings, a letter on the subject of the Magistracy from the North West Provinces. Our correspondent says that the Police in that division of the Presidency is as inefficient as in the Lower Provinces; but that the defect arises not from the anomalous and fatal union of the functions of the Police and of the Criminal Judge in the same individual, but from the want of adequate rewards for meritorious exertions. When he says that "interest, intrigue and personal acquaintance outweigh a thousand times the best services," he brings a charge against the ...inistration which cannot be admitted with...ost convincing and multiplied proofs. ...hat our administration in the East ...usly free from this charge of favour... compared with the pure government ...nd, and the purer government of America, where one of the Presidents, not many years since turned out no fewer than three thousand of the functionaries who had been appointed by his predecessor, under the plea that he could not work so well with another man's tools as with his own. During the last two administrations and the present, there has certainly been a most anxious desire to improve the management of public affairs, by giving promotion only to men of acknowledged ability. The brightest page in Lord Ellenborough's Indian History is that which records the conscientious impartiality with which he has distributed his public patronage. We have occasion to know that he has in various instances turned a deaf ear on the recommendations of his own nearest relatives; and that they have ceased to importune so impracticable a Governor General. His appointments, with perhaps one or two exceptions, have also been as much distinguished by their judgment as their impartiality. We have no such scenes now as those enacted under the good Lord Hastings, who on one occasion is said to have sent for his Military Secretary and directed him to fill up three vacancies with the names of three officers who had recently distinguished themselves in the Pindarree war. On the Secretary's leaving the room, he was sent for by Lady Hastings and informed that she had promised the berths to three Ayrshire cousins. He returned to his Lordship and mentioned his new instructions, and enquired whom he was to obey. Tradition goes on to say that Lord Hastings with his characteristic gallantry, replied: "The Lady to be sure; could you doubt it?" This latter part of the story is, we hope, fabulous; but the anecdote, even without it, will shew the "Magistrate of the North West Provinces," that matters were infinitely worse in past times. Perhaps he may also find on farther examination that we have in India as impartial and even meritorious a distribution of offices, as the infirmity of human nature will admit of.

We cannot bring ourselves to believe that under Lord Ellenborough's administration of the North West Provinces, there was cause for asserting that "interest, intrigue and personal acquaintance outweighed a thousand times the best services." Mr. Clerk's administration, which had existed little more than three months when he was disabled from public business, has been too short to allow of our forming any fixed opinion of it; but his established character ought to be regarded as an ample security against the abuse of his patronage. And while Mr. Thomason continues to administer the internal affairs of those Provinces, we are confident that his choice of men will be governed by the purest principles and the wisest discrimination. With this opinion of the recent administration of the North West Provinces, perhaps we may be censured for giving admission to a letter which brings so heavy and in our opinion so groundless a charge against it. But it is advantageous for our rulers to know the opinion entertained of their measures by those who are employed under them. It may not be without its use to shew them that, however anxious they have been to consult the public interests in the distribution of offices, there may be men of ability whom they have overlooked, and men of showy but unsubstantial merit whom they have incautiously promoted.

We think, with our correspondent, that the Police of the North Western Provinces is very deficient; that is, that crimes of a very heinous nature are perpetrated, and that no whisper of them reaches the Magistrate on the bench. The confessions of the Budduck robbers, which we noticed about a twelve month ago, shew that they have ranged without control through those provinces, almost from the time when they came into our possession, committing the most atrocious robberies, in large bands; and that the Magistrates have remained in comparative ignorance of this dangerous confederacy and of its doings. They inform us, that no sooner did Major Sleeman and his Thug establishment take the field against them than they found the country too hot for themselves, and sought refuge in the independent states around us. This inefficiency of our Magistracy has arisen from that vicious organization which makes its leading object the trial and punishment of dacoits, and not their capture. Hence the chances of their escape exceed ten times the chance of detection, while the native officers connive at their outrages through fear or venality; and the people suffer in silent sulkiness. For one instance in which the Police is rendered inefficient because the Magistrate's services are not suitably rewarded, there are ten in which it is useless because the thief trier is one and the same with the thief catcher. Let merit be rewarded to its fullest extent, and the noblest spirit of emulation be thereby diffused through the service, still, while we continue to be without a separate Police under active European control, there will be little improvement. Of this our correspondent may find a clear example in the district conventionally attached to Bengal, but which is naturally part of the North West Provinces, we mean Tirhoot. It is under a merit fostering administration, with which "interest, intrigue and personal acquaintance" count for nothing. It has been intrusted to the best Magistrate in the Lower Provinces, whose merits have been acknowledged by Government to an extent which might make him the object of envy. Yet he acknowledges that he can do nothing for the improvement of the Police under the present system; and it is quite possible that there are as many crimes which pass undetected in his district, as in that which lies immediately to the west of it, under a 'merit despising' administration.

APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.—The last Mail informs us that the question of Appeals to the Privy Council has been brought before the Court of Proprietors in a motion by Mr. Lewis, which was withdrawn on the production of papers by the Chairman of the Court of Directors. They shewed that the subject was then under negotiation with Her Majesty's Ministers.

The 3d and 4th William the IV. Chapter 41, enacted that, if the parties in appeals to the Privy Council took no steps to bring them to a termination within a given time, the Court of Directors should be compelled to conduct them at the public expense. It would be difficult to discover in the most barbarous legislation of the most barbarous age of England any act more palpably unsound and absurd in principle or more mischievous in practice. For what can be more absurd than to lay on the Government of the country the responsibility of carrying forward a private suit, when the appellant has ceased to feel any anxiety regarding it, or to charge the public revenues with the expense of an action which the litigants are no longer able to conduct? Yet a Whig Ministry, in the thirty-third year of the nineteenth century, did actually place this ludicrous enactment on the Statute book. In order to enhance the absurdity of the measure, and to make the public purse chargeable to the fullest extent with the expense of private suits, they soon after reduced the amount for which an appeal might be lodged, from 5000£ to 1000£.

The consequence has been such as might have been expected. In the ten years which have elapsed since the passing of the Act, the Company have been compelled, under orders in Council, to bring to a hearing seventy appeal cases, at an expense of 132,826*l.*—more than fifteen lakhs of Rupees. Of this sum they have only recovered 24,191*l.* so that the revenues of India have been saddled during ten years with an expense of nearly thirteen lakhs of Rupees—enough to cover Bengal with Commercial Roads—to enable a few Baboos to enjoy the ineffable luxury of protracted litigation. When we thus see lakhs of Rupees squandered to pamper the vitiated appetite of litigants, and compare this profusion in a bad cause with the penurious mode in which these same revenues are doled out, pice by pice, for public improvements, it is difficult to restrain one's indignation.

It appears from the able memorandum of the Court of Directors which we have appended to this article, that of sixty-three cases, the decree of the Sudder Court has been reversed only in twelve; in thirty-seven it has been affirmed; and fourteen cases have been compromized. In fact, the Act is used in four instances out of five, only to prolong litigation, and to distress the successful party by obliging him either to forego the possession of the property decreed to him, or to give security to its full amount; and, through the wisdom of Parliament, this game has been played at the public expense. No legislative body has, we believe, ever succeeded in discovering a more effectual mode of defeating the ends of substantive justice, or offered a more tempting premium on litigation.

The information elicited by this discussion is not without instruction. Mr. Lewis stated, that the whole sum which had been recovered as legal costs from the parties to seventy suits, had not exceeded 24,191*l.* Yet, if the laws at Bombay and Madras correspond with those of Bengal, security to the extent of 70,000*l.* had been actually taken from the appellants. The security exacted by the Sudder Court, was 1000*l.* in each case; the sum realized was only 345*l.* How are we to account for the fact that the securities which the Mofussil Courts had verified, and declared to be good and sufficient, turned out eventually to be worth only one third of the value for which they had been taken? It is just possible that in the twelve cases, in which the decision of the Sudder Court was reversed, and the appellant was victorious, the costs may have been thrown on the respondent, or losing party; but if this was the case, then the security taken from the appellant is in fact no security at all, for every decision is liable to be thus reversed. But even this supposition will not account satisfactorily for the inadequate outturn of the securities which had been taken with the express view of holding the Court of Directors free from all pecuniary loss.

But the Court of Directors are not the first in the field for the protection of the public interests committed to them. The security formerly required of appellants in India to cover costs, was 1000£. It appears, however, that the costs have on the average, been 2183*l*. in each case, and the Court now seek to be relieved from the loss thus entailed on the Indian revenues. But how does it happen that the Chairman of the Court of Directors in his reply to Mr. Lewis, omitted all mention of the efforts which had been made by the local authorities in India to remedy the evil? In the month of November 1842, the Sudder Dewanny Court, with the sanction of the Government of Bengal, declared that no appeal should be received unless security was given for costs to the extent of 2,500*l*. sterling, or 317*l*. beyond the average charge incurred in each case. It is not to be supposed that the Chairman of the Court of Directors would have omitted all mention of so important a fact in the course of the debate, if he had been acquainted with it. It is evident therefore that he knew nothing of the matter whatever. That the Chairman should know nothing of the Circular Orders of the Sudder Court is neither new nor singular; indeed there is no evidence that those documents are ever read by the Directors. But has the Chairman not read the Indian Journals in which the new orders of the Sudder Court were alluded to? Has he not read the Friend of India of the 21st December last, in which this subject was fully discussed? We fear it will be found that Lord Ellenborough's contempt for the Indian Press is the only part of his Lordship's conduct which the Directors consider worthy of approval and imitation.

Joking apart, however, we are happy to see the subject taken up in earnest by the Directors, and we hope they will push Her Majesty's Ministers till they have saved us this iniquitous outlay. We believe Lord Glenelg to be a statesman of the highest principle and benevolence; yet we cannot but suspect that those who put it into his head to make the revenues of India chargeable with the cost of all cases of appeal, and to reduce the value of appealable suits, from 5, to 1000*l*. and thus multiply them five fold, had an eye rather to the advantage of the legal profession at home, than to the Natives of India. It certainly benefits the former to the extent of 15,000*l*. a year. It is very doubtful whether it confers any corresponding benefit on India; or indeed any benefit at all. It appears that of forty-nine cases brought to a hearing in the course of ten years, the Privy Council has decided that twelve were unjustly decided by the Courts in India, that is one in four. That body has therefore redressed a little more than one act of legal injustice committed among eighty millions of people in a twelvemonth, and for this remedy the revenues of India have paid One lakh, twenty-seven thousand, three hundred and fifty Rupees! Although it has been said that justice is so inestimable a jewel as to be cheap at any price, this must refer only to the individual who is so fortunate as to obtain it, not those who have to pay for it without enjoying it. And we really question, whether it would not have produced a greater national benefit to have laid out this sum in local improvements, than to have devoted it to the private advantage of a few litigious suitors. The following is the memorandum of the Court:

The memorandum respecting the system of appeals from the Courts of Sudder Adawlut in India, to the Queen in Council, was next read, from which we give the following extract :—

"The operation of the system, therefore, has been, that, in every case of appeal brought to a hearing, both the appellant and respondent have been represented by the Company; that for that purpose a very heavy charge has been imposed upon the revenues of India; and that there is reason to apprehend that the right of appeal has been frequently used as a mere obstruction to the course of justice. It is not believed that in any other country the assistance of the Government is given to promote litigation, or that in any other system of judicature the interests of the opposing parties in a suit are maintained by one and the same representative.

"An appeal which the appellant takes no measures whatever to prosecute, can be viewed as nothing more than the means of preventing the execution of the decree in the respondent's favour; and the natural and just consequence seems to be, that, without application by the respondent, or by the Company on his behalf, it should, as of course, after a certain lapse of time, and after due notice, be struck off the file for non-prosecution.

"It is true that in twelve cases the decree of the Sudder Court has been reversed; but in the 37 cases affirmed, the enforced prosecution of the appeals through the Company's agency has worked nothing but expense, and therefore, injustice. In other respects, the result would have been the same if after three or six months they had all been dismissed for non-prosecution. Another species of injustice and oppression, may have been effected in the fourteen cases which were compromised, if the respondents were driven into a compromise from the apprehension of similar consequences.

"As, under the foregoing considerations, it appears that the present system of appeals from the Sudder Courts in India to her Majesty in Council rests on no sound principle, and is at variance with the practice of all British colonies, and as its operation has been attended with heavy expense and with other injurious consequences, it is submitted, that so much of the act as provides for appeals being brought to a hearing by the Company should be repealed, and that appeals from India, as elsewhere, should be left to be carried on by the parties themselves, with a distinct notice to the appellant in every case, that if not prosecuted within a time to be fixed the appeal will be dismissed."

INLAND STEAM NAVIGATION.—Mr. Buckland's letter reached us too late last week to admit of our offering any remarks upon it. Indeed the necessity of any comment has been in a great measure removed by the reduction of freight which the Assam Company has made, from 2 Rupees the Cubic foot to 1 Rupee 8 annas. We have not the vanity to attribute this judicious modification to any observation of ours; we ascribe it to the more mature judgement of the Directors of the Society: and we congratulate them on having adopted a rule which will recommend them to the patronage of what is usually called a "discerning public." Since this alteration has been made, it would be perfectly superfluous to dwell on the absurdity of offering the same article at an advance of thirty-three per cent. under the idea of competition, or to suppose that a minimum freight of two Rupees would be more beneficial to the public than one of a Rupee and a half. We are not much in the habit of taking credit to ourselves in our humble labours for the public benefit, because the public would we apprehend be disposed rather to abstract from than to increase our stock of credit, but on such an occasion as the present, we should not allow any feeling of modesty to interpose between us and our just reward. We therefore lay claim to the gratitude of the community of the Ditch for having clearly and scientifically explained the True Theory of Competition.

The Assam Company deserve the public thanks in a far higher sense than we do, and that for three things. First, for having reduced the freight to One Rupee Eight annas. Secondly, for having resolved not to put up the freight to auction, but to register applications in the order of their receipt. Thirdly, for having made no distinction between the freight of millinery and of literature. When the auction system was resorted to some four years ago by the Government of British India, it was said to be adopted simply as a temporary expedient, to prevent the imputation of injustice ... demand for freight exceeded the sup... the Superintendent was unable t... wishes of all, or to make any selec... the charge of partiality, the freight ... to auction. Those who bid highest ob... and thus two objects were accomplished; Government appeared perfectly impartial, and filled its pockets with the wages of impartiality. But it was distinctly given out at the time, though not under the solemnity of a pledge, that this expedient, which was as disagreeable to Government as it was profitable, should cease at no distant time; and that additional vessels should be laid on, without delay, to meet the public exigencies. But strange to say, although sufficient time has elapsed since the augmentation of the price, to have built twenty vessels, the increase of the number has not been to such an extent as to remove the distressing necessity of selling freight by public outcry. Appearances are at all times deceitful, perhaps never more so than on the present occasion, but it does appear as though Government had acted on the calculation that it would be more advantageous for the state—whatever it might be for the public—to obtain higher freight with fewer vessels, than reasonable freight by a larger outlay for additional vessels. It is apparently upon this principle that the expense of new steamers has been saved. We may however be wrong in our conjecture; and the continued deficiency in the supply of tonnage by Government, after the demand for it has been made apparent, may arise from the difficulty of diverting funds required for political purposes into this channel. But in this case the necessity of providing the means of commercial transport through other agency than that of the State, is only rendered more palpable.

As it regards the difference made in the public steamers between the charge for conveying Millinery and Literature, it was manifest, that certain articles, such as metals, must be charged by weight and not by their cubic contents; and it was necessary to draw some line of distinction between light and heavy goods. Unfortunately, this line was drawn just at the limit which excluded books from the more advantageous freight of articles taken by measurement; they have therefore been charged at a much higher rate than articles of less specific gravity. Whatever tends to interrupt the circulation of books through the Presidency, we consider as most injudicious; and we rejoice therefore that the Assam Company makes no distinction between bonnets for the ladies and books for the gentlemen.

The Assam Company is now indeed and in truth a rival; and we rejoice at the competition. Government nobly took the lead in this enterprize and demonstrated the feasibility of conveying goods by steam from the port of Calcutta to the marts in the interior; but it is impossible for the state to supply all the tonnage required for commercial purposes; and the undertaking should be relinquished at the earliest practicable moment to private enterprize. It has been said that the Government Steamers would have yielded no return but for the treasure freight with which they were loaded. The Assam Steamer will speedily show whether this idea was erroneous or not. But the transport of goods by steam vessels to be generally beneficial to mercantile interests, must be reduced, if possible, to a Rupee the Cubic foot. It is for the Directors of that Company to decide, upon an average of experimental voyages, whether this can be done or not. improvements which have been made truction of vessels, we should think ject is near its completion. Once freight to this moderate scale, and a week will scarcely be sufficient for the growing demands of the country.

THE BENGALEE SPECTATOR IS DEAD. The Conductors have lost a thousand Rupees within little more than a year, and, though their object was not gain, they have felt it prudent to desist from an undertaking which entailed a positive loss on them.

The object of the Journal was to discuss subjects connected with the welfare and improvement of the country. It was conducted with considerable ability; the Bengalee style was chaste, and as idiomatic as translations can be rendered, and the English composition did no little credit to the Native gentlemen who furnished it. Its politics were of a liberal cast; with a considerable tendency to the sentiments of the Chuckerbutty School. It looked for support therefore, both pecuniary and editorial, to the numerous youths who had received a liberal English education and who were supposed to have been thereby raised above the level of vulgar prejudices, and to have imbibed that European thirst for knowledge, which increases with the supply. In both respects, the conductors have been miserably disappointed. Although there are hundreds of Native youths who have received a liberal education, and are now employed in situations of trust, influence and profit, both under Government and by private individuals, they have taken so little interest in this enterprise, and have so completely failed to contribute to it, either by pen or purse, as to allow it to die a natural death. The only paper identified with the party who may be styled "young Bengal," has been placed in the bills of mortality within a year of its birth. Somehow or other, there seems to be the same "disinclination to progress" among those who have been made familiar with the finest models of European literature, which has characterized the disciples of the Vedas for twenty centuries, and kept the Hindoos in a state of constant inferiority. Those youths whose minds have been imbued with the thoughts of Shakespear and Milton and Addison and Johnson, and enriched with the study of mental and natural philosophy, seem to have dismissed all desire for improvement the moment they had gained the prize, and obtained a situation. The English-man seems to think that they are above taking a journal published both in English and Bengalee, and subscribe only for English newspapers. Unhappily he is mistaken. After twenty years' labour in giving English instruction to Native youth, and planting hundreds of them in situations of ease and comparative affluence, there are not One Hundred and Fifty-five who subscribe to the English newspapers of the Presidency, including the Friend of India. The national and hereditary lethargy has overpowered their spirit, and improvement is at an end.

It is now twenty-five years since the first newspaper was published in India, and the number of subscribers to all the Native journals little exceeds fifteen hundred. In no enterprize has so much talent and zeal been embarked as in that of the Native Newspapers, with so humiliating a result. The listlessness of this people is absolutely incredible, and appears to be incurable. If any thing could have been supposed capable of breaking up the sleep of ages, it must have been the spirit stirring Gazette; yet the nation sleeps on as in the days of Vikramaditya. Let us fancy for a moment the same stimulants to have been thrown among the Chinese, and the same strenuous efforts to have been made to infuse intellectual life and animation into them which have been so lavishly employed on the Hindoos, and how different would have been the result. We are sorry, very sorry that the Spectator is dead, both for its own sake, and for its influence on future efforts; but we are not sorry it is dead before Mr. George Thompson leaves the country. It will serve to open his eyes to the deep lethargy which pervades the Section of "enlightened natives" whom his eloquence roused for a time into a kind of galvanic action, which has been succeeded by as profound a slumber as that which existed before his arrival. He will now be able to comprehend the difficulty of introducing permanent improvement among a body which shews so few symptoms of vitality.

STEAM COMMUNICATION.—The loss of the Memnon with the entire Mails of one month, and the non-arrival of those of the following month by the return of the Cleopatra to Bombay appear to have excited a great sensation throughout England. Every letter brought from thence by the present Mail is said to bear evidence of the deep disappointment which has been created both in the family, in the commercial, and in the political circle. People at home do not seem to have felt how necessary a punctual and periodical communication with India was to their interest or comfort, until the intercourse was interrupted. A general desire has therefore been created to improve the means of communication by the employment of superior vessels. The Directors of the Peninsular and Oriental Navigation Company, true to the interests confided to them, have determined to fall in with the current of public feeling, that they might, when the tide of discontent was at the highest, come in for a valuable contract for the whole line, and thus obtain the entire command of Steam communication with India. They have gone up with a proposition to Government to contract for the punctual conveyance of the Mails, in such time as shall "give to Calcutta, and all places in India similarly situated, a month in the homeward communication to England, as well as a month on the outward communication from England, thus affording an aggregate acceleration of two months in the intercourse to and from the most important parts of India." The following is the plan.

"The following plan and proposal for improving the overland mail communication with India, China, &c., is now under the consideration of her Majesty's Government and the Directors of the Hon. East India Company;" and it was added that "memorials in favour of its adoption, signed by merchants and others connected with these places, were considered necessary to further the prompt accomplishment of the desired improvement."

"A plan and proposal for accelerating the transmission and reducing the expense of conveyance by the 'Overland Route' of the mails and despatches between the United Kingdom and India, China, &c., submitted by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company.

"The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company propose to undertake the transmission of the mails between Bombay and Suez monthly, by vessels of such speed as to ensure, under ordinary circumstances, the arrival of the mails despatched from Bombay on the 1st of every month (the monsoon months excepted) at Suez on the 16th of every month.

"They will also undertake the conveyance of that portion of the monthly mails destined for transmission through France via Marseilles, by vessels of such speed as to ensure, under ordinary circumstances, their arrival at Marseilles within 144 hours, or six days, from their embarkation at Alexandria. The mails from the United Kingdom to India, &c., to be transmitted within a similar time.

"The result of this proposed acceleration would be as follows:—

|---|---|
| The mails despatched from Bombay on the 1st of the month would arrive at Suez on the 16th, or in . . . . . | 15 days |
| They would be brought across Egypt, and embarked at Alexandria in . . . | 3 „ |
| They would consequently be embarked at Alexandria on the 19th of the month, and would arrive at Marseilles on the 25th, or in . . . . . . . . . . | 6 „ |
| Total time from Bombay to Marseilles . | 24 days |
| Marseilles to London, say . . . . . . | 4 „ |
| (N. B. The mail of this month, July, arrived in London in 3½ days from Marseilles.) | |
| Total time from Bombay to London . . | 28 days |

"It therefore follows that the mails would, under all ordinary circumstances, arrive in London on the 29th of every month. And the company have such confidence in their ability to effect this acceleration, that they will submit to a forfeiture of 1,000*l.* for every time that the mails despatched from Bombay on the 1st are not conveyed by their vessels, so far as the respective sea-voyages are concerned, say between Suez and Bombay, and between Alexandria and Marseilles, both lines inclusive, in 22 days, the monsoon months, as before mentioned, excepted, and also accidents at sea, which cannot be provided against.

"The time of transmitting the mails between London and Alexandria, via Marseilles, being reduced by the proposed plan to ten days, it would not be necessary to despatch that part of the mails until the evening of the 6th of the month, which would enable the steamer from Marseilles to Alexandria, to reach Alexandria on the same day as the steamer from Southampton, via Gibraltar. Hence, an interval of six or seven days would be afforded for replying to letters and despatches by the Overland Outward Mail, via France, instead of correspondents having to wait for the Outward Mail of the following month, as is now the case, and giving ample time for that purpose, not only to London, but to Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow, and, in short, to all the great commerical and manufacturing towns of the kingdom.

"From the time required to transmit the mails under the proposed accelerated arrangements by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, viz. 29 days, the mails despatched according to that arrangement on—say the 6th January, 1844, (instead of the 4th, as at present.) would arrive at Bombay on the 5th February, and at Calcutta on the 18th February, thus affording, as will be seen by reference to the dates of despatching the homeward mails from Calcutta, as exhibited in the preceding table, from five to eight days, for replying to letters by the homeward mails of the same month, the monsoon months not included

"It therefore follows that Calcutta, and all places in India similarly situated, would gain, under the proposed plan, a month in the homeward communication to England, as well as a month on the outward communication from England; thus affording an aggregate acceleration of two months in the intercourse to and from the most important parts of India."

A meeting of Merchants and others connected with India was held in London on the 19th of September, in order to press the Home authorities to entertain the proposal of the Peninsular Company. Similar meetings have been held in the chief commercial and manufacturing towns in the country. It will be seen that their plan restricts the communication to Bombay alone, but this was considered by the majority of the meeting as a matter of little consequence. With them, Bombay was India. The inconvenience which it might inflict on the rest of India, on the Bengal and Madras Presidencies, and on Ceylon, to be deprived of the advantage of direct communication, now enjoyed, was totally unheeded. One wiseacre, a Mr. Ridgeway, informed the meeting that the acceleration of the Mails to India, was so desirable that it needed no comment! He laid the whole blame of the present system,—which has been so much deprecated, and which so many meetings have been got up to subvert—not on the Steaming department, but on the culpable negligence of those who were appointed by the Government to sort their letters on their arrival at Bombay. Such nonsense scarcely deserves notice. If the fault did not lie with the steaming department, why did he hope that there would be "no dissent from the proposal" then before the meeting, which referred entirely to an improvement in that department? Why did he not propose that the evils of the present system should be at once cured by an address to Her Majesty's Ministers requesting that the Post Master General of Calcutta might be sent forthwith to Bombay to teach them to sort their letters better?

Mr. Elliott, a barrister, and the Editor of the London Mail, however, got up and advocated the interests of the other Presidencies, which it appeared to be the object of the Peninsular Company to throw overboard. He shewed how the interests of every section of the Indian Empire would be consulted, by considering the line of communication between Suez, Aden, Galle, Madras and Calcutta as the great trunk road, and laying a branch steamer on the line from Aden to Bombay. He was however overruled. Mr. Abel Smith, the chairman, said they had all one object in view, namely, "the acceleration of the Mails," and that it would be wise not to fetter Government by suggesting any particular line. He proposed therefore that the word Bombay should be left out of the motion, but this reasonable proposal was at once negatived; and the Ducks carried the day.

It is now stated, and on the highest authority that, it was not the intention of the Peninsular Company to abandon the line of direct communication between Calcutta and Suez; that their new proposal was intended to be an addition to the present arrangement; not to supersede it; and that in the year 1844 they would positively run the Bentinck and the Hindoostan, eight times between the two ports and back again. This assertion is made in the Monthly Times; it is given also in a letter from the Commander of the Bentinck to the Englishman; and it appears to be entitled to confidence. But it seems singular that there was not a single individual at this London meeting to rise and explain this matter; that no friend or understrapper of the Company should have been deputed to remove any misunderstanding which might arise. It is however perfectly clear that if the Government at home patronize the new scheme, the comprehensive plan which embraces the interests of the other Presidencies must be speedily relinquished, since it cannot be maintained without official support, and the home Authorities will not charge the public revenues with the burden of two lines of communication.

But let us look more closely at the "result of this proposed acceleration," as detailed in the scheme of the Peninsular Company, which if adopted by Government must speedily annihilate the comprehensive scheme, by taking our present steamers from us. "The mail despatched from London on the 6th January," say they, "will reach Bombay on the 5th of February, and Calcutta, on the 15th of that month." This can refer only to the Express which brings in but a partial supply of letters, and which cannot bring them all. The bulk of the letters would still be subjected to a delay of eleven, twelve and thirteen days, giving to one merchant a priority of information over another; and this act of injustice no skill in sorting the letters can remedy, not even though Mr. Ridgeway himself was appointed Post Master at Bombay. But the Peninsular Company's vessels, thanks to their successful experiment this year, can effect this by sea; they have already brought all our letters to Calcutta in less time than that occupied by the Express. The highest advantage which the new scheme proposes to confer on Calcutta, and in consequence of which, it has been lauded through England, and urged on Government, we have already enjoyed and to all appearance, may continue to enjoy, if the new steamers are not delayed by the arrangements for the Bombay steamers. Again, the new scheme allows ten days from Calcutta to Bombay and fifteen from Bombay to Suez, in all twenty-five days. The Hindoostan has already made the distance between Calcutta and Suez in twenty-five days, and will do it in less time when the arrangements for cooling are complete. The new plan will only therefore make this difference to us, that instead of receiving our letters at once by Sea we should receive them by Land in two, three or four instalments, without any acceleration whatever; and instead of paying three annas for them, we should be obliged to pay fourteen annas; and for those sent by the express, the small sum of five shillings and eight pence!

The construction of suitable vessels to carry out this new scheme will probably occupy three years. Yet the advantage which it proposes to confer on all India, may be attained in half that time by simpler and surer means. Government has only to encourage the Peninsular Company, by a suitable premium, to make twelve trips a year between Suez and Calcutta, instead of the eight they are now engaged to perform, and to lay on a branch steamer of adequate power between Aden and Bombay during eight months in the year, and Galle and Bombay during the four months of the Monsoon, and the intercourse is complete. No Presidency would then enjoy an advantage denied to its neighbour, but each one would share equally in the blessings of Steam Navigation, to the full extent its geographical position admitted of. We repudiate all idea of asking any benefit for this Presidency which should prove injurious to Bombay; at the same time we submit that after the successful experiment made by the large class of Steamers this year, to give any exclusive advantage to Bombay, at the expense of the other Presidencies, would be an act of gross injustice.

It is said that the Court of Directors are anxious to retain the communication in their own hands and are loth to give up the vessels which have created all this disappointment. But the communication between England and Egypt is already in other hands; so is that between Suez, Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta, for two-thirds of the year. Nothing remains to them but the intercourse between Suez and Bombay. If they are still anxious to have some hand in the matter, let them be permitted to ply their own vessels between Aden and Bombay, taking advantage of the superior speed of the Peninsular Navigation Company's boats to expedite the mails half the way to Aden. For our parts, we want no new scheme; we are ready to give up the land express altogether, and to trust entirely to the vessels already established, if they be only made monthly packets. The sea for us all the year round. The Englishman tells us there is going to be a magnificent rail road constructed between Bombay and Calcutta, which will remove all diffi[culties and] enable us to receive our letters fro[m England in] thirty-six hours. We shall be [most happy to] use it, and, when it is completed, [bid a]dieu cheerfully to our sea communic[ation and] advocate the transmission of the mails across the country. But we shall not be satisfied unless a similar road be made to Madras; for we must all share and share alike. These roads will extend to the length of about 1,500 miles, and, considering the mountainous country they must traverse, will not cost less than 10,000*l.* a mile. The whole cost will therefore not fall far short of Fifteen millions sterling or fifteen crores of Rupees. Now the Peninsular Company will carry out the most comprehensive plan that can be devised, and possibly include Hong Kong and Pekin in their calculations, for one per cent. interest of this sum.

This article has been extended to so very unconscionable a length, that we must reserve for next week our observations on the plan which the Peninsular Company intend to adopt, of going out of the direct line from Calcutta to Suez, to "fill up" with passengers at Bombay.

It was not till after these remarks were written that we saw in the Hurkaru, a letter from S. the veteran advocate of direct Steam communication. His quotation from the proposal of the Peninsular Company places the matter in a new light. We confess it is utterly impossible to reconcile the assertions officially put forth by the Secretary, Mr. Allan, with the design unfolded in the prospectus. The Secretary is instructed to give a public and unqualified denial to the report that it was intended to abandon the line of Steam communication which they have opened with Calcutta, Madras, and Ceylon, and to assure the public that the new line between Suez and Bombay they are anxious to occupy shall not disturb the existing arrangement between this Company and the Court of Directors in regard to the communication with Calcutta and Madras. And yet the Peninsular Company offers the home Authorities the two vessels which are now employed between Suez and Calcutta. It is manifest they cannot be employed in both lines at the same time; and the proposal to run them between Suez and Bombay necessarily implies their being taken off the present line. There is a degree of mystery and reservation in the transaction, which is any thing but creditable to a public body. It would appear as though the Company was anxious to obtain a return for the capital employed in the construction of these two vessels, rather by a lumping gratuity from the public funds for running them as packets between Suez and Bombay, than by taking passengers from the other Presidencies. We hope the Home Authorities will not forget that by contracting to run these vessels with the Mail to Bombay, more than half the sum which would have been received by them as passage money, will be lost, and that this sum must be made up from the public purse; and that, a far more advantageous bargain might be made, and with equally favourable results, as it regards the conveyance of the Mails, by allowing these vessels to run between Suez, Galle, Madras and Calcutta, and contracting for the employment of an additional Steamer from Aden to Bombay.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23.

correspondent of the Englishman, rather ed with capital which he is anxious to a profitable way, asks whether rags imported at Serampore from Europe. reply that they were; but that they d to be more expensive than the rags ... were obtainable in India. In Europe the only thing which they look for in rags is their strength, as the dirtiest can be bleached white as the driven snow by Chlorine gas, but unfortunately the rags furnished by the Hundred Millions of British subjects in the East, are deficient above all things in that one quality of strength.

— Mr. George Thompson has left Delhi, having, as the Delhi Gazette says, settled every thing with his Majesty to his own satisfaction.

— Sir Richmond Shakespear received charge of the Gwalior Residency from Col. Speirs on the 30th ultimo. The latter took his departure immediately for Nagpore.

— It has been proposed to erect a Church at Neuralia, or Newerra Ellia, and a considerable subscription has been raised for the purpose. When Sir Lawrence Peel and the other Calcutta visitors were applied to for their aid, they considered that as it was likely there would not always be a Clergyman of the Church of England there, and as other denominations of Christians, particularly the Presbyterians, might contribute to it, the building ought not to be devoted exclusively to Episcopal worship. They determined therefore to subscribe provided that (giving Episcopalians, as the most numerous of the subscribers the preference of using the place for morning service) a Presbyterian clergyman would be allowed, if present, to use it in the evening; and that when neither Episcopalian nor Presbyterian minister was present, a minister of any other denomination should be allowed to officiate, if a few of the subscribers wished it. Sir Anthony Oliphant, who, as might have been expected, is favourable to this Catholic project, has been made the depository of these conditional subscriptions, and now holds a considerable sum which he is authorized to lay out for any other charitable purpose if he cannot accomplish the object of having the Church of Neuralia open to all denominations of Protestants. Ceylon lies in the diocese of Madras, and Sir Anthony is not in good odour with its Anglo-Catholic Bishop. We think he will not be allowed to remain long in doubt regarding the distribution of these funds among other charities.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 24.

— The Bentinck Steamer arrived yesterday off Garden Reach, without having been semaphored. We think the Superintendent of Marine will find, on enquiry, that there is large room for improvement in the Semaphore department. On every occasion on which we have trusted to the intelligence it gives of the progress of ships up and down the river, we have been misled. An occasional comparison of the ship's log as she passed the four stations, with the semaphoric report would shew the extent to which carelessness prevails.

— The Bentinck has made a very splendid voyage. She was only sixty-four days under steam from Southampton to the Sand Heads. She was detained on the route twenty-four days yet reached Calcutta in less than three months. The Venerable the Archdeacon and his family have come up in her from Galle, in six days and five hours. The passengers speak in the highest terms of the attention they received from the Commander, and of the arrangement of the Cabins, which are far superior in accommodation to those of the Hindoostan.

— Mr. George Clerk, late Lieut. Governor of the North West Provinces, has left Simla, and embarked for Calcutta at Gurmooktesbur Ghat. He returns to England by way of the Cape.

— Sir Joseph Thackwell has been appointed to command the Cavalry division of the army intended to operate against Gwalior.

— By the latest accounts from Moulmein we learn that the Commissioner has suspended Capt. Corbyn, the Master Attendant at Amherst, and established a land post between Mergui, Tavoy, Amherst and Moulmein.

— The Rustomjee Cowasjee has brought round from China the remnant of the Company's Staff, Col. Wilson, Capt. Davidson and Lieut. Ochterlony. The Settlements there are now placed upon the usual colonial allowances given by the Crown, which fall far short of those given by our Honourable Masters.

— Sir Henry Pottinger has appointed Major Pottinger, an extra Aid-de-Camp, and it is said will send him home with the Supplementary Treaty. This treaty, it appears, provides that all foreign nations trading with China shall enjoy the same privileges which have been granted to the English, and that if any fresh privileges should be granted to foreigners, the British may claim to participate in them.

— The Bombay papers hint that an American fleet will congregate at Canton, and that the Envoy will demand of the Chinese Government reparation for injuries committed in the seizure of some opium on American ships. We thought brother Jonathan repudiated the opium traffic, quite as much as he does the repayment of the loans made to some of the states.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25.

— The Hindostan Steamer arrived at Madras at day light on the 19th, having made the voyage from Garden Reach to that Port, in four days. Capt. Engledue has been very successful in expediting the passage of this vessel. On the former trip, she did not leave the Pilot, till the third day after leaving town.

— The Hurkaru states that an extensive robbery of shawls of the value of 20,000 Rupees has recently been committed in Calcutta. We are happy to learn that the Police have succeeded in discovering a part of the stolen property; and that other property stolen by the same parties has come to light.

— An Act has been passed by the Mauritius Government, which reduces the public allowance on Coolies imported after the 1st of January next from 7£ to 4£; but this reduction is to apply only to labourers introduced by private speculation. The last Act of the Indian Government altogether forbids the exportation of Coolies by private individuals. We have several letters on the subject and hope to take it up fully next week.

— The Hindostan, Capt. Rednan, which left Madras on the 12th October, was only reported yesterday. She has made one of the slowest passages on record. The Bentinck Steamer came up in three days; this vessel has been forty-two days, on the passage.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 27.

— Lord Ellenborough left Barrackpore in the State Boat, towed by the Hooghly Steamer, on Saturday a little after two in the afternoon. A bar of sand on the Barrackpore side of the river obliged the vessels to take the deeper channel on our side of the water. His Lordship was on deck, and appeared to look with some degree of interest towards the office of the Friend of India as he passed in front of it. We stood on the bank of the river to return the complement, musing at the same time on the thrones the Governor General would probably overturn before he again returned to his country seat. At Hooghly he disembarked, and entered a nondescript kind of conveyance, in which he is to be propelled by human labour to Agra. Strange that after having held Bengal for nearly eighty years, there should not be a decent carriage road for the Governor General of India to travel on.

— The Southampton is at length reported. The present passage has been three weeks longer than the last.

— The Floreville, which has brought up Mr. Blundell, the Ex-Governor of Moulmein and of the Straits settlements, grounded on her way up last Saturday, on the "James and Mary" and foundered; all hands are saved but one. We believe it will now belong to the province of the Superintendent of Marine to urge on Government the immediate necessity of blowing her up, to prevent the obstruction of a channel at all times narrow and dangerous, but which will be rendered ten times more so, unless steps are taken to clear away the wreck. We are extremely sorry to find how great a loser Mr. Blundell has been by this calamity. All the property he brought round with him has perished. His English library may be replaced; but not the valuable Burmese library which he had been many years in collecting.

— The Delhi Gazette gives the important intelligence that Rajah Golab Singh has at length arrived at Lahore with 20,000 of his well disciplined mountain soldiers, and has assumed the Government of the Punjab. He has at once refused to accede to the pecuniary demands of the refractory troops of Heera Singh, which have been urged with such insolent importunity, and will doubtless put them down by force. All the foreign officers including General Ventura, are to quit the service.

— His Excellency, the Commander-in-Chief reached Agra on the 18th where he found Col. Sleeman and Sir Richmond Shakespear. Mr. Thomason, the newly appointed Lieut. Governor, had also arrived there, but intended shortly to leave it on revenue duties in the north. The arrival at the station of Baboo Dwarkenath Tagore is also announced. The Agra Ukhbar states, that Col. Speirs had arrived at Agra, having made an unsuccessful attempt to pass through the Gwalior states to Nagpore. The policy of removing this officer who is so intimately acquainted with Gwalior affairs, and also Major Lawrence, whose knowledge of the Punjab is second only to that of Mr. Clerk, just at the time when we are about to enter upon negotiations with those states, which may end in war, is very questionable. Their successors cannot be supposed to have their local experience.

— Mr. Speed, late Editor of the Planters' Journal, now confined in the Great Jail, has just been brought up before the Magistrate for beating a poor washerwoman with shoes, and fined Five Rupees.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 28.

— The latest account from Scinde is in a letter from Sukkur of the 10th instant, published in the Star, and which gives a very lamentable account of the sickness still prevailing there. Though we have been obliged to omit every local extract to admit the contents of the last Mail, we have still contrived to make room for a portion of this letter. It appears that there are more than 2,500 men in hospital at Sukkur. All the Regiments there could not furnish 500 men fit to shoulder a musket, and repel any attack which might be made on them by the wild Belochees, if they should descend in sufficient numbers from the mountains. Our army in Upper Scinde appears to be almost in as critical a position as ever the garrison of Cabul was. The question of its entire annihilation has ceased to depend on its own prowess, for the bravest cannot fight with a fever in his veins. The security of those regiments depends on the moderation or the fears of the enemy, which may cease at any moment. Should evil befal the army stationed there, the present administration would be brought to a speedy close. The catastrophe would ring throughout England, and all those who were wavering about the justice of having occupied Scinde, would immediately make up their minds as to its injustice, and the Ministry would be obliged to divert the storm of public indignation from themselves by sending out another Governor General.

— The benefit at the Theatre last Wednesday night, for the late Mrs. Leach's children, was a miserable failure. The house was comparatively empty, though the object was the relief of the orphans of one who had so long afforded amusement to the play goers of Calcutta. A subscription has therefore been opened which has seven names, and donations to the amount of 800 Rupees.

— The Madras papers state, that orders had been unexpectedly and peremptorily received from Lord Ellenborough by the Resident at Hydrabad to despatch seven Regiments of Cavalry and Infantry to some place in the vicinity of Elichpore. No one seems to know any thing of the object of this contemplated movement.

— A correspondent of the Hurkaru states, that Government have thrown out the proposal of two out of four of the Magistrates of Calcutta to raise the House Tax from Five to Six and a half per cent. The same writer states, that the collection of the Tax, which is now performed by salaried officers, costs nearly 15 per cent.; and suggests that it might be done for half that sum by a per-centage.

— The officers of the American Frigate Brandywine, now at Bombay, have returned the hospitality they experienced from the officers of the Indian Navy, by giving a splendid entertainment on board that vessel to Three Hundred Ladies and Gentlemen. Just as the entertainment was about to commence, the Suez Steamer with the Envoy, the Honourable Mr. Cushing, anchored along side, and His Excellency was enabled to join in the festivities of the evening.

— The Governor General having taken his departure for the North West Provinces, the Hon. W. W. Bird, Esq. has been again sworn in as President of the Council of India and has appointed Capt. Spottiswoode, Military Secretary, and Lieut. Walker, Aid-de-Camp.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 29.

— The Bombay Times informs us that the September periodical publications which had been left behind at Suez, have been brought on now; and that the October Periodicals have been left behind at Aden because the Commander of the Steamer considering them as Merchandize fancied he was precluded by his orders from bringing them on.

— The same paper states that of 8,504 troops at Hydrabad and Kerachee, 4648 are effective, and 3850 non-effective from sickness. The amount of mortality has not been so great as the amount of sickness would have led us to suppose. The sickness at Sukkur, as will be seen by the extract we made yesterday, continues to be much more formidable.

— The papers of this morning publish the correspondence between the Peninsular Company and the East India and China Association, which fully confirms the view we took of the matter before we had seen these letters, that the Company have distinctly offered to run between Suez and Bombay, the same vessels which they are already under an engagement to run between Suez and Calcutta. Mr. Allan's reply is haughty and evasive, and goes far to confirm the suspicions which have been entertained regarding the intended "dereliction of duty"—to use the mildest term.

— A correspondent of the Star states, that the sum which Mr. Cushing is going to demand from the Chinese is 250,000 dollars, not for opium seized, but for certain merchandize belonging to American citizens, which was destroyed in the late war with the English.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

SCINDE.

"Nothing of any great moment since my last. Sickness continues the same, excepting that it appears to go harder with those who have been attacked since the 1st of the month. The Sukker Brigade turned out on muster about, 9th N. I. 14 men, 10th N. I. 30, and 55th N. I. 73! The Artillery I do not think could have had half a dozen, and Chamberlayne's Horse about 12. The men on the sick list were 2,374!! Deaths are becoming more frequent. The Europeans of the Artillery have lost 43 men out of 164; and are as sickly as can be now. The 9th and 10th N. I. have daily a death or two, and the 55th N. I., since the 2d of this month to to-day, the 10th have had 20 deaths, or two a day. Dr. W. Polland lately arrived from Ferozepore died here on the 6th current. The Steamer Satellite arrived from Hyderabad on the 7th with Dr. Thompson, a Bombay Medico for us, and left on the 9th yesterday with Drs. Maitland and Young, and one or two officers of the 9th and 10th on sick leave, Captain Gwatkin of the Commissariat leaves to-day for Ferozepore. He has been very ill. Capt. Lindsay 10th N. I. is acting Commissary General for Capt. Gwatkin, Dr. Macrae will soon go away. Chamberlayne's Horse have lost one duffadar and eight sowars since the 4th current. The Right Wing of the 55th N. I. went out into Camp about 2½ miles from the Station, encamped on the banks of the Shikarpore Nullah. This has been done in the hope of the change benefitting the men. We have reports here that the 15th and 34th Bengal N. I. are ordered down. Is this to be a relief? I suspect not. Government will find that unless they relieve the Bengal Regiments here and send Bombay ones, all the former will be fit for nothing, either here or on their return to the provinces. Let their "office men" calculate the average number of deaths here and at the unhealthiest Station in India, and they will see the difference. There are certain reports, Mr. Editor, that Scinde is not so quiet as thought. Lower Scinde is rising and Upper will also;—mark my words, Sir, about the end of this month, if not ere that, you will hear of few unruly doings of the gents who it was expected would not fire a shot in Scinde again.—Cal. Star, November 28.

The letter respecting the Temperance Society at Dum-Dum has been received, but too late for noice this week.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

DETACHED THOUGHTS

Regarding the abstract lately given by the "Friend of India," from the declarations of certain gang robbers.

Praiseworthy as have been the Superintendent's zeal and activity in disclosing the appalling growth of gang robbery under our highly extolled civil administration; I cannot think that the root of this evil has yet been fully exhausted: many think that the remedy for gang robbery consists merely in punishing the offenders: and a coarse and sweeping system of conviction and punishment has accordingly been resorted to; under which, and with the present state of evidence, the innocent must too frequently be involved with the guilty; and even if it be otherwise; even if, under the Superintendent's energy and judgment justice acts with greater precision as well as energy; still success must depend much on the accident of the Superintendent's personal energy and judgment; and also on a continuance in the present disposition of the robbers to make confessional disclosures.

It seems to me that one main root of the evil is indicated in the following words of a confession. "The Headman of a village provided him (the robber) with maintenance; and taught him gang robbery."

Another main root of the evil seems to be indicated in the following passage. "In a Dacoity 2,400 Rupees were given to the Zemindar of Hurungotta."

The above tallies with an opinion I have often urged in the Friend of India to the effect that Heads of villages and Zemindars were the chief oppressors of the communities under them; and that the Heads of villages in particular never acted but against the communities under them—whether in aid of Zemindars, official extortioners, or robbers: and that, being entirely independent of the village community, the Headmen find it their interest to make separate cause against them; and also that the village watchmen being in the pay of the Zemindars were equally disposed with the Headmen to act with the Zemindars against the communities and were often (as I said) the key for the Zemindars and other robbers, to the village they intended to rob.

It is evident that whatever in the above manner prostrates the people below those over them must be favorable to the smooth and coercive collection of revenue; and not the smallest disposition to modify this strong purchase on the people has been evinced; and indeed the only disposition seems the old Tory disposition of adding to it a stronger military purchase on the prostrated communities. But it is now evident that in thus prostrating the people beneath the official extortioners and the Zemindars through whom we derive revenue, we are at the same time prostrating the people beneath the gang robbers from whom we do not derive revenue; and who, on the contrary, are exhausting the sources of revenue, and as the Friend of India emphatically says preying on the very vitals of the country. It is now evident that the people must be rendere[d] jectly at the mercy of robbers; even t[...]
must, by the same operation, be rend[...]
jectly at the mercy of Zemindars and [...] through whom we realize the revenues.

But where and how are we to comm[...] work of raising the communities in some degree from their prostration under the official functionary, the Zemindar, and the gang robber?

I urge that we must commence the work from below; and at the point indicated in the first of the quotations at the commencement of this writing, so that the Head of a village may have a strong interest in the village adverse to that which now induces him to maintain gang robbers and to "instruct them in the profession," we must in short give him a practical and actuating motive to act for and with the community instead of, as now, only on and against the community; and at the same time, we must give to the watcher a similar motive for acting for the community instead of being as now a key whereby the Zemindar who pays him and the robber who pays the Zemindar are to enter and rob whatever house they please. In a word we must make the Headman responsible to the community over which he is placed and make the village constabulary force (be they watchers or peons) responsible to the responsible Headman; and thus by increasing his powers with his responsibilities, by binding up his interests with those of the community, we will convert the Headman into a nucleus of collective and defensive energy, while other faculties of Local self-government might by the same operation be drawn forth from the community wherein we so acted as the grand principle of political development, namely, increase of power with increase of responsibility.

But the prevailing idea is that, here, as in China, the only responsibility must be responsibility to the central authorities and their delegates: but unless we relax a little of this Chinese theory; I believe that the people will continue to be as abject as stationary as in China, and as helpless beneath the power of Zemindars, robbers and their own Headmen as they now are; the only compensatory reflection for all this being that our power of smooth coercion and of silent pressure on the people will continue as perfect as in China.

Let me in conclusion add; that I, by no means, think we should meanwhile relax in the exertions carried on through the Superintendent. Let him proceed in his laudable exertions of seeking and keeping down the growth of the evils, without hindrance to our more general and constitutional means of eradicating the evil. Let him kill the brood while we clear the noisome recesses which generate them.

REGARDING INDEFINITE TAXATION.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—I should be glad to learn through your instructive columns whether the imposition of a tax on the people without defining the rate or the amount is legal and constitutional.

The Municipal Act authorises the local Committee to impose such tax; and if this were to be a self imposed tax, no defining of the tax would be necessary. But as the tax payers have no voice whatever in appointing the taxing Committee the tax will in nowise be a self imposed tax; and the Committee is therefore a mere instrument for additional and unlimited taxation, another force added to that great taxing and fighting machine called the Indian Government.

The object of the said Act should have been to educe from the local communities those aptitudes of local self-Government which we have always repressed; but in imposing such a Committee we only add to the depressive tendencies of our Government, and give a higher pressure to the screw.

I submit that one duty of the Law Committee is to see that the liabilities of the people are duly defined and limited; and that the Committee is paid for something more than merely putting the Government into Law-English.

Yours, &c. PRO PROVINCIIS.

DISTRACT IN THE NORTH WEST.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Every true Friend to India must have read with interest your article on the Dacoits of Bengal published in your paper of the 19th October. Every Magistrate in the country must agree in the justice of most of your remarks, and every active Magistrate must rejoice to see the main error of our criminal administration urged upon the Government as you have done in your concluding lines:—viz. that Police is utterly neglected and judicial proceedings alone attended to.

2. You are not altogether right in supposing that no Magistrates have free intercourse with the people. Those who do their duty properly have; and necessarily so,—for how can a man know what is going on about him unless he does mix with the people? And how many are those who do so, you will ask, and why are they not more numerous? I will tell you why—simply because the man who takes no trouble about his Police, receives just as much of the favour of Government as he who takes every pains. No man is praised for his good Police—no Magistrate expects preferment, honour, or emolument from maintaining a good Police:—and the consequence is, that most men neglect that most important branch of duty.

3. Nay more, he who is familiar with the people whom he governs, whose name is a Terror to Thieves and Robbers,—who traces crime with perseverance and labour, such an officer is constantly mortified at finding that his Police labours are wholly overlooked;—no acknowledgment made, no thanks given; while for a trifling error of procedure or irregularity he is subjected to censure:—meanwhile his neighbour a man of ease and pleasure—ignorant of his district, unknown to his people, presiding in a district where crime stalks unrepressed—punishing only such crime as convicts itself—this officer is perhaps held up as a model of excellence, by the Chief Judicial Court, because his Judicial Statements are fair, and his procedure exhibits little irregularity.

4. I am not holding up irregularity or defending error:—but martinetism and precision may be carried too far—and when more attention is paid (as is now the case) to trivial forms and rules than to the solid advantages attending the repression of crime, it is high time to reform.

5. Under our present system of Government, a Magistrate is much more afraid of committing some irregularity in ferretting out offenders than of leaving them unpunished. In the former case, his laborious and successful exertions are sometimes followed by censure from the Sessions Judge and from the Nizamut Adawlut. In the latter no one can say much, and if the Superintendent of Police [i. e. Commissioner] does raise his feeble voice, it is, whether in censure or in praise little attended to in higher quarters. In fact a Magistrate is fettered in every way—receives no encouragement—no support—no praise—and what result can you expect different from what it is? viz. The Police is Bad!

6. The Thuggee and Dacoitee officers have done much good, and will I hope do more: but they have had extraordinary support and assistance, which Magistrates unaided might in vain have sought for. Several enactments specially passed to aid their efforts have brought the Dacoit—and Thug under very different Law from what was wielded by Magistrates. The efforts, the successes, the necessities of the Police were brought directly before the Government by the head of the department, and received attention which it might in vain have sought through the slow and unheeded medium of the ordinary channels—Sessions Judges learnt the necessity of attending less to minutiæ of Law and more to the true merits of a case from the knowledge that their proceedings were watched and liable to be overlooked.

7. It is sad to see the dignified indifference of these high functionaries in some cases to the interests of the Police. Ignorant entirely of the opinion, and feelings of the people over whom they preside, their judgments are solely passed from the papers before them, and while they are really incompetent to judge of the weight due to the testimony of A. B. C. or D. who may come before them—from an ignorance of their respective characters—bias—or party,—yet pass judgment and censure on the Magistrate who does know all this with the complacency of an oracle.

8. The fact of the Zemindars being privy to, or at least cognizant of—99—out of the 100 offences committed against property is, Sir, no news to efficient Magistrates of these Provinces. Here it is invariably the case. Exceptions may occur but they are rare—and the surest way of keeping down crime is to hold the Landholder responsible who protects the thief. On this point our Laws are not nearly stringent enough—and though under different enactments they are liable to punishment by the Session Judge for gross connivance proved by Judicial Trial—and to slight punishment by the Magistrate for failing to report crime, yet we want an enactment still which shall render all Landholders liable to severe fine and imprisonment whenever the Magistrate and Superintendent of Police are agreed that they have grossly neglected precautionary measures so as to induce a well grounded opinion of their having connived at criminals or crime. From such sentence no appeal should lie to the Judicial authorities, for nothing is so difficult, so next to impossible as to prove a Zemindar's actual connivance judicially: while the fact may be as well known among the people as that the sun is high in heaven at noon day. I have long intended sending you a line on this subject but have really not found time. I have a Police to attend to—and it takes time and what with roads, bridges, supplies, revenue, balances, locusts and all, I find little leisure for discussions of this nature. I have written hurriedly and cared more to state a few broad facts than to clothe them in the best words for which you must excuse Yours obediently,

A MAGISTRATE OF THE N. W. P

N. W. P.
October 26th, 1843.

P. S. I could add a few lines to the same purport on Revenue matters. Inefficiency in that department is again becoming the order of the day. Then why? because merit is no longer sought and rewarded and idleness gains as much as labour. Labour is painful, and continued applying desk labour is injurious to health: Idleness when joined to air and recreation promotes health and has attractions for most men. Is it wonderful then that Talent when unrewarded should not be called forth? that knowledge or experience unacknowledged and unvalued should flag? Can any unprejudiced man of the Civil Service look at the daily appointments, changes, &c. in that Service, and assert that Merit has any weight in the councils of Government? Certainly none in these N. W. P.! The Patronage of the Civil Service is one of the most vitally important functions of Government not for the mere sake of the Patronage—the influence—the Halo of authority and power which surrounds the dispenser, but because upon the due and the proper exercise of that patronage depends the efficiency of the Civil Service—and hence of the Civil administration of the country. If men were confident that merit must win its way to preferment and honour, the very indolent would exert their energies. But when all feel sensible that interest and intrigue and personal acquaintance outweigh a thousand times the best service—the most active become indifferent and indifference generates neglect.

Yours obediently,

A MAGISTRATE AND COLLECTOR, N. W. P.

MAJOR THOMAS WILKINSON.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—In reply to the Query contained under the head of Weekly Epitome of news of the Friend of India, dated 9th instant, as to why Major Wilkinson has been superseded by Col. Speirs in the Nagpore Residency, I beg most respectfully to state that the Major has resigned the appointment at his own free will with an intention of proceeding to his native Land "the old Merry England."

I am, Sir,
Yours obediently,

EUROPE.

GENERAL REMARKS.—The missing mail, and anxious speculations as to the cause of its detention, and the fate of the steamer by which it should have reached Aden have, since our last, served to keep India before the public; Indian affairs generally have also afforded matter for frequent discussion. Accounts of the disastrous wreck of the Memnon reached London on the afternoon of the 3rd October. The loss of the mails produced considerable excitement among mercantile men, and is likely to occasion much inconvenience in commercial affairs; for though in most cases duplicate bills may be received, in many instances, as the Times remarks, "the mischief cannot so soon be remedied." The loss of the Memnon clearly illustrates the mischief of confining the intercourse to Bombay. Had there been a steamer on the "comprehensive line," the mails from Calcutta, Madras, and Ceylon, would in all human probability, have reached England in due course.

The past month opened with a meeting, held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, in order to take measures for the immediate dispatch of the Rev. Dr. Wolff to Bokhara, with a view of determining the existence or non-existence of Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly. Capt. Grover, who presided upon this occasion, gave a very clear history of the imprisonment and sufferings of these unfortunate officers. He contended that they were accredited to Bokhara; and then discussed at considerable length, and with much ingenuity, the evidence upon which her Majesty's Government have come to the conclusion that they are no more; pointing out, as he went along, those particulars in which he considered it either contradictory or defective. The observations of the chairman appeared to make a strong impression on the meeting, and resolutions, in furtherance of the proposed objects, were passed unanimously.

We confess we are not in the number of those who entertain any very sanguine hope as to the present safety of Col. Stoddart and his companion. Still, the case is one of sufficient doubt to demand immediate interference, on the part of the public, if not of the Government of the country. Humanity and state policy alike require it; for British subjects ought not to suffer, under circumstances such as have been disclosed, without some inquiries being instituted in order to ascertain their fate. We do not profess now to discuss how far the Government are bound to interfere where they have not the power to insist upon redress, or whether it may not be more politic in the present instance to leave the matter in the hands of the public. All we say is, that something should be done. If by the public, we have reason to know that it will have the encouragement and support of the Government.

Some facts which came to light in the course of the proceedings appeared to occasion considerable surprise and give rise to rather severe animadversions. Why, it was asked, should a letter written by the Sultan to the Ameer of Bokhara, demanding the release of his prisoners, have been stopped by Col. Sheil, at Teheran? And how was it Lord Ellenborough could have written to the Khan, designating two British officers, who had represented themselves to be "diplomatic agents," as "innocent travellers?" Col. Sheil may have certain instructions to plead in justification of his conduct; but it seems almost impossible to conceive, that, had the Governor General been at the trouble of consulting any person of ordinary oriental experience, he could have committed so fatal a mistake.

We must next call attention to the proceedings of a very important meeting, held at the Hall of Commerce, on the 19th Sept., for the purpose of memorialising her Majesty's Government and the East India Company, and of adopting other measures for obtaining increased despatch in the conveyance of the Mails between England and India. Though it would be impossible to over-estimate the importance of such an object, the only plan submitted to the meeting was one put forward by the Peninsular and Oriental Company, which proposes to convey the mail of the 1st of every month from Bombay to London in 28 or 29 days, the monsoon season excepted; and the mails of the 8th of every month from London to Bombay in 29 or 30 days. If this could be secured,—and experience justifies the utmost confidence in the ability of this Company to carry out any undertaking in which it engages,—then no doubt the merchants of many of the large commercial cities in England would be enabled to reply to their letters by the mail of the same month. But we very much question, considering the mode of dawk conveyance, whether the same advantages would be secured to the merchants of Calcutta, and other places in India, especially at certain seasons of the year. We say "merchants," because this question has been discussed as one of commercial rather than of social importance.

Such is the substance of the plan which has been proposed. It is undoubtedly a good one as far as it goes, nor would we underrate for a moment the advantages it is likely to afford to this country, and, especially to Bombay. But is it the best plan that might be submitted? And does it secure to India, in general, all or even most of the advantages the public have a right to expect from steam intercourse with England? It is for the public in India to determine this for themselves, and to make known their wishes on the subject; but in our judgement it is defective in every essential particular—a conviction which induced the Editor of this Journal, in the absence of more influential parties, to offer it his humble opposition. It is not "comprehensive" steam intercourse. It does not propose any improvement in the present unsatisfactory mode of transmitting the mails between Bombay and Calcutta and other places in India. Above all, it does not procure for Ceylon, Madras, and Calcutta, the earliest receipt of their respective mails; which could be provided, not by way of Bombay as is proposed, but by direct steam conveyance from Suez, while a priority of intelligence would still be secured to Bombay by a branch line from Aden or Galle. The attention of the meeting was called to the propriety of seeking such a contract as would effect the improvements now suggested, and to the inexpediency of pledging itself to any line confining the steam intercourse in the first instance to Bombay; and amendments were moved to that effect, both of which were negatived. This result was, perhaps, in some degree attributable to the view taken by the Chairman, who expressed himself clearly of opinion that the original resolutions went only to the acceleration of the mails; and that it would be unwise to press any particular line of intercourse upon the Government. Upon both points we are at issue with the hon. gentleman; however, in the present case, it is perhaps of less consequence, as we have the assurance of Mr. Smith, that in any memorial founded upon the resolutions passed, no particular line of intercourse should be recommended.* Whether the mails shall be conveyed to Bombay, or whether comprehensive communication is to be adopted, are therefore open questions as far as this meeting is concerned. Upon this point there can be no mistake, although report says, the line to Bombay has been recommended in a memorial from the committee. We shall see how the matter stands when these gentlemen come to report to a public meeting on 1st December.

A Quarterly meeting of the proprietors of India Stock was held on 27th Sept., when Mr. Lewis called attention to the provisions of the 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 41, which compels the East India Company to prosecute appeals from the Courts of Sudder Dewannee Adawlut, even where the parties most interested do not see fit to prosecute for themselves. Some modification of this measure seems to be absolutely necessary, and we are glad to find the Court of Directors have taken steps for obtaining the removal of an evil which has been so justly complained of. Between Sept. 1833 and Sept. 1843, no less than 70 appeals have been heard under Orders in Council, at a cost to the revenues of India of £152,826, of which sum only £24,191 has been recovered, leaving a deficit of £128,635.

A seat in the representation of London is vacant by the decease of Alderman Sir M. Wood, Bart. Mr. T. Baring has started on the conservative interest; the reform candidate is Mr. Pattison.

In different parts of Scotland the people have resisted the settlement of the ministers appointed in certain parishes to fill the vacancies caused by secession. There has been considerable rioting, and in some places military aid is to be called in, the power of the civil force having proved quite insufficient. The ministers of the Free Church have been doing all they can to control the popular feeling, but hitherto unsuccessfully. It will be seen by reference to another page, that the merits of Lord Aberdeen's Bill are likely soon to be tested.

We regret to say that the state of Wales is daily assuming a more serious aspect, and that the necessity of declaring martial law, and of issuing a special commission has been under the consideration of Government. As long as hostility was confined to the destruction of gates and bars,—to the redress of unjust exactions,—the followers of Rebecca had public sympathy on their side; but matters have now taken a very different turn. The movement is no longer against turnpike tolls, but against rents, rates, poor-laws, taxes, and a host of grievances, real or imaginary; while some spirits among the rioters, gathering impunity from forbearance, are taking advantage of the present state of the country, to gratify personal revenge. The destruction of private property is of nightly occurrence, and, we are sorry to add, that in one instance murder has been committed. A poor old woman named Sarah Williams, the keeper of a toll-gate, was shot while defending her property. It is fair to add that this has been attributed, by some, to accident.

Repeal agitation continues in Ireland; but the enthusiasm which characterised the earlier stages of the movement, has scarcely been maintained. The meetings have been neither so numerously nor so respectably attended as those of which we have been accustomed to read; nor do the proceedings which took place present a single feature of novelty. In all but time, place, and numbers, the meetings of the past month were the meetings of any previous month. Even the speeches of the great leader himself were little more than repetitions of former harangues. There was the same fierce denunciation, the same delusive promise, the same gross exaggeration, to be found in each. The people seem to grow impatient of all this, and to look for practical results, in the realisation of those social and political advantages which they were led to expect would, long ere this, have resulted from agitation. This is a natural step in the progress of events; but it is one which appears to have somewhat perplexed Mr. O'Connell, who has now, as in the instance of the Lismore demonstration, to control the intemperate zeal of his reverend friends—to put on the drag-chain, and ask his impatient followers for increased confidence and further time. The wise forbearance of Government in avoiding all measures of coercion, is another source of embarrassment. He feels it; and therefore dares Ministers to a prosecution, which he knows would but serve to increase his popularity and give fresh vigour to agitation.

The new movement in Spain raised by the Central Junta of Barcelona, and directed against the Provisional Government at Madrid, has spread as rapidly as the revolt which ended in the overthrow of Espartero; and, strange to say, in many of the larger cities, as Saragossa and Seville, it is favourable to the ex-Regent. The original cause of this movement, as stated by the Junta, was, that Serrano promised there should be a National Convention to sanction and remodel the new Government; whereas his colleagues have violated that pledge, and committed the most despotic acts under the power which they have without licence usurped. The manifesto put forward by the Government admits the promise, but denies the power of Serrano to give such a pledge, though they reaped all the advantages of the insurrection to which it gave rise. As matters at present stand, it seems impossible the Government can retain power, even till the meeting of the Cortes. A coalition of the Progresistas and the friends of Espartero has, it is said, been concluded on a basis, of which the marriage of the Queen with the Duke de Cadiz, the convocation of a Central Junta, the adjustment of the marriage question and the Queen's minority at the same time, are the principal features. Commissioners have been despatched from Barcelona and Madrid, with an invitation to Espartero to return and place himself at the head of affairs. General dissatisfaction prevails at the conduct of the Lopez Ministry. Gallicia is expected to declare itself against the Provisional Government. Already the principal cities, towns, and districts have addressed strong remonstrances against its successive breaches of the Constitution. No impression seems to have been made by all the firing against Barcelona. Saragossa maintains itself against the government; Madrid is entirely at the discretion of Narvaez and Mazzaredo, who arbitrarily arrest the citizens without giving notice of their proceedings to the authorities, and have already sent passports to several English residents. There are reports of the pronunciamiento of San Sebastian, Cadiz, Carthagena, and Murcia. In the midst of all this the Cabinet is divided against itself, so that ere many weeks have passed, it is probable one more revolution will have been consummated, and that Espartero may be again at the head of affairs in Spain.

Greece has also been the theatre of revolution; a bloodless one however, though in every respect as complete as any to be found in the history of Europe. The king has been obliged to yield to the just demands of his subjects, who have shown a moderation in the hour of triumph, scarcely to be expected from a people who have endured so long the most exasperating persecutions, and been so cruelly deceived and injured. He has been compelled to dismiss his Bavarian counsellors; to form an administration in which the people have confidence, and from which all foreigners are excluded; and to summon a national convention in order to settle the constitution of the country.

The stage was arranged as a saloon, the sides and back having tiers of seats for spectators: the chairman's seat was upon a raised platform or rostum; and in the centre, immediately before the stage-lights, was a table to which the speakers advanced on addressing the audience. The doors were opened a little after six o'clock; and no favourite performance on the boards ever attracted a greater crowd. It seemed composed chiefly of respectable persons of the middle class, and included a large number of ladies. At seven o'clock, entered Mr. G. Wilson, Chairman of the Council, accompanied by Mr. Cobden, and other leading Corn-Law Repealers in and out of Parliament. There was a loud burst of applause, renewed on the entry of Mr. W. J. W. Lockhart, Esq., B. A. of Exeter College, Oxford, and for the last twelvemonths an inmate of Mr. Newman's house at Littlemore, has become a convert to Roman Catholicism, and it is stated that the Rev. H. L. Oxley, late a Romish priest, has renounced the errors of the Church of Rome.

It is said to be intended to hold a dissenting convention at Birmingham as soon as the arrangements can be matured, the object being to cement more closely the ties which bind all non-conformists together, and thus to strengthen themselves the more effectually to resist encroachments upon liberty of conscience.

At the Town hall, Liverpool, a box of bread was lately opened which was packed at Rio Janeiro nearly two years ago, and proved as sound, sweet, and in all respect as good, as on the day when it was enclosed. This bread is manufactured of a mixture in certain proportions of rice meal and wheat flour. The coarsest quality of flour may be used, and will produce bread not inferior to that of the finest description by the ordinary method. It was stated that it is also extremely nutritious, very beneficial to the system, and a certain antiscorbutic. Some of it was eaten by the Mayor, who pronounced it excellent, in which opinion he was joined by all present. It was asserted by M. Alzard, the discoverer of the process, that the bread would keep two centuries without the slightest alteration.

WALES.—It is generally understood that Carmarthenshire and Cardiganshire are about to be placed under martial law, and that a special commission will immediately issue for the trial of prisoners now in custody. The disturbances appear to have spread to Radnorshire.

Rebecca's people lately made a very daring attack on Pontardulais gate, a few miles from Swansea. In a field near the gate were concealed eight policemen, under Capt. Napier, with whom were three magistrates. Towards midnight, a strong body of rioters, including about a hundred horsemen, attacked a blacksmith's shop, and then the gate, which they destroyed. When they had finished the destruction of the gate, the police advanced—the object being to secure the ringleaders flagrante delicto; but instead of desisting, the rioters fired a volley at them. The police were ordered to draw their pistols and fire, which they did twice, wounding several of Rebecca's gang, and shooting the horse of the leader. A regular battle took place for a short time; and the police succeeded in capturing six prisoners, three of whom were wounded, two severely. The rioters attempted a rescue, but were repulsed; and, some soldiers coming up, they fled. The correspondent of the Times says that, so far from striking terror into Rebecca's followers, the wounding some of their number in the attack on Pontardulais gate has only exasperated their spirit of revenge; and he remarks that incendiary attacks on the property of private persons are now often substituted for attacks on toll-gates. The daughter of a Baptist minister, who lived near Pontardulais gate, told the reporter that she watched the proceedings: the police, on coming up, suddenly fired on the rioters, before they had fired a shot. That, whether the fact or not, is what the people generally believe. The gate has since been frequently erected, and as frequently destroyed.

Incendiarism begins to show itself as a popular form of crime in South Wales. Mr. W. Chambers, a Magistrate of Llanelly, whose tact in directing the military has made him formidable to the Rebecca rioters, and who was instrumental in causing the apprehension of those who attacked Pontardulais gates, has been the object of repeated incendiary attacks. "Mr. Chambers cultivates a farm, called Tynywern, about seven miles from Llanelly, on the Pontyberrem road. On Sunday morning, between one and two o'clock, the barns and outbuildings of this farm were set fire to, together with the hay and corn stacks all of which were completely consumed, and about 300*l.* worth of property destroyed. One of the farm-boys was awakened, and on looking out, saw the outbuildings on fire, and about fifteen men disguised leaving them. The same men were then seen to go across the country to another farm occupied by Mr. W. Chambers, called Maensant; and there they set fire to the corn and hay stacks. Three stacks of corn and one of hay, worth about 150*l.*, were entirely consumed. On Sunday night, the house itself was set on fire, and destroyed."

The rioters have also added deliberate murder to their misdeeds. "On the road from Llanelly to Pontardulais, and within five hundred yards of the latter place, is a turnpike-gate called Hendy gate. This was kept by an old woman upwards of seventy years of age, who has received frequent notices that if she did not leave the gate, her house should be burnt down. About three o'clock on Sunday morning, a party of ruffians set fire to the thatch of the toll-house. The old woman on being awakened, ran into the road, and to a neighbouring cottage within twenty yards of the toll-house, shouting to the people who lived in it 'for God's sake to come out and help her to put out the fire; there was not much.' The occupier of this cottage, a stout able man, was afraid to go out, and begged the old woman to come into his cottage; which she refused, and went back to try and save some of her furniture. It appears her exclamation had been overheard, for the villains returned and set fire to the thatch again. The old woman then ran across the road, and, shouted out, 'She knew them;' when the brutes fired at her. She staggered as far as the neighbouring cottage door, and there sank down dead, in the arms of the cottager's wife."

An inquest was held on the body; and, after hearing ample evidence of the facts, including medical evidence as to the fatal nature of wounds in the chest produced by the shots, the Jury returned the following most extraordinary verdict:—"That the deceased died from the effusion of blood into the chest, which occasioned suffocation; but from what cause, is to this jury unknown."

On the night of the 11th Sept., about four hundred persons visited the Fish-guard toll-house, near Haverfordwest, and completely destroyed it. They then proceeded to Parkymorfa toll-house, and instantly demolished it. About 2000 persons were assembled in the town, looking on whilst this was going forward; but no one interfered.

The Welshman relates the destruction of Llechryd Weir, near Cardigan, on the night of the 13th Sept., by Rebecca and her Daughters. "She had long threatened to do so; and on the night in question she put her threats in execution. It appears that threatening letters had been sent to some gentlemen in the neighbourhood of Cardigan, that a small weir near Velingigfrag would be pulled down that night; consequently the alarm was given, and the Marines marched from Cardigan down to watch the said weir; but Rebecca and her Daughters went to work in another quarter, and succeeded in their enterprise. We understand that a rearguard of the Marines on their return from Velingigfrag, fell in with the Rebeccaites; two of them were in advance, and the third a little behind. Becca asked him if he had a musket? 'Yes,' replied the Marine. 'Is it loaded?' 'Yes.' 'Is it capped?' 'Yes.' 'Take off the cap, then, and come with us.' He was then taken to a public-house in the neighbourhood, and treated with several glasses of ale, and then discharged. He arrived in Cardigan two hours after his comrades."

During last week, about fourteen different toll-bars have been destroyed in Carmarthenshire; and property to the amount of 800*l.* was burned in the rick-yard of Mr. J. R. Lloyd, a County Magistrate, at Dolhaidd. The London Police have succeeded in arresting two of the ringleaders in the late attacks upon private property, and lodging them in Carmarthen jail.

The correspondent of the Times writes thus:—"It is said, too, that the better class of farmers are beginning to get sick of Rebecca's proceedings; and with some reason. I am informed that a kind of black mail is levied on them. The parties who break gates, &c. are generally paid labourers, led on by some few farmers and the Rebecca of the district; and I am informed these men are paid 2*s.* 6*d.* per night, out of which they provide their powder and shot; and the money to pay them with is raised by sending round notices, first to one farmer and then to another, to pay a sum at which he is assessed by a certain time, and bring it to some meeting of Rebeccaites. If he refuse it, he does it at the peril of having his stacks fired. The Rebecca for the night pays the men from this fund. On the person of the Rebecca taken at Pontardulais, several receipts acknowledging payments of this nature were found. This sort of tax on the farmer has caused, I am told, a great deal of secret information to be given by them to the authorities; and I have heard that it was from information derived in this way that the Police came upon the party attacking Pontardulais gate."

A proclamation was published in the London Gazette of the 3d Oct., in which her Majesty strictly commands all justices of the peace, sheriffs, under-sheriffs, and all other civil officers whatsoever, that they do use their utmost endeavours to repress all tumults, riots, outrages, and breaches of the peace, and to discover, apprehend, and bring to justice the person concerned in riotous and wicked proceedings aforesaid; and enjoins all liege subjects to give prompt and effectual assistance to all civil officers in their endeavours to preserve the public peace. And as an inducement to discover offenders, it promises that any person who shall discover or cause to be apprehended, the authors and perpetrators of any fire or outrage upon the person, by which life shall have been sacrificed, shall be entitled to the sum of 500*l.*

A riot and breach of the peace took place at Rosskeen church on the day fixed by the Presbytery of Tain for the settlement of the Rev. J. Mackenzie in the parish of Rosskeen. About eleven o'clock Mr. Mackenzie crossed the ferry, accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Gibson, Avoch, Wood, Rosemarkie, and Hall, Cromarty, Sir Hugh and Lady Fraser, Braelangwell, &c., and proceeded to the church. On their arrival at the bridge they found a large mob of people, to the number of between 200 and 300, armed with bludgeons, who assailed them with the most gross expressions, and as they advanced towards the church the crowd closed upon them, menacing them with personal violence if they attempted to enter the churchyard. The party were attacked, several were struck with stones, and some received severe blows from sticks. The members of Presbytery having been thus prevented from entering the parish church, and assaulted and threatened, if they attempted to go near it, met and were constituted at Lower Kincraig, where the usual forms of settlement were gone through, and Mr. Mackenzie was inducted. The Presbytery, not deeming themselves safe in the excited district, and seeing that their proceedings would be obstructed, adjourned to Dingwall, where they have since met, and the Rev. Mr. Rose was settled as parish minister of Kincardine, and the Rev. Mr. M'Bride and the Rev. Mr. Mackenzie, were settled as ministers of Kilmuir and Logie respectively.

The spirit of opposition by members of the Free Church to the settlement of ministers in the vacant parishes, which exhibited itself at Rosskeen, was exceeded in violence at Resolis, a parish situate a short distance to the west of Cromarty. On the day appointed for the settlement of the Rev. Lewis Rose, presented to the parish of Resolis, vacant by the secession of the Rev. D. Sage, the members of Presbytery, Col. Hugh Baillie, M. P., Sheriff Jardine, and other gentlemen, accompanied by ladies, set out from the residence of Sir H. Fraser, at Braelangwell, but on arriving within a short distance of the church, they found it surrounded by a numerous party of males and females, for the most part under mature age, and that a few minutes previously, on perceiving the approach of Mr. H. T. Cameron, procurator fiscal of the district, and a sheriff's officer, they had at once forbade their approach to the church by greeting them with a volley of stones, although Mr. Cameron is a celebrated non-intrusionist himself. The members of Presbytery were not, however, permitted to proceed, for on coming within reach, volleys of stones were hurled at them in such a manner as to oblige them to retreat. Matters having now assumed a most alarming appearance, an officer and three or four revenue-cuttermen, were hastily brought up, armed with cutlasses and pistols. One double-barrelled gun and a few pistols were all the arms that could be distributed in addition among the maintainers of the law, others being obliged to provide themselves with sticks. Having formed in as good order as possible, with the four cuttermen in front, the Presbytery and escort, preceded by the sheriff, again advanced towards the church, and were received, when within reach, by volleys of stones. The sheriff then read the Riot Act. The rioters placed the women in front, and the men, ranged behind, kept up an incessant discharge of stones. Almost every person had been struck by stones before the order was given to fire upon the rioters. One man was apparently wounded in the leg, but, being on an elevation, the pistol, although loaded with ball, did not do much apparent damage, and, not possessing further ammunition, the revenue-officer ordered the party to charge with their cutlasses and with sticks. At this juncture, and while leading his men on, he was knocked down, and it is said had a rib fractured by a blow from a stone; and, unfortunately, about the same instant, he received a severe wound on the back of the neck from a missile, which covered him with blood. The force being clearly insufficient for effecting an entrance into the church, under such circumstances, and especially as it was asserted that there was a large party lying in wait in the wood above the church, the Presbytery were deforced, and retired to effect the settlement in a private house. Under these alarming circumstances, and as similar outrages are expected at Knockbain, and other places where ministers have to be settled, it is said the Lord Lieutenant of the county has applied to Sir N. Douglas for troops. Similar disturbances have taken place at Logie, where the people will not permit Mr. Mackenzie to preach, and have defied the civil power.

OBITUARY.—We have to announce the death of George Joseph Bell, Esq., Professor of Scots Law in the University of Edinburgh, after a protracted illness. Mr. Bell also held the office of one of the principal clerks of session, which by his death has become vacant.

Dr Prior, the late Vice-Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, died on 16th of Sept. Dr. Prior was elected unanimously to succeed the late Dr. Hodgkinson in 1841. He has nearly attained the very advanced age of seventy-nine years, having been elected a fellow in the year 1722. It is supposed that Dr. Prior will be succeeded in the vice-provostship by the Rev. Dr. Wray, S. F. T. D. C.

Private accounts from Bogota state that Mr. Steuart, the British Charge d'Affaites to the Republic of New Granada (formerly M. P. for Haddington), died in that city on the 15th of July.—Morning Post.

The Right. Hon. James A. Stewart Mackenzie expired on 25th of Sept, at Southampton. The deceased was eldest son of Admiral the Hon. Keith Stewart, second son of the sixth, and brother of John seventh Earl of Galloway. He was born September 23, 1784; and married, in 1817, the Hon. Mary Mackenzie, eldest daughter and co heir of Francis last Lord Seaforth, and widow of Vice-Admiral Sir S. Hood, Bart. K. C. B., by whom he had issue a son and daughter—namely, Mr. W. S. Mackenzie, 90th Foot, and Mary, married to the Hon. P. Anstruther. The Right. Hon. gentleman assumed by sign-manual the name of Mackenzie on his marriage. He was Commissioner of the India Board from 1832 until November, 1834. In 1831, he was elected member of Parliament for Ross and Cromarty, which he represented until 1837, when he was appointed Governor and Commander-in-Chief of Ceylon, where he remained until 1840, when Sir C. Campbell succeeded to the Governorship. On leaving Ceylon, the deceased proceeded to Corfu as Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands; in which he was succeeded a few months back by General Lord Seaton, the present Commissioner.

Alderman Sir Matthew Wood, Bart., M. P., died at Matson House, near Gloucester, the residence of his son-in-law, Edwin Maddey, Esq., D. C. L., on 25th Sept., in the seventy-sixth year of his age.

AMERICA.—The principal points of interest in the American papers relate to the progress of the state elections, and their probable effect on the coming Presidential contest. The candidates for the Presidency are understood to be, on the Whig interest, Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky; and on the side of the Democrats, Mr. John C. Calhoun and Mr. Martin Van Buren. The elections, so far, were in favour of the Whig party, but to so trifling an extent, that the election would have to be decided by the House of Representatives, unless the Calhoun and Van Buren parties were to form a coalition, or one of them give their interest to the Whig candidate.

A fatal duel, marked by circumstances of disgraceful ferocity, has taken place between a Mr. Abel Labranche, a newly-erected Democratic member of Congress for Louisiana, and a Mr. Hueston, the Whig editor of a paper called the Baton Rouge Gazette. The cause of the difference was the publication in the Gazette of an article censuring Labranch on political grounds, which he considered a personal insult. He is a man of large muscular frame; and, seeking his opponent in a billiard-room in New Orleans, commenced upon his person a most aggravated attack, which it seems the bystanders countenanced or tolerated, and which resulted in the removal of Hueston in a state of perfect insensibility. A challenge followed. The parties fought with double-barrel guns, loaded with ball; and each had fired six shots at his opponent without injury, when, at the seventh fire, the ball of Labranche took effect, and Mr. Hueston died in five hours.

A Philadelphia correspondent says—"You will doubtless have read in most of the New York papers reports of Mr. Robert Tyler's speech at the Irish Repeal meeting on Tuesday, in New York. It is, indeed, a strange and extraordinary spectacle, to see a son and secretary of the President of this Republic meddling with the affairs of Europe. Very few native Americans attend these meetings. His speeches are full of the bitterest malignity against England. He said, 'I appear to denounce a government which I hate! I abhor the history of the British Government' (with which his father has just made a treaty). Again, he professes 'irradicable detestation of those who are now the enemies (the English) of Ireland.' Again, 'I (Mr. Robert Tyler!) claim legislative emancipation for Ireland— I (Mr. Robert Tyler!) demand it, in the name of the enlightened age in which we live,' &c. After all, the sum of eighty dollars only was collected. He talked in one part of his speech of 'churches desecrated, daughters ravished in sight of mothers, sons slain, and Ireland's halls of justice turned into worse than Saturnalian orgies, and where the British judge has stained his very ermine with the blood of victims.' These are the pictures this man (son of the President) holds out as indicative of the state of Ireland under British rule."

The accounts published by the French Commerce Minister, and the progress of French trade in 1842, are by no means satisfactory. The falling off in that year, comparatively with the previous one, in French exports of silks, cottons, and linens, is very great. In cotton goods the diminution is one-fourth, in silks one-third, in linen little short of a third. The diminution in the export of wines and brandies is equally remarkable, also in articles of mode, paper-hangings and other articles, the trade in which was supposed to be prosperous. We see an increase in scarcely one article of export from France, except porcelain.

GREECE.—Athens has been the scene of a bloodless revolution which commenced on the 14th, and was effected before noon of the 15th September, occasioned by the unwillingness of the King to adopt the recommendation of a protocol from the London Conference. The three protecting powers had, in the most positive manner, notified their dissatisfaction at the system of government then pursued, and required the dismissal of the Bavarian employes, and the exclusive appropriation of the customs and stamp duties to the payment of the interest on the loan.

At two o'clock A. M., a few musket shots fired in the air announced the assembling of the people in the different quarters. Soon afterwards the inhabitants, accompanied by the entire garrison, marched towards the square of the palace, crying, "The Constitution for ever!" On reaching the place, the entire garrison, the artillery, cavalry, and infantry, drew up under the windows of the King, in front of the Palace; and the people having stationed themselves in the rear, all in one voice demanded a constitution. The King appeared at a low window, and assured the people that he would take into consideration their demand and that of the army, after consulting with his Ministers, the Council of State, and the representatives of the Foreign Powers. But the commander, M. Calergi, having stepped forward, made known to his Majesty that the Ministry was no longer recognised, and that the Council of State was already deliberating on the best course to be adopted under existing circumstances. Shortly afterwards, a deputation from the Council of State presented an address to the King, comprising, among other things, the following requisitions, which it described as measures emanating from the wants and wishes distinctly expressed by the Greek nation:—A new Ministry without delay, comprising Messrs. Andre Metaxa, Andre Londos, Candris, Rhigas Palamidis, Mansolas, Leon Melas, and Michel Schimas.

An ordinance, which will impose on the new Ministry, as its first duty, the convocation within the space of a month of the National Assembly; who are to deliberate upon the definite constitution that is to be established in concert with the Royal authority, as the aegis under which the throne and the nation shall hereafter be placed. The new Ministry to render an account of its acts to the National Assembly.

Whilst his Majesty was reading the propositions of the Council of State, the representatives of the Foreign Powers presented themselves at the Palace, and were told by the Commander that nobody could be admitted at that moment, the King being in conference with the deputation of the Council of State. The latter came out two hours afterwards, with the consent of the King. The new Ministry then repaired to the Palace, where they held a long consultation with his Majesty; who shortly appeared on the balcony, surrounded by his Ministers and other personages, and was received with acclamation by the people. The cry of "Long live the Constitutional King!" resounded, together with that of "The Constitution for ever!" The new Ministers entered immediately on the discharge of their functions. The military revolution was directed, on the part of the regular army, by the colonel of cavalry, Demetri Calergi, and on that of the irregular army by Col. Macryany. At three o'clock in the afternoon, the garrison, after defiling before the Palace, re-entered their quarters, preceded by their bands, amidst the acclamations of the people. An hour af . the city, in which order had not been an turbed, resumed its customary aspect.

Next day, the King issued a decree National Assembly within thirty days. T. State issued a decree, thanking the people my, exhorting them to continued order, an to the army an oath of "fidelity to the country and the constitutional throne," and of attachment to the constitution to be settled by the Assembly. The Council also decreed that the 15th Sept. should in future be a national festival. Similar movements took place at Chalcis and Nauplia. Letters from Athens say that all foreigners who held offices under Government were to be dismissed, with an exception in favour of veteran Philhellenes. It is said that the King yielded with bad grace when he found that all resistance on his part would be unavailing. It was eleven o'clock, A. M., before his obstinacy was subdued. The military bands were then playing the "Marseillaise" and the "Parisienne;" which gave him cause to suppose that affairs might proceed to unpleasant extremities. On the 16th, King Otho took his customary airing and was saluted, as he passed along the streets, with cries from the people and soldiers of "Long live the Constitutional King!" Tzinos, a minister, who had ordered the infliction of torture on several occasions, was hidden for a time in the King's palace: he was forced out but his only punishment was to be banished, and to be guarded by the troops of the new regime from the fury of the mob. Vlahopulo, the old Minister of War, indiscreetly presented himself, and ordered the troops to withdraw. Calergi merely said, "Take the Bavarian away, and shut him up!" and he was put under a guard in his own house.

Head Quarters, Camp Cawnpore, 23d October, 1843.

The following orders are confirmed:

The presidency division order of the 10th instant, directing Ensign J. Maginn, recently admitted into the service, to join and do duty with the 32d regiment of native infantry at Dinapore.

The Saugor division order of the 12th instant, appointing Essoory Lall, Native Doctor, to do duty in the hospital of the 69th regiment of native infantry at Nowgong, in Bundlekund, and directing Ghunsam Singh, Native Doctor, to proceed to Seonee, on the requisition of the Deputy Commissioner.

The Kurnaul station order of the 12th instant, appointing Assistant Surgeon J. N. D. Login, M. D. to the medical charge of the detachment of the Hurrianah light infantry battalion at the station.

The regimental order issued on the 13th instant, by Major H. Dick, commanding the 56th native infantry, appointing Lieutenant W. R. Prout to act as interpreter and Quarter Master to the corps, during the absence, on medical certificate, of Brevet Captain and interpreter and Quarter Master J. R. Younger, or until further orders.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence:

4th Regt N. I.—Lieut. O. J. McL. Farrington from 1st November to 1st December in extension, to appear before the committee of examiners in the native languages at Cawnpore.

Sappers and miners, 2d Lieut. A. Impey from 1st November to 30th November in extension, to enable him to join the corps.

---

Head Quarters, Camp Cawnpore, 24th October, 1843.

Lieutenant Colonel E. Biddulph is removed from the 1st to the 3d Brigade of horse artillery, and Lieutenant Colonel C. Graham, C. B. from the latter to the former.

Lieut. Col. Biddulph will join the head-quarters of the 3d brigade with all practicable expedition.

The following removal of medical officers is directed:

Surgeon J. M. Brander, M. D from the 4th to the 63th regiment of native infantry, and Surgeon C. J. Macdonald, from the latter to the former corps.

---

Head Quarters, Camp Cawnpore, 25th October, 1843.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief is pleased to direct, that monthly returns of corps of every denomination, and detached troops and companies of artillery, as furnished to the Adjutant General of the army, shall likewise be transmitted, for the present month and thenceforward, to the Secretary to the Government of India, in the Military department, Calcutta.

The leave of absence, to visit Mussoorie, on private affairs, for one month, which was granted to Brevet Colonel G. P. Wymer, C. B. of the 38th light infantry, in General Orders of the 16th ultimo, is cancelled, at his own request.

Ensigns F. R. M. Gasset and Charles Warde, recently admitted into the service are directed to join and do duty with the 68th regiment of native infantry at Barrackpore.

Deputy Assistant Commissary of ordnance, J. Hamilton, is posted to the Magazine at Allahabad.

Sergeant Maurice Sweeny, of the 3d company 3d battalion of artillery, is transferred to the town Major's list and appointed park Sergeant to the permanent select committee of artillery officers at Dum-Dum.

Recruits John Nightingale and Albert Woodham, lately arrived from Europe, are transferred from the 1st European light infantry, to the regiment of artillery, as gunners.

Bugle Major John Jennings, as invalid of the present season from the 3d battalion of artillery is, with the sanction of the Right Honourable the Governor General of India in Council, permitted to reside as an out-pensioner at Agra, subject to confirmation by the honourable the Court of Directors.

By Order of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief,
J. R. LUMLEY, Major General,
Adjutant General of the Army.

Head Quarters, Camp, Cawnpore, 28th October, 1843.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief enjoins on committees for investigating claims to family pension, the necessity of the greatest attention being observed in sifting the nature of the evidence offered in support of a claim; numerous instances having lately occurred of the same individual giving testimony in support of a number of claims, although the claimants were of different castes and religions, and resided in widely distant parts of the country, circumstances which, from the habits of the native soldiery, would at once indicate that the witness could not be speaking from personal knowledge of the parties.

The order issued on the 4th instant, by Colonel W. R. C. Costly, commanding the 18th regiment of native infantry, appointing Lieutenant and Brevet Captain W. Hore to act as Adjutant to the left wing of that corps proceeding on escort duty with His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, is confirmed.

A committee of horse artillery and cavalry officers will assemble at Ghazeepore, on the 1st of December next, for the purpose of examining and passing into the service, such horses as may be presented by the superintendent of the central stud, and which the committee may consider fit for military purposes.

Captain C. M. Gascoyn, of the 5th regiment of light cavalry, is nominated a member of the committee, and the Major General commanding the Cawnpore division will, in communication with the General Officer commanding the Benares division, nominate the president and remaining members, reporting the names of the officers selected for the duty to the Adjutant General of the army.

2d Lieutenants H. D. Macswcen and D. McNeill, of the artillery regiment, are directed to proceed to Agra, and report themselves to Lieutenant Colonel J. Tennant, at whose disposal they are temporarily placed.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence:

4th Company 6th Battalion Artillery.—2d Lieutenant F. Alexander, from 1st September to 5th November to remain at Simlah, on medical certificate.

2nd Company 4th Battalion Artillery.—2d Lieutenant H. D'O. Baillie, from 1st November to 1st December in extension, to enable him to join.

10th Regiment Light Cavalry.—Captain D. G. A. F. H. Mellish, from 1st September to 2d October to visit Simlah, on private affairs.

8th Regiment Light Cavalry.—Captain F. Tweedale from 25th September to 15th November in extension, to enable him to join.

2d Regiment Grenadiers.—Lieutenant H. Mainwaring, from 7th October to 7th November in extension, to remain at Mirzapore, on medical certificate.

15th Regiment Native Infantry.—Ensign J. Laing, from 30th September to 1st November in extension, to remain at Simlah, on medical certificate.

24th Regiment Native Infantry.—Ensign M. M. Salmon, from 25th October to 25th January 1844 to visit Calcutta on private affairs.

A committee of horse artillery and cavalry officers will assemble at the Haupur stud, on the 27th proximo, for the purpose of passing into the service such colts as may be presented by the superintendent, and considered by the committee fit for Military purposes.

The Major General commanding the Meerut division will be pleased to nominate the president and members, reporting the names of the officers selected for the duty to the Adjutant General of the army.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence:

65th Regiment Native Infantry.—Surgeon H. Bousfield, from 1st November to 1st February 1844 in extension, to remain at Darjeeling, on medical certificate, and enable him to rejoin his corps.

74th Regiment Native Infantry.—Captain A. Charlton, from 1st Nov. to 1st Feb. 1844 in extension, to remain at Darjeeling, on medical certificate, and visit Calcutta, preparatory to applying for leave to Sea, for the benefit of his health.

By Order of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief,
J. R. LUMLEY, Major General,
Adjutant General of the Army.

EDUCATION.

CLAPHAM PARK ACADEMY NEAR LONDON.

IN this establishment a liberal education, in all its branches, is combined with an assiduous Intellectual Training, an ever watchful Moral oversight, Religious culture and the treatment of a Home.

The premises have been recently erected for the purpose, and combine advantages of no ordinary character, conducive alike to health, cheerfulness, and the formation of habits of good order; and the situation, for its salubrity, pleasantness and highly select character, is second to none in the environs of London. Mr. Long aims in all his arrangements and in his whole system of instruction, to extend to his pupils the full benefit of his own experience in teaching during more than twenty years, and to form the character through the instrumentality of his and Mrs. Long's personal attention and influence, and the steady application, by himself and assistants of a discipline equally mild and effective.

Mr. Long has pleasure in referring to the following Gentlemen, to whom he is well known: The Rev. E. Crisp, Bangalore; Rev. G. Mundy, Chinsurah; Rev. A. Lacroix, Calcutta; Rev. M. Hill, Berhampore; Rev. W. Morton, Calcutta; Rev. E. Porter, Vizagapatam; Rev. W. Porter, Madras; also to the Rev. James Hill, Clapham, Surrey, late of Calcutta.

The mildly bracing air of Clapham Park, and the superior accommodations of the house, including warm and cold bathing, are particularly adapted to the reception of pupils from warm climates.—Further particulars may be had of the Rev. E. Porter, Vizagapatam, and the Rev. W. Porter, Madras.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

A LADY of high respectability and accomplishments, residing in a healthy part of the Coast of Kent, wishes to receive four Girls to board and educate with the advantage of living in a private family. The Lady is a mother, and having been for some years in India is well acquainted with the treatment for young persons of delicate constitutions. If desired too, she would have no objection to take charge of one or two little Boys up to 7 or 8 years old, in any case where parents were unwilling to separate brothers and sisters. The terms will be moderate varying according to the age of the pupil, but always for a specific sum annually, including extra charges of every description.

Cards of address, and other particulars will be given by the undersigned, and parties writing Home may communicate with Messrs. J. Cockburn and Co., No. 41, New Broad-street, London.

Gwalior, the Punjab, and Scinde.—The two parties into which the troops at Gwalior had divided themselves, have come to blows. That of the Regent and the Khasgee was beaten, and the Usurper was sent in chains to the British Resident. He is since reported to have made his escape. The details of the engagement, as given in the papers, are any thing but distinct, and it is difficult to form any consistent opinion of the state and the views of the parties from the information before us. There does not appear to have been any extraordinary display of courage on either side, and the number of killed and wounded is marvellously small. Indeed, from the demonstration made on this occasion, it would seem that the assemblage of so large a British army to meet so insignificant a foe, is almost ridiculous. It is more than probable that if we are obliged to enter the country in hostile array, we shall meet no enemy capable of standing a quarter of an hour's struggle with us. Whether, however, we enter the country by treaty, or by force, the independence of Scindea's House is gone for ever. We shall reduce the royal authority to a mere shadow, disband the disorderly rabble of soldiers, and garrison the country with our own troops. We shall thus create that most pestiferous form of administration, a double Government; keeping the power of the sword in our own hands, and leaving the Native ruler in charge of the civil, criminal and fiscal administration, to squeeze and oppress the people under the protection of our authority. We shall always stand ready to assist the Government whenever its oppressions may rouse the people into rebellion; but never shall we assist the people to obtain any redress of their injuries. Under the present system, they have still some small chance of consideration, for the fear of retribution has a natural tendency to induce a degree of moderation. But, when our troops are once established in the country, that salutary fear will disappear, and all check upon the tyranny of the Court and its officials, will be effectually removed. And, unfortunately, the very strength which establishes this most lamentable state of things, serves at the same time to perpetuate it; for as the rulers of the country can never dream of resisting our authority, no pretence can apparently ever arise for breaking up this arrangement. The kingdom of Scindia is therefore we fear doomed, by the present current of circumstances, to remediless misgovernment for the next fifty years. So far as the interests of the people are concerned, it would have been vastly more fortunate if the obstinacy of the Durbar had been carried to such an extent as to have given us just and reasonable grounds for subverting the Government altogether, and pensioning the Regent and the royal family, and giving the people the blessing of British institutions.

The intelligence from the Punjab is by no means decisive of the future course of affairs in that country. On the arrival of Raja Golab Sing, his nephew appears to have voluntarily resigned all authority into his hands; and he assumed the administration with every appearance of vigor. The large force of disciplined mountaineers whom he brought with him served to overawe the refractory troops, whose insolent demands for larger pay and gratuities he peremptorily refused. At the same time, he ordered some of the most contumacious of the Regiments to march forthwith to Peshawur, to strengthen that post, but they do not seem to have obeyed his command. Subsequent accounts state that he found the combination of Sikh chieftains too strong to be easily overcome, and had determined to retire with the Raja Heera Sing to his own domains in the Hills, and to abandon the plains to the contention of the rival factions, who agree on no one point but that of hostility to the upstart greatness of his family. Doubtless his absence from the hills, where the wild mountaineers bear his sway with impatience, will not be without danger to its perpetuity, and he acts perhaps wisely in not risking his possessions there, and the command of the fortress which his brother and he have for many years endeavoured to render impregnable, for an uncertain authority in the Punjab. There he must be constantly exposed to the machinations of those families, whose power was absorbed by the genius of Runjeet Sing and whose ambition will revive now that the field is open for its display. There is evidently no authority but that of Raja Golab Sing which can maintain a strong government in the Punjab; and his departure will doubtless be the beginning of anarchy, which, by endangering the peace of neighbouring states will render it necessary for the paramount power to seize the reins of government, on the simple principle of self defence. The state of things is far from satisfactory. The kingdom which Runjeet Sing was thirty years in consolidating, will in all probability be resolved into its original elements before two years have passed, and the various misils which he held in subjection by his own master mind, will again assume independence. Mutual hostility will be the order of the day, and the protected Sikh states on the left bank of the Sutlege will probably be invaded; and thus an opening will be created for British interference. The correspondents of the papers state the number of our troops about to be assembled on the Sutlege at Umbala, Loodiana and Ferozepore, at not less than twenty thousand. The settlement of affairs at Gwalior will release a very large portion of the so called Army of Exercise, and as the Sikh frontier is the only exposed position in our dominions, it is not improbable that an army of great magnitude will be stationed in that direction. But we can scarcely credit the assertion that Lord Ellenborough's visit to the North West has reference chiefly to the ticklish state of affairs in the Punjab, because his Lordship ... repeatedly announced his intention to be ... fore the hot weather set in, to his delig... treat at Barrackpore, which he has laid o... so much taste. If however the present aspect of affairs be such in November as to require his Lordship's presence in the North West, it is not likely to be so far improved by February as to enable him to quit the scene.

Matters in Scinde are daily assuming a more gloomy aspect. We have conquered the Beloochees, and obtained possession of a deadly swamp. For three months past, our accounts from thence present but one unvaried picture of sickness and mortality. The country seems to be as fatal to the European constitution as Africa. We have reports of almost entire regiments unfit for duty, and of a whole army demoralized by universal disease. This country, fertile as Egypt, has hitherto proved only the grave of our troops. The inundation of the Indus seems to abstract from animal existence, as much vigor as it imparts to vegetable life. Since we first occupied the country and abolished slavery, and opened its Stream to all nations, we have heard nothing of any local improvements, nothing of any arrangements for the establishment of a wise and beneficial system of administration; nothing of the increase of commerce. No vessels with rich freights have entered the emancipated river, and not a note of gratulation has been heard regarding the manumission of the slaves. As soon as our struggles with the last of the chiefs ended, our struggle with the climate commenced, in which we have been as much humbled, as we were previously triumphant. If this state of things was likely to be transient, there might be room for exercising the virtues of patience and hope: but there is every reason to believe that the unhealthy season will come round annually with as much regularity as the inundation of the Indus; and that the country will always prove most deleterious to the European and Indian constitution. There does not appear at present any hope of our being able to hold the country except at an immense sacrifice of health and life; or of our having much time to spare from the cares of self preservation for the amelioration of the people or the improvement of the country. The last accounts from Affghanistan state that Shere Mahomed has informed the Candahar Sirdars of the extreme sickness which prevailed among our troops and invited them to bring down a body of two or three thousand horse through the Bolan; while he assembled the Murees and Boogties. He said that Shikarpore was wealthy and incapable of defence. Should this information be correct, it is probable that this city will be the first object of plunder.

Steam.—The two proposals of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, both of which interfere with their promise of a direct communication between Calcutta, Madras, Ceylon and Suez have created, as might have been expected, no ordinary sensation in Calcutta, and a meeting is to be held immediately, to petition the Home Authorities against the contemplated change. A meeting has also been held of the Chamber of Commerce at Bombay, to consider the propriety of employing the vessels now on the line between Calcutta and Suez, in running between Bombay and Suez. That body has discovered that the Steamers which now ply on their particular route, are daily becoming [illegible]al to the object, and are altogether un[illegible]mpete in speed with the magnificent [illegible] the Peninsular Company. They consi[illegible]therefore very advisable that the vessels should be taken from us and given to Bombay. The Courier says that, doubtless some arrangement would be made which should continue most, if not all, the advantages which we now enjoy; but what this arrangement is, or when it is to be carried into effect, we are not told. The Edi[illegible]r considers it highly unreasonable that the inhabitants of Calcutta should be actuated by a regard for the interests of one particular spot, and thus throw obstables in the way of a plan which promises so much for the country at large; that is, he considers it highly unreasonable that we should grumble at the loss of our present advantages, or refuse cheerfully to exchange them for some future contingency which may never arrive. We believe it is an undeniable fact, that the writers at this Presidency have never advocated any arrangement which should give to Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta a single advantage denied to Bombay. But it does so happen that the Bombay writers have never patronized any plan which was not likely at the same time to be beneficial to that port, and detrimental to the other Presidencies. This has been done doubtless on the most patriotic motives; for with them Bombay is India, and whatever benefits that port, benefits the country at large.

Of the two plans now proposed, one is to take off the Hindoostan and Bentinck from the present line, and run them exclusively to Bombay, and to transfer the Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta passengers and packets—with the exception of a few letters sent on by express at the rate of five shillings and eight pence—to smaller steamers. But if it be necessary to have two classes of steamers employed on the eastern side of Suez, the one large and the other small, it is the dictate of reason that the larger vessels should be used for conveying the larger number of passengers and packets, and the smaller vessels for conveying the smaller number. It is certain that the passengers and packages for the other Presidencies and Ceylon, will exceed two fold, perhaps three fold, those which are destined for Bombay. The smaller vessels should therefore be given to this latter port, and the more capacious steamers to the longer line. The public convenience of the country would be more promoted, or rather there would be a far less amount of inconvenience if the Bombay passengers and letters were put on board these smaller steamers at Aden and Galle, than if those destined for the other presidencies and Ceylon were transhipped at Bombay into smaller and less commodious vessels. These minor steamers would be able to accommodate all the Bombay passengers with ease, but they could not contain those who were proceeding to the other ports.

But it is evident that the question whether the larger class of steamers shall run to Calcutta or only to Bombay, must depend on the determination of the public Authorities at home, and not on the Company itself, for the Company will be guided of course by its own interest, and cease to send their vessels to Calcutta and the other eastern ports, if they can get more money out of Government for sending them to Bombay. It is therefore to the Government that our reasoning and our remonstrances should be addressed, and not to the sensibilities of a Company whose only object is gain. How then stands the question of Pounds, Shillings and Pence? The proposal now made is understood to embrace the employment of the large steamers between Suez and Bombay, and the subsidiary steamers between Bombay, and Galle, Madras and Calcutta. Opposed to this is the plan of employing the large steamers on the line from Suez to Calcutta, and branch steamers from Aden and Galle to Bombay. The first proposal will require three large steamers and three smaller ones. The other plan which embraces the interests of Bengal, Madras and Ceylon, will require four large steamers; the difference between the two being the cost of one additional steamer. But it must be remembered that the expense of keeping up steam communication between Europe and India is divided between the public at large and the Government. The more the public pays, the lighter is the burden on Government. The experience of the last year has clearly shewn that the contributions of the community by means of passengers and packages to vessels starting from Calcutta and calling at Madras and Ceylon, will go far to pay the cost of the enterprize, and leave a comparatively small sum for Government to make up. And the first year is likely, as in all other cases, to be the least productive. We believe this was the case with the Bombay Steamers, and it will doubtless be the same with ours. As the facilities of the voyage are improved, and become more widely known, the use of the route will become more general, and in two or three years it is highly probable that the monthly steamer with all its accommodations will be unequal to the general demand. But if the passengers of the three eastern ports are to be conducted to Bombay and there crammed into vessels of half the size of the Hindoostan, it is perfectly certain that not one half the number who would be happy to proceed direct to Suez, will submit to this round-about and most irksome voyage. The amount of passage money will fall off, and a corresponding increase of gratuity must be made to the Company by Government to compensate for the loss. It appears therefore self evident that the plan which embraces the largest interests, and which most extensively commands the support of the community, will be found the cheapest for Government; that is, it would be necessary to give a smaller bonus to the Peninsular Company to induce them to maintain a monthly communication by means of large steamers between Suez and the three Eastern ports, than would be required for keeping up the communication between that place and the Western port.

We had intended to say something about the justice of giving to the Bengal Presidency, an equal share in the benefits of Steam communication, the whole charge of which is to be borne from the revenues it furnishes, but this plea would, we fear, be traced up to narrow and contracted views. We should probably in that case be told that we were actuated by a "regard for the interests of one particular spot," meaning thereby the Presidency, which contains seven ninths of the population, and supplies three fifths of the revenues of the Empire. We should be told that the whole empire is to be regarded as one and indivisible, and that the only scheme by which it can be benefited is that of making Bombay the Steam port of India. We had also intended to add a word about the common sense of placing the larger vessels on that line which has the largest portion of traffic, and furnishes the largest number of passengers and packets, and on which those vessels would consequently afford the greatest amount of convenience to the public,—and of planting the smaller steamers on the shorter and less important route, in which the passengers and packets would be sure not to exceed the capacity of the branch vessels; but we are checked by the recollection that common sense is perhaps the last consideration which has weight in Councils of State, from which it continues to be excluded long after it has pervaded the rest of the community.

Whether the new proposal of the Peninsular Company, which would go far to deprive us of the advantages of intercourse by steam altogether, be accepted by the Home Government or not, it is certain that this Association does intend to diverge from the straight line from Galle to Aden, and call at Bombay, on its outward and homeward voyage, to fill up with passengers, if such an arrangement should be insisted on by Government, or appear advantageous to the interests of the Company. This divergence would be only less inconvenient to the public at Calcutta, Madras and Ceylon, than the project of taking the vessels altogether from us, and bestowing them on Bombay. It would occasion a loss, under the most favourable circumstances, of five days to us; and it would be contrary to the pledge of the Peninsular Company with the Indian subscribers, who gave their capital with the clear understanding that the direct route, and that alone, should be maintained. The only parties who have a right to complain of this measure are the Indian members of the Association. It has been urged that the aid which the Company obtained from India was so inconsiderable, and the number of Indian subscribers so small, that their interests ought not to be permitted to outweigh those of the large majority of home subscribers. To the taunt which has been cast on the Indian public that they did not adequately support the scheme, and ought to hold their tongues, we reply that it is little to the purpose. The support which the Peninsular Company needs is that of our passengers, not of our capital. Capital can be got any day in London for any scheme which promises to pay five per cent. There is said to be at this time Twenty-five millions of Capital unemployed in that city, and if the Company were sure of a hundred passengers on each side, every month, there would be no difficulty in raising funds enough to build half a dozen vessels. As a practical question, we are not disposed to lay any particular stress on the bad faith which is involved in this deviation to Bombay, however deeply we may regret it. If it be found that the passengers and packages from Calcutta, Madras and Galle, are not sufficient to meet the expense of the enterprize, and that the dividends would materially suffer from adhering to the direct line, that line must and will be relinquished. For the public interests, it is better that the vessels should go out of the route from Galle to Aden and call at Bombay for additional passengers—if this be the only plan which will prevent the relinquishment of the enterprize—than that they should continue to run for a short time on the straight line, and then be taken off altogether. Those who subscribed their capital, expected a return, and it is easy to suppose that they would rather sanction the calling of the vessels at Bombay, if that alone could give them a suitable dividend, than risk the loss of their money by the eventual abandonment of the route. Even if the Indian subscribers had taken up one half of the entire capital of the Company, the disposition to turn out of the way, as the only means of avoiding a loss, would perhaps have been as strong this side the Isthmus, as it is supposed to be in London.

We think therefore that the strongest argument for continuing the line direct from Suez to Calcutta, is not that which appeals to the charge of breach of faith, but that which belongs to the money branch of the subject. Let it be clearly shewn that the same advantage in point of speed will be conferred on Bombay, and on the places which lie nearest to it, by giving official support to the plan of having large steamers for the longer run, and branch steamers for the short run to Bombay, as by depriving the other Presidencies and Ceylon of the advantage of Steam communication, and sending the larger vessels to Bombay; and that adequate encouragement may be given for a less sum to the plan which equally embraces the interests of all India, than to that which limits the benefit in a great measure to one port, —and we may hope to produce some conviction on the minds even of those in our native land whose predilections attach them to Bombay.

THE CASE OF THE NATIVE CHRISTIAN AND HIS WIFE.—Since we last wrote on this subject we have had an opportunity of learning farther particulars of the case, and are inclined to think that the information we have now obtained is authentic, and may be received with confidence. It appears that on the 27th of October last, a complaint was made to the Magistrate of the 24-Pergunnahs by the father of the girl, who is a respectable Kaest, that during his absence from home on the preceding day, his house had been forcibly entered and plundered, and that his daughter who had not lived for eight years with her husband, had been carried off, and was then held in duress in Calcutta. A warrant was immediately issued to a discreet and trustworthy constable directing him to release the woman from restraint if she was detained against her will, and to give her such protection to the Magistrate's Court as would enable her to appear and give her deposition. The constable found her in a closed room at the Medical College, and as she begged to be released, he brought her straight to the Magistrate on the evening of the 27th., when she again stated her unwillingness to remain with her husband, with whom she had not resided for eight years. The next day, her deposition and that of the Prosecutor's witnesses, and the examination of the Defendant, Dwarkenath were taken. No order was passed as to the custody or guardianship of the woman. She was simply released from whatever restraint she was under by her husband, as she was sufficiently advanced in years and discretion to judge for herself.

This places the matter in question in a different point of view. It does not appear that the Magistrate assumed those functions which belong only to the Civil Court. He did not decide the question whether the woman was to live with her Christian husband or her heathen father, but simply released her from restraint, allowing her to choose her own course. It exonerates the Magistrate from the censure with which a partial knowledge of circumstances has led men of great benevolence and conscientiousness to visit him; at the same time it serves to confirm the view which we took of the legal points of the question;—that the right of determining with whom a Hindoo girl, married to one who has abjured Hindooism, is to live, does not belong to the province of the Magistrate, but of the Civil Courts. We have seen no argument to shake our position, that a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights, being of the nature of a civil suit, may be brought at any time within the limitation fixed for Civil Actions, and that in deciding the question, the Court would be under no necessity of having recourse to Hindoo law, but would be bound to regulate its decision by the principles of justice, equity and good conscience.

As to the punishment inflicted on Dwarkenath for a breach of the peace, we cannot consider it disproportioned to the offence, when we learn that he admitted his having forced an entry into the house of his father-in-law, with three European sailors and five common Portuguese. Such an outrage as this demanded a severe visitation. Fortunately, it was a market day, and the village was comparatively empty. Had this not been the case, it is not improbable that the populace would have taken up the cause of the Kaest, and resented the gross indignity which had been offered to him. Had an affray occurred, it is difficult to say how it might have ended. The conduct of Dwarkenath was most unchristian and flagitious, and though we shall, we hope, always be found at our post defending the rights and privileges of Native Christians against all opponents, yet we must say that a more unsafe case upon which to raise the question of privilege, could scarcely have occurred.

THE BRIDGE AT BALEE.—A week or two ago we stated that an ineffectual effort was made during the administration of Lord Auckland to obtain from Government one-half the expense of erecting a Suspension Bridge over the creek at Balee, about six miles above Calcutta on the opposite bank of the river. The whole cost was estimated at 40,000 Rs. and the Magistrates of the district of Hooghly in which it lies, obtained large subscriptions from the Native Zemindars in the hope that if they contributed one moiety of the expense, the rest would be furnished from the public funds. But the project, after having been long weighed by His Lordship was at length laid on the shelf, when the expenses of the Affghan war had run the Treasury dry. Unfortunately, a considerable portion of the Native subscriptions was diverted to other objects than that for which they had been given, and much disgust was thereby created in the Native community. The project has been, we hear, warmly espoused by the Deputy Governor of Bengal, who is anxious to carry out the plan, and to contribute half the expense from the revenues of the country, on condition that the other half shall be made up, as originally proposed, by the community. A great effort will therefore be made to raise the necessary funds, and we hope the Native Zemindars of the district will come forward with liberal assistance. But the frequent disappointment of their hopes, and the mistrust which has been created in their minds, will possibly operate against the subscriptions, and it may happen that the whole sum required from the community may not be raised before Mr. Bird relinquishes the Government of Bengal. In that case the project will of course fall to the ground. The obligation to devote a portion of the vast resources of this magnificent empire to local improvements, to the construction of roads, canals and bridges, is not admitted by Government. It is not as yet a fixed principle of our administration that objects of public utility and convenience possess any claim on the revenues of the country, though those revenues can be readily lavished in enco[illegible] litigation and perverting the course of jus[illegible] is only occasionally and at long intervals, that we have an enlightened ruler who recognizes the importance of these improvements, and is disposed to assist them by donations from the public purse. It is therefore the more necessary to take advantage of so fortunate a contingency, when it does occur, and to draw as much benefit as possible from it.

Supposing therefore the public subscriptions should not be equal to one half the cost of the bridge, what is to be done? To what other sources can we look for support? To what, indeed, but to the surplus of the Ferry Funds, which could not be more equitably or advantageously expended than in the erection of such a bridge. We do not allude to the old accumulation of fifteen years which stood at the credit of the Hooghly district before the Committees were appointed, and which amounts to 70,000 Rupees. That sum is we fear for ever lost to public improvement. We refer to the annual surplus, which to our deep mortification, we hear, has been devoted for the next year or two to the construction of some road, seven hundred miles off. This is scarcely just; the district which contributes these funds has the first claim upon them; and the bridge at Balee has a higher claim than the road at Culpee. The Howrah district yields annually 9,000 Rupees from the surplus of its ferry receipts; but unhappily it is still considered only in the light of an experimental district—as though Government could ever think of dispensing with a separate Magistracy in that rising suburb—and its ferry funds are paid into the treasury of the neighbouring district, and are thus lost to Howrah. Now as the Government of Bengal has generously undertaken to defray one half the expense of the bridge from the public exchequer, we would make our humble suit for the further grant of one year's surplus of the Howrah Ferry funds; and that upon this most substantial and incontrovertible ground, that nothing will contribute more to the augmentation of that fund than the completion of the road to the ferries by the construction of the Bridge. But whatever is done, must be done quickly. Unless the foundation of the bridge be laid during the existing administration, there can be little hope that it will be completed during the present generation.

THE KHOOND CHILDREN.—The Hurkaru has received a reply to the remarks which we offered on the obstacles which were said to have been thrown in the way of giving to the victims rescued from the Khoonds a knowledge of Christian truth. The authority on which this defence is set up, is considered so unexceptionable by our contemporary as to induce him to affix his own seal to it, and he looks for our concurrence in its validity. We are happy to find that those who have the deepest interest in this matter, have thought it so necessary to come forward and offer some explanation of their conduct. At the same time we are sorry that we cannot concur in the complacent view which our contemporary takes of the defence. We trust he will bear with us while we state the result of that close examination which we have given to it.

It appears that the Missionaries applied to the public Authorities to be entrusted with the education of the victims which had been rescued from the Khoonds, but the request has not been granted. To this it is replied that the pe- was not addressed to the Governor of s, but to its official Agent in the Khoond co ry. This circumstance is altogether immaterial. Capt. McPherson was the channel through which the application was to be made to his own Government, and the only result of this explanation is to exonerate the Government at the Madras Presidency from all blame this matter, and to place it upon the should- of the local Authorities at Goomsoor.

Neither is it at all germane to the matter that the letter was written by one Missionary, with the concurrence of his brethren. Such is the usual routine of all public business; and it would be quite as preposterous to say that a letter written by the Secretary to Government at Madras and approved of by the Governor in Council, was not an official communication, as to insinuate that a letter signed by one Missionary with the concurrence of his associates, was a private paper.

"Capt. McPherson had no power to comply with the wishes of the Missionaries," and therefore sent the letter to the Magistrate of Ganjam, Mr. Bannerman. Yet we are subsequently told in the defence of that officer that so far from "having refused to give children over to the Missionaries, that he had given them six children, besides the four we have already alluded to." So it seems that Capt. McPherson had power to comply with the request of the missionaries. This glaring discrepancy can only be explained by supposing that the letter in question asked some assistance from Government for the maintenance of the children, and that the ten children whom that Officer did actually deliver to them, were received gratis. Of this we shall of course hear hereafter.

The Magistrate at Ganjam, Mr. Bannerman, received the application, but whether he ever forwarded it to the Government of Madras, the Deponent of the Hurkaru says not. It was manifestly his duty either to have complied with the petition, or to have forwarded it to his own Government. He did neither; there lies the application still in his office at Ganjam, unless indeed it has been sent on since we held up this culpable negligence to public indignation. It was not so much however to Capt. McPherson's conduct in this matter that our remarks were directed, as to the cool way in which this application had been laid on the shelf by the Magistrate; but when we are told by our contemporary that his informant did not know whether the application had ever been forwarded or not, we are strongly tempted to ask how it happened that the Officer entrusted with Khoond affairs who is said to have felt so deep an interest in the welfare of the victims, should have allowed month after month to elapse without once enquiring whether Mr. Bannerman had ever sent up the letter to Government, or chiding him for his indolence or neglect, when it was found that he had not moved in the matter.

Our correspondent had said "that many of the children have grown up under charge of the Tehsildar of Goomsoor to be men and women, and that the manner in which many of the latter are allowed to run wild is revolting." The defence fully corroborates the former part of this statement. It admits that the girls were removed eight or nine months ago from the charge of the Tehsildar. They had therefore grown up till that very recent period under his charge. We are happy, however, to learn that among eighty-seven girls, who it appears have been allowed to remain even beyond the age when marriages are contracted in India, amidst Native associations, under the protection of a Native Tehsildar, there has not been a single case of misconduct.

Our correspondent had said that they were freely given over to the Officers as servants, while the application made for them by the missionaries was neglected. The defence says that only three have thus been consigned as servants to the officers. To the assertion that they had been given up in some instances to the sepoys, who made Hindoos or Mahomedans of them, the Hurkaru's opponent gives a point blank contradiction.

The Hurkaru claims great credit for Capt. McPherson, for having consulted Dr. Duff on the best mode of giving a Christian education to these children. Now Dr. Duff has no local knowledge or experience which should qualify him to give any opinion on the subject with confidence; and, moreover, his hands are full and more than full of other and more pressing matters. It seems therefore very strange and altogether unaccountable that the Officer in question should entirely have overlooked the fact that there was a body of Missionaries who had been labouring faithfully, disinterestedly and successfully in the country itself, for more than twenty years, infinitely more competent to the work than any missionaries in Calcutta. It seems strange and unaccountable that while the Khoond agent, in his deep anxiety for the spiritual welfare of these children, directed his enquiries to a distance of several hundred miles, he should so entirely have forgotten that an application had been made to him by Missionaries, so to speak, on the spot, for permission to receive these victims and to train them up in a knowledge of Christian duties, which application he had handed over to the Magistrate, without once enquiring what the Magistrate had done with it. The only reason which appears to be offered for this neglect of opportunities at hand, is that the Missionary at Ganjam did not succeed in proselyting two Khoond girls during the several months in which Capt. McPherson is said to have kept them in his own house. Whether the Missionary was required to proceed daily to afford Christian instruction to the girls at the residence of that Officer, or whether they were sent as a kind of day scholars to the Missionary, we are not told, but the "good work of evangelization," was not completed, and "proselytes they were not made." The want of success in this effort was of course attributed to the Missionary, who we are informed "seemed to take no sort of interest in the matter." But we question whether even Dr. Duff would have consented to receive the two girls into the bosom of the Christian church after so brief and strange a system of tuition. The Officer should have applied at Bishop's College for some Puseyite Minister, who might have administered the sacrament of baptism upon the Anglo-Catholic principle that its validity and virtue depend not upon the faith or knowledge of the recipient, but upon the apostolic succession of the Priest. Really, if there be no other reason than that which has been alleged for the contempt which has been thrown on the application of the Missionaries, we must still adhere to our former opinion, and affirm that "there does not appear to be among the local authorities the same sense of the responsibility which begins with the rescue of the victims, which pervades the minds of the Christian community in our own land."

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 30.

— The papers of the day give a long report of the progress made by the Agricultural Society of Bhagulpore, which appears to have surpassed all other Branches in the vigor and success of its exertions. We regret that we cannot make room for the whole report; but we cannot forego the pleasure of transcribing the following tribute so justly paid at the last meeting, by the Commissioner, Mr. G. F. Brown, to the indefatigable industry of the Secretary Major Napleton:—

"Gentlemen, though it may not be considered quite regular for the Chairman of a Public Meeting to move any resolution for general adoption, yet I hope you will hold me excused for doing so on the present occasion. You have just passed a vote of well merited thanks on our indefatigable Secretary, but I wish you to do something more than this; I wish you to prove by deeds, not words, how grateful you feel for his meritorious exertions. You all know that a year ago such a society as this was never thought of at Bhagulpore, and that six months ago, our present flourishing Public Garden was an Indigo field. Within this short period, the ground has been purchased and cleared, walks have been made, wells dug, show rooms built, trees planted, flowers of all descriptions brought from Calcutta, potatoes from Futtyghur, cotton from the East, tobacco from the West, and all sorts of rare and valuable seeds from England.

"For all this I tell you again and again, we are indebted to Major Napleton.

"But more than this, we owe it to Major Napleton's zeal, constant supervision, and good management that twice as much has been effected with the money which we subscribed towards the undertaking, than we could have reasonably expected. He has made 500 Rupees go as far as another would have done Rs. 1000."

— We are happy to find from the Delhi Gazette that "Bundlekund appears to be in a settled state."

— Golam Alee Khan has been appointed Grand Vizier of the Emperor of Delhi. He has made his own terms, they say, with his master, and has the entire management of affairs under his control. These affairs no longer embrace the external and internal relations of India, but are simply confined to the disbursement of a few lakhs of Rupees a year.

— The Englishman announces that the sole right of reprinting Martin Chuzzlewitz in India has been purchased of Chapman and Hall, the booksellers, by the Proprietor of that journal. Doubtless the exclusive republication of any work of Dickens will give value to any paper, but experience teaches that no paper can safely rely on these borrowed sources for the increase or even maintenance of its circulation, and that a large and accurate knowledge of Indian affairs, a sound judgment, a nervous style, and impartiality of views are of themselves quite sufficient to insure extensive popularity, and that without these qualifications no paper can long stand its ground.

— There is little news from the Punjab this morning. Only, it is said that the foreign officers are more than ever anxious to quit the scene of trouble and uncertainty which the Punjab now presents, and that Heera Singh has resolved to detain General Ventura as security for the 27 lakhs of Rupees which General Avitabile is said to have taken out of the country.

— The news from Ceylon is, that the Roman Catholics are anxious to throw their present priests overboard, and to procure new ones from Cochin. The Madras Athenæum also states in reference to

Mr. Langslow; "The public will learn with indignation that Mr. Langslow, the talented, learned, impartial and independent Judge of Columbo, has been officially informed by Government that it is intended to suspend him." The real reasons, says that paper, are too well known to require mention. Now as we have begun to take an interest in Ceylon matters, and know nothing of the real reasons, we wish the Athenæum would give them to us,—always supposing that they would not involve him in an action for libel.

— Last night's Gazette contains an amended draft of an Act for the establishment of a new Court for hearing and determining petty civil cases. Strange to say the amendments are so numerous that there is not, we believe, a single paragraph or sentence of the old Act to be found in the new, yet it is called the same Act, on the principle on which the Irishman persisted in calling his knife the same knife, though the handle had been changed once and the blade twice. We have not time to discuss this important Act this week, but shall not forget it in our next number.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 1.

— The Temperance Society of Calcutta, has resolved to open a second Temperance Tavern in Grant's Lane. One has already been opened in Radha bazar, and has, we suppose met with sufficient encouragement to induce the benevolent projectors to venture on a second.

— A meeting of the Chamber of Commerce was held yesterday to urge on the Home Authorities not to adopt any plan of Steam communication that did not embrace the direct line between Suez and Calcutta.

— Intelligence has been received that the two parties have come to an engagement at Gwalior, in which the adherents of the Khasgee wallah were defeated. He was loaded with irons and sent to Dholpore to Col. Speirs. Yet we were told last week that the Colonel had made over the Residency to Sir Richmond Shakespear and had in vain endeavoured to pass through the Gwalior states on his way to Nagpore, and had in consequence proceeded to Agra. The delivery of the Khasgee, it is supposed, will put an end to all hopes of earning any ribbons or crosses in the battle field, and lead to the immediate acceptance of our terms, which embrace the disbanding of all the troops of the state.

— An Address to the Sheriff is in circulation requesting him to call a meeting of the Inhabitants of Calcutta, to consider the present position of Steam communication, and to adopt such measures as may be necessary to secure a permanent direct communication by Steam between Calcutta, Madras, Galle and Suez.

— A most distressing accident has just befallen Mr. Ireland, Chief Officer of the Northumberland, one of the most active, promising and beloved officers in the port. He was standing on the vessel with a loaded double-barrel gun, which he was drawing to himself from the capstan, when the lock hitched somewhere; the piece went off, and its contents were lodged in his thigh. Professional aid was immediately obtained, but the injury was of such a nature as to require the amputation of the limb.

— We are happy to learn from the Englishman of this morning, that "the Calcutta public may confidently rely upon the Steam question being settled to their entire satisfaction." We should have received the announcement with more pleasure, if our contemporary had informed us in what manner it is to be so satisfactorily settled—we mean exclusive of the rail road from Bombay to Calcutta, which we fear is too remote a blessing for any of the present generation to hope to enjoy. Confidence, said Edmund Burke, is a plant of slow growth, and on the present occasion it appears to have been nipped in the bud.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2.

— The Star states, that it is rumoured that Raja Golab Sing intends to withdraw altogether from Lahore with Heera Sing to his own dominions in Jumboo, and to leave the Seikhs to fight the matter out among themselves. For this determination the public was fully prepared. At Lahore he will always be exposed to a collision with our Government. In his Hill territories he may maintain his position free from all interruption, and even take an opportunity of carving a slice out of the Chinese empire for himself.

— The candidates for the office of Secretary to the Military fund are growing up apace like Shakespear's men in buckram. In addition to Capt. Doveton and Major Hough we have now Major Colnett and Major Payne in the field and Dr. Lightfoot.

— The following is the number of letters and papers received by the slow Cleopatra at Bombay:

| | Letters. | Papers. | Boxes. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Via Falmouth, ...... | 17,894 | 22,240 | 60 |
| Via Marseilles, ...... | 4,048 | 8,764 | 27 |
| Foreign, ............ | 1,279 | 4,500 | 11 |
| Total Letters, ...... | 23,221 | 35,504 | 98 |
| Total Papers, ...... | 35,045 | | |
| Total Covers, .... | 58,723 | | |

It will thus be seen that the interest we feel in home affairs, is three times as great as the interest felt at home in Indian affairs. Ten thousand of our newspapers is the average limit of transmission while we continue to receive more than Thirty-five thousand. We wish some of our contemporaries in Calcutta would contrive to obtain from the Post Master General or the Deputy, the number of letters brought on by the Hindoostan. This they can easily do, for Lord Ellenborough's Proclamation against the communication of intelligence of which an officer may become officially cognizant, was issued from the Foreign Department, and refers exclusively to papers and intelligence of a high political character. It has nothing whatever to do with the Home Department, to which the Post Office belongs.

— The Agra Ukhbar just received says: we have just heard that another fight has taken place at Gwalior, but the Khasgee is sent to Dholpore. It is somewhat singular that not one of the papers as far as we can recollect, has told the public who this most formidable Khasgee wallah is; who was his father and his grandfather; what are his resources and his pretensions, and how he got into power.

— The Madras papers state, that the new Act forbidding the embarkation of Coolies from any port but that of Calcutta will be particularly hard upon the wives of a great many labourers now at the Mauritius who are most anxious to join their husbands. We think the Editor is wrong. The Act forbids only the exportation of labourers, which means men; it says nothing of women, and no Captain who should take the wives and children of those who are on the island could be considered as infringing the law.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 4.

— The Delhi Gazette has this enigmatical sentence. "Two hundred hackery loads of boards have lately been despatched from the Delhi Magazine to Ferozepore."

— Major General Churchill—whom some of the papers murdered a few weeks ago—has joined the Commander-in-Chief at Agra, so that his Excellency is now surrounded by the whole of the superior Staff of the Bengal Army.

— We regret to state that Mr. Ireland, the Chief Officer of the Northumberland, whose thigh was amputated last week, expired on Saturday at ½ past 1 P. M. His remains were followed to the grave by his brother officers, and many of the crew of the vessel to whom he had endeared himself by his kindness and consideration.

— The Hurkaru states that a large House of business in Calcutta, sought the protection of the Insolvent Court on Saturday last, but that no order was passed by the Court, on which account the name is suppressed.

— The Hurkaru has received intelligence that the Khasgeewalla whom they were conveying to the British Resident has been rescued. But the Agra Ukhbar says that it is rumoured in the city that he has made his escape and that it was effected by collusion.

— On Saturday last, the members of the extinct firm of Fergusson, Brothers and Co. were respectively sworn to the truth of the schedule of the separate estate of each, and then in due form discharged, without any opposition whatsoever.

— The Englishman says that Heera Sing, when General Ventura applied to him for leave of absence, adopted an ingenious contrivance to [illegible] him responsible for the 27 lakhs of Rupees [illegible] out of the country by General Avitabile, by sending to him for 100 Rupees a day; at which rate he would be nearly Eighty years paying up the whole sum.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5.

— The seventh and last Criminal Sessions of the year was opened yesterday. The Chief-Justice and both the Puisne Judges were on the bench. Sir Lawrence Peel charged the Grand Jury, commented on the lightness of the Calendar, and said with one or two exceptions all the cases were of trivial nature. His Lordship also stated that the Magistrates had been much more careful in wording the committals than they had formerly been.

— A Board of Officers has been appointed to assemble to-morrow morning in Fort William, to enquire whether the uncommon sickness which prevails in the 10th Foot, arises from their location.

— The Bombay Times states on the authority of letters from Mandavie, that the wing of the 2d Europeans which has been sent to Kurachee is, if possible, in a more debilitated state from sickness than the troops already in that Golgotha, Seinde. Of 394 of all ranks there were on the 13th November not fewer than 323 sick!

— The Mussoorie Bank has just declared a dividend of 12 per cent., and determined to increase its capital Stock to the sum of Five Lakhs of Rupees. The existence and flourishing condition of a Bank in such a nook as Mussoorie, where there is no commerce requiring assistance, is a remarkable circumstance. It has been determined by the shareholders to adopt the rules of the Agra Bank as it respects Loans, Deposits and Mortgages. The Bank is therefore the medium of accommodating the officers of the public service with loans, on good security, from the stores of other officers who have accumulated a little capital.

— The Hurkaru states it as the opinion of those who are entitled to form an opinion in the North West Provinces that the present movement of the Governor General to Agra, is occasioned chiefly by the unsettled state of things in the Punjab. We learn from the same source that terms have been proposed to the Authorities at Lahore, and that they consist only of a demand for the reception of a Resident at Lahore, and the right of marching troops through the Punjab to Peshawur, if necessary. As to the former, it is not many months since Mr. Clerk was appointed Envoy to the Court at Lahore, and the subsequent withdrawal of the Envoy, and the substitution of a mere Agent in his stead was understood to have originated in objections offered by the Court in Leadenhall Street, not by the Court of Lahore. As to the latter requisition, we thought Lord Ellenborough had washed his hands clean of Affghanistan, and had for ever established the Indus as the ultimate and impassable limit of our movements.

— We have sometimes felt somewhat amused at the self glorification of our Western brother, without however feeling our regard for him in the least diminished, for we have all our weak points. But in the number which has just come in of the 25th November, this weakness is exhibited so prominently as to deserve particular attention. The Bombay Times is not, it seems, in good odour with the public Authorities, and certain official advertisements which belong of right to the leading journal, are given to the minor papers of that Presidency; a practice which he reprobates in the following terms: "We believe it has long been pretty generally known that the circulation of the Bombay Times is somewhere about double that of all the English papers put together printed in the Western presidency—if the Government Gazette be excepted from the number: and our first and second page columns will shew that in whatever other papers the advertisements of private parties may be inserted, they are at all events sure to make their way to our office. It will equally be seen from our pages, that the degree of publicity given through their medium alone [illegible]en regarded sufficient in matters of the ut[illegible] importance—and that, after nearly all the newspaper readers in Western India have had the means of perusing an advertisement in the Times, it is considered quite superfluous to exhibit it to them a second time through any other medium. Without any very exact means of knowing, but upon a general view of the total amount of readers in the Presidency, we should say that there were not 50 who looked into the columns of [illegible] brethren who did not also study the contents of our own—but that there were at least 500 who read the Bombay Times and no other presidency paper. We in this respect occupy, in relation to our local brethren, a more prominent place than our gigantic London namesake holds amongst his—we greatly more outnumber all the papers of Western India than he does those of the British metropolis. It will seem singular to our readers after this to be informed that there are certain official advertisements of a very important nature, which, though generally to be found in the Courier or Gentleman's Gazette, are by no sort of chance ever to be seen in the Bombay Times."

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 6.

— The Preliminary Steam Meeting was held yesterday morning at the Town Hall. There was a very large attendance. Mr. F. Millet was in the chair. The business of the meeting was comprised in the following Resolution that "it be referred to a Committee to prepare resolutions to be laid before a General Meeting to consider what steps should be taken with reference to the communication lately made by the E. I. and China Association, on the contemplated arrangements for altering the present line of Steam Navigation between India and Great Britain." The names of the gentlemen appointed on the committee are the following:—Messrs. W. P. Grant, Elliott, C. B. Greenlaw, L. J. H. Grey, T. Leach, Remfry, Lieutenant Colonel Taylor, J. Hume, Stopford, Colonel Forbes and Newcomen.

— The Delhi Gazette just received gives information from Cabul to the effect that Dost Mahomed was becoming daily more oppressive and unpopular, and less able to maintain his position. He had sent a letter to Peer Mahomed Khan at Peshawur, ostensibly condoling with him on the death of Shere Singh, but secretly instigating him to revolt. The fact of the Dost's weakness is distinctly proved by his inability to take advantage of the present favorable opening for regaining Peshawur. A report prevailed at Loodiana on the 8th of November that a large body of the Khyberees had come down and attacked Jumrood, and that 500 of the garrison had been killed. It is said that Tez Sing, the commandant at Peshawur sallied out with a large body and drove back the Khyberees.

— The Candahar Sirdars have begun to read the Khootba and to coin money in the name of the King of Persia. It is distinctly stated that Meer Morad Ali, our ally, to whom we have made over nearly half Scinde is in treasonable correspondence with these Sirdars, and has promised to kick up a dust at Khyrpoor, if they will attack Shikarpoor.

— General Ventura has succeeded in obtaining leave at last from the Seikh Government, and is packing up as rapidly as possible for Loodiana. He is leaving the Punjab for ever, in which he shews his wisdom.

— A meeting of the Indian Shareholders of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company is to be held at the Town Hall to-morrow at 3 P. M. when Capt. Engledue will doubtless afford some explanation of the movements of that Association, which have created so much anxiety in Calcutta and Madras, and afforded so much satisfaction to the community at Bombay.

Erratum.

We regret much that the following erratum reached us after the publication of the Letter in our last number.

In the Letter regarding Indefinite Taxation page 759, in the 11th line from the bottom, for "appointing the taxing Committees," read "electing the taxing Committees."

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the following sums for the Friend of India:—

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

THE KHOOND CHILDREN.

The arrival of an Overland Mail is to us very much what a foreign war is to Government—a broom that sweeps into the corner many subjects of local interest and importance, which are waiting the attention they merit, at the time when the great besom comes to clear all away; and in the case of Government at least, to consign every thing else to the dust hole. The September Mail, like all its predecessors, has done something of this sweeping work; but all is not rubbish that it clears away for the nonce, and we have more than one subject of interest, which we purpose to pick out from the heap, now that we can again look peacefully at them. The first which we select is the matter of the Khoonds, regarding which, it may be remembered, we penned an article a few weeks ago, taking for our text some observations on the subject, which appeared in the Friend of India, of the 2d ultimo. Since that time, we have received much information on the points touched upon by our cotemporary; and we think we shall be able to show that the statements, which he has received, give anything but a faithful picture of the condition of the rescued Khoond children. We republish the article from the Friend of India, in which these statements are made, on the authority of a correspondent, and now proceed to notice as briefly as possible the errors which it contains—The correspondent states, in the first place, that "it is understood as a fact, that the petition written some time ago to the Governor of Madras, is still in the Agent's Office at Ganjam." Now, there is no such document, as that referred to—and never was—in existence. The Missionaries did not memorialise Government; but addressed Captain McPherson. It was a letter written by one Missionary, and "concurred" in by another. Capt. McPherson had no power to comply with the wishes of the Missionaries; but he promised to forward the application to the Ganjam Magistrate, and he did so. Whether Mr. Bannerman forwarded it to Government, or whether it is still lying in his office, we do not pretend to know—Again, it is stated, that many of the grown up victim girls have been allowed to run wild in a revolting manner, under the charge of the Tehsildar of Goomsoor. The obvious meaning of this passage is, that the girls are abandoned to gross immorality, for no one could expect to see much social refinement in a band of young savages. If the wildness spoken of means uncouthness, we have no doubt, that the statement is sufficiently true, though we should think it extremely unnecessary to say anything which must be so obvious to every one. But, if the statement means, that the girls are living a life of immorality, we have authority for asserting, that it is altogether untrue. Capt. McPherson, since he took charge, has had 87 girls under his care, and out of this large number there has not been a single case of misconduct. The girls were removed eight or nine months ago, from the charge of the Tehsildar of Goomsoor; they have been carefully watched and the utmost pains taken to secure for them a respectable settlement in life. Capt. McPherson, with much tact and good judgement has been exerting himself, for some time past, to bring about the marriage of these rescued Khoond girls, with the men of another class of Khoonds, who do not pursue the abomination of human sacrifice, but among whom female infanticide prevails to a lamentable extent. This was a work of much difficulty. The Khoonds at first rejected an alliance with women, who had been devoted to the deity and given up to sacrifice; and the girls turned away, with equal repugnance, from men, known to be guilty of eating cows and accused of devouring monkeys. However, after eight months' exertion, the repugnance of both parties was overcome, and the desirable object effected. There is good hope, that these alliances will prove extremely serviceable, when aided by other measures, as a means of rooting out in time the melancholy practice of female infanticide.

Now, again, with regard to the story told in the Friend of India, that "one of the young women, threatened to hang herself if she were not given away in marriage, and so convinced was the officer in charge of the sincerity of her intentions, that there was a general search among the [illegible] boys for a volunteer husband"—Let us look at the real history of this affair. About two years ago, Colonel Campbell, permitted two Khoond boys, who had grown up in his house, to promise marriage to two of the victim girls, when the parties should have advanced somewhat further in life. Some time afterwards, when as we have above stated, Capt. McPherson removed the girls for the purpose of forming alliances between them and some of the other infanticide Khoonds, these two girls, under the fear of being severed from their betrothed, did declare, that if they were not restored to their plighted husbands, they would kill themselves. Well; they were brought back to Capt. McPherson's house; and advantage was taken of the occasion to make an effort towards a commencement of the good work of evangeliation; and the parties, under the influence of Capt. McPherson, agreed to delay their marriage until they had been instructed in Christianity and received as Christians by the Missionary. For this purpose, Capt M. kept them for several months in his house; and if the effort did not succeed, it was the fault of the Missionary, who, as we are informed, seemed to take no sort of interest in the matter, and proselytes accordingly were not made.—The next story told relative to a Khoond boy having been made a Mahomedan by a nominal Christian is true; but this was owing to no indifference or negligence on the part of the Agent; and the assertion, which follows to the effect, that children are given over to the sepoys, who make Hindoos or Mahomedans of them is exceedingly untrue, the Agent not having given over one single child to a sepoy. As to their being "freely given over as servants" to officers, only three have been so given over; and so far from Capt. McPherson having invariably refused to give them over to the missionaries, he has given them six children, besides the four to whom we have already alluded. We know not what may have been the result in these cases; but if it were no better than that of the effort above recorded, the Missionaries have not done no more good to the Khoond children, than the "nominal Christian," who made a Mahomedan of the child entrusted to his care! We have reason to believe, that Capt. McPherson, so far from opposing any obstacle to the evangelization of the rescued children, is not only willing, but anxious to conduce, by every means in his power, to this great end, and we believe, that he has even consulted Dr. Duff and others as to the best means to be pursued. Dr. Duff can tell us whether we have been misinformed upon this point. The girls, however, as we have before said, Capt. McPherson is anxious to employ as indirect agents for the suppression of infanticide, and the Friend of India will, we are sure, upon learning this, acknowledge that he erred in saying, that there does not "exist among the local authorities, on the Khoond borders, the same sense of the responsibility which begins with the rescue of the victims, which pervades the minds of the Christian community of our land." As for ourselves, we entirely recant anything, which we may have written, on a former occasion, under a mistaken impression of the facts of the case. We believe, that Capt. McPherson to whom every philanthropist must feel deeply indebted, for his zealous and successful efforts in the cause of humanity, at the risk be it said of his own life, has done all that it became him to do, as an officer and a Christian. The facts, which we have stated, we have upon authority—so good that we have sung our own Pallinode—and we trust, that the Friend of India will do the same. As regards the general question, it is one of extreme interest, and we hope, that it will not be very long before we return it.—Hurk. Dec. 5.

NORTH WEST AFFAIRS.

A friend at Simla writes to us as follows:—

"Mr. Clerk goes down to-morrow. He is, I am rejoiced to say, looking very well; and not even pulled down, by his recent dangerous attack. He will be accompanied as far as Gornuckteeur, by Mr. Hamilton, who turns off thence for Sirsa, and proceeds eventually to Bhawulpore, where he will make out the line of roads to be built between Bhawulpore and Sukkur, select the sites for the serais and wells, which are to be established at easy stages along that road, and determine the extent of a proposed further grant of territory between Subzulkote and Roree, by our Government to the Nuwab of Bhawulpore, in return for a strip of land of some eight or ten coe wide, running along the Mundoth boundary, which his Highness, it seems, agreed, a few months since, to present to our Government with a view to the extension of our Customs road in an uninterrupted line, from Delhi to the Sutlej. The opening of the Sirsa road with the proposed accessories of comfort, in the shape of wells and serais, will have an infallable tendency to increase enormously the reciprocal traffic of Bhawulpore and Delhi, as also to augment the commerce of Kabool and Mooltan with Bhawulpore, and Upper India. It will also; and this is not its least important result—throw open the market of Bombay to our northern provinces.—Hurkaru, Dec. 2.

GWALIOR.

Tremendous hot work in this quarter. On Sunday, the 19th instant, at 12 N. 4 Companies of the Maharaj Cumpoo and 1 Regiment of Secunder's got into a dispute near Maudoogunge whilst proceeding on duty to the palace. The former insisted that the latter should return to their lines; as their female commandant Bebee Secunder was busily employed in the palace in making away with the state property and giving bad advice to Tara Baee, and that her son Tuwihee Secunder was carrying on intrigues out of the palace and encouraging the troops of the Jinsee and those under his command to attack their camp. The dispute lasted for good two hours, and during this confligt, Secunder's Sepoys turned their guns, and prepared for action, the example was soon followed by the Sepoys of the Cumpoo, and a battle ensued which lasted for almost twenty-five minutes. The Sepoys of the Cumpoo fought desperately, and captured Secunder's guns (4), committing great slaughter, and putting the men to flight. The number of killed and wounded is said to be about 400 of which 80 of the Maharaj Cumpoo. The Baee Sahib on hearing of this sent word to the native Officers of the Jinsee and Secunder that she required them to act up to their promise after having paid them their full arrears of pay, and she required of them to storm and attack the Maharaj Cumpoo, and above all, to save the life of the Khasgeewalla. The officers of the Jinsee on receiving this order, commenced playing their batteries on the Maharaj Cumpoo and the latter most manfully returned the compliment, and in the precise and deliberate aim, opened a most brisk firing, whereas the cannons from the Jinsee and Secunder's Camp were directed at a random, doing little or no harm to the Cumpoo, but a great deal of mischief to the innocent people in the Lushkur. The guns in the Fort commenced firing on the Cumpoo also, but they were soon silenced by the batteries of the Cumpoo that were placed in opposition to theirs on a high elevation, and well directed, and in a few minutes the roaring of Cannons in all directions became quite incessant without intermission, and the balls were observed flying in almost every quarter of the Lushkur. The balls from the cannons of two batteries belonging to the Jinsee were deliberately thrown into Baptist's Koottee evidently with a view to harm him, and two guns had advanced to storm his Koottee, fortunately the Januck Battalion on observing this, and the danger Baptist had to encounter without any troops at his command, voluntarily offered to protect him, and sent their native "Comaidan" with a tender of their services to Major Filose, and desired that he would send word to Baboo Seetoolcea and obtain his permission. This was accordingly done, and the order obtained. The Januck with a Christian Officer at their head took up a position in the rear of the Jinsee, and with four guns and good stock of ammunition, opened a brisk and deliberate fire on the Jinsee, and in less than forty minutes captured two batteries of the Jerryput, and made several of the runaways prisoners. The conduct of the Januck in this instance has been acknowledged by all, in point of discipline and good conduct, they outbeat the whole of Maharaja's troops. Their conduct has been highly appreciated by Baboo Seetooleea, who sent them 400 Rs. this morning to feed themselves with a good blow-out of sweetmeats. The report of the cannons since 4 P. M. of yesterday the 19th to 6 in the morning of the 20th has been incessant and without intermission. The casualties of killed and wounded is not yet properly known, but from all accounts it appears to be very great, at the least calculation about eighteen hundred of this Secunder's Camp must have suffered severely. The Sepoys of the Maharaj Cumpoo are now preparing for a general assault, the noise of the cannons has now ceased, and the sword and the musquet are the next man killing instruments they are determined to put into force. They have sent word to the Baee to turn Beebee Secunder out of the palace and to prepare to leave the Lushkur. Secunder's Camp has been surrounded, and he has sent word to allow him to leave the Lushkur unmolested. It is difficult to say whether his request will be granted. Several chiefs who had taken refuge in the Jinsee, have absconded, and some taken into custody. The Jinsee is now a heap of ruin, and the greater portion of the troops absconded during the night. Col. Jacob during the disturbance left his Camp, and returned to the city without leaving instructions to his officers to join and assist the Cumpoo. He was immediately written to by Seetooleea, and cautioned, that if he refused to send his Regiments to assist his Cumpoo (as such was his engagement) that he would have him apprehended, and disgracefully turned out of the Lushkur next morning. Jacob very readily ordered these Regiments with 12 guns to proceed and join the Maharaj Cumpoo.—They arrived at the Camp at a late hour of the night, and took ground in the rear of Secunder's batteries, and kept cannonading then till morning. The Khasgeewalla on the report of the first gun was brought out of his prison to be sacrificed, but Seetooleea and Ram Rao prevented this by ordering 30 Seers weight of fetters on his legs, and an extra guard, telling the men that they had to deliver him a living being to the Sircar Company, and that they were responsible for this. Col. Jacob and Baptiste have just been invited to the Durbar. In my next I hope to be able to hand you a better detail of the casualties that have actually occurred. 20th Nov. 1843.—Correspondent of the Agra Ukhbar, Nov. 23.

STEAM MEETING AT BOMBAY.

A meeting took place yesterday at the rooms of the Chamber of Commerce, to take into consideration the propriety of memorializing the authorities on the present state of our steam communication with England, with a view to its improvement. We beg to call attention to the resolutions which were proposed and adopted on the occasion, and we hope to obtain a copy of the memorial to the Board of Control for our monthly summary. It is perfectly clear that the public will no longer submit to the present imperfect state of our steam arrangements, which are, instead of improving, daily growing worse. We expect when the Government tariff of freights reaches England, that the community there will re-double its exertions, to get the packet-line transferred to a private company, who may be expected to be more amenable to public opinion than our Government has shown itself:—

Proposed by C. B. Skinner, Esq., seconded by A. O. Maclean, Esq.—1. Resolved—That the commercial interests of Bombay being so intimately concerned in promoting the efficiency of the steam communication between India and England, it behoves the mercantile community to use their best efforts, in support of any scheme which promises to be attended with substantial and permanent improvement of the present mode of intercourse.

Proposed by D. Miller, Esq., seconded by T. R. Richmond, Esq.—

2. Resolved—That in the opinion of this meeting, the plan proposed for undertaking the conveyance of the Overland Mails between Bombay and Alexandria, and which, by the last accounts, was still under the consideration of the home authorities, appears calculated to confer considerable advantages on the country at large, and to promote in particular the interests of trade, as well by effecting a great acceleration of the rate of progress, and thus facilitating correspondence, as by bringing into operation a system, as respects the transmission of goods, from which advantages may be expected, which under present circumstances, it were in vain to look for.

Proposed by H. G. Gordon, Esq., seconded by T. R. Richmond, Esq.—

3. Resolved, therefore, that a memorial be forwarded by the next Overland Mail, to the Lords of the Treasury, and also to the Board of Control, advocating the transfer of the conveyance of the mails from the hands of Government to those of a private Company, under such arrangements as those mentioned in the preceding Resolution; and that in this memorial the attention of the authorities be particularly drawn to the rules recently established here, for the management of the Steam Packets, plying between Bombay and Suez, the prejudicial effect certain to be produced by which furnishes a strong reason, in addition to other considerations, for the adoption of the desired change.

Proposed by G. Faris, Esq., seconded by W. J. Young, Esq.—

4. Resolved—That the memorial now read be adopted by this meeting, and that the Committee be instructed to forward it to England for presentation.

Proposed by A. Cassels, Esq., seconded by S. D. Murray, Esq.—

5. Resolved—That the Resolutions now [illegible] be published for general information.

Proposed by T. Cardwell, Esq., seconded by W. Frith, Esq.—

6. Resolved—That a copy of the memorial now adopted be sent in to Government, with a request that they will forward the same to the Court of Directors.—Bombay Times, November 22.

SEETHAURAME MAHARAJAH.

Among the arrivals at this Presidency whi[illegible] ought to have been mentioned in an earlier is[illegible] is a native nobleman of high character, S[illegible]thaurame Maharajah. This gentleman we have the pleasure of knowing and are able to state from a personal acquaintance that he ranks higher than any other it has been our lot to come into contact with. His intellectual qualifications are of the first order, but from his retired habits much of their glow and value are lost to his countrymen. Converse with him is a treat of no ordinary kind, and it is astonishing with what ease and grace he developes the treasures of his well-stored mind. His urbanity is proverbial, and his active benevolence unsurpassed by any of his countrymen. The reason of his name and acts not having claimed greater notoriety, arises from his disinclination to be thought to have done more than his duty. Public buildings exist in different parts of the country in great numbers for the benefit of travellers, which owe their origin to him, and the expense of which, has been defrayed from his own resources. He is a most learned and amiable man, and his moral eminence is not the least attractive feature in his character. Such men are worthy of the utmost attention from our authorities, not that Seethaurame Maharajah covets such courtesy, but we advocate it, as evincing a readiness to shew honour, where honour is due—Athenæum.

Who is this man? Of what place is he the Rajah? All the Madras papers seem to suppose we have more knowledge than we possess of matters beyond our Presidency.—Ed. F. of I.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—It was with considerable interest that I read your issue of the 2d November anent the new Criminal Code—but there is a certain observation in one of the two anomalous cases brought as instances, which would have been better if you had not made on so unstable ground as public report, upon which I would wish to say a few words. I am not a party interested, but I deem it fair to put down aspersions highly discreditable to the authors of them, and grievous indeed to the person who has been the most injured in the case. There are always, as you well know, two sides of a question and both must be heard to arrive at the fact—but you have deviated from this principle, and thus from your duty also as Editor. Immediately after condemning the husband in public report you cast a shade, I should say, of doubt which the words "but to that circumstance we have nothing to say," would imply—or if any other meaning, it must be one of belief. But whatever it may be, it was uncharitable in you to blame the husband exparte—because the public who trumpeted the report are friends of the transgressor. At all events as you have given ear to them, I pray you will lend an ear to me also. I am perfectly acquainted with the whole case, and I challenge any party to contradict me conscientiously, that, if the husband be at all in the fault it must be ascribed to his agreeable and confiding disposition, and to his implicit faith in the honour of the transgressor, whom society termed "gentleman." The less said on this subject the better—as an exposure would bring facts which would shock you, and place the chief actors in this unhappy affair on the horns of a sad dilemma. And now trusting that you will in future be a little more careful, or rather I should say never to depart from your well known sober judgment.

I am,
Yours,
THE GHOST OF INDIANA.

THE BOMBAY DHURMU SUBHA.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—I humbly beg leave to transmit to you the following lines, and request that you will graciously be pleased to insert them in your most valuable and enriched Journal after corrections that you deem necessary.

Having observed in your issue of the 22d November last, an article regarding the establish[ment] of a Dhurmu Shubha at Bombay by the [Hei]minical Inhabitants in order to preserve Hindooism and to prevent their children from embracing Christianity; and further their determination to make him lose caste who would attend any Missionary's School or the place where they used to reside, I cannot refrain myself from saying a word or two on the subject.

Mr. Editor, if they are truly desirous to preserve Hindooism, let them in the first place preserve union and unanimity in every thing among themselves, and cherish no evil design or envy in their bosom against any other. And be it too an object of vital importance (which is itself in its nature so) to establish a literary institution for the instruction of their children—if they fail to do so they will undoubtedly meet with tenfold opposition and difficulty in putting the object in view into execution, and expose themselves to the laughter and derision of the community in general.

I also embrace this opportunity to suggest to the Members of the Calcutta Dhurma Shubha to observe the plan above alluded to; otherwise they will repent their own negligence.

I am, yours truly,
A READER P.

FURRUCKABAD MISSION SCHOOL.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Will you kindly insert the following lines in a corner of your valuable Journal, which will give much interest to the public.

The 3rd Annual Examination and the distribution of prizes to the student of the School took place at Mr. McAuley's house on Tuesday, the 14th instant, at 11. A. M., before a large and respectable audience, consisting of the Rev. Messrs. Budden, H. R. Wilson, J. L. Scott, and W. H. H. McAuley, Baboo Gopee Nauth Nundy, Newab Dilawur Jung Bahadur, Moulovee Nioz Auly, Moulavee Asgurhosen, Moonshee Nuzzor Khan, Lala Ranajeet, and there were also present several Hindoos and Moosulmans.

The Junior Classes were examined in Reading and Spelling, the students of the 3rd and 2nd classes underwent an examination in the Testament and Reader, &c. The 1st class, in the Scripture and Mathematics, also the boys were examined in Persian, Oordoo and Hindee.

Their answers to the several questions put to them were very correct, and on the whole they acquitted themselves in a style which reflected great credit on themselves and their respective Teachers.

The above part of the business being over, the successful students of each class were called by name and presented with the prizes composed of appropriate books with an exhortative address from the chair.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

MANCHESTER AND SALFORD.—On Lord's-day, Sept. 17, the annual sermons on behalf of the Auxiliary to the Baptist Missionary Society were preached in the Baptist Chapels in Manchester and Salford. The deputation from the present society were the Rev. J. Oughton, of Kingston, Jamaica; the Rev. William Brock, of Norwich, and the Rev. James Hargreaves, of Waltham Abbey. On Monday, the 18th, a public meeting was held in Mosley-street Chapel, which was kindly lent for the occasion; and James Kershaw, Esq., a deacon of that church, and mayor of the borough of Manchester, had the kindness to preside. The meeting was addressed by the members of the deputation, also by the Rev. Drs. Vaughan and Davidson, of the Independent College, and by the Rev. Julius Wood, of the Free Church of Scotland, recently from Malta. The following morning a public breakfast was held at the school-room of Union Chapel, Alderman Callender in the chair. This meeting was one of peculiar interest. In answer to questions from the chairman, the Rev. Mr. Oughton gave much information concerning the converted negroes in Jamaica—such as the mode in which they employ their leisure; the measure of their attachment to the means of grace; the feelings which they cherish towards the land of their fathers; and the efforts in which they are now uniting with English missionaries to spread the Gospel there. The Rev. W. Brock then called the attention of the company to some of the striking events in the history of the Baptist missions in India, and the remarkable indications they present of a mighty and gracious Providence. The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. W. M'Kerrow, of the Secession Church; the Rev. J. Gwyther, of Zion Chapel; the Rev. Joseph Davis, and Rev. F. Tucker. It is stated, with humble gratitude to God, that the collections at this anniversary, including annual subscriptions, amounted to 430*l*.—Pat.

THE RIOTS IN ROSS-SHIRE.—We have inserted, elsewhere, two notices of certain riotous proceedings, alleged to have taken place in Ross-shire, in connexion with the settlement of a parish and the conductor of worship in one of the churches of the Establishment. We regret the occurrence of such disorders. We deny that they are to be charged on the members of the Free Church; and we challenge inquiry on that point. The people who have followed their faithful pastors in their separation from the Establishment have learned to look on the intrusion of their hireling successors with compassion and sorrow, but without anger; and the pulpit filled by a stranger whom they know not, and the manse given over to his unrighteous occupancy, may move their eyes to tears, but not their hands to violence. There are disorderly crowds in every country; and that these should break out on the occasion is not surprising. They are to be quelled and repressed by the civil arm, which unquestionably ought to protect its own. The Free Church disavows all who take any part in such movements, and will gladly assist in their detection and punishment.—Witness.

THE COLOURED CHRISTIANS OF AMERICA.—The following letter was read at a meeting of the church worshipping at Surrey Chapel, on Monday last, September 25th :—

TO THE MINISTERS, ELDERS, AND MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH WORSHIPPING AT SURREY CHAPEL, LONDON.

Beloved in the Lord,—By the return of our esteemed pastor, Rev. James W. E. Pennington, we, the undersigned, officers and members of the Julcott-street, or Fifth Congregational Church, Hartford, Conn., have received your truly fraternal and Christian letter addressed to him. Our hearts are tenderly affected in view of the expression of your sympathies with us, and towards our fellow-Christians in this land, who are companions in the same trials.

With the deepest interest we have listened to the recital of the providential steps which brought our pastor in connexion with you. We love to acknowledge these ways of the Lord that led his mission abroad, to be began and ended at Surrey Chapel. Its name, and that of your present minister, are not unknown among us, while the praise of his venerated predecessor is in all our churches.

Suffer us, then, individually and collectively, in behalf of our church and of its members, like poor and afflicted people whom the Lord hath left in Zion, to express to you, as individuals and as a body, our heartfelt acknowledgment of your many acts of kindness and Christian fellowship extended to our pastor during his recent visit among you. We cannot, however, speak of Christian fellowship, and read the contents of your letter, without feeling deeply moved at the recollection of how far short many of the professed disciples of our common Lord, in this land, come of its exercise towards those who are "guilty of a skin not coloured like their own."

Far be it from us to magnify the trials of this kind, which, at all times and in all places, most of us are compelled to undergo; much less would we, without occasion, expose the failings of Christian brethren, who for many excellencies, and much of the Spirit of Christ which we discover in them, we cannot but esteem. (And, because we do love them, we may speak the more strongly.) The evils which you lament, and of which we have so much reason to complain, had their origin in the sin of slavery; and by it they are still sustained in a great degree. But, like the system of caste among the Hindoos, in some respects similar, and still more in our case than theirs, from permanent and obvious physical differences, such middle walls of partition, may, through the force of custom, unless special pains be taken to throw it down, remain long after the causes that conspired to rear it have become extinct. It seems, therefore, to be one of those evil usages which occasionally creep in among a portion of the Church of Christ, and which it becomes the duty of other more favoured portions to endeavour in the spirit of Christian faithfulness, to do away. May we not then, dear brethren, address God in the language of an apostle, and say, "Ye have done well that ye communicated with us in our afflictions?"

Most encouraging to our pastor, and consoling to us and our afflicted and fellow disciples, are your words and your deeds. We trust also that the kind letter of your Sabbath-school teachers and pupils may be greatly blessed to our children; nay, more, such Christ-like acts, if followed up by the churches of Britain, will, through the blessing of God, be effectual in breaking down the unholy barriers between the white man and the coloured man of America.

We cannot dismiss this subject without bearing our testimony to the correctness of what you allege to have learned of the disabilities under which all persons of African descent labour, whatever may be their character or education.

In most of the non-slave-holding states, as well as our own state of Connecticut, the elective franchise is limited to "white" men; and coloured parents cannot even have a voice in the pettiest officer, no, not so much as a village schoolmaster.

But the grievances which originate from constitutions and legal enactments are but few and small, compared with those which originate from the laws of custom, the practices of business, corporations, colleges, and, above all, of churches: these press us down far more heavily.

In those cases where a few persons, like our pastor, break through all obstacles, and enter the ministry, they can only minister to churches composed of persons of their own colour. Their ministerial intercourse with white brethren, is not likely to be more considerable than his; and during a residence of between three and four years in this city, where we have four other churches of the same denomination, and after frequent journeyings in this state, where ours is the most numerous denomination, he has had assistance, indeed, in his own pulpit from other ministers, but has been enabled to exchange only with the chaplain of the Penitentiary, one of the signers of this letter, and to preach for a single father in the ministry Rev. Mr. Swift, at Derby, near N. Haven.

Here is the burden of our complaint. We might pass over much that is unpleasant, while mingling with a world that has no sympathy with Christ and his cross, but when we come into the house of God, and find there the "negro pew," we are injured and wounded beyond measure.

Thus suffering under prejudices so oppressive and so unjust, you, will believe it when we tell you, that we prize most highly the assurances of the sympathy, and the other token of the fellowship of British philanthropists and Christians.

We trust the voice of remonstrance will continue to be raised by your churches and your religious press. Whatever some may say to the contrary, we are assured that it will do much good.

In conclusion, we thank you, from the depth of our hearts, for your acts of kindness and of respect to our pastor while among you. The letter and memorial we shall hope to see placed in some accessible place in our chapel. In thus drawing consolation from your proffered fellowship, we shall deem it a duty to continue to merit it. With sincere sentiments of very high regard and reciprocal Christian love, we are; dear brethren, yours in Christ,

J. W. E. Pennington, Pastor.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Belgian Colonization Society.—We lately gave some account of a new French Society, at once anti-Protestant and anti-English. We have now to present a sketch of a Belgian Colonization Company, on which a Report has been published by Messrs. Hamont and Marey-Monge, of Paris, recommending the principles and practice of the Belgian Commercial Company for adoption, as far as applicable, in Algiers, and wherever the French can undertake Colonial establishments. The Authors of the Report deeply regret, that the first effort was not made by French capitalists, but they are consoled by reflecting, that the Author of the project was a Frenchman; that the Belgian nation is, in fact, a younger sister of France, speaking the same language, assimilated in manners, professing the same religion; and that the Commercial Colonization Society is thus placed under the ægis of the Catholic clergy.

The Belgian Colonization Society is established by a Royal Ordonnance; and King Leopold, it seems, takes a most lively interest in its success. The Company has obtained from the Government of Guatemala the cession of the district and port of Santo Thomas, with exemption for twenty years from all kinds of taxes or duties; not only of taxes on land or property, but of custom duties both on imports and on exports. The privilege of steam navigation is also insured to the Company, and also the free cultivation even of tobacco. The district of Santo Thomas comprises about 200 square leagues, and is bounded on the north by Lake Isabal and the River Polochic, and on the south by the River Montagua; it is covered with virgin forests, and has one of the finest ports in the world, three leagues in circumference, the only one that Guatemala has in the Atlantic, sheltered from all winds, and accessible at all times to the largest vessels. The population of Guatemala is above 430,000. The country is most fertile in fruits, vegetables, and grain; and indigo, vanilla, coffee, cotton, and the sugar-cane are successfully cultivated: it is thus rich in productions of all kinds. Its commercial position is represented as unique, being placed between two oceans, which will soon be united. The importance of this country is much increased by the political events of 1842,—the new relations between England and China consequent on the war, the seizure of the Marquesas, and the occupation of Tahiti.

"The Belgians are Catholics," continues the Report; "and, amidst all the revolutions of Central America, the inhabitants have preserved the faith of their fathers in all its purity. The port of Santo Thomas, refused to the repeated solicitations of an English Company, was at once conceded to the Belgian Company. A single word explains the fact,—the English are Protestants! At present, starting from Isabal, and passing by the city of Guatemala, at least twelve days are required to get from Santo Thomas on the Atlantic to Istapa in the Pacific. When a regular service is established on the Montagua, the journey will be made in four days. The Belgian Company is bound to establish this communication. A line of Steam-boats will also leave Europe direct for Santo Thomas; another line, in correspondence with it, will start either from Istapa or some other port on the Pacific; and then, letters despatched from Paris on the 1st of each month, will be received in the Marquesas on the 15th of the following month at the very latest. Letters leaving, again, the Marquesas for different parts of Oceania and the Chinese Sea, will thus find their way in little more than sixty days to the furthest point of that part of the world. When it is calculated that the intermediate places will all receive their proportion of advantage, it will be seen of what immense importance will become the establishments of the Belgian Colonization Company. The English, following the traditions of the Venetians and other commercial people, endeavour to keep the world in ignorance of the countries they inhabit. The French are now resolved to tear asunder the veil with which the British cover their operations, and to promote the safety, the celerity, and the economy necessary to commercial and colonial enterprise; and this at once in the interest of France and of the Catholic Church."

It is not our object to make known the details of the system of Colonization recommended in the Report of MM. Hamont and Marey-Monge; nor do we pretend to estimate the proportions of wisdom or folly to be found in the project; it is to the spirit and collateral objects that we wish to draw attention. The Company is to form communities, all the members of which are to share in the general advantage; a sort of family interest, with domestic independence, is to unite all; and the Catholic religion is declared to be the palladium under which the enterprise is to be nourished and protected. As a thing of course, first on the list of the Colonial Council at Santo Thomas, we find the Very Reverend Father Walle, Regent of the College of St. Michael, Brussels. In all those countries, the Roman Catholic is the only religion tolerated. Leopold takes the most lively interest, we are assured, in this Belgian Catholic Colonization Company; which Company, projected by a Frenchman, and recommended to be imitated by the French, is to act in concert with the Missions to Tahiti and the Marquesas and the Sandwich Islands! This is not surprising in the Protestant King of the Belgians, who married Louis Philippe's daughter, and obtained the crown on condition that his children should be brought up Catholics! No conscience or no crown!—Pat.

Revolution in Greece.—The Greek Observer of the 15th inst. publishes the following account of the bloodless revolution which took place the night before in Athens:—

"New Era—Constitutional Monarchy.—A wise revolution, accomplished in one day, amidst the most perfect order, without a single offensive cry being uttered, even against the Bavarians, has renewed the claims of Greece to the esteem and sympathy of nations and their governments. Every body knows the unfortunate situation in which Greece was placed. The Greeks had exhausted every means in their power to induce the Government to adopt a truly national policy. The Parliaments of France and England, and the London Conference, had vainly acknowledged the many grievances of the Greek people; the Government obstinately persevered in its evil course. The nation had no other alternative but to plunge itself into the abyss opened by ten years' mistakes and incapacity, or to extricate itself therefrom by a dangerous but inevitable effort. For some time the movement was in progress of preparation on different points of the country, that it might be effected without any disorder. The hostile attitude assumed by the Government against those who sought to enlighten it, the extraordinary dispositions adopted within the last few days with a view to assail the liberty and the very lives of the citizens (a military tribunal had been established) most devoted to the national interests, should necessarily tend to hasten the manifestation of the contemplated movement. Last night, at [illegible] o'clock, A. M., a few musket shots, fired, in the air, announced the assembling of the people in the different quarters of Athens. Soon afterwards the inhabitants, accompanied by the entire garrison, marched towards the square of the palace, crying "The constitution for ever!" On reaching the place the entire garrison, the artillery, cavalry, and infantry, drew up under the windows of the King, in front of the palace, and, the people having stationed themselves in the rear, all in one voice demanded a constitution. The King appeared at a low window, and assured the people that he would take into consideration their demand and that of the army, after consulting with his ministers, the council of state, and the representatives of the foreign powers. But the Commander, M. Calergi, having stepped forward, made known to his Majesty that the ministry was no longer recognized, and that the council of state was already deliberating on the best course to be adopted under existing circumstances. In fact, the council of state was engaged in drawing up two documents, which will be found subjoined. The second was presented to the King by a deputation of the council, composed of Messrs. Conduriotis, the president, G. Enian, A. P. Mavromichali, jun., Psyles, and Anastasius Londos. Whilst his Majesty was reading the propositions of the council of state, the representatives of the foreign powers presented themselves at the palace, and were told by the commander that nobody could be admitted at that moment, the King being in conference with the deputation of the council state. The latter came out two hours afterwards with the consent of the King. The new ministry then repaired to the palace, where they held a long consultation with his Majesty, who shortly appeared on the balcony, surrounded by his ministers and other personages, and was received with acclamation by the people. The cry of 'Long live the Constitutional King' resounded, together with that of 'The Constitution for ever.' The new ministers entered immediately on the discharge of their functions. The military revolution was directed, on the part of the regular army, by the Colonel of Cavalry (Demetri Calergi), and on that of the irregular army by Colonel Macryany. At three o'clock in the afternoon the garrison, after defiling before the Palace, re-entered their quarters, preceded by their bands, amidst the acclamations of the people. An hour afterwards the city, in which order had not been an instant disturbed, resumed its customary aspect. The day of the 3rd of September (15th) will hereafter be kept as a great national festivity. It will have consolidated the throne, and secured the future prosperity of Greece. The enthusiasm which inspires us, and which we endeavour to moderate in writing these lines, in order to give to Europe a clear aspect of the facts, does not permit us to conceal the spontaneousness and the effecting and exemplary unanimity of that revolution. The Greek people has placed itself, on this occasion, on a level with the nations the most civilized, and the most worthy of sympathy. It has made a pure and spotless revolution, although it has but a few years emerged from an oppression of ages. Europe, we are sure, will do them justice.—We have to address our congratulations to that wise and intelligent population, to the patriotic army and its chiefs, and to remind them that their work will be achieved by the uninterrupted maintenance of public order, such as it now exists, and of which the organization of a National Guard will soon be one of the surest guarantees. We have reason to believe that similar movements to that of Athens took place simultaneously in the principal provinces."

Decree.—"The Council of State having held an extraordinary meeting in the hall of their sittings, on the 3rd (15th) of September, at four o'clock A. M., unanimously deemed it expedient, under existing circumstances, before it should attend to other business, to address, first, in the name of the country, warm thanks to the people, the garrison, and other corps of the army, for the admirable conduct which they exhibited on this occasion, by acting, on the one part, with patriotism, agreeably to the interests of the country, and, on the other, by preserving the perfect order which the country now enjoys. The Council of State declares, in a special manner for the army, that the part which it has taken in that national movement was dictated by a sense of necessity and of the interests of the nation—a sentiment entirely conformable to the honour, duty, and prescriptions of national assemblies; the army recollected that the soldier of a free nation is a citizen before being a soldier. The Council of State expects that it will behave similarly and with the same spirit of order in future, until the fate of the country be guaranteed as respects the institution of its laws. To that end the Council ordains that the entire army shall take the following oath:—'I take the oath of fidelity to the country and to the constitutional throne. I swear that I will remain invariably attached to the constitutional institutions framed by the National Assembly, convoked in consequence of the measures adopted this day.' The Council of State, moreover, declares that the 3rd of September, [open]ing a glorious prospect to Greece, it has [thou]ght proper to class it among the national festivities.—Athens, 3rd (15th) September, 1843."

ADDRESS OF THE COUNCIL OF STATE TO THE KING. —"SIRE,—The Council of State, concurring completely in the wishes of the Greek people, and accepting the extraordinary power which the irresistible force of things compels it to assume, for the consolidation of the throne, and for the salvation of the country, hastens respectfully to submit to your Majesty the following measures, which it trusts will be immediately and fully approved. Your Majesty will consider it expedient to appoint a new Ministry without delay. The Council of State recommend to the approbation of your Majesty, as persons competent to form it, because of their enjoying public esteem and confidence, Messrs. André Metaxa, for the Presidency of the Council of Ministers, with the Department of Foreign Affairs; André Londos, for the Ministry of War; Canaris, for the Navy Department; Rhigas Palamidis for the Interior; Mansolas for the Finance; Leon Melas for Justice, and Michel Schinas for Public Instruction and Ecclesiastical Affairs. Your Majesty will be pleased, at the same time, to sign an ordinance, which will impose on the new Ministry, as its first duty, the convocation, within the delay of a month, of the National Assembly, which will deliberate upon the definitive Constitution that is to be established in concert with the Royal authority, as the ægis under which the throne and the nation shall hereafter be placed. The extraordinary circumstances of the country rendering the convocation of the National Assembly an urgent necessity, and not admitting of a new law of election being previously framed, your Majesty will permit your Ministry to convoke that Assembly, agreeably to the spirit and provisions of the last law of election in vigour before 1833, with the sole difference that the electoral colleges shall elect their Presidents by a majority of votes. The new Ministry, invested with the full powers necessary to conduct the Government in accord with the gravity of the circumstances which led to its formation, shall render an account of its acts to the National Assembly. Sire, these measures emanate in the most evident manner from the wishes and wants so lively expressed by the Greek nation, and of which the Council is at this moment the faithful interpreter. They are an inevitable consequence of the legitimate exigencies, demanding the immediate realization of all the guarantees stipulated by preceding National Assemblies, by the acts of the triple alliance, and by the Prince himself, who accepted the throne of Greece. These are, in fine, the measures which the Council of State, in accord with the nation, considers in its conscience, not only as urgent, but likewise as the only means of salvation under the present circumstances. May Heaven grant that your Majesty, becoming conscious of the necessity of what we have just exposed, approve these measures and direct their immediate execution, for the satisfaction of all, and for the maintenance of public order and tranquillity. The Council of State respectfully entreats your Majesty to accede to the wishes it has expressed, and subscribes itself, &c.

"CONDURIOTIS, President.
"MAVROMICHALI, Vice-President.

"Panutzos Notaras, R. Church, A. Metaxa, A. Monarchidis, B. N. Boudouris, A. Lidikoris, T. Manghine, G. Eynian, N. Zacharitza, N. Rhynieri, C. Caradja, A. P. Mavromichali, P. Soutzo, Paicos, N. G. Theocharis, C. C. G. Praides, Rhighi Palamidis, Drosso Mansola, Siliverges, A. Polyzoides, Anastasious Londos, S. Theocharopoulos, G. Psyles, G. Spaniolakis, C. Zographos, André Londos, G. D. Schinas."

"The above address was carried to his Majesty by a commission composed of Messrs. Conduriotis, President; G. Eynian, A. P. Mavromicali, jun.; G. Psyles, Anastasious Londos. About an hour afterwards, the commission returned with the following reply signed by the King:—

"Otho, by the Grace of God, King of Greece. On the proposition of the Council of State, we have decreed as follows:—

"Art. 1. A national assembly shall be convoked within the space of thirty days, to the effect of drawing up, in conjunction with us, the constitution of this state. The electoral assemblies shall take place, agreeably to the provisions of the last law of election, promulgated previous to 1833, with this sole difference, that those electoral assemblies shall name their presidents by a majority of votes. Our Council of Ministers shall be convoked, to countersign this ordinance and carry it into execution.—OTHO. Athens, Sept. 3, (15th) 1843."

Letters from Athens of the 17th, state, that all foreigners holding office under Government were to be dismissed, including even M. Lemaitre and other Frenchmen employed in the administration of the National Bank. The chiefs of the movement had adopted every precaution for the safety of that establishment; the directors were beforehand informed of the hour at which the movement was to take place, and twelve trusty soldiers were sent thither during the night, for its protection, by M. Calergi. The revolution was effected without any violence. The Ministers were arrested in their houses, but liberated on the next morning. An aide-de-camp of the King, M. Gardekeckis, a Bavarian, was also apprehended, and confined in the barracks, where he, however, remained a prisoner only a few hours.—It appears that the King yielded with bad grace, when he found that all resistance on his part would be unavailing. It was eleven o'clock, A. M., when his obstinacy was subdued. The military bands were then playing the "Marseillaise" and the "Parisienne," which gave his Majesty cause to suppose that affairs might proceed to unpleasant extremities. On the 16th, King Otho took his customary airing, and was saluted, as he passed along the streets, with cries from the people and soldiers of "Long live the Constitutional King!" An exception had been made in the decree of exclusion against foreigners, in favour of the old Philhellenes who held office under the Government.

ATHENS, Sept. 15.—Such was the complete isolation of the Court, that it was only on Wednesday (the day before yesterday), that Tzinos, the monster, whose horrible acts of torture I have, on more than one occasion, described to you, discovered and denounced the affair to the King, the general rising of the capital having then been fixed for the day after to-morrow, the 17th. Fortunately, most fortunately, as it has since turned out, the Greeks discovered that their intentions were known, and with that energy for which they have been always remarkable, at once resolved on compromising the capital, by the rising, which they were aware would be instantly followed by the whole country, although the important assistance of Grigiotis, who was expected from Chalsis on Saturday (to-morrow) with seven hundred men, would thus be wanting. At eleven o'clock yesterday night, Tzinos discovered that the insurrection was about to burst forth, and he instantly proceeded to the palace, where he probably remains to this moment. Although it appears that neither the King nor Tzinos were aware of the extent of the conspiracy, their first act was to despatch a Bavarian aide-de-camp to the barracks of the artillery, with an order for the guns to be immediately brought to the palace. The reply of the commanding officer was, that he could take no orders but from the Commandant de Place. The only men on whom Tzinos could depend, amounting to about a hundred gens-d'armes, had been employed in surrounding the garden of the Chief Macri-Janni, situated near the Temple of Jupiter, where his information led him to believe the principal conspirators were gathered. At about half an hour after midnight, the Minister of War desired Colonel Calergi to proceed with his cavalry to this spot, to support and assist the gendarmerie. Calergi, but too glad of an excuse for putting his men in movement, at once proceeded to the spot, where he remained, his troops drawn up at a sufficient distance to enable the inmates of the garden to recognise them, for about a quarter of an hour, when, no doubt, receiving a signal that all was in readiness, they galloped off to the infantry barracks, situated in the centre of the town. Almost immediately after, some gens-d'armes endeavouring to advance too near the gardens were warned off by Macri-Janni, and on refusing to retire they were fired on, when one gens-d'arme was killed and one wounded. This was the signal that the revolution had commenced. King Otho stood at his window, believing that the gens-d'armes he had surrounded the garden with were sufficient to keep the inmates within it, when presently a cheer arose from the centre of the town that must have made him turn his eyes and thoughts in a very different direction. Calergi had harangued the soldiers; every house had turned out its armed man to fight for liberty, but who to fight with? There was no one. The whole body moved towards the palace, the artillery was marching in the same direction from the barracks. Valco had placed men to guard the treasury from any attempt at plunder; and in less than a quarter of an hour the enormous esplanade in front of the palace was covered with the élite of the Greek nation, consisting of the members of the council of state, the military chiefs, the troops, and the citizens of the capital. King Otho stood at the window of his marble palace, supported by the Bavarian Hesse and the monster Tzinos, listening to his own Bavarian band, which the Greeks caused to regale his Majesty with the harmonious strains of the "Marseillaise" and "Parisienne." This practical joke reminds me of an old woman's buying five Bavarian prisoners for 6d. a piece in Maina, during the war in that province, and sending them as a present to the King.

"The first and only act of folly which might have led to bloodshed, was committed by the Minister of War, Vlahopulo, who presented himself before Calergi, and desired him to withdraw the troops. Calergi applied the strongest expressions of contempt to this silly creature his vocabulary would allow of. He said, "Take the Bavarian away, and shut him up." To prevent any similar nonsense, guards were then placed over the houses of the other Ministers, who in any other country would have been instantly put to death for their criminal support of the late system. The first person to appear at the palace was Hesse, who came forward and addressed Calergi in an insolent manner; again the greatest presence of mind was displayed by the chief. He replied, "You are a miscreant, and are the cause of the King's being placed in this position; I am not going to lower myself by talking with a Bavarian; retire, or I will order the troops to fire on you." The hint was taken, and the King then came forward. He said, "Colonel Calergi, is this the tranquillity you promised me to maintain? Go away; I will speak to you to-morrow." Calergi's answer was firm and dignified, and, moreover, to the point: "This is no question of tranquillity; we are come to settle an affair of ten years' standing, and to-morrow will no longer do for us. I am, however, here to maintain tranquillity, while your Majesty settles the basis of the constitution with the civil power." The King retired, and the crowd amused itself by shouting, while the chiefs decided on what was to be done. When morning broke the Council of State had been formed into a provisional government, to decide on the necessary measures to be taken. These were soon presented to his Majesty, and, though reduced to the simplest possible form of the demand of a convocation of the National Assembly to draw up a definite constitution, it will hardly be believed that King Otho did not finally accept this till after he was informed that, if he hesitated ten minutes longer, the cannon would commence firing on the palace, to break open the gates, and that the chiefs would not be answerable for the consequences.

I must not conclude without saying a few words of unbounded praise of the perfect order that has prevailed during a period, and under circumstances, which in any other country in the world, I am inclined to believe, must have led to bloodshed and anarchy. Not an instance of theft, not an instance of even a Bavarian being insulted, has occurred. All is order and respect towards the superiors of the nation's choice. For the first time since King Otho has been on the throne of Greece, a strong Government has been formed; and it has been formed by the people. If King Otho wishes to reign over Greece, as it was intended by the Allies he should reign, constitutionally, he may now do so, and continue to do so to the day of his death: all depends upon himself, and, without entering on any anticipations of evils, let us express our sincere hope that he will now see that the way to govern happily, is to do so according to the wishes of the people.—Pat.

THE SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES.—We understand that, in consequence of the intolerant proceedings of the Residuary Establishment for the purpose of ejecting Sir David Brewster and other ornaments of our Universities from their situations, solely on account of their adherence to the Free Church, an active agitation will immediately be commenced by influential parties, principally connected with the Universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, for the purpose of effecting an entire overthrow of the restrictions by which a pretext is given to such proceedings.—Witness.

MR. HENRY LYTTON BULWER, the brother of the novelist, will be appointed Ambassador to Spain—indeed, he has received his appointment already. Mr. Bulwer was a Liberal of the Grey school, and something more during the time that he sat for the opulent borough of Marylebone. Mr. Bulwer is about the fittest person that could be found to represent our interests at Madrid. Had events been of a more ordinary and routine nature in the Peninsula, it was their intention to have appointed Lord Mahon their ambassador. This is the second disappointment to which that noble lord will have been compelled to submit, as he was pointed out for, and actually expected, the appointment of Under-Secretary, now held by Viscount Canning.—Hants Independent.

PUBLIC APPOINTMENTS.—Major-General Sir Charles Felix Smith, to be C. B., and Colonel Richard England, with local rank of Major-General in India, to be Knights Commanders of the said Order; Lieutenant-Colonels Gore Brown and Joseph Simmons, of the 41st Regiment of Foot; Majors Arthur Philip Savage Wilkinson and Hamlet Wade, of the 13th Regiment of Light Infantry; and Major George Hogarth, of the 26th Regiment of Foot, to be Companions of the Bath; Lieutenant-Colonel George Hume, of the 20th Regiment of Bengal Native Infanry, in the service of the East India Company, to be a Companion of the Bath; Mr. William Morgan Davies, Consul at Cardiff, and Mr. William Leslie Thompson, Consul at Aberdeen, for the King of Hanover; Henry William Macaulay, Esq., to be Commissioner, and Charles Pettingal, Esq. to be Arbitrator, on the part of her Majesty, to the Mixed British and Portuguese Commission, to be established at the island of Boa Vista, in the Cape Verds; John Thomas, Esq., to be Commissioner, and Charles Francis Fynes Clinton, Esq., to be Arbitrator, on the part of her Majesty, to the Mixed British and Portuguese Commission, to be established at the city of Loanda, in the province of Angola; Arthur Richard Hamilton, Esq., in the room of James Fitzjames, Esq., deceased, to be Arbitrator, on the part of her Majesty, to the Mixed British and Portuguese Commission established at Jamaica.—Pat.

STATE OF IRELAND.—There is a rumour that Government intend bringing all these demonstrations to a violent and speedy end. This, however, we can hardly bring ourselves to believe. For, as they have so long and so patiently connived at the violence of the agitation, it seems improbable that they should spoil sport just as it is exhibiting some of its most curious vagaries.—Times.

REBECCA IN LONDON—REMOVAL OF THE UNIVERSITY COLLEGE GATE.—A few evenings since, Mr. Hill, the porter and keeper of the gate of the London University College, which crosses Gower street, New-road, and which prevents carriages from passing along the front of University College Hospital, received a letter with the signature of "Rebecca" attached, declaring it to be the intention of herself and others to remove the "obstruction" called a gate on the following night. Mr. Hill, believing the matter a joke, took no notice of the circumstance, but to his astonishment, early on the morning following the night on which the threatened attack was promised, he was awakened by the night porter, who informed him that the gate (a large wooden one, such as the ordinary toll-bars) was gone. On examination, it was found that not only had the large padlock by which it was fastened been broken and carried away, but the gate had absolutely been filed off its hinges, and conveyed by the depredators into the college grounds, and hid behind some shrubs set in one part of it. The gate has again been reinstated, but since the occurrence Mr. Hill has received another threatening notice, informing him that it is the intention of Rebecca and her daughters on Monday night next to effect its entire destruction. What is most extraordinary in connexion with the affair is, that the gate should have been removed without the knowledge of the police, the beats of two constables joining close to the spot, or that of the night porters, either at the college or at the hospital.—Pat.

EXTENSIVE FAILURE.—A letter from Berlin, of the 13th ult., in the Courrier Francais, announces that Rick and Co., of Iserlohn in Westphalia, one of the most extensive manufacturing firms in Europe, had failed for a sum of 4,000,000 thalers (600,000*l.*). It is added that the calamity will be severely felt throughout Germany, but particularly at Berlin and Hamburg.—Ibid.

SWITZERLAND.—A letter from Appenzell, in Switzerland, mentions a singular instance of religious zeal. "At the fête of the Nativity of the Virgin, the Curé Weishoupt, of Brulleeau, declared that he would shoot any one who should attempt to get in his harvest on that day. One M. Fuchs proceeded to his work as usual. The curé, seeing this, fired at him, and lodged twenty grains of shot in his thigh and leg. The Government wished to prosecute him; but the inhabitants of Brulleeau prevented; and the affair is to be taken before the Bishop."

A letter from Coire, in the canton of the Grisons, reports that the mountain of Calanda had suddenly given way, with a dull noise. It was found to be cleft with longitudinal crevices; and the village of Felsberg is threatened with ultimate destruction. Government will help the inhabitants to emigrate beyond the Rhine.—Ibid.

FOREIGN CORN.—Behold, how the farmers are duped by the Corn-law cheat!—On Thursday last, duty was paid on no less than 320,000 quarters of wheat at the port of London alone. At Hull, upwards of 60,000 quarters were taken out of bond last week; at Newcastle, upwards of 70,000 quarters; and at Leith, about the same quantity. In all about 800,000 quarters of foreign grain has been thrown into the English market during the last few weeks.—Leeds Times.

The Tay, just arrived, brings information of a dreadful conflagration, which broke out at Kingston, at mid-day, of the 26th of August, destroying nearly ten thousand houses, and a vast deal of other property, to the amount of 350.000*l.*, computed at a rough calculation. The wind was very high, and the fire spread with the greatest rapidity, the negroes looking on with unconcern, and not lending a helping hand to extinguish the flames; there was besides a great scarcity of water. Had not the sailors in harbour, soldiers of the 60th regiment, and the respectable inhabitants of the town rendered assistance, the whole must have fallen a prey to the devouring element. There was only one life lost—that of a gentleman, who was killed in consequence of the bursting of a shell. Fever, however, ensued, and affected those principally who had over-exerted themselves, and several lives fell a sacrifice. The fire broke out in the western part of the town, and continued burning for 24 hours before its ravages were stopped.

Our accounts from Athens state that the late revolution had no-wise disturbed the tranquillity of the kingdom. The new ministry displayed the greatest activity. They had issued a decree relative to the elections, and another for the organisation of the National Guard of Athens, which was placed under the command of Col. Macryany, the President of the Municipal Council, and one of the chiefs of the movement.

The Rev. I. H. Newman has resigned the vicarage of St. Mary's, in Oxford, which living is attached to the chapel of Littlemore, built by Mr. Newman himself. The fact is, that for a length of time Mr. Newman has been exposed to a systematic opposition from the heads of houses, who have resorted to every possible means in order to prevent young men attending his sermons.

A meeting was recently held in London, at which were present Lord Ashley, Lord R. Grosvenor, Sir R. H. Inglis, and other noblemen and gentlemen, when it was determined that a respectful address should be prepared to his Grace the Chancellor, and the Rev. the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford, expressive of the concern experienced by the memorialists, occasioned by the diffusion of sentiments through the academical body calculated "to excite dissatisfaction with the principles of our reformed Church, as the same are embodied in the Book of Common Prayer, and especially in the Thirty-nine Articles of religion."

EAST INDIA INTELLIGENCE.—A telegraphic dispatch announcing the total loss of the steamer Memnon, with the Mail of the 19th July, reached London 3rd October.

The government having determined that Southampton shall in future be the port for the arrival and departure of mails: those for Egypt and India will be made up on the 1st day of each month, and dispatched by the morning mail, instead of the evening as heretofore. When the 1st of the month falls on a Sunday, the mail will be made up and dispatched on the morning of the previous day.

The following is to be the inscription on the tablet about to be erected in St. Peter's Church, Colchester, to the memory of the martyrs who suffered in this town during the reign of Mary, for their adherence to the Protestant faith:—" 'The noble army of martyrs praise Thee.' In memory of those blessed martyrs for Christ, who, during the reign of Queen Mary, were burnt alive in this town of Colchester, for their firm adherence to the Protestant faith. John Lawrence, a priest and sometime a Black Friar, having been degraded and condemned by Edmund Bonner, Bishop of London, was burned March 29, 1555; Richard Chamberlain suffered June 14, 1555; Christopher Lyster, John Mace, John Spencer, Simon Joyne, Richard Nichols, and John Hamond, were burned alive for the testimony of the Gospel, April 28, 1556; W. Bongeor, W. Purcas, Thomas Benold, Agnes Silverside, Helen Ewring, and Elizabeth Folkes, were burned outside the town wall, August 2, 1557; and William Munt, John Johnson, Alice Munt, and Rose Allen, the same day, suffered in like manner in the Castle Bailey; Margaret Thurston and Agnes Bongeor were burned alive September 17, 1557; William Harries, Richard Day, and Christina George, suffered martyrdom by fire, May 26, 1558, for the defence and testimony of Christ's Gospel. And also in memory of John Thurston and others, who died in Colchester Castle and other prisons of this town, being 'Constant Confessors of Jesus Christ.' 'They loved not their lives unto the death.' (Rev. vi. 9, 11; Rev. iii. 11.) Erected by voluntary contributions. 1843." On the upper part of the tablet will be sculptured an open Bible, surmounted by the martyr's crown, and palm branches on each side. At the bottom will be placed the arms of the borough.

Father Mathew has returned to Ireland. At Norwich he was rather uncourteously treated, but Dr. Stanley, the Bishop of the Diocese, addressed the Rev. gentleman thus at a public meeting:—"And now, reverend sir (turning to Father Mathew, who rose from his seat), you, my friend from another island, I meet not here as a priest of the Roman Catholic church; for I will candidly say I am hostile to it. But I meet you here in a nobler and more comprehensive character than that of the priest; I meet you here, like myself, a Christian brother; I meet you upon neutral ground, where Christians of all denominations meet and delight to visit and to congregate together. Sir, I have watched your proceedings for many and many a year. You may remember many years ago that I censured you in public—nay, more, may I not add, abused you? I believed those public reports that were spread concerning you; and I scarcely know how to allude to them in their malignity, falsehood, and misrepresentation; nevertheless I believed in them. Yet I thought it but fair, as a candid man, to appeal to you as a gentleman, a Christian, and a man of honour, and to tell you how the case stood. Sir, you answered me in a manner which did you credit, and I turned over a new leaf; I abused you no more, and I am now your friend. I am not one of those who will not believe a Catholic upon his oath. I act more cautiously. I believed you upon your candid and honest affirmation, and I am satisfied that you did not deceive me." Father Mathew said, "I cannot command words to give expression to what I feel,—thankfulness to the Great Bestower of all good for the scene witnessed to-night, and then joy and pleasure at hearing the great cause in which all the feelings of my heart are concentrated, so ably and nobly vindicated by the illustrious bishop. I grieve that he has suffered so much on my account, and on account of this great cause; but in spite of suffering still greater obloquy, high influences compel him—his own conscience—his benevolent heart, and that great and good God who will bestow on him a reward far superior to all human approbation. He had already conferred upon me a heavy weight of obligation; he had extended over me his protecting shield at a time when I was nearly oppressed by prejudice and malevolence. But I may not presume to praise the learned, eloquent, good, and pious Lord Bishop of Norwich. It would be presumptuous in me to say that he thanks you for the kindness with which you have received me. That would, perhaps, be arrogating an honour not intended for me, but for the great work which the Lord has blessed so wonderfully; for in all sincerity I say, that I consider myself worthy of nothing. In my most sanguine moments, in my wildest dreams of the success of this great cause, I never anticipated what my eyes have seen and my ears have heard this night. I consider myself but as an unworthy instrument in the hands of the Almighty, who selects what instruments he pleases, and who declares that he chooses the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and the weak things thereof to confound the proud."

Not a little ignorance is prevalent, even among the new Seceders themselves, in regard to the financial condition of the Free Church. The following extract from a speech of Dr. Chalmers, recently delivered in Dundee, exhibits with very great clearness the actually available resources of the new body, and throws light on various statements which, from time to time, have appeared in the newspapers, of the wealth which was flowing in upon it :—

"The subjects on which he (Dr. Chalmers) intended to address them were the sustentation and building funds. There were various local funds which went to make up the general fund, which was established in Edinburgh. The various local bodies thought [illegible] central fund inexhaustible. 300,000*l.* sounds [illegible]ificently ; but in summing up this, all the contributions which had been obtained by the various local associations had been taken into account, as well as the slates and wood provided by the Marquis of Breadalbane, the free labour of the noble-hearted peasantry, and the aid derived from the farmers, in driving the materials for the churches throughout the country. He had been told by the party who was building the church in Fettercairn, that had it not been for the aid obtained from the farmers, his estimate would have been doubled. He believed the farmers [ha]d contributed fully one-half. There was 160,000*l.* [of] subscriptions entered in their books, a great deal of which was never sent to Edinburgh ; and taking into account this sum, along with the amount of free labour and all other sources, he might safely say they had as good as 300,000*l.* It was, however, a delusion to measure the capacity of the committee to grant aid in building churches from this sum. In the central treasury there was 55,000*l.*, and even of this there was 15,000*l.* belonging to the sustentation fund, leaving 40,000*l.*, and to part of this there were several conditions annexed. Everything sent to the central fund should be free and not hampered. If money was required for local objects, let it be reserved for that purpose, and let them send as much as they could to the general fund to be applied as the committee might consider most advisable. Of the 40,000*l.* there was 10,000*l.* burdened in this manner, part to be remitted to one place and part to another ; so that all that remained at the command of the committee was 30,000*l.* with which to aid their poorer congregations. The committee had resolved on only granting the sum of 5*s.* for each sitting ; so that, allotting an average number of sittings for each church, they would be only able to aid in the erection of about 200 places of worship. They had the prospect of 800 churches being erected in two or three years ; as, although only 470 ministers had left the Establishment, 800 congregations were in course of connection with the Free Church. They would, therefore, see the necessity of doing as much as they could for themselves, and also endeavour to extend their aid to some 500 or 600 congregations, in order that all the religious necessities of the inhabitants of Scotland might be provided for."

The committee of the Stoddart and Conolly Fund have had an interview with Lord Aberdeen, at the Foreign Office, when his lordship kindly offered to render every assistance in his power to Dr. Wolff, for the purpose of prosecuting his researches for obtaining information as to the fact of Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly ; His lordship stated that the mission of Dr. Wolff would not in any way interfere with the instructions he had already given to Col. Shiel.

Capt. Harris, who went out as ambassador from this country to the Court of Shoa, in Southern Abyssinia, for the purpose of concluding a treaty of commerce with the King, and who was presented to Her Majesty, at Buckingham Palace, upon his return to England, in the Oriental, brought as presents to the Queen and the Prince of Wales, a quantity of rare and valuable articles, and amongst them a jet-black mule, of the most exquisite symmetry, taken from the stud of the King of Shoa, and presented in his Majesty's name, to the Heir-Apparent to the British throne. The trappings of this beautiful animal consist of a saddle-cloth of a peculiar form and exquisite workmanship, upon which is elaborately emblazoned the Ethiopian lion, an extraordinarily shaped Abyssinian saddle, with breast-plate and head-stall en suite are of the most gorgeous and magnificent description. The other presents consist of a crown worn by the former Queen of Shoa, various shields, covered with numerous warlike devices, composed of gold and silver, and precious stones, [illegible], gauntlets, cloaks and robes, made of the skins of Ethiopian wild animals, armlets of solid silver, numerous distinctive badges of honour, such as ivory [illegible], silver falchions, or crooked swords, curious specimens of armour, several baskets made of grass and beads, and somewhat rude in their construction, filled with aromatic herbs, &c. A brilliantly illuminated letter to Her Majesty, in Arabic, in which the King of Shoa expresses the highest respect and esteem for "the Queen of the greatest nation under the Sun," accompanied the presents.

The Chairman, Deputy-Chairman, and several Directors of the East India Company, lately inspected the iron steamer Loodhiana, at Liverpool—a most uncommon-looking steam vessel, with two chimneys, and very much resembling a large Indian canoe. She was built by Mr. Laird, of North Birkenhead, for the Hon. East Company, and is intended for the navigation of the Indian rivers. Her length is 160 feet, and her beam 24 feet. She has a pair of 45-horse engines, by George Forrester and Co. ; and such is her length, width, and flatness, that her draught of water—with her engines, coal, and all stores on board—will be only 1 foot 10½ inches ! Her speed by log has been found to be 11½ knots an hour. With two loaded flats, she went at from 9 to 9½ knots. Her powers of speed, steaming, and steering were tried in presence of the deputation ; and after a trip to Runcorn and back, and a run to the Rock Light-house, they went ashore, it is reported, expressing themselves highly satisfied with her performances in all points. Her steering and turning are most remarkable. When going straight she scarcely requires the helm to be moved, and she will turn in her own length. She is entirely on a new construction, unlike anything that has yet been built ; and, from her success, will probably give rise to a new era in the shape of river craft, and lead to important improvements and practical discoveries in what may be termed surface-sailing. She has a rudder at her bow as well as aft. The engines will be taken out, and the hull separated in pieces, so that she may be sent to India by ship.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Major-Gen. Sir. C. F. Smith, and Col. R. England, to be Knights Commanders of the Bath.

Her Majesty has also been pleased to appoint Lieut. Cols. G. Browne and J. Simmons, 41st Regt. ; Majors A. P. S. Wilkinson and H. Wade, 13th Regt. ; and Major G. Hogarth, 26th Regt., to be Companions of the said Most Hon. Military Order.

The Queen has further been pleased to appoint Lieut. Col. Geo. Huish, 26th Regt. of Bengal Native Infantry, in the service of the East India Company, to be a Companion of the aforesaid Most Hon. Military Order of the Bath.

Lieut. Gunthorpe, of the Madras Artillery, has been appointed Orderly Officer at the Military Seminary, Addiscombe, to replace Lieut. Rees.

ALDERMAN SIR MATTHEW WOOD, BART., M. P., was the son of a tradesman who resided at Tiverton, in Devonshire, and began life as a commercial traveller. He subsequently became a partner in the business of a wholesale druggist, and afterwards engaged extensively in mining speculations. He was twice Lord Mayor of London, and represented the City in nine successive Parliaments. In his political opinions, Sir Matthew was a Reformer, in favour of the most unlimited free trade, the vote by ballot, and a repeal of the assessed taxes. He supported almost all the measures proposed by the Governments of Lord Grey and Lord Melbourne, uniformly opposing those of Lord Liverpool, the Duke of Wellington, and Sir R. Peel. He was a man who attended his parliamentary duties with considerable regularity, and occasionally took part in discussions relating to matters connected with the city of London, as well as in those relating to subjects of a more general interest. In the excitement occasioned by the charges brought against Queen Caroline, Alderman Wood largely participated. He felt the utmost indignation at the treatment which she had experienced. It being understood that the Queen was on her way to England, Alderman Wood went to St. Omer to meet her, and conducted her, amongst the plaudits of multitudes, to his own residence, at which for some time she took up her abode. Lords Brougham and Denman were the Attorney and Solicitor-General of this unfortunate Princess ; but Alderman Wood formed part of what might be considered her council, and in some smaller matters she was occasionally governed by his advice ; in reference to which Mr. (now Lord) Brougham once said, in the House of Commons, that her Majesty had not been in those instances "guided by the dictates of absolute wisdom," an observation which excited some merriment, and which had the effect of affixing for some years upon Alderman Wood the sobriquet of "Absolute Wisdom," for he it was who had been suspected of giving that advice to Queen Caroline at which, in his usual way, Lord Brougham thought proper to sneer. It must be fresh in the recollection of the public that the late James Wood, of Gloucester, the well-known miser, made a will, which gave rise to much litigation, in which Sir M. Wood was a party deeply interested. How far the anxieties consequent upon so important a suit may have injured a constitution already borne down by the weight of years, it is not now very material to inquire ; Sir Matthew is no more, and his eldest son, the Rev. Sir J. Page Wood, has succeeded to the title. The present baronet was born in the year 1796, and married a daughter of Admiral Mitchell, of the Portuguese service. He holds the rectory of St. Peter, Cornhill, and the vicarage of Cressing, Essex.—London Mail, October 6.

23d November, 1843.

Parties availing themselves of leave of absence granted under the Rules in force, are required, when submitting separate Pay Bills for audit, as is occasionally done, to forward all their Certificates, stating distinctly the dates of quitting and resuming their respective Offices, or if their Pay and Allowances are incorporated in the General Abstracts of the Office, the Officer in charge will be careful to do so. At present, for want of a rule of practice on this head, the Civil Auditor is too frequently left to gather the facts incidentally, and much delay and tedious references are thereby entailed before the Bills can be properly checked.

W. H. BELLI, Offg. Civil Auditor.

30th October, 1843.

Application for Copies of the Work to be made to Mr. HUTTMANN, Superintendent Military Orphan Press, Calcutta.

November 6th, 1843.

A LADY, the widow of a medical officer well known in the Bengal Service, residing in Regent's Park, London, wishes to receive three or four little girls from India to educate with her own two Daughters, for whom she has a very highly accomplished governess, any children committed to her care would in every respect be treated as her own family, and share the same advantages both in their moral as well as mental cultivation.

For terms and references apply to Messrs. Colvin, Ainslie, Cowie and Co., Calcutta.

MR. THOMAS LUXMOORE WILSON, Solicitor and Conveyancer, No. 42, Bedford Row, Red Lion Square, London, begs to offer his services as Law Agent to the profession and to Residents in India, generally, for the conduct of any legal proceedings in Great Britain in which they may be interested. Mr. Wilson's connections with India and with Indian Authorities in England, with Dr. Horace Hayman Wilson in particular, give him peculiar advantages, which he engages to employ for the benefit of those who may honour him with their confidence. Reference may be made to Messrs. Colvin, Ainslie, Cowie and Co.

EDUCATION.

CLAPHAM PARK ACADEMY NEAR LONDON.

IN this establishment a liberal education, in all its branches, is combined with an assiduous Intellectual Training, an ever watchful Moral oversight, Religious culture and the treatment of a Home.

The premises have been recently erected for the purpose, and combine advantages of no ordinary character, conducive alike to health, cheerfulness, and the formation of habits of good order; and the situation, for its salubrity, pleasantness and highly select character, is second to none in the environs of London. Mr. Long aims in all his arrangements and in his whole system of instruction, to extend to his pupils the full benefit of his own experience in teaching during more than twenty years, and to form the character through the instrumentality of his and Mrs. Long's personal attention and influence, and the steady application, by himself and assistants of a discipline equally mild and effective.

Mr. Long has pleasure in referring to the following Gentlemen, to whom he is well known: The Rev. E. Crisp, Bangalore; Rev. G. Mundy, Chinsurah; Rev. A. Lacroix, Calcutta; Rev. M. Hill, Berhampore; Rev. W. Morton, Calcutta; Rev. E. Porter, Vizagapatam; Rev. W. Porter, Madras; also to the Rev. James Hill, Clapham, Surrey, late of Calcutta.

The mildly bracing air of Clapham Park, and the superior accommodations of the house, including warm and cold bathing, are particularly adapted to the reception of pupils from warm climates.—Further particulars may be had of the Rev. E. Porter, Vizagapatam, and the Rev. W. Porter, Madras.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

A LADY of high respectability and accomplishments, residing in a healthy part of the Coast of Kent, wishes to receive four Girls to board and educate with the advantage of living in a private family. The Lady is a mother, and having been for some years in India is well acquainted with the treatment for young persons of delicate constitutions. If desired too, she would have no objection to take charge of one or two little Boys up to 7 or 8 years old, in any case where parents were unwilling to separate brothers and sisters. The terms will be moderate varying according to the age of the pupil, but always for a specific sum annually, including extra charges of every description.

Cards of address, and other particulars will be given by the undersigned, and parties writing Home may communicate with Messrs. J. Cockburn and Co., No. 11, New Broad-street, London.

THE PRESENT STATE OF CALCUTTA.—The funds devoted by Government to the lighting and watering of Calcutta, and the repair of its roads, have run short, by about 12,000 Rupees a year, or 100 Pounds Sterling a month; and for want of this small sum the City of Palaces is enveloped in a cloud of dust. The Magistrates have met to consider the means of relief; but no plan has been adopted, and the dust becomes every day more dense and insufferable. Some have proposed to pare down the allowances of the municipal officers; and two of the Magistrates have gone up to Government with a suggestion—rejected by the other moiety of the bench—to raise the House tax from five, to six and a half per cent.

We are happy to hear that the proposal has been at once rejected by the Governor of Bengal. We hope all such unworthy expedients will be rejected with equal promptitude. The expense should be thrown upon the general revenues of the country. It is time for Government to take a liberal and comprehensive view of its duty towards a city, for which private individuals have done so much, and the public authorities comparatively so little. It is a shame that this noble city, the most magnificent in Asia, the capital of British India, the metropolis of an Empire of Ninety millions, the admiration of all foreigners, should be treated with such niggardly neglect by our rulers. It is to our disgrace, that not only are all schemes of improvement discountenanced, which will 'cost money', but that provision is not made even for the indispensible comfort of watered roads. One might have thought that the British Government, after having created so mighty an empire in the East, would have felt some degree of national pride in adorning the capital of its power. All other sovereigns, in all other ages, have done so. Had the country been held with equal security and firmness for so long a period, even by the Mahomedans, whom we deem barbarous, they would not have hesitated for two months to lay out a thousand Rupees monthly in allaying the dust, and rendering their imperial residence tolerable. Assuredly they would have made improvements, corresponding in some measure with the greatness of the Empire and the majesty of the Government. The Romans adorned even their Provincial Capitals, with a degree of splendor, of which the remains surprise mankind after the lapse of eighteen centuries. Had it fallen to the lot of Napoleon, to have realized his desire of establishing an empire in the East, with how much zeal and energy would he not have urged on the improvement of his metropolis. Even Russia, barbarian Russia, if India had been reckoned among the provinces of its empire, would have spared no funds and no labour to render its metropolis a miniature of the noble capital it has raised on the banks of the Neva. It is only England that hesitates to devote a fraction of the general revenues of the empire, to the object of increasing the conveniences and augmenting the beauty of its metropolis. The old spirit of the counting house, which regarded a good Export and Import Warehouse as the most important and ornamental of all buildings, still seems to cling to the imperial Government, even after it has shed its commercial skin; and the funds required for public improvements, are doled out with the thrifty parsimony of a pedlar.

If the municipal wants of the town constituted any demand on the treasury of the mother country, we could account for the hesitation of the public authorities. But we want no aid from home. In our connection with England, it is we who are the givers, and it is she who is the recipient. We require only a generous and judicious distribution of the revenues of the country itself, on objects which shall promote the convenience of the public, and redound to the credit of Government. But the country is in debt! What then; are there to be no public improvements till the public debt is extinct? If so, we must wait till our trust in India has been transferred to some other potentate; for, if we are to judge from the experience of the last eighty years, this Government will always be in debt to the last chapter of its history. But this debt interferes with no outlay, which the partialities, the whims, and even the follies of our rulers may require. It was only by the last Mail we were informed that an egregious blunder in legislation, sanctioned by the wisdom of Parliament, had cost this country twelve lakhs of Rupees, in ten years. Then, we have spent some nine lakhs of Rupees in a Legislative Member of Council, whose office it is now proposed to abolish as redundant; and we have paid about twenty-two lakhs of Rupees to a Law Commission, of which Government has made little practical use, and which Parliament will probably extinguish in the next session. We have spent lakhs in building new barracks which the next administration will in all probability abandon, and lakhs on lakhs in military pageantries, which have contributed nothing to the strength of the Empire.

All these fantasies and experiments we have not hesitated, to feed at the expense of the country, even when its exchequer was burdened with debt, without one twinge of conscience. But when the solid improvement of the metropolis, and the increase of its salubrity, by the opening of new roads, and the formation of squares to dispel malaria were in question, Government could only lend the funds to the Municipal Committee, and take in pledge the annual profits of two state lotteries, till the loan was repaid. And those lotteries were kept up year by year, after their demoralizing effects were fully demonstrated, for the mere purpose of getting back the sums which had been laid out in the metropolis; thus making the encouragement of vice the only means for improving the health and appearance of the city. It may appear ungrateful, after Mr. Bird has so nobly abolished lotteries, to revert to the misdeeds of those who preceded him in the Government; but the retrospect, however painful, is necessary to shew that the Government of India, letting alone the Affghan and Burmese wars, has incurred no small amount of blame by its lavishness when fancies and whims [illegible] to be indulged, and its half-heartedness when local improvements were required.

We need the spirit to improve the Metropolis of British India. We want a generous and noble spirit worthy of men who rule ninety millions of subjects, and dispense a revenue of twenty crores of Rupees. It would be a small matter for Government to confine its views to the present exigency, and allay the dust by an order on the Sub-Treasurer for 1000, or 1100 Rupees a month. The metropolis requires many improvements, for which due and adequate provision should be made. Let Government at once come forward, and consecrate one or two lakhs of Rupees annually to the use of the city, so that there may be no year without progressive improvement. Why not at once surrender the tax on spirituous liquors in the city for municipal purposes; and, if the amount be not sufficient, it will be time to go up and tap the Treasury.

THE STEAM MEETING of the inhabitants of Calcutta was held on Monday afternoon, when a Memorial to the Lords of the Treasury, the President of the Board of Control and to the Court of Directors was agreed to, which will be found among our selections. The unanimity of feeling manifested at this meeting, of all classes of society, to the number of four hundred, cannot fail to do good. It will give to the members of Government at home, a convincing proof of the deep, and general feeling which exists at this Presidency on the subject, and serve to recal public attention to the importance of securing the patronage of the State to that plan which shall combine the interests of all the Presidencies. We are happy to find that no allusion is made in the Memorial to that breach of faith, which is involved in taking off the present steamers from the Comprehensive line, and placing them on the Bombay line of communication. It simply points out with great force and clearness, the fact that this comprehensive line of intercourse, is that alone which can give to Calcutta, and Madras and Ceylon the full benefit of Steam communication. This fact which was heretofore problematical has been incontrovertibly established by the voyages of the Hindoostan. With this evidence before them, nothing but an obliquity of vision or a perverse partiality for one Presidency, can induce the Company, or Her Majesty's Ministers, to confine their view to the Western Port.

It is of course manifest, that the assistance of Government, is indispensably necessary to the maintenance of a monthly Steam communication, with all the ports, or even with one port, in India. That assistance the people of England are most willing to bestow, in order to secure the inestimable blessing of a regular intercourse with the vast seats of commerce in the East. That assistance the Court of Directors are at this present time giving to the undertaking. The sum devoted to the promotion of Steam Navigation from the revenues of India,—from the revenues of the Bengal Presidency we might say,—is one lakh of Rupees a month;

viz. 100,000*l.* a year expended on the Bombay Steam navy, and 20,000*l.* given as a bonus to the Peninsular Company. We are not therefore asking for any new and startling outlay. We merely solicit that this sum may be so judiciously expended as to produce the largest possible advantage, in an equal degree, to all the Presidencies. Less than this sum would we believe be a sufficient encouragement to this Company, to establish a monthly communication direct to the three ports of Bombay, Madras and Calcutta. The time has arrived when the existing arrangements must be revised. The Bombay Steamers are unequal to the task, and are becoming more and more inefficient the older they grow. Government must either build new and larger vessels, or make terms with the Peninsular Company. Now therefore is the time for adopting a comprehensive scheme, which so far from interfering with the advantages enjoyed by Bombay shall improve them, and confer the same advantages on the other Presidencies. It is a fortunate circumstance, that, just at this important juncture, Government will have the benefit of that practical knowledge which is afforded by the successful voyages made by the Hindoostan. There can therefore be no excuse for adopting narrow views and unworthy prejudices, detrimental to the public character of those who embrace them, and injurious to the general interests of the Empire.

CHINA.—During the past week, we have received from China, an abstract of the Supplementary Treaty between their Majesties the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Emperor of China, consisting of seventeen Articles. The more important provisions of this Treaty are, that no British Merchant ships shall resort to any other Port in China, except the five ports named in the first Treaty, and that any infringement of the rule shall be visited by the seizure and confiscation of the vessel and cargo. Art. VI. provides that English merchants residing at the five ports, shall not wander away into the country, or go beyond certain limits fixed by the Chinese Authorities and the Consuls; and that any one who may contravene this order, shall be delivered over to the British Consul for punishment. The next Article permits English merchants, who may be residing at these ports, to buy and rent ground and houses at a fair valuation. Art. IX. provides for the mutual surrender of criminals who may escape, from the Chinese territories into Hong Kong; or from our own settlement and ships into the interior of the country.

The Eighth Article stipulates that all foreign nations, whose subjects or citizens have hitherto traded at Canton, shall be admitted to the five ports of Canton, Fu-choo-foo, Amoy, Ningpo, and Shang-hai, on the same terms as the English. According to European notions, such a provision is out of place in a Treaty with the British Crown, but the Chinese evidently considered the English as the representatives of the European family, and were anxious to embrace the opportunity of this Supplementary Treaty, to make known the footing on which the merchants of other powers would be permitted to trade in China. The Chinese authorities soon became aware, that foreign nations would not fail to besiege the Cabinet for the same privileges which had been conceded to the English, and would probably proceed so far as to send an Embassy to the Capital. They have therefore acted discreetly in thus anticipating their negotiations requests, and rendering any personal application at Pekin, which could not have been refused without risk, or permitted without humiliation, altogether superfluous.

The Opium question, the original cause of the war, remains in statu quo. It is not so much as hinted at. That word of ill omen appears to have been most carefully excluded from these Treaties of perpetual peace and friendship. This article continues to be regarded as contraband by the Chinese laws; and any attempt to introduce it, will be viewed as an act of smuggling, and punished accordingly. The English Government has engaged to prevent the admission of the drug into the five ports, and the Consuls are required to apprize the Chinese authorities of any such smuggling transaction, which may come to their knowledge, in order that the goods may be confiscated. The Chinese Government undertakes to exclude the drug from all other ports. Yet the Government of India will not probably diminish the manufacture of the article by a single chest, or the Chinese relinquish the use of it. This exclusion of Opium from Hong Kong, and from the five Ports which have been opened to our commerce, is all that could be expected of our Government. The consumption of the drug in the Empire will now depend on the success with which the Opium smugglers, backed by the wishes of the people, may baffle the vigilance, or corrupt the integrity of the Chinese preventive service. Yet it is a very anomalous position for any government to take up. In India, the British Authorities are engaged in raising the drug by means of public funds, expressly for the Chinese market; in China the British Authorities will not allow it to be landed in the only Settlement we possess, and have directed it to be rigidly excluded from the ports to which our trade is confined; and the Consuls are bound to make known to the Chinese authorities, with the view of its being confiscated, any cargo of that same Opium, which the servants of the same Crown have raised for that specific object. Although the Chinese authorities appear to have entered upon the arrangement of the Treaty with a feeling of sincerity, and even cordiality, which does them infinite credit, yet it is to be feared that the guilty enterprizes of the Opium smugglers will at no distant period interrupt that lasting peace and friendship which the Emperor appears so anxious to cement. The least that our Government can do to counteract the evil is to forbid the arming of the Opium vessels, a measure which the Englishman has repeatedly and very forcibly advised. While we have vessels of war in every port for the protection of commerce, there can be no legitimate occasion for trading vessels to be armed with cannon; there can indeed be no reason for it, but one which it would be shameful to avow, and which would impose on Government the imperious necessity of preventing it. If they are permitted thus to be armed, there will be bloody conflicts with the Chinese preventive service, and mistrust will be sown in the minds of the Chinese authorities, which will inevitably ripen into feelings of hostility.

LOTTERIES.—The present state of the Lottery Question is any thing but intelligible. At the beginning of this year, Mr. Bird, the Governor of Bengal, took on himself the responsibility of suspending the State Lottery, pending a reference to the Court of Directors without whose sanction no final blow could be given to it. His Honour was induced to take this wise step from a consideration of the extensive mischief inflicted on society by the Minor Lotteries, which were established in connection with the great Lotteries of Government, and which diffused a spirit of gambling through the community. He attacked the evil at its source, and the state lottery expired at once, together with all the little sucklings which it had been nourishing. But it was felt at the time, both by Government and the community, that unless an Act was passed making Lotteries criminal, private lotteries would spring up, in fearful abundance, that temptations to gambling would still continue to be held out, perhaps with increasing vigor; and that the only change produced by Mr. Bird's judicious Act, if it were not followed up by a stringent law, would be that a dozen fraudulent schemes would be substituted for the honest—if the word be not misplaced—scheme of the State Lotteries. These fears have been more than realized. The projects which the Hurkaru, the Englishman and the Exchange Gazette have been advertising for the last five months,—though without any approval whatever on the part of the Editors,—appear to have been for the most part based on deceit. The Star, which seems to have a special vocation for ferreting out these nuisances, has repeatedly denounced the impositions practised on the public by the projectors. These magnificent schemes have been ushered into notice, under the "auspices and patronage of the most respectable Agency and Commercial Houses in Calcutta," not one of the names of which, however, has ever been given. The drawings have been duly notified to the public; even the numbers of the tickets which had come up as prizes have been given with the same formalities, as those of the extinct State Lotteries; but, strange to say, none of the valuable prizes have ever fallen to the lot of residents in Calcutta. They have come up invariably for the benefit of individuals living a thousand miles off, some of whom appear never to have heard of their good fortune, simply we suppose because they never had any existence, except in the newspapers. In an evil hour, however, General Fast, who is an actual living personage, was announced as the fortunate holder of a prize of 50,000 Rupees, and he is understood to have directed an action to be brought against the Projectors for the recovery of the sum, the immediate result of which has been we believe to quash the drawing of the next Lottery of Five lakhs and ninety thousand Rupees, which is advertized to take place on the 2d and 3d of January at the Exchange Rooms.

A very enterprizing firm of the name of Robertson and Co., whose existence however is very problematical, has been advertizing a Lottery of One lakh of Rupees in the Singapore papers, and [illegible]ve also in those of China,—any where ho[illegible] but in Calcutta. This Lottery also is to be drawn at the Exchange Rooms, and the projectors have even had the audacity to name the Union Bank as their Treasurer. We believe the Bank and the Proprietors of the Exchange Rooms are equally innocent of any connection with these gamblers.

There is also another Lottery scheme, the scene of which is laid in Calcutta, though the projectors have not sent their advertisements to either the Hurkaru or the Englishman. The Proprietors are Johnson, Brothers and Co. of Calcutta, and their advertisements appear in the Singapore, and, we think, also in the Madras papers. There are to be 1,000 prizes to 2,000 blanks; the capital embarked is said to be 1,87,650 Rupees; and the worthy projectors are so moderate as to content themselves with a profit of four per cent. The Trustees are Messrs. Ewart, Brown and Co. and their office is at 65, Durrumtollah Road, where the two drawings will take place under the superintendence of "disinterested and respectable gentlemen." This firm is a firm of straw, and No. 65 is an empty house.

But the contagion of this gambling spirit is not confined to men in European habits and society, or even to this Presidency. The mania is spreading rapidly from the capital to the provinces. The last number of the Bombay Times informs us, in a letter from a correspondent, that certain speculators at Poonah have got up a lottery, which they are forcing into public notice. The profit to the projectors is fixed at a moderate sum, but past experience teaches us, that those schemes are most to be suspected of fraud, in which the conduct of the proprietors is apparently most disinterested. Another lottery has been set up at Ahmednuggur, under the Bombay Presidency, in which the projectors have reserved 20 per cent. to themselves! "I think it should be the duty," says the Correspondent of the Times, "of every man possessing the least spark of philanthropic feeling, to shew an unequivocal hatred of lotteries by steadfastly discontinuing to patronize them." But we think it the imperative duty of the Court of Directors, at once to give their public and cordial sanction to the abolition of all State Lotteries for ever, and at the same time to lay their commands on the Legislative Council to frame a law prohibiting all private lotteries, throughout the dominions entrusted to the Government of the Company. Why such instructions have not been issued from Leadenhall Street earlier, it is difficult to divine. So long as the lotteries yielded any profit to the State it was easy to understand the reluctance of the Honourable Court to extinguish them. But they are now a nuisance to the community, without being profitable to Government; and the delay in prohibiting them is anomalous. Surely it cannot be because the Court intends to re-establish them, with a view to meet the inadequacy of municipal funds. It cannot be that they have encountered any opposition from the Earl of Ripon, the President of the Board of Control. It was during his incumbency as Chancellor of the Exchequer, that England was for the first time delivered from the curse of State Lotteries, and Lotteries themselves were rendered illegal. His Lordship cannot begrudge to India the blessing he conferred on England. We hope the Local Authorities will not fail to bring to the notice of the Court, the steady progress which the spirit of gambling is making through the country, and the increasing audacity of the frauds which mark each successive project, and to importune them for permission to check the evil at once by a legislative enactment.

REVIVAL OF CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.—The Draft of an Act, for the adoption of corporal punishment in certain cases of theft, more especially of children, was published in the last Official Gazette. Government has thought it expedient to abrogate, to a certain extent, one of those laws by which the administration of Lord William Bentinck was distinguished, but which has been the object of incessant vituperation by a large body of the public servants ever since. We think the experience of the last ten years proves, that the sudden and entire abrogation of corporal chastisement, in a country in which it has been in vogue for many centuries, was in some degree a premature measure; inasmuch as we were unable to substitute any other punishment, which was likely to prove efficacious by the terror it inspired. The truth of the assertion in Lord William Bentinck's Regulation, however, has not been in the smallest degree weakened, that "the punishment of stripes is degrading to the individual, and by affixing marks of infamy which are often for ever indelible, prevents his return to an honest course of life." Corporal punishment can by no effort of sophistry or ridicule be relieved from the odium of doing the culprit an irreparable injury, by making him a "marked man" for the rest of his life, and rendering his return to virtue next to impossible. And when we reflect that this punishment may often be inflicted for a first and almost venial offence, on insufficient or doubtful evidence, in a moment of passion, it ought not to be resorted to but for the gravest and most weighty reasons. Lord William Bentinck himself appears to have thought, when he refused to abolish it among the English troops, that there were circumstances in which the infliction of it was necessary. And, we are reluctantly brought to the conviction, that the circumstances of the country and the Government, combined with the habits and feelings of the people, do appear to point out the necessity of again having recourse to it in India. In the last ten years, the improvements in prison discipline, in prospect of which it was abolished, have not been effected. A lodging in a prison, where "their bread is given and their water is sure," where they have in general a more comfortable residence, has no terrors for offenders. It does not deter them from crime, and therefore to make this the only punishment for theft is to expose property to constant spoliation, and inflict grievous injury on society. As a general rule, therefore, under existing circumstances, the use of the rattan is perhaps the less of two evils. The experiment of substituting other punishments for it has not succeeded in giving security to property; and, unless some better means of correction than we now possess can be brought into operation, recourse must be had to this most objectionable form of punishment. We are speaking of course of delinquents of full age. The school discipline which the Magistrates are now required to inflict on juvenile offenders, instead of exposing them to the contamination of a jail, will of course meet with general approbation.

There are however some considerations which ought not to be altogether overlooked. This corporal chastisement is now revived, evidently under the impression, and a very correct one, that it is the only punishment which is likely to deter from the commission of crime; that it is in short, the heaviest punishment the public authorities can inflict. This idea is necessarily implied in the present adoption of it. It seems singular therefore that the severest punishment, and that which is most dreaded by the natives, should not be inflicted for the heaviest crime, but reserved only for those of minor turpitude. Neither should we overlook the fact, that almost every other punishment which the Magistrate can inflict is open to an appeal to the higher authorities, and that the errors of a harsh or hasty judgment may be corrected by the mature consideration of older and more experienced officers; but, by this enactment, the order for inflicting the severest kind of punishment, and that which admits of no reduction, or remedy, is to be final. The sentences of fine and imprisonment passed by the Sessions Judge are liable to be reversed in appeal to the higher authorities, whereas the order of those, who occupy a very subordinate place in the administration, and one which by the course of circumstances, is frequently filled by youths just come to age, is irrevocable. These are anomalies which cannot escape observation.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—We have been favoured with a little pamphlet just published by Mr. H. G. Palmer, upon the state of the Indian Bazar weights and measures. The object of the writer is to shew that in almost every bazar and shop in Calcutta, pieces of stone, lumps of lead, and fragments of bricks are used in "lieu of weights denoting authenticated gravity or proportion;" that the uncertain weight of these substitutes affords an opening for fraud; and that the Natives, more especially the poorer classes, are thereby cheated by the shopkeepers to a very considerable amount. He alludes to the recent Act of Parliament, by which Superintendents are appointed in every district in England for the purpose of applying a more stringent system to the Act; and he cites numerous instances in which transgressors have been brought up before the Magistrates and fined for a breach of it. He proposes to introduce something of the same kind into Calcutta, to provide that all sets of weights used for the purpose of vending should be duly examined, adjusted, marked and licensed; that for these licenses the shopkeepers should pay at the rate of Eight annas a month, which would yield a revenue of nearly a lakh of Rupees; and that this fund should be applied to the improvement of the City.

It is highly desirable that just weights and measures should be universally employed; and it is certain, that the use of false weights entails a great loss on the purchaser, and more especially on the poorer classes of society. To this it has been replied in a very able article, which appeared some days since in the Englishman, that buyers are the best protectors of their own interests, and that although they may have no means of detecting fraudulent weights and measures, they are not slow in discovering at what shops they obtain the largest supplies for their money, and that the most honest dealers are sure in the long run to have the largest custom. This is true to a considerable extent; yet it is a fact, that notwithstanding the strength of this principle of self interest, dealers continue to be rogues and purchasers to be cheated; and that in our own land the public authorities consider it a part of their official duty to come to the aid of private interests, and to seek out and punish those who use deficient weights and measures. And in this country such provisions against fraud would be the more valuable, as the buyers being for the most part in debt to the shopkeepers, and purchasing the greater portion of their supplies on credit, are more particularly at their mercy.

But we have many doubts whether the proposed interference in the town and suburbs of Calcutta, would not be found more vexatious than useful, a source of greater oppression to the shopkeepers than of benefit to the public, or of revenue to the state. Mr. Palmer estimates the number of venders at 15,000. These men, if compelled to do so, would doubtless rather take out a license for the authenticated weights and measures than shut up their shops; but it is not certain that they would use these just weights in one case out of ten. When an independent buyer came to their counter, and paid down his copper or silver, the authenticated weights would be invariably produced; but there would be a very strong inducement to resort to the old and deficient weights, whenever they were required to deal out articles to any customer who was already in their debt—that is, to any poor man, whom the new arrangement is more particularly intended to benefit. These poor creatures would be the least likely to obtain substantial relief from it, for they would probably be met at once by an order to go to some other shop, if they were to demand the use of the fair weights; and Mr. Palmer's pamphlet tells us that the natives seldom complain.

It would be necessary to appoint officers to enforce the use of these weights; but an establishment adequate to a domiciliary visit once a week to 15,000 shops would absorb all the receipts; and a weekly visit would not ensure the daily, or hourly, or continual employment of the authenticated weights. The agency Mr. Palmer proposes to employ is altogether native, and the highest salary 32 Rs. a month, for which sum honesty is not be obtained in the Native market,—if indeed it can be obtained for any price. The officers of the department would inevitably misuse the power entrusted to them, and turn it into an engine of extortion. Much may be done in England, where there is an independent and spirited community, and a vigilant press, which is utterly impracticable in a country like this; and the shopkeepers would be sure to take the price of the license, and the hush money they paid the Native overseers, in some shape or other, out of their customers. We are sorry thus to throw cold water on a project which has so kind and benevolent an origin; but we think the projector on reconsidering it, in all its bearings, will feel satisfied that it will most probably produce more inconvenience than it remedies.

Instead of drawing the funds required for improving the salubrity and convenience of Calcutta from a municipal tax on shops, which must eventually fall on provisions, we would go up at once to Government and ask them to give whatever may be necessary, from the twenty millions raised in the country. Government might spare this sum without feeling its loss. Where there is a will, there is a way. It is only in the last Calcutta Gazette we find it announced that Col. Everest has resigned the service. Of course the Grand Trigonometrical Survey of India, which ought to have ceased years ago, is now completed, for the Surveyor General would not quit the country without finishing his work. We should think, if common report be true, that the extinction of this extravagant establishment would produce a saving of a lakh of Rupees a year. The substitution of whipping for imprisonment will doubtless produce a saving of another lakh or two, in the keep of rogues. In short to a well disposed and careful Government there can never be any lack of funds for the benefit of its own metropolis.

THE KHOONDS.—The Hurkaru has given a very elaborate reply to our observations on his last article relative to the Khoond children. He writes, of course as we did, on the strength of information from the spot. He cannot therefore expect us to admit the validity of the statements he has brought forward, before we have an opportunity of communication with those on whose authority we depended, and whose views of his explanation it is obviously necessary for us to receive. In this stage of the controversy, therefore, all that we can do is to examine the strength of his reasoning, and to enquire how far the admissions which have been made, bear upon the general imputation of neglect, which our correspondent brings against the local authorities. Our observations will therefore be very brief.

The Hurkaru dwells much on the mistake which our informant is said to have made, when he stated that the Memorial had not been forwarded to the Government of Madras, but was still in the Agent's office. We are willing to concede to his argument all the benefit which such an error can afford it. It appears that the Agent, not having power to comply with this request, forwarded it to the Judge, in whose office it has remained ever since. On turning to Capt. Macpherson's Report on the Khoonds, however, we find that it was addressed directly to the Secretary to Government at Madras. It is just possible that the Government at that Presidency may have directed that all subsequent communications should be submitted through the Judge. But even in this case the Hurkaru will excuse our remarking that when the Agent found that, from whatever cause, a Memorial of considerable importance, which referred to the temporal and spiritual welfare of the children whom he was especially appointed to rescue, had been detained for many months at the station, there were many ways in which it might have been brought to the notice of the public authorities at Madras. If the Agent thought the proposal of the Missionaries to educate the children in the truths and doctrines of Christianity of any importance, it would have been no stretch of presumption for him to have forwarded a copy of the memorial direct to Madras.

The Hurkaru had stated that the Agent had no authority to comply with the request of the Missionaries to be allowed to undertake the education of the children; and then, to shew that the Agent was not indifferent to their welfare, affirmed that he had actually made over six children to them. We pointed out the manifest discrepancy of the two statements; which our contemporary endeavours to obviate by saying, that this disposal of the children was done by a stretch of authority. He should have said so in his first explanation. But it seems a very anomalous state of things, that the Agent should be at liberty to leave so large a number of the female victims in the hands of a Native Tuhseeldar, and yet should be unable without a "stretch of authority" to allow the Missionaries to receive and instruct them; and it behoves the Government of Madras to give its early consideration to this matter.

As it regards the contempt thrown by the Agent, on the offer of the Missionaries to educate the children, while at the same time he had placed himself in correspondence with the Rev. Dr. Duff, in reference to the same matter, the Hurkaru remarks, "We alluded to Capt. Macpherson's reference to Dr. Duff simply for the purpose of shewing that there can have been no inherent dislike in his mind to the plan of evangelizing the Khoond children, but that on the contrary there must have been a personal desire on the part of that officer to see the children reclaimed from their false faith—a desire which ill consorts with the systematic repulsion of Missionary efforts which has been alleged by the Agent." We think so too; and we have looked in vain for an explanation of this neglect of the means of evangelization which were at hand, by an individual who had their evangelization so much at heart as to enter into correspondence with a gentleman residing in another province.

The system of tuition to which we alluded, which is said to have failed in the hands of the Missionary, for which failure he was taunted by our contemporary, we were first informed of in his columns. His account is not very distinct; but we understand that two girls were to be married to two boys, but the Agent wished them to be made Christians before the knot was tied. He had them in his own house, and the Missionary was employed in the work of Christianizing them in which he did not succeed for several months. This is the strange kind of tuition we alluded to and there is no wonder it did not succeed.

We have only one word more to say on the subject at present. Our contemporary says we have not alluded to the "important point" of the object to which the Agent intended to apply the rescued females. "He has employed them as important agents for the suppression of female infanticide." We think this a most important object, and one on which too much attention cannot be bestowed, but the Hurkaru's information is evidently deficient, and his ideas are therefore any thing but clear on the subject. He tells us that the girls have been taught to spin, and that they are married, or to be married, to Khoonds who practise infanticide. We cannot see how their being simply taught to spin can qualify them for this important vocation; or how the mere circumstance of their being given in marriage among a tribe which practises infanticide, will of itself prevent their husbands murdering their children.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7.

— The requisition to the Sheriff for a Steam meeting to be held on Monday next, has between 1300 and 1400 signatures, a greater number than has, we believe, ever been affixed to any public requisition in Calcutta.

— Intelligence has been received from China to the 26th of October. The Supplementary Treaty has been ratified by the Emperor, and ordered to be carried into effect, without waiting for the signature of Queen Victoria. This token of confidence in British faith is very gratifying. It is pleasing to find that Major Pottinger, who left India under the capricious frown of the Governor General, has been nominated to convey the Treaty to Her Majesty. Thus the injustice to which he was subjected by the Head of the Government in India, has been in a great measure redressed, and the Hero of Herat and Chareekar, the individual to whose exertions at Bameean we are indebted for the liberation of the prisoners, one of the objects of the expedition to Cabul, will make his first appearance at the Court of England in association with the final treaty concluded by his illustrious uncle, with the Empire of China.

— A very destructive fire had broken out at the Factories of the Foreign merchants at Canton. Fifteen factories, and a large amount of property have been destroyed by this conflagration. It was altogether accidental. Plunder was restrained by the Chinese Police, and the Marines from the Dido British frigate. The populace offered no molestation or insult to the English, but pelted the lascars, whom they very cordially detest. By the Supplementary Treaty, Europeans are allowed to rent ground and houses, at the five ports to which they are allowed to resort; and, it is to be hoped, therefore, that their residence will no longer be limited to the small and disagreeable factories to which Chinese jealousy has, hitherto confined them.

— Last night's Calcutta Gazette contains the draft of an Act repealing Reg. 9, of 1808, which had become obsolete, from its extreme severity. This was the Act passed when dacoity was at its height in Bengal, which inflicted such extraordinary penalties on those who refused to surrender. It was under this Act that a Native was recently subjected to long transportation for not appearing when summoned, which punishment Mr. Bird wisely remitted.

— The Rev. Mr. Thomas has been appointed Assistant Chaplain to the garrison of Fort William. We believe this appointment is connected with an arrangement for giving two Chaplains to the Fort and St. James's, as there are already at the Cathedral and the Old Church.

— The Honourable the Court of Directors have sent out a despatch to "our Governor of the Presidency of Fort William in Bengal," informing him that Southampton had been made the port of arrival and departure of the Indian Mails sent by the Mediterranean, and directing that the "immediate and particular attention of your Post Master General be called to this alteration." It is much to be regretted that the Honourable Court did not see fit to announce with the same formalities a far more important alteration, the reduction of the French postage from 2*s*. 8*d*. to 1*s*. 8*d*. In that case our Post Master General would have been obliged to pay immediate and particular attention to it, instead of continuing to announce the old rate for months after it had been abolished. As the Post Master has now done with the Governor General's journey to the Upper Provinces, perhaps he will find leisure to publish the amended rate which has not yet appeared.

— The last letter from Gwalior is that which appeared in yesterday's Hurkaru, which would lead us to suppose that there may yet be some difficulty in the settlement of affairs in that territory. The writer says, that a feeling of hostility is beginning to grow up against our interference by those whom it will affect. "These British, say the troops, will come here and disband us, and leave their own troops to feed on the fat of the land. Why should we give up our hak rights." It is quite natural that the troops, whose very bread is at stake, should object to the process of starvation destined for them.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8.

— The accounts from Sukkur are still of the same melancholy character, and the troops are saved from annihilation only by the moderation or fears of the Belochees. Each Regiment has still 500 in hospital.

— The Honourable Caleb Cushing, the Envoy from the United States of America, to the Emperor of China, after having been most honourably and most hospitably treated at Bombay by the Government and the community, has embarked for the Celestial empire, where the Brother of the Sun and the Moon does not by any means wish to see him, and will contrive to evade a meeting by referring him to the 8th Article of the Supplementary Treaty with Great Britain, and sending him back to Washington.

— Capt. Engledue issued cards of invitation to the community to visit the Bentinck yesterday and to-day, and we are told that three hundred persons sat down to a substantial tiffin yesterday. We are happy that our humble advice has been followed, and we hope that the irritation produced by refusing the list of passengers, which might be very proper when demanded by a tradesman who wished to send a constable on board, but very injudicious when required by the fourth estate, will have completely vanished. The Star says, that Captain Engledue made some disparaging allusions to the press, and to public papers, which we hope will be found to originate only in the proverbial incorrectness of Calcutta reporting.

— The Englishman says there was a report yesterday of an outbreak in Nepal. We have heard of no other outbreak than one of regret at Mr. Hodgson's approaching departure. The Dut-bar was loading him with tokens of their esteem and gratitude.

— The Star says, that final arrangements have been determined on for the occupation of Scinde by Bengal troops, and that the several Regiments will proceed to their destination immediately.

— From the same authority we learn, that the preparation of the siege train for Gwalior has been countermanded; and probably the Star is right in pronouncing this measure premature, as according to the last accounts the Khasgee was still with the troops, who seemed to have half a mind to shew fight.

— We were we find wrong in supposing that the meeting of the Indian members of the Peninsular and Oriental Navigation Company was convened by Capt. Engledue. By whom it was called has not transpired, but Mr. Greenlaw read a number of papers, and it was resolved that he should furnish a statement of the points in the prospectus of the Company and in their correspondence, which warrant an opinion of a departure from the plans on which the Calcutta subscribers gave their mite. Alas, for our prospects; if we can afford no more than thirty passengers for the steamers, which must have a hundred or lose money, not all the resolutions of all the public meetings, nor all the charges of breach of faith, can keep them to the direct line.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9.

— We regret to learn from the Star, that the Hindoostan on her next voyage from Aden to Galle will touch at Bombay. This, says our contemporary, was hinted to a gentleman in London. Having once taken this devious route, there can be little hope that the vessel will ever resume the direct course till some arrangement be made with the Home Government. Perhaps however some new improvement in Steam, or the discovery of some other agent may lay both the Hindoostan and the Bentinck on the shelf.

— Mr. George Thompson has arrived in Calcutta and embarks on Friday morning in the Bentinck.

— The Queen steamer, with Col. Squire and the recruits of H. M. 13th, has arrived at Bombay, and they will be sent on immediately to perish in the swamps of the Indus. The last accounts from Ferozepore state, that the Head Quarters of the Regiment had taken its departure for Sukkur from that station. The deadly climate will probably thin the ranks of this noble corps, in a month more than they were thinned by four years' struggles with the Affghans.

— The Queen is to replace the lost Memnon; the latter was 400 horse power; the former has only engines of 200 horse power. Of course to employ her in bringing on the Mails would only subject the community to a bitter disappointment. The Hon. Company has not two vessels capable of maintaining the speed requisite for the occasion, and must either build new vessels, or fall in with the proposal of the Oriental and Peninsular Company.

— The Englishman states, on the authority of a letter from the North West, that three French officers had arrived at Cabul, with the intention of forming and disciplining a force for the Affghans, as their countrymen have done in the Punjab. They could not have arrived at a time when their aid will be less prized.

— The Governor General, it is said, intends to proceed forthwith to the banks of the Sutledge, doubtless to Ferozepore, the scene of last year's festivities; but apparently with a different object; not to receive a triumphant army on its return at the foot of the bridge, but to send an army across it to gather fresh laurels. The Post Office authorities are said to have received orders to lay bearers between Agra and Umbala. A letter from this latter place published in this day's Hurkaru, seems to hint that Lord Ellenborough has demanded the session of the states belonging to the Sikhs, that is to Runjeet Singh's successor, on the left bank of the Sutledge. These estates were acquired by the late ruler by gradual encroachments and are estimated to yield if we remember right a revenue of about 12 lakhs of Rupees a year. They were guaranteed to Runjeet Singh, more than thirty years ago. It is said that Heera Singh is quite willing to resign the lands, but that Golab Singh peremptorily refuses to give them up, and even threatens to cross the river if we should attempt to occupy them.

— The John Hepburne, which has come in from Rangoon, brings accounts of a very serious outbreak of the Cholera at Ava, to which the King's second illegitimate son, and one of his ministers well known to be very inimical to us, have fallen victims.

— The relief of the troops in Scinde, appears to be involved in uncertainty. A letter quoted in the Hurkaru says, that there will be no general relief of the Bombay troops. Other letters received from the north west however, speak confidently of the approaching departure of the troops intended for Scinde.

— The Brandywine, American frigate, with the American Envoy, the Honourable Mr. Cushing, left Bombay on Monday, the 27th November. The officers on their departure liberally contributed the sum of 457 Rs. to the American Mission Press, which has long been the leading establishment for book printing at Bombay. The money is to be devoted to the preparation of a fount of Arabic types.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 11.

— The last sale of Indigo at the Indigo Mart, is said to have gone off with spirit. The average price of about 100 maunds of Kishnaghur Indigo was 150 Rs. the factory maund; the average of Tirhoot, about 105.

— The Shipping reports announce the arrival of the Steamer Windsor Castle from the Mauritius; but none of the daily papers tell us who the stranger is.

— An attempt is said to have been made to carry the young King of the Punjab, Duleep Sing, across the Sutlege into the British dominions. Two of his uncles endeavoured to corrupt the troops, but in vain; they then laid a horse dawk from Lahore to the river, but the project was discovered before they could put it into execution. They were seized and thrown into confinement, and the young lad was reinstated on the Guddee. After this Heera Sing and Golab ordered a body of troops down to the Sutlege to watch the fords, but they mutinied and refused to go. It must however be remembered that all intelligence from the Punjab must be told three times by three independent witnesses before it is entitled to credit.

— H. M's. 13th Foot embarked at Ferozepore for Scinde on the 24th, it is said in high spirits! It would seem as though Sir Robert Sale had proceeded with the Regiment in command of it.

— The Vernon, Capt. Gimblet, which left Portsmouth on the 26th of August, arrived at Madras on the 27th ultimo, having been only a day beyond three months on the voyage.

— The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states that a Register of about 1,500 letters received from the H. C. vessel the Clive, which were picked up on the beach near the wreck of the Memnon Steamer, has been published in the Bombay Government Gazette. They have been forwarded to their destination by Capt. Haines, the Political Agent at Aden. There is also a list of 72 Bills of Exchange amounting to 72,000*l*. which were likewise picked up on the Beach.

— The Star publishes a letter from Sukkur, which states that Sir Jasper Nicolls and family, with Col. Luard, had reached that station on his way to Bombay. He had written from Bhawulpore to request that no other mark of distinction should be shewn him but the salute due to his rank. Even that, owing to the universal sickness, could not be shewn him. In fact the army may be considered as broken up by the effects of the climate. So many officers had been obliged to leave the station, that there was likely soon to be a Brigade of sick men without officers. Of 104

Artillerymen who left Ferozepore not long ago, 60 have been consigned to the grave. Rain was expected in the next month, when the Medical men predicted the Sepoys would die like rotten sheep.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 12.

— The great Steam Meeting yesterday afternoon was attended by more than 400 persons. A series of Resolutions was adopted which will be [illegible]d in another part of this paper. It is true that the Bombay folks have had the start of us by one month, as it respects the despatch of their resolutions, approving the plan of taking the Bentinck and Hindoostan from Calcutta, Madras and Ceylon and giving them to themselves; but we trust that the cogent and unanswerable arguments of our Resolutions, and the unanimity and strength of feeling which has been exhibited at this Presidency will be sufficient to counteract the effects of Bombay influence, however paramount it may be in Leadenhall Street.

— The Star states, that preparations are again going on for the siege train at Agra, which is to be on a larger scale than ever. The whole force was calculated to assemble there by the 4th; the Governor General would reach the station by the 10th, and it is said that the force would be in motion towards Gwalior by the 12th.

— We are happy to hear, that the letters sent by the Regular Mail of the 21st of November, arrived at Bombay at the same time as the Express, and were quite in time for the Steamer, which started at 9 on the evening of the 1st of December.

— The outbreak on the Nepal frontier is said to be directed against the state of Oude, an ally of ours, whom we are bound to defend. The exact nature of it has not transpired, but it is said that a Nepalese army has made an inroad on the Vizier's territories. We must of course repel it by force, if we do not succeed by negotiation; and this may lead us at once into hostilities with the spirited Durbar.

— The Hurkaru states, that letters of the 2d instant from Umbalah mention that a report was current, that our position at Sukkur had been attacked, but that no great confidence could be placed in it. Such an event however may be expected, unless the post should be strengthened by the arrival of fresh and healthy troops. In case of an attack the Queen's 13th, part of the illustrious garrison, will come in for the first laurels; and it will be a singular circumstance if this distinguished corps, which was ordered to the banks of the Irawaddy immediately on its arrival in India, should close its Indian career by fresh triumphs on the banks of the Indus.

— The Hurkaru states, that the attempted flight of Duleep Singh, and the subsequent mutiny of some of the Sikh troops is confirmed. Golab Sing and Heera Sing are still at the capital, enlisting troops, in consequence of the consternation created by the large force we are gathering on the Sutlege. The same accounts state that Akbar Khan was at the Western extremity of the Khyber, ready of course to fall upon Peshawur.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13.

— The list of Passengers by the Bentinck has been sent to the Calcutta papers spontaneously by Capt. Engledue. We wish it had been three times the length; and, when such regularity has been given to the sailing of the Steamers, that arrangements can be confidently made in reference to it both in London and Calcutta, we have not the slightest doubt that a full ship will start on every voyage. The passengers on this occasion are: Lieut. Col. Everest; Mr. Frazer; Mr. G. W. Robertson; Mr. G. J. Gordon; Mrs. Capt. Greaves; Dr. Hy. Pilleané; Mr. C. Whitmore, C. S.; Mr. Geo. Thompson; Mrs. Brig. Frith; Mrs. Wilson; Mr. Goodwyn; Capt. Hopper; Capt. Saunders; Mrs. Saunders; General Avitabili; Mr. A. O. Challaye; Mr. Alex. Calder; Mr. W. de Chonski; Mr. Gilbert; Mrs. Pereira and Child; Mr. Ilbery; Mr. Hough; Dr. Borghi; Mr. [illegible]; Mr. Fleming; Mr. and Mrs. Home; Mr. Clark and his Sons; Mr. Anderson; Mr. W. H. Frith; Mr. and Mrs. Fisher; Mr. Nisbett; Col. Montgomery; Mr. Ochterlony; Rev. Mr. Florian; and M. Challaye's Servant.

— The Hurkaru states that the mercantile firm, which was mentioned in its law report some ten days ago as having sought the protection of the Insolvent Court, was that of McGregor, Hunter and Co.

— According to the Star, the appearance of the Nepaul troops in the Oude territories had been occasioned by an aggression of Dursan Singh, a subject of Oude; and they retired as soon as they heard that the offender had been taken a prisoner to Lucknow and punished.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE PUBLIC MEETING ON STEAM AFFAIRS.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSED TO THE HONOURABLE THE COURT OF DIRECTORS, THE BOARD OF CONTROL, AND THE LORDS OF THE TREASURY.

Sheweth, that your Memorialists have learnt that the Directors of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company have submitted to Her Majesty's Government, and the Directors of the Hon'ble East India Company, a proposal to undertake the monthly transmission of the Mails between Bombay and Suez.

That for the execution of this proposed service, combined with their other arrangements in the Indian seas, the Directors have stated that the Peninsular and Oriental Company are provided with two Steam ships, the Hindoostan and Bentinck; that they have at their disposal a new, large, and powerful Steamer, capable of being completed for sea in three months; and that, though these three vessels are amply sufficient for the performance, under ordinary circumstances, of the whole services contemplated, the Company propose to provide a fourth vessel as a reserve to meet contingencies.

That, had it been announced merely that the expediency of contracting with the Peninsular and Oriental Company for the transmission of the Mails between Bombay and Suez, with a view to their acceleration and without interfering with the direct communication by means of Steam Vessels between Calcutta and Suez, was under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government and the Directors of the Hon'ble East India Company, your Memorialists would have thought it unnecessary to address your Hon'ble Court on the matter; but as the only means by which this acceleration of the Bombay Mail is proposed to be brought about, are avowedly to be supplied by diverting Steam vessels devoted to maintaining direct communication monthly between Calcutta and Suez, in which your Memorialists are deeply interested, they feel it necessary to protest most strongly against the injustice attempted to be done to them, and to press upon your Hon'ble Court the public importance of the interests thus threatened, which interests embrace nearly half the correspondence between Great Britain and the East, and about three-fourths of their commercial relations.

That the proposed plan for the acceleration of the Indian Mails is confined to their transit to and from Bombay, and that it is not attempted to be shown that greater expedition will be gained for the Mails to and from Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta, by carrying them via Bombay than can be achieved by the direct line between Suez and Calcutta; and your Memorialists confidently submit that if the Mail is delivered at Suez thirteen days after its despatch from England, as volunteered, under a penalty, by the Peninsular and Oriental Company, it will be brought on to its several destinations more rapidly by observing such direct line than if it be carried in the first instance to Bombay, and this whether it be forwarded from that Presidency by Steamers, or across the country.

That in urging this upon the attention of your Hon'ble Court, your Memorialists would be understood as meaning by "the Mail" a full and complete delivery, and not a partial dispatch, which as a permanent arrangement they regard as most objectionable; and your Memorialists would respectfully submit to your Hon'ble Court that the question of acceleration of the Mails is not fairly considered unless it embrace this completeness of delivery.

That by continuing the Hindoostan and Bentinck Steamers on the direct line between Calcutta and Suez, with such other boat or boats as may be deemed necessary to preserve the monthly communication uninterrupted, the entire Mail to and from this Presidency can be carried from port to port in 25 days, as has been proved by the three voyages of the Hindoostan, which vessel has performed the entire distance in 20 days and 5 hours under steam.

That this would make the whole time between despatch and delivery 30 days, and your Memorialists strongly urge upon your Hon'ble Court that this would allow seven days between the arrival of one Mail and the dispatch of another, for answering letters, &c., and thus render practicable four perfect interchanges of correspondence in the year between Europe and this side of India, which they confidently submit cannot be accomplished if the Mails for Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta are forwarded to their respective destinations via Bombay.

That the Peninsular and Oriental Company's contract time (as proposed) to Bombay is 28 days, and your Memorialists say the Europe Mail has never been fully delivered at Calcutta in 10 days after its arrival at Bombay, and that it cannot be delivered in such time, unless under more extensive inland improvements than can be carried out for a lengthened period.

That the Mails could not be brought on by a Steamer from Bombay and Calcutta in ten days with two intermediate ports of detention, and that therefore the entire Mails for Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta cannot be delivered so expeditiously via Bombay, either by land or sea, as by the direct route at present occupied by the Hindoostan and Bentinck.

That in proof of the accuracy of your Memorialists' statement as to the greater time required for the transit of the Mail, overland, via Bombay, they may mention that during the last eleven months the average time taken by the Express from Bombay to Calcutta has been upwards of 8 days and 14 hours, and by the first portion of the general Mail upwards of 10 days and 6 hours, and this independent of the time elapsing between the arrival of the Steamer at Bombay and the several dispatches from the Post Office, while the time from the arrival of the Express to that of the last portion of the Mail has ranged between 5 and 8 days.

That as a further proof of their assertion your Memorialists state, that the only Mail which has yet been brought to Calcutta by the direct route was the Falmouth portion of the September Mail, which was delivered in Calcutta by the Hindostan 18 days after she left Aden, while the Marseilles portion of that Mail which was carried to Bombay, arrived in Calcutta in six several parcels, the last of which was not delivered until 16 days after the arrival of the Steamer at Bombay, although the Hindostan had relieved the dâk of nearly 7,000 covers.

That, independently of the above, the correspondence of your Memorialists passing between Bombay and Calcutta is not infrequently during the rains so damaged as to be utterly illegible, and occasionally in a state to render delivery altogether impossible.

That large sums of money had been subscribed by the public of Calcutta, Madras and Ceylon for the purpose of carrying out direct communication, and arrangements made for this purpose by a Company in London who proposed to undertake the whole of the direct line on both sides of the Isthmus of Suez, and by a Company in Calcutta who proposed to limit their exertions to perfecting that part of the line which fell upon the Indian Seas, when the Peninsular and Oriental Company obtained from her Majesty's Government the exclusive privilege of conveying the Mails between Alexandria and Great Britain, and subsequently a Charter granting them peculiar advantages for Navigating the Indian seas.

That, thereafter, upon the expressed intention of the Directors of the last named Company to complete the direct communication between Calcutta and Great Britain by way of Madras and Ceylon, before engaging on any of the other lines of Steam Communication comprehended in their Charter, the London and Calcutta Companies both relinquished their undertakings, and a large number of the shareholders in the former Company, transferred their money to the Peninsular and Oriental Company.

That the Directors of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, soon afterwards sent out the Hindostan steam ship to ply between Calcutta and Suez, intimating that the Bentinck Steamer was in a state of forwardness, and that they would do all in their power towards the speedy completion of the line as originally intended.

That the Hindostan and Bentinck are the only vessels which the Peninsular and Oriental Company have as yet put upon this line.

That these two vessels would be incapable under any circumstances of fulfilling the present engagement of the Peninsular and Oriental Company respecting this line, and that three vessels in the India Seas are the least number by which under ordinary circumstances that direct Communication by means of Steam vessels, at all times of the year, between Calcutta and Great Britain can be accomplished, to the speedy completion of which your Memorialists have devoted all their exertions.

That the public importance of a direct communication by means of steam vessels between Calcutta and Great Britain, as well as between Great Britain and Bombay, has been repeatedly acknowledged by your Hon'ble Court, by Parliamentary Committees, and by the Lords of the Treasury, when the general subject of establishing Steam Communication between England and India by way of the Red Sea has been under consideration.

That a Select Committee of the House of Commons on the 15th day of July 1837—reported to that Hon'ble House; that "inasmuch as, in the opinion of the witnesses who have appeared before your Committee, a direct communication by Steam, from the Red Sea to Ceylon, Madras and Bengal, would be practicable at all seasons of the year, by the employment of vessels of adequate tonnage and power, and as, under judicious arrangements, such extended establishment would appear to offer a prospect of an adequate return for the increased outlay by the conveyance of passengers, and of some valuable articles of merchandize, which cannot be expected from the limited communication with Bombay alone; your committee feel bound to recommend a continued and zealous attention to the subject on the part of His Majesty's Government and the East India Company."

That in March 1841, the Right Hon'ble the Lords of Her M.'s Treasury recorded their judgment to the effect that the object of establishing Steam Communication between England and India by way of the Red Sea was so important as to be worthy of a public grant, but that no plan would be deserving of adoption, which did not include direct communication to the three Presidencies of India, and the Right Hon'ble the President of the Board of Commissioners for the affairs of India did thereupon declare his concurrence, and also that any other course would fail to fulfil the just expectations of the people both of England and of India.

That your Honourable Court have testified your concurrence in these opinions by having liberally granted to the Peninsular and Oriental Company, on their commencing to open this direct route, and when they had placed but one vessel on the line, a yearly sum of £20,000 for five years.

That while your Memorialists must view with satisfaction any prospect of accelerating the communication between England and Bombay, they confidently trust that your Hon'ble Court will not adopt any measures tending to interrupt, or in any manner interfere with, the direct line of communication between Calcutta, Madras, Ceylon and Suez—a line that being easily practicable at all seasons (which the Bombay line is not) is pre-eminently calculated to benefit the most extensive and valuable Provinces of India—those adjoining the Bay of Bengal and the Rivers Ganges and Burhampooter, and now extending from Calcutta through Assam to the confines of China.

(Signed) W. P. Grant,
Chairman of the Committee.

Resolution 1st,—Resolved that the Memorials now read, addressed respectively to the Right Hon'ble the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury—the Right Hon'ble the President of the Board of Control, and the Hon'ble the Court of Directors of the East India Company be adopted, and that the number of requisitionists by whom the present Meeting is called, amounting to nearly fourteen hundred is so large as to preclude the possibility of obtaining their signatures to these Memorials, far less those of the many others who would be desirous of signing them in time for their despatch by the next Mail, and that therefore the Sheriff be requested to sign them on behalf of this Meeting.

Proposed by W. P. Grant, Esq.—Seconded by Rustomjee Cowasjee, Esq.

Carried unanimously.

Resolution 2d,—Resolved that the Committee of the New Bengal Steam Fund, be requested to take charge of the Memorials from the Sheriff and forward them as respectively addressed, and to co-operate generally in the objects contemplated by this Meeting.

Proposed by J. Hume, Esq.—Seconded by C. Newcomen, Esq.

Carried unanimously.

Resolution 3rd,—Resolved that copies of the above Resolutions and Memorials be sent by the Sheriff to the Right Hon'ble the Governor General, with the grateful acknowledgments of the Meeting for the deep interest which His Lordship is known to have felt for the establishment of this great object since it was first brought forward, and the earnest request of the Meeting that His Lordship will support the prayer of the Memorials in such manner as shall seem to His Lordship to be most conducive to success.

Proposed by The Venerable Archdeacon.—Seconded by C. B. Greenlaw, Esq.

Carried unanimously.

Resolution 4th,—Resolved that copies of the above Resolutions and Memorials be also sent by the Sheriff to the Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal, with the request that His Honour will use his powerful influence in the promotion of the prayers of the Memorials.

Proposed by L. Grey, Esq.—Seconded by G. F. Remfry, Esq.

Carried unanimously.

Resolution 5th,—Resolved that the cordial thanks of this Meeting be offered to the Committee of the East India and China Association for the interest they have manifested in the objects of this Meeting, and for the able manner in which they have advocated our cause.

Proposed by J. Deans Campbell, Esq.—Seconded by C. B. Greenlaw, Esq.

Carried unanimously.

Resolution 6th.—Resolved that the cordial thanks of this Meeting be offered to Mr. Thomas Elliott for the interest he has manifested in the objects of this Meeting, and for the able, prompt, and independent manner in which he came forward to demonstrate as regards the interests of two thirds of India, the injury which would be inflicted by any departure from the direct line of Steam Communication between Suez and Calcutta.

Proposed by J. C. C. Sutherland, Esq.—Seconded by J. Stopford, Esq.

Carried unanimously.—Cal. Star, Dec. 12.

LOTTERIES.

We perceive in the Singapore Free Press of 16th ultimo, two advertisements of Lotteries on a large scale, one being for prizes to the extent of one lack and the other of nearly two. The parties are represented to be Messrs. Robertson and Co., and Messrs. Johnson, Brs. and Co. The former announce the Union Bank as Treasurers, and that their lottery will be drawn at the Exchange Rooms on the 15th of January. We are enabled to state that the Union Bank has not any account with Messrs. Robertson and Co., either as Lottery Schemers, or in any other capacity, and that the respectable Firm who have the Exchange Rooms know nothing whatever of any of the parties advertising in the Singapore papers: our opinion is that there are no such firms and that an extensive fraud is being perpetrated on the public. We lay ourselves open to much risk in saying this, but these Lottery frauds are being carried on to such an extent that we should be departing from the principles on which this paper was established unless we spoke out plainly. We firmly believe these pretended Lotteries to be frauds and we say so. They advertise two facts to which we give the lie direct. If there be such people in Calcutta let them come forward. References are made to No. 65, Durrumtollah; we have sent there and find—what could be more characteristic—an empty house!

Messrs. Methold and Co. advertised a drawing the other day, in which there was a prize of Rs. 50,000: we shall, we suppose ere long have some of our papers announcing 'the fortunate holder,' and then their notices will be made advertisements for places away from the scene of action, as in a late case when payment of the money was refused. If the public could hold this commonly respectable, we should say it was a bad, low, vicious public,—but we know better; we hear on all hands the severest censures on parties lending themselves, however indirectly, to these Lottery schemes. If there really be such people as Messrs. Methold and Co. their lotteries are before the public in no reputable light. They advertise by means of their literary friends, that their lotteries are 'under the auspices and patronage of the most respectable agency and Commercial Houses in Calcutta,' and we say this is a lie,—strong language, and we are sorry to be obliged to use it, but on such an occasion we must speak plainly, nor will we cease so to speak as long as such falsehoods disgrace the columns of daily newspapers to the possible ruin of those who may attach credence to them. Some continue to make their profit of these advertisements, and affect to see no compromise of the character of their Journals in doing so: as far as our own interests are concerned we could desire nothing more cordially than that they should continue to this extent partners in the concern, but while they thus express their opinion, we will give ours, which is—and we write it calmly—that they might as well advertise a Fence for the ready disposal of stolen goods. As these Singapore advertisements refer to Durrumtollah we would ask Messrs. Methold and Co., having asked several before, whether they know such firms as Robertson and Co., and Johnson, Brs. and Co. We are informed they are unknown here, as are Ewart, Brown and Co., who are advertised as Messrs. Johnson, Brs. and Co's. Trustees!—Cal. Star, Dec. 8.

GWALIOR.

"The Khasgeewalla was made over to Colonel Jacobs on the 23d, with a view that he should be sent to Agra, and made over to the British Authorities; but a portion of the Troops and Sirdars having objected to the measure, his departure has been postponed. A deputation composing of Ram Rao, Sumbajee and Oodajee, left this on the morning of the 24th, to wait on the Resident at Agra and to explain matters, and if possible, to obtain the sanction of his being kept a State Prisoner within the Territories of the Gwalior Raj. Whether this arrangement will be approved and complied with, is a matter of doubt. The Khasgeewalla was twice before this a State Prisoner in the hill fort of Nurwur, and obtained his enlargement at the intercession of the Mama Sahib. The greater portion of the Troops have received their full arrears of pay, and the rest are being paid off as quick as possible, no knowing whether with a view to enable them to desert or prepare for battle. The talk in the Lushkur is, that the Khasgee will be sent to Agra immediately after the distribution of the pay, and that the Jinsee and Secunder's Camp will be disbanded. Secunder has already received his "juwab" from Seetooleea. The report in the Lushkur is that Juswunt Rao Bhow has taken his post at Dutteeth, where he is employed in raising men, and that Secunder has invited the Boondellas to join him. It remains to be seen whether the Authorities will enquire into the extent of Secunder's influence over the Boondellas, and, (if report be true,) whether Salvadore Smith, his Uncle, has not been busily employed at Jhansi in getting the Boondellas to join his Nephew; it would be well if the authorities were to make some enquiries into the cause of Salvadore Smith remaining in Bundlekhund. The general opinion in the Lushkur is, that without the presence of British Troops, nothing of a favourable nature is likely to terminate in this distracted State."—25*th Nov.* 1843.—Agra Ukhber, Nov. 30.

ABOLITION OF THE TRANSIT DUTIES.

We understand that a proposition from the government of India, for affecting the total abolition of the transit duties in the Madras territories, is now before our local Government. It has crossed a recommendation sent up from Madras to the same effect. These obnoxious duties have been most unfairly left to press with all their burdensome and vexatious weight upon our Presidency, for years after all the rest of British India has been emancipated from the incubus. The common admission of their never failing operation as a clog on all internal improvement, as not even sufficed to let this neglected division of British India be included in the otherwise general abolition. But, with the evidence now before us of a general disposition amongst the ruling powers to make the long delayed concession, we trust we may now congratulate ourselves on a prospect of seeing these galling chains struck off at no distant day. —Madras Spectator, Nov. 23.

ABSTRACT OF THE SUPPLEMENTARY TREATY, BETWEEN THEIR MAJESTIES THE QUEEN OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, AND THE EMPEROR OF CHINA.

PREAMBLE.—The Preamble provides, that the Articles of the Supplementary Treaty "shall be as binding and of the same efficacy as though they had been inserted in the Original Treaty of perpetual Peace and Friendship."

Art. I.—Provides for the New Tariff being in force at the five Ports of Canton, Fuchow-foo, Amoy, Ningpo, and Shanghai.

Art. II.—Provides for the General Regulations of Trade being in force at the aforesaid Five Ports.

Art. III.—Provides that all penalties or confiscations made under the 3rd clause of the said General Regulations of Trade, shall belong to the Government of China.

Art. IV.—Provides that British Merchants shall be allowed only to trade at the five Ports named in Article 1, that the British Merchants' Ships shall not repair to any other Ports or Places in China; that if they do so, in contravention of this Article, the Chinese Authorities shall be at liberty to seize and confiscate both Vessel and Cargo, and that all Chinese Subjects discovered clandestinely trading with British Merchants at any other Ports or Places in China shall be punished as the law in China may direct.

Art. V.—Provides for the IV. Clause of the General Regulations of Trade being applicable to both parties.

Art. VI.—Provides that English Merchants and others residing at, or resorting to the five-Ports shall not go into the surrounding Country beyond certain distances (to be fixed by the local Authorities and Consuls) and "on no pretence for purposes of traffic;" and that if any person, whatever his rank, station, or calling disobey this Article and "wander away into the country, he shall be seized and handed over to the British Consul for suitable punishment."

Art. VII.—Provides for British Subjects and their Families residing, agreeably to the Treaty of perpetual Peace and Friendship, at the different Ports named in Article 1, and for their being allowed to buy or rent Ground or Houses at fair and equitable rates, such as prevail "amongst the people, without exaction on either side. The ground and houses, so to be sold, or rented, to be set apart by the local Authorities in communication with the Consuls."

Art. VIII.—Provides for all Foreign Countries whose Subjects or Citizens have hitherto traded at Canton, being admitted to the five Ports, named in Article 1, on the same terms as England.

Art. IX.—Provides for all Chinese Criminals and Offenders against the Law, who may flee to Hong-kong, or to British Ship of War or to British Merchantmen for refuge, being "delivered upon proof or admission of their guilt;" and for any Sailor, Soldier, or other person,—whatever his Caste or Country—who is a Subject of the Crown of England and who may, from any cause, or on any pretence, desert, fly or escape into the Chinese territory, being seized and confined by Chinese Authorities, and forthwith sent to the nearest Consular, or other British Government Officer.

Art. X.—Provides for a British Ship of War being stationed at each of the five Ports, "to ensure good order and discipline amongst the crews of the merchant shipping, and to support the necessary authority of the Consul over British subjects." The crews of such Ship of war to be "carefully restrained by the Officer Commanding," and the rules regarding not straying into the country to be applicable to them, in the same manner as the crews of merchant ships. The ships of war to be in no degree liable to Port Charges or any of the General Regulations laid down for trade.

Art. XI.—Provides for the British Forces being withdrawn from Chusan (Tinghae) and Coolung-soo being restored to the Chinese Government agreeable to the Treaty of perpetual Peace and Friendship the moment all the monies stipulated for in that Treaty shall be paid; and "the British Plenipotentiary, distinctly and voluntarily, agrees that all Dwelling Houses, Store houses, Barracks and other Buildings, that the British Troops or People may have occupied or intermediately built or repaired, shall be handed over on the evacuation of the Ports, exactly as they stand."

Art. XII.—Provides for the British Plenipotentiary instructing the different Consuls (in addition to the Proclamation the Plenipotentiary has already issued) "to strictly watch over and carefully scrutinize the conduct of all Persons, being British Subjects,—trading under their superintendence"—and, in the event of any smuggling transactions coming to their knowledge, they are to apprize the Chinese authorities "who will proceed to seize, and confiscate, all goods, whatever their value or nature—that may have been so smuggled;" and will, likewise, "be at liberty to prohibit the vessel, from which the smuggled goods were landed, from trading further and to send her away, as soon as her accounts are adjusted and paid." All Chinese Subjects, whether Custom House Officers or others, who may be discovered to be concerned in smuggling are, by this Article, to be punished as the Chinese authorities shall think fit.

Art. XIII.—Provides for all persons, whether native of China or otherwise, conveying goods, to Hongkong for sale on obtaining a Pass or Port Clearance from one of the five Ports, named in article 1; and paying the duties agreeable to the Tariff on such goods. It also provides for natives of China repairing to Hongkong to purchase goods, and for their obtaining a Pass from the Custom House of one of the five Ports should they require a Chinese vessel to carry away their purchases. These Passes to be restored at the expiration of each trip.

Art. XIV.—Provides for an officer of the British Government examining the Registers and Passes of all Chinese vessels visiting Hongkong to buy or sell goods; and, for any vessel which may not have a Register or Pass being "considered an unauthorized or smuggling vessel" and not being allowed to trade. "By this arrangement it is to be hoped, that Piracy and illegal traffic will be effectually prevented."

Art. XV.—Provides for debts, incurred by Chinese Dealers or Merchants at Hongkong, being recovered through the English Courts of justice. Should the debtor fly from Hongkong to the Chinese Territory and be known or found to have property, real or personal, the IV. clause of the General Regulations will be applicable to the case, on application being made by the Consul. In like manner, should a British Merchant incur debts at any of the five Ports and fly to Hongkong, the British Authorities will, on receiving an application from the Chinese Officers, institute an investigation into the Claims, and, when established, oblige the defaulter or debtor to settle them, to the utmost of his means."

Art. XVI.—Provides for a monthly Return of Passes granted to Chinese Vessels to visit Hongkong, being furnished to the British Officer refered to in Article XIV. by the Hoppo of Canton, and for a similar return being made by the said officer.

Art. XVII. also termed "Additional Article." Provides for all Cutters, Schooners, Lorchas, and such small vessels that ply between Canton and Hongkong or between Canton and Macao, passing as they have hitherto done, free of all Port Charges; "if they only carry Passengers, letters or baggage; but if they carry any dutyable articles, however small the quantity, they are to pay tonnage dues at the rate of one mace per ton Register. This article further provides for the smallest of such Vessels being considered to be 75 tons burthen and the largest 150 tons burthen beyond which last size they are to be classed as foreign Ships and to be charged Tonnage dues according to Article V. of the General Regulations.

The following three Rules were further laid down in this Article, which is only applicable to the Port of Canton, for the guidance of these small Vessels,

1st.—"Every British Schooner, Cutter, Lorcha, &c., shall have a sailing letter or Register, in Chinese and English, under the Seal and Signature of the Chief Superintendent of Trade, describing her appearance, burthen, &c. &c."

2nd.—Every Schooner, Cutter, Lorcha, and such Vessels shall report herself as large Vessels are required to do at the Bocca Tigris; and when she carries Cargo, she shall also report herself at Whampoa, and on reaching Canton deliver up her sailing letter or Register to the British Consul, who will obtain permission from the Hoppo for her to discharge her Cargo, which she is not to do without such permission under the forfeiture of the penalties laid down in the III Clause of the General Regulations."

3rd.—"When the inward Cargo is discharged and an outward one (if intended) taken on board and the duties on both arranged and paid, the Consul will restore the Register or Sailing letter, and allow the Vessel to depart."

THE CONCLUSION.—Provides for the provisions of the Supplementary Treaty being immediately carried into effect; that on receiving the gracious assent of the Emperor in the Vermillion Pencil, the Imperial Commissioner, will deliver the very Copy of the Treaty containing it into the hands of His Excellency Hwang, Judge of Canton, who is to proceed to such place as the British Plenipotentiary may appoint, and deliver it to the Plenipotentiary to have and to "hold." Afterwards the Sign Manual of the Sovereign of England having been received at Hongkong, likewise "graciously assenting to, and confirming the Treaty, the British Plenipotentiary will dispatch that Copy of the Treaty containing the Royal Sign Manual, by a specially appointed officer to Canton, to deliver it into the hands of His said Excellency Hwang "who will forward it to the Imperial Commissioner as a Rule and a Guide to both Nation for ever, and as a solemn confirmation of our Peace and Friendship."

"A most important Supplementary Treaty."

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—I have perused with considerable attention all that has been lately written in the pages of your journal, and in those of the Hurkaru regarding the Khoond children, and from an impartial consideration of the statements advanced on either side, the following appear to me to be the essential facts.

1st. A missionary or missionaries sent to the Agent for the Khoonds (and here I may remark that there seems to be some confusion in the use of the word agent) a letter asking to have about one hundred victims handed over to him or them, to be educated.

2nd. The Khoond Agent sent the letter on to his immediate superior: who, it appears, was in a state of ill health, which has since compelled him to leave the country, and who does not seem to have given it the attention it deserved. The missionary or missionaries seem to have received no reply, and to have made no enquiry as to the fate of the letter.

3d. Some one (probably irritated at the neglect with which the letter has met) has sent you a general accusation of neglect of the victims on the part of the agent, which you have zealously adopted, apparently without sufficient proof.

4th. The Khoond agent appears to have met the wishes of the missionaries in so far as to have handed over to them some six or ten children: whether they were placed in circumstances favourable to their conversion or were converted, does not appear, but the Hurkaru vaguely states that there was a want of success as regarded two victim boys and two girls who were betrothed: the Hurkaru also brings without distinct proof a general charge of indifference against the missionaries.

If the above be a fair exposition of the facts of the case, the chief question to be solved (neglect regarding the letter being admitted) is this. Was it the imperative duty of the agent or of his superiors to hand all the children over to the missionaries? On this point people must be allowed to entertain different opinions. Judging from what I have seen of Native Christians, i. e. the average of professing Native Christians, I should think it very doubtful whether it was worth while to make nominal Christians of the victims, provided they could be in other ways made subservient to the purposes of civilizing the Khoonds.

Now the Hurkaru states, that, by the marriage of the victim girls into tribes which practice female infanticide a means of influence over them has been obtained : if such be the case, an important point would seem to be gained.

And this leads me to the general question on which I sought information, when I addressed you last. Is there any progress making in the work of suppressing the barbarous superstitions of the Khoonds. Is any comprehensive plan of operations contemplated or in course of execution?

Your answer seemed to be, that we must trust to the gradual influence of civilization. Christianity and its hand-maid civilization will in time do their work. But if we are to trust to them alone—neither the rite of human sacrifice nor the practice of female infanticide are likely to be abolished during your lifetime or that of

Your obedient servant,

AN ENEMY TO PROCRASTINATION.

THE SUSPENDED RECTOR OF FENITON.—The following letter, addressed to the Churchwardens of Feniton by a clergyman of the Established Church, will be read with interest by all who sympathise with the pious, conscientious, and persecuted Rector of Feniton:—

"Bath, August 15th, 1843.

"Gentlemen,—An unusual pressure of business has prevented my writing to you earlier, but I now wish to express to you my sincere thanks, as a minister of the Established Church, for the warm and manly manner in which you and your parishioners have come forward in defence of your minister.

"Of Mr. Head I am not able to speak; his person, character, and conduct, are equally unknown to me,—but the judgment delivered in his case plainly declares the existing law to be worthy of a free nation, an intelligent people, and above all of a Christian country.

"The Court is reported to have affirmed, that it is an offence against the law, punishable, in the third instance, by imprisonment for life, for a clergyman to speak in disparagement of the 'Book of Common Prayer.'

"That any human institution should be supported by penalties attaching to the offence of questioning the perfection of that institution, is tyrannical, absurd, and unscriptural in the last degree.

"It is the more striking in our day, when Dissent enjoys the most perfect liberty, that episcopal power should be advancing toward absolute despotism.

"It is not in this way that either our church or our Prayer-book can be upheld.

"The circumstances in which we live make it absolutely necessary that every conscientious believer become either a reformer or a seceder.

"I trust that we may yet have enough of the former among us to obtain a clear statement of doctrine for the Church, in accordance with the mind of our first reformers, where they have left us expressions liable to be mistaken or perverted; and to establish and complete that system of Christian liberty, which they of necessity left unfinished.

"It is very essential that the members of our Church should have a clear perception of the undeniable truth, that the bishop is subject to the Church, and the Church subject to the Lord Jesus alone.

"I send by this post a 5*l.* Bank of England note, and am, Gentlemen, with much respect, yours very faithfully,

"JAMES R. PEARS.

"To the Churchwardens of Feniton."

John Henry Merle D'Aubigne, D. D., was born in Geneva, in 1794. His family is descended from Huguenot ancestors. He was educated in the "Academy" of his native city. The Theological Faculty, when Dr. Merle was a student, was wholly Socinian; but it pleased God to send a faithful servant to Geneva about the time he was completing his theological training. This was Mr. Haldane, of Edinburgh. He invited a number of the men to his hotel, and endeavoured to teach them the glorious Gospel. God blessed his efforts to the salvation of ten or twelve of them, including M. Merle. One of these was Felix Neff, of blessed memory. Another Henry Pyt. The greater part of them, however, still live. Not long after his ordination Dr. Merle set out for Germany, where he spent a number of months, chiefly at Berlin. On his way to that city, he passed through Eisenach, and visited the Castle of Wartburg. It was whilst gazing at the walls of the room which the great Reformer had occupied, that the thought of writing the History of the Reformation entered his mind. From Berlin, Dr. Merle was called to Hamburgh to preach to an interesting French Protestant Church. In that city he spent five years. From Hamburgh he was invited to Brussels, by the late King of Holland, to preach in a chapel which he had erected in that capital for Protestants who spoke the French language. In the year 1830, a revolution took place in Belgium. The priests joined De Potter and the other "patriots" in their revolutionary measures. The Dutch were driven out; and all who were considered friendly to the King, or intimately connected with him, were in no little danger. Among those who were in this predicament was Dr. Merle. He escaped from Belgium to Holland, where he spent a short time, and then went to his native city. The return of Dr. Merle to Geneva was most opportune. The friends of the truth had been steadily increasing in number, since the year 1816, and had begun to think seriously of founding an Orthodox School of Theology, in order that pious Swiss and French youth, who were looking to the ministry of the Gospel, should no longer be forced to pursue their studies under the Unitarian doctors of the Academy. The arrival of Dr. Merle decided them for immediate action. The next year (1831) the Geneva Evangelical Society was formed, one of whose objects was to found the long desired seminary. In this movement Dr. Merle took a prominent part, and was placed at the head of the new school of theology. His intimate friend, the excellent Mr. Gaussen, so favourably known in this country for his Theopneustia, and in Switzerland for many other writings, took an equal part in this important enterprise, and was chosen Professor of Theology. The publications of Dr. Merle have been numerous. Besides the History of the Reformation, he has published thirteen others on various subjects, of from twenty to two hundred pages. But Dr. Merle's great undertaking is his History of the Reformation in the Sixteenth Century. The author is now engaged on the fourth volume, in which he is well advanced. It treats of the Reformation in Great Britain, and is expected with very different feelings, by different religious parties in England. The fifth and sixth volumes will not be published for some years.—Wesleyan Chronicle.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO FRANCE.—Among the numberless questions to which her Majesty's visit to the Continent has given rise, not a few have been mooted respecting the supposed incapacity of the Queen to leave her British dominions without the sanction of an express Act of Parliament. Some persons (upon what grounds it is difficult to conjecture) have maintained that the Prince of Wales, and not her Majesty, is the person affected by this restriction. In order, therefore, to remove all doubt upon the subject, it is right to mention that the third clause in the Act of Settlement, which enacted, "that no person who shall hereafter come to the possession of this Crown shall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without consent of Parliament," was repealed very soon afterwards, in the 1st year of George 1. (1st George I. c. 31). "whose frequent journeys to Hanover" (says Mr. Hallam) "were an abuse of the graciousness with which the Parliament consented to annul the restriction."—Times

THE DUKE AND DR. As the journeys of her Majesty by the Great Western Railway, between Windsor and Buckingham Palace are becoming more frequent, it is said to be in contemplation to erect, for the exclusive use of the Court, a separate entrance to the station at the end of Westbourne-terrace. Her Majesty's route to the terminus, instead of being through narrow and inferior streets, where obstructions are of frequent occurrence, will, in future, be across the parks to Victoria gate, and along the splendid avenue of Westbourne-terrace. —Record.

As a proof of the enormous and unnecessary expenses to which the country is yearly put by Members of Parliament moving for returns, it may be stated that during the last session, one return connected with one of the metropolitan presons, moved for in the House of Commons, occupied three clerks upwards of thirty days, and contained, amongst other particulars, upwards of 13,000 names. It was also so weighty that it was almost more than a man could carry, and the printing of it cost about 2,000*l.*—Record.

PUSEYISM AT ETON COLLEGE.—It has been whispered for some time past that several of the authorities of this ancient seat of learning have become converts to the now "fashionable," but not the less dangerous, Puseyite doctrines, which are making such deep inroads amongst the clergy of our Protestant Church. It is feared, indeed, that the rumour is but too true; and there is very little doubt entertained, in numerous high and influential quarters, that unless some satisfactory proofs are afforded to dissipate the alarm which has thus been very naturally created amongst the Protestant parents of the seven hundred pupils at that institution, the most serious results, with reference to the future well-being and prosperity of the college, must necessarily ensue. That one of the most influential of the masters, the Rev. Edward Coleridge, M. A., of Exeter College, Oxford, and the brother of Mr. Justice Coleridge, is a Tractarian advocate and an espouser of the doctrines of Puseyism, is now beyond question or doubt. The Rev. Mr. Coleridge was amongst the first to affix his signature to the remonstrance, addressed by some 200 or 300 of the non-resident members of convocation of the University of Oxford, to the Rev. the Vice-Chancellor for having "suspended" the Rev. Dr. Pusey for his heretical and anti-Protestant sermon. The effect of the Senior Assistant-Master of Eton having thus publicly avowed himself a professor of the Romish-Puseyite faith, will, it is feared, tend very considerably to injure the hitherto high Protestant reputation of the venerable College of Eton.—Herald

The number of soldiers receiving pensions from 6d., 9d., to 1s. per diem is upwards of 50,000. The present number of in-door pensioners at Chelsea College is 490; the youngest is 58, and the ages vary from 60 to 70, 80, and 90, and two of these old veterans have attained the great age of 104 years. WRITING HISTORY.—The historiographers of the Portuguese press chronicle contemporary events in Great Britain thus:—The Patriota, in its summary of the news by the last packet, says—"In Scotland the disturbances have increased in the principality of Wales, because the jury absolved sixty of the Rebequitas!"—Ibid.

The distinguished name of Sir John Herschell, Bart., has within these few days been added to the list of the Trustees of the British Museum.—Ibid.

THE "STUPID" QUARTERLY!—The Quarterly Review has issued its quarterly Article on the Policy of Ministers; and, strange to say, the Ministerial and Conservative Papers have opened a broad attack upon both the policy and its advocate. "It is quite in keeping, quite proper, quite the thing," we are told by the Times, "that the Quarterly Review should stick up for the PEEL Administration." "It has now reached that climax of respectable stupidity which admirably qualifies it for the thick-and-thin championship of the PEEL Administration. Respectable Administration, respectable Review!" Poor JOHN MURRAY! His head has been laid low before this storm has burst upon Albemarle-street. But what will MR. CROKER, what must Lord LYNDHURST feel, at this traitorous attack upon Printing-house-square? This is playing "Young England" with the old stagers of the political scene with a vengeance.

The Article is certainly a curious one, and may be considered as preparing the way for the decent fall of a defeated Ministry. It is described as showing the white feather, or rather, as holding out the white flag. It is feeble, deprecatory, almost senile. Not all the italics and capital letters which are employed to give a forced emphasis to its periods, can impart strength or raciness to the style. It savours throughout of exhaustion and hopelessness. The reader is irresistibly led to the conclusion, that it is all over with the writer's party.

And the unfavourable rumours respecting the state of the PREMIER's health, point in the same direction. We are approaching a change, the precise character of which it is impossible, at present, to descry. Birds of evil augury are abroad, and the steersman must be on the look-out.—Pat.

THE FISH THE AGGRESSOR.—I take a little wool and feather, and tying it in a particular manner upon a hook, make an imitation of a fly; then I throw it across the river, and let it sweep round the stream with a lively motion. This I have an undoubted right to do, for the river belongs to me and my friend; but mark what follows. Up starts a monstrous fish with his murderous jaws, and makes a dash at my little Andromeda. Thus he is the aggressor, not I; his intention is evidently to commit murder. He is caught in the act of putting that intention into execution. Having wantonly intruded himself on my hook, which I contend he had no right to do, he darts about in various directions, evidently surprised to find that the fly, which he hoped to make an easy conquest of, is much stronger than himself. I naturally attempt to regain this fly, unjustly withheld from me. The fish gets tired and weak in his lawless endeavours to deprive me of it. I take advantage of his weakness, I own, and drag him, somewhat loath, to the shore, where one rap at the back of the head ends him in an instant. If he is a trout, I find his stomach distended with flies. * * You see, then, what a wretch a fish is: no ogre is more bloodthirsty.—Scrope on Salmon Fishing.

THE COUNCIL OF THREE HUNDRED.—Applications are daily received at the Repeal Association, Dublin, from various parts of the country, from persons ambitious of becoming members of the council contemplated by Mr. O'Connell. It had been supposed, on account of the condition that each member of the council is to bring up 100*l.* from his locality, that there would be some difficulty in obtaining the required number. But instead of a difficulty on this point, the only embarrassment, it would appear, that can be experienced, will arise from the multitude of candidates. On the completion of the council, the entire amount, from this source, would be 30,000*l.* The council, which is to be called "The Preservative Society," is to be assembled towards the close of the year.—Pat.

IRELAND.—DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER 5.—Lord Londonderry has caused to be published in the Belfast papers, in sustainment of his own course in opposing the Conservative demonstration in that town, a letter addressed to him by the Rev. R. N. Horner, Rector of Dungannon. The following is an extract:—

"I see in Ireland 36,000 of the best troops in Europe, fully appointed and judiciously disposed—in the constabulary, the water-guard, and the revenue police, I see very useful auxiliaries—and when I see this, and when I remember that the Government can command a force of yeomanry and militia, amounting to 100,000 men, I cannot conclude that we are abandoned—I cannot conclude that we are left without protection. Should the Repeal agitation result in violence, Government have taken abundant measures for the restoration of tranquillity, and as for preventing the agitation of Repeal, while many wish that it were prevented, none have shown me a preventive which could wisely be applied. Some suggest the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; but it may be doubted whether such suspension would meet the approval of the English people, and it might happen that, although the gaols were filled, the agitation would continue. Some suggest the dispersion of the 'monster Meetings,' but it is manifest that, although this might be done, the question of Repeal would still be agitated as zealously as ever, notwithstanding that the assemblages were less numerous than before. What course, then, remains but that which the Government have adopted—to leave the Repeal agitation to exhaust itself, which would be its happiest termination."—Record.

PRESENTS TO QUEEN VICTORIA FROM THE KING OF SHOA.—Captain Harris, who went out as ambassador from this country to the Court of Shoa, a kingdom situated in Southern Abyssinia, for the purpose of concluding a treaty of commerce with the King, has brought to this country, as presents to the Queen and the Prince of Wales, an immense quantity of rare and valuable articles, and amongst them a jet black mule, of the most exquisite symmetry, taken from the stud of the King of Shoa, and presented in his Majesty's name to the Heir Apparent to the British throne. The trappings of this beautiful animal (which in the language of the country is called tishel, or sans pareil,) consisting of a saddle-cloth, of a peculiar form and exquisite workmanship, upon which is elaborately emblazoned the Ethiopian lion, and extraordinarily shaped Abyssinian saddle, with breast-plate, and head-stall, en suite, are of the most gorgeous and magnificent description. The other presents consist of a crown worn by the former Queen of Shoa, various shields covered with numerous warlike devices, composed of gold and silver and precious stones; spears, gauntlets; cloaks and robes made of the skins of Ethiopian wild animals; armlets of solid silver; numerous distinctive badges of honour, such as ivory rings, silver falchions, or crooked swords; curious specimens of armour; several baskets made of grass and beads, and somewhat rude in their construction, filled with aromatic herbs, &c. A brilliantly-illuminated letter to her Majesty, in the Arabic language, in which the King of Shoa expresses the highest respect and esteem for "the Queen of the greatest nation under the sun," accompanied the presents brought over. The mule, which is perfectly docile, and of an excellent temper, will be sent to Windsor from the Royal Mews at Buckingham Palace, previously to the return of her Majesty.—Pat.

WHAT OUGHT TO BE DONE—TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.—In turning our attention from the state of Agriculture to that of Trade and Manufactures, we find that it is still the how, not the what, which forms the matter of difficulty. The great evil which the Government has to deal with is, a declining Revenue, the indication and effect of a commercial stagnation and declension of Trade. What the people complain of is, want of employment and insufficient wages. Educated or uneducated, taught or untaught, an unemployed and pauperized population can never be either quiet or contented. The first question is, whether Government and the Legislature are responsible for having created or aggravated this mercantile depression and consequent suffering?

We say, yes; first, because it is admitted, that the opening of the ports to a free trade in Corn, would have benefited Trade and Manufactures; and the ground upon which the restrictive laws have been upheld is, that they are necessary for the protection of Agriculture. This argument is tantamount to a confession, that the Corn-law is, quoad the interests of our traders and manufacturers, an evil,—a cause of loss and distress.

Yes, again, because the changes in the Tariff were made upon the ground, that our Trade had been crippled by the absurd and vexatious system of Import Duties, which had been enacted, not for the purpose of revenue so much as of protection. For the pertinacious adherence to this protective system, the Government is wholly responsible; and the new Tariff, invaluable as a concession and an instalment of reform, has not remedied the evil, but is only a first step in the right direction.

Yes, again, because it was distinctly admitted, in one of the last debates of the Session, that the impost upon foreign wool was one main cause of the depression of our woollen trade, and that policy would require its immediate repeal, but that the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER could not afford to give up a tax producing 100,000*l.*, though it costs the country many times that amount to retain it.

Yes, again, because the falling-off of the Revenue is itself caused by the extra taxation arising from the protective duties on Food, which taxation yields nothing to the public Treasury. Such was the testimony given by Mr. J. D. HUME, late one of the Secretaries of the Board of Trade, as the result of fifty years' experience and reflection. "I have not a doubt," are his words, "that, if there were no protecting duties, the revenue would flow in with a very great increase and great ease, owing to the increase of population, and the greater ability of men to pay the State taxes, being relieved from paying taxes to individuals." Food, Mr. J. D. HUME stated, is the first thing from which protective duties should be removed; and the sum of various estimates of the amount of indirect taxation leaved by protective and prohibitory duties on Food is, that it exceeds that of all the taxes levied directly by the Government. We can far better afford to pay the interest of the National Debt, and all the cost of our enormous and excessive civil and military establishments, than to bear the expense of the monopoly of the landed aristocracy.

Yes, again, because the retaliatory Tariffs of other countries, and more especially the last American Tariff, which has proved so fatal to some branches of our manufactures, have been caused by the policy of our own Government. And even Mr. GLADSTONE has admitted the justness of the remark made by Mr. SALOMONS, that, "by restricting the importations of food from America, and compelling that country to pay us, whatever she did pay of her debts, in gold, we, with a double power, dragged downwards the price of our own exports in her markets, at the same time that we paid to the nations of Europe a higher price for the relief of our deficiency in Corn than would have brought us flour from her ports, and, at the same time, upheld the prices of our manufactures, for which it would then have formed the means of exchange."

Once more, yes; because, admitting that the successive four bad harvests, from 1838 to 1841, occasioned to the nation a loss of material wealth, (estimated at ten millions sterling a-year,) which, by contracting the home trade, has greatly contributed to the distress of the people;—admitting this to be fact, it only aggravates the folly and wickedness of a law which enhances the loss to the public, without securing to the cultivator any indemnification for his diminished gains.

To the question, then, whether the Government is responsible for the calamitous depression of trade, and, in some instances, its destruction, we have shown that the answer must be in the affirmative. But then, what is the Government of this country but the Executive of the Oligarchy? What ought to be done, is obvious enough; but how to carry it into effect, is the difficulty. The lease must run out, we are told, and then we must come to new terms.

There are other evils besides the want of employment, arising from the lessened demand for the products of labour; but, as we remarked of Pauperism, these would become manageable evils, if the pressure upon the springs of industry were first removed; and they will not be till then. Factory-regulation Bills, if simply protective of the weaker party, perhaps a Ten hours Bill for children under a certain age, the suppression of the Truck system, Sanatory Regulations, Schools—all these measures, which are now but despicable palliatives of an evil that laughs such legislation to scorn,—would, in better times, be feasible and beneficent. Legislation, to be salutary, must be well timed. Food first, schooling next, is the order of nature; and if the working classes could earn a fair day's wage by a fair day's labour, they would find schooling for their children. Fearful alternations of commercial prosperity and decline may be inevitable, and no legislation may be able to reach the cause; but, in the words of Mr. GLADSTONE, (in the Foreign and Colonial Review), "we contend likewise, that legislation has had it within its power to do much towards their alleviation, by a cautious and wise adjustment of our commercial laws to the circumstances of the time." What is required in our legislators is not wisdom, so much as justice—the ceasing to do wrong. Ireland, Wales, the people of Great Britain, ask only for justice and protection,—that the toll-gates be thrown open to industry. The struggle which shakes the whole Kingdom, has been rightly described as a struggle between Feudalism and Commerce. The continual transformation of our great capitalists into nobles and territorial proprietors, which has saved our old feudal aristocracy from extinction, has, by strengthening the oligarchical interest, prolonged this struggle, throwing us back continually in the march of national improvement. To a similar cause, the conversion of their merchants into territorial magnates, the Republics of Italy owed the loss, first of their freedom, next of their commerce, and last, of their political existence. We have no fears for the issue of the struggle in this country, not because the people are too many, or too intelligent, but because they are strong in the moral and spiritual life, and in the spirit of religious freedom, which animate the sounder portion of the population. "It is in the creature MAN," (once more to cite the eloquent language of the Article attributed to the President of the Board of Trade,) "such as GOD has made him in this Island, that the moving cause of the commercial pre-eminence of the country is to be found; and his title to that pre-eminence is secure, if he can in himself but be preserved, or even rescued from degeneracy."—Pat.

LORD BROUGHAM.—During the present stagnation of public news, the daily journals are amusing their readers, and exercising their own gladiatorship, in a contest about the gifted but eccentric Ex-Chancellor LORD BROUGHAM. The Standard has boldly declared that there is no principle of vital importance on which they differ from his Lordship, while the Chronicle holds up his hands in amazement that any one should attempt the desperate task of upholding Lord Brougham's consistency.

Lord Brougham alleges that he has neither abandoned nor modified any of his principles, and we give him full credit for the truth of the assertion, since we do not think that Lord Brougham, from the beginning of his career, ever held very firmly any principle, while in regard to his opinions, there was, as the late Mr. Horner's early correspondence shows an "uncertainty" which rendered him always an object of distrust to his friends.

Lord Brougham has, indeed, been one of those characters, about whom the world was long egregiously received. His public course was long marked by no glaring inconsistency; and the country at large knew little of the by-play which marked the unsteadiness of his aim. He came to the great metropolis almost as an adventurer. His outset at the Scottish bar had been wild, but unsuccessful. Every one of his associates knew his vast powers of application, his stores of information drawn from every quarter, and the acuteness, the readiness, and the vigour of his intellect. But then all knew how loosely he wore his opinions, how little he was distinguished by firm principle, and how much there was of scepticism connected with all his sentiments, whether in politics, religion, or morals. At the time when he studied in Edinburgh, the school of David Hume was in the ascendant; and while almost all his contemporaries, including Horner, Jeffrey, Murray, and the rest, were tainted with the same leaven, yet there was a wildness about the composition of Brougham, which served to render that leaven more practically dangerous to men who feel the value of that steadiness in the politics of the world, which they disregard in the affairs of eternity.

The steadiness, the consistency, of FRANCIS HORNER have been eulogised by Sidney Smith and others of the Edinburgh clique, who seem to have regarded his obvious indifference to all religion and his undisguised enmity to vital Christianity as no drawback to his pretensions. And yet all soundness of principle, or moral worth, is but like a rope of sand, where it does not rest on the only true basis of sound principle and morality.

It might be easy to show, nevertheless, how it is that one man, with no more real principle than another, is able to win the confidence of those around him, which his neighbour is unable to secure. Much depends on that innate self-respect which renders a man tenacious of character and consistency, and in that respect for the good opinion of his fellow-men, which renders him unwilling to put it in jeopardy.

Lord Brougham has never been much distinguished for either of these qualities. Conscious of his great intellectual powers, his chief aim seems to have been rather to command the wondering admiration of the world, than to secure their reverential esteem. As a young man this tendency was more easily developed, and it was this which probably destroyed his prospects in Edinburgh, and led him to seek a wider field for his ambition in London. In the metropolis he became associated with the anti-slavery cause, and to that cause he has firmly adhered, so far, at least, as to prevent its being said that he was a deserter. But on many occasions he postponed the interests of the negro to those of the Whig, and has shown, that while he clung to the cause of abolition, and next to that of emancipation, neither abolition nor emancipation were, in his view, principles of action paramount to self. No man could less sympathize with Lord Ashley in the feelings which prompted that nobleman to sacrifice place and power to the cause of the factory children. But Lord Ashley's philanthropy stands upon a rock, which neither Brougham, nor Horner, nor the rest of their brilliant associates, ever reached.

If, however, forgetting all that we know, and all that we have at various times written, concerning Lord Brougham and his principles, we are only required to decide the question now debated between the Standard and the Chronicle, we have no hesitation in saying that Lord Brougham owes nothing to the Whigs. They distrusted, but feared him. Earl Grey reluctantly made him Lord Chancellor, having previously offered to appoint him Attorney-General—an offer to which he is stated to have verbally replied, that "there was no answer." Again, it is certain that Earl Grey's friends considered Lord Brougham as one leading cause of the retirement of their chief, while there is as little doubt that the Noble and Learned Lord had been himself scheming for the Premiership.

Indeed, we have the authority of Lord Brougham himself for saying that a correspondence did take place so early as May, 1832, for the purpose of enabling him to reconstruct the Cabinet when Lord Grey resigned, at the time Lord Lyndhurst's majority in the House of Lords seemed to threaten the Reform Bill. In the publication by himself of Lord Brougham's speeches—

"Lord Melbourne and his colleagues must have also well known that Lord Brougham's falling into disfavour with King William IV. was entirely owing to his pressing upon that monarch the immediate formation of the Government under Lord Melbourne himself, and his sudden declaration in his place that this Government was ready to continue in office—a step which wholly prevented his Majesty from executing his design of changing his Ministers, as he had hoped to do, if they had expressed any kind of reluctance to go on after Lord Grey's resignation. The same individuals also well knew his Majesty's severe displeasure and disappointment at Lord Brougham's peremptory refusal to take the Government in May, 1832, when his Majesty was desirous that it should be reconstructed by him of persons willing to carry the Reform Bill; for it is believed that they both knew of his intercourse with his Majesty, and of the written correspondence on Lord Brougham's positive refusal."

With reference to this curious piece of private history, which is only a specimen of many other private intrigues connected with the Reform Bill, the Chronicle, in an article, which may probably have come from the pen of an ex-Foreign Secretary, thus writes:—

"The reference to 1832 is curious enough. Lord Brougham peremptorily refused to form a Government! He had a correspondence and other communications on the subject, however; and he believes that this was known to his colleagues. It is a pity that this charming passage of history should lie in the obscurity which now enshrouds it. If Lord Brougham should keep the details to himself, we fear no one else will be able to furnish them. It is a pity that the world should possess no authentic record of a magnanimity so striking, and a regard so punctilious for the principle of united counsels in a Cabinet. We cannot, of course, suppose that Lord Brougham's recollection of what happened to himself in that year might be erroneous. It could not have been the case, for example, that it was Lord Brougham who asked permission to form a Government when nobody else would, and that it was the King who gave the peremptory refusal. But we may ask, whether the knowledge of this correspondence, which Lord Brougham believes his colleagues to have possessed, reached them in spite of Lord Brougham's anxiety to keep the matter secret, or why his habitual candour was not shown by a direct communication? Had this anything to do with the change, which we know from Lord Melbourne's public statement took place in Lord Brougham at that time? The factious opposition on the Canada question drew these remarks from Lord Melbourne, in February, 1838:—

"'He all along knew it must come—that the spirit of bitterness, the acerbity of feeling, which took its birth in the Noble and Learned Lord's mind in the beginning of 1833, and which had been gathering strength and bitterness from long and forcible suppression, must out at last. This was nothing more than he had long expected—than was natural—for most people were blind in respect to themselves, and it was impossible to perceive in their own case that which was clear and manifest to all the rest of mankind, and which was approved, and assented to by the general opinion of all those who considered the subject.'"

As to the secret history of the break-up between Lord Brougham and the Whigs, something is known, and something yet remains to be told. Meanwhile it would be foolish to refuse the assistance of one who knows his Whig friends, and their vaunted principles of patriotism, from long and intimate experience. His opposition, at all times to be deprecated, is to them tremendous, and we do not wonder that they are so little able to conceal the mortification to which they have been exposed during the past session, while writhing under the lash of his sarcastic eloquence.—Record.

FRANCE.—It was reported in Paris that the question of the marriage of Queen Isabel II. had been settled at the Chateau d'Eu, between the Governments of England and France, in favour of the son of the Infant Don Franciso de Paula.

A Havre journal states that it was contemplated to erect at Treport a column commemorative of the landing of Queen Victoria, with two allegorical figures, representing England and France holding each other by the hand.

King Louis Philippe has conferred the decoration of the Legion of Honour on the postilion through whose courage and presence of mind the whole Royal family of France were saved from destruction.

Galignani's Messenger of Friday, states that the King intends founding what is to be called the Victoria Gallery. In it will be placed a series of pictures connected with the proceedings of the Queen of England's visit. A special building is to be erected at the Chateau d'Eu for this collection.—Pat.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal directs, that the following copy of the Dispatch from the Honourable the Court of Directors, in the Public Department, No. 19 of 1843, dated the 26th September, and of the printed Notice issued by Her Majesty's Post Master General in England, relative to the alteration which has been prescribed in the transmission of Letters and Packets by the Overland Mail, be published for general information.

PUBLIC DEPARTMENT.

No. 19 of 1843.

*OUR GOVERNOR OF THE PRESIDENCY OF FORT WILLIAM IN BENGAL.

We transmit in the Packet a printed Notice recently issued by Command of Her Majesty's Post Master General, from which you will observe, that Southampton has been made by Her Majesty's Government the Port of arrival and departure of the Mediterranean and East India Mails, instead of Falmouth, and therefore all Letters and Packets from India intended to be forwarded direct to or through the United Kingdom, (instead of via Marseilles,) and which would, under our former orders, have been marked for transmission via Falmouth, should henceforward be addressed via Southampton, and we direct that the immediate and particular attention of your Post Master General be called to this alteration.

LONDON, 26th Sept. 1843.

We are, &c.,

Notice to the Public, and Instructions to all Post Masters, Sub-Post Masters, Letter Receivers, &c.

General Post Office, Sept. 1843.

Her Majesty's Government having decided that Southampton shall be made the Port of arrival and departure for the Peninsular, Mediterranean, Oriental and West Indian Mails, instead of Falmouth; the following are the arrangements which have been sanctioned, and which will come into operation on and from the 18th instant, on which day the next Packet to the West Indies will be dispatched from Southampton.

The respective Mails to be forwarded by the Packets from Southampton, will be made up in London, and transmitted from London to Southampton by the Morning instead of the Evening Mail, as at present, upon the undermentioned days, viz.

|---|---|
| Peninsular Mails, viz. Vigo, Oporto, Lisbon, Cadiz, Gibraltar, .... | Every Thursday. |
| Mediterranean, viz. Malta, Greece and the Ionian Islands, ...... | The 1st of the month and the Thursday nearest the 15th of the month.* |
| Egypt and India, .. | The 1st of the month.* |

* When the 1st of the month falls on Sunday, the Mediterranean and East India Mails will be made up in London, and dispatched on the previous morning.

West Indies, &c. .. .. The 2d and 17th of the month.*

Those Postmasters whose instructions direct them to send the correspondence for the above Packets to Falmouth, will, upon this measure coming into operation, forward such letters to London.

The Brazilian Packet will continue to be dispatched from Falmouth as at present.

Letters to and from the Mediterranean and the East Indies, &c. intended to be forwarded by the direct packet instead of via Marseilles, should henceforward be addressed via Southampton.

By Command,

OBSERVATIONS ON IDIOPATHIC DYSENTERY:

As it occurs in Europeans in Bengal, particularly in reference to the anatomy of that disease

BY WALTER RALEIGH, Esq.,

Surgeon of the Native Hospital, &c., one vol. post 8vo. cloth, lettered, Rs. 5.

"We are much mistaken if it will not be hailed as a very valuable addition to the general stock of pathological and therapeutic knowledge. It relates as its title shews to one of the most formidable diseases the tropical sojourner is liable to, and that requires the promptest, most skilful and decisive treatment for its cure. So far as we are enabled to judge, it is the most important that has appeared on the subject since the late Mr. Twining's dissertation. But ought to be in the hands of every Indian Medical Officer."—Englishman, January 3, 1843.

BY THE REV. JAMES G. SMALL.
Minister of the Free Church of Scotland.

"Mr. Small has a poet's eye to see the beauties of nature, and a poet's imagination to group the objects that come before him in new forms of loveliness: and, better still, he has the piety of an enlightened Christian leading him to consecrate his powers to the interests of virtue and religion, and shedding over the productions of fancy and feeling a lustre, brighter and purer than can emanate from genius, however exalted, unless it be illuminated by the light of Heaven. 'The Scottish Martyrs' contains many passages which are not merely beautiful, but calculated, under existing circumstances, to awaken loud and deep echoes in many a Scottish heart."—Witness.

EDUCATION.
CLAPHAM PARK ACADEMY NEAR LONDON.

IN this establishment a liberal education, in all its branches, is combined with an assiduous Intellectual Training, an ever watchful Moral oversight, Religious culture and the treatment of a Home.

The premises have been recently erected for the purpose, and combine advantages of no ordinary character, conducive alike to health, cheerfulness, and the formation of habits of good order: and the situation, for its salubrity, pleasantness and highly select character, is second to none in the environs of London. Mr. Long aims in all his arrangements and in his whole system of instruction, to extend to his pupils the full benefit of his own experience in teaching during more than twenty years, and to form the character through the instrumentality of his and Mrs. Long's personal attention and influence, and the steady application, by himself and assistants of a discipline equally mild and effective.

Mr. Long has pleasure in referring to the following Gentlemen, to whom he is well known: The Rev. E. Crisp, Bangalore; Rev. G. Mundy, Chinsurah; Rev. A. Lacroix, Calcutta; Rev. M. Hill, Berhampore; Rev. W. Morton, Calcutta; Rev. E. Porter, Vizagapatam; Rev. W. Porter, Madras; also to the Rev. James Hill, Clapham, Surrey, late of Calcutta.

The mildly bracing air of Clapham Park, and the superior accommodations of the house, including warm and cold bathing, are particularly adapted to the reception of pupils from warm climates.—Further particulars may be had of the Rev. E. Porter, Vizagapatam, and the Rev. W. Porter, Madras.

A LADY, the widow of a medical officer well known in the Bengal Service, residing in Regent's Park, London, wishes to receive three or four little girls from India to educate with her own two Daughters, for whom she has a very highly accomplished governess, any children committed to her care would in every respect be treated as her own family, and share the same advantages both in their moral as well as mental cultivation.

For terms and references apply to Messrs. Colvin, Ainslie, Cowie and Co., Calcutta.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

A LADY of high respectability and accomplishments, residing in a healthy part of the Coast of Kent, wishes to receive four Girls to board and educate with the advantage of living in a private family. The Lady is a mother, and having been for some years in India is well acquainted with the treatment for young persons of delicate constitutions. If desired too, she would have no objection to take charge of one or two little Boys up to 7 or 8 years old, in any case where parents were unwilling to separate brothers and sisters. The terms will be moderate varying according to the age of the pupil, but always for a specific sum annually, including extra charges of every description.

Cards of address, and other particulars will be given by the undersigned, and parties writing Home may communicate with Messrs. J. Cockburn and Co., No. 11, New Broad-street, London.

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY MORNING.

No. 468. Vol. IX.] SERAMPORE: THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21st. 1843. {Price 2 Co's. Rs. monthly, or 20 Rs. yearly if paid in advance.

Steam.—The Memorial of the Calcutta Trade's Association, to the Court of Directors in favour of the Comprehensive plan of Steam navigation, and which will be found among our selections, places this great question in a very lucid point of view, by a reference to incontrovertible statistical facts. It contrasts the interests which would be promoted by the despatch of the Steamers to Bombay alone, with those which are connected with the arrival of the Steamers direct at Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta. The argument deduced from this comparison needs no extraneous support. If the public Authorities at home are disposed to take a comprehensive view of their national duties, they will adopt that plan which shall give to all the Presidencies an equal participation in the blessings of Steam communication. If they take a narrow view of their responsibilities, they will confine their views to the single port of Bombay and the interests connected with it. We rather incline to fear that they will adopt the narrowest view of the case, partly because common sense so rarely enters into the councils of State, and partly because the interests of Bombay appear to predominate so largely at the India House over those of Madras or Calcutta.

A writer who calls himself A Looker on, in the Hurkaru, looks at the subject in what he considers a facetious light, and maintains that the only object which may be called national, and for which the Authorities in England will expend the public funds, is the early communication of political and commercial information; that is, the despatch of a packet of political news and political instructions to the Governor General; of a single Journal to the Editors at Madras and Calcutta, and the transmission of One commercial letter by express to each House of business at Ceylon, Madras, and Calcutta, at a most exorbitant rate of postage. This is what we have at present, and it costs Government the sum of One Hundred Thousand Pounds sterling a year. The rest of the correspondence comes on, at a heavy rate of postage, after a lapse of 5, 7, or 8 days. The patriotic Looker on says "this is an inconvenience certainly," and then he gives us some poetical quotation about "some banished lover or some captive maid." He altogether overlooks the fact, that the same sum which is now expended from the resources of India for the benefit of Bombay alone, would, if judiciously applied, be sufficient to give the same benefit to each Presidency, without injury to the favoured port of Bombay. This great fact has always been cast into the shade; and we have a right therefore to assume that the exclusive advocacy of the Bombay line does not arise from any real difficulty in the way of meeting the wishes and the wants of the rest of India, but from an undue partiality for one port, and, we fear, from that perversity of disposition which makes it so agreeable to some men to run counter to the views of others.

We lament that the Bentinck has gone home with so small a number of passengers as thirty-five. The Hindoostan took home seventy in the previous trip, and more than a hundred in the trip before that. We account for this falling off, partly from the fear of arriving in England in the depth of winter, and partly from the conveniences offered to old Indians, by the superior class of passenger ships now in the river. The old Qui-his, as the venerable old gentlemen of Bengal are called, look above all things to their comforts, and the Steamers are uncomfortable, while the great vessels which go round the Cape, afford every description of comfort. When the Honourable Company, with an eye to the approaching extinction of their trade, began to discontinue the despatch of their ships, some of the old Civilians of Lord Wellesley's days, asked what "was the use of the Company's sending them out to make fortunes, if they did not also send out ships to take them home, when their fortunes were made?" Something akin to this feeling still lurks about the old Indian, who likes to go home in a ship in which a Colonel and a Senior Merchant are still somebody, instead of being lost in the miscellaneous mob of a Steamer. But as the old stagers are transferred, one by one, to the United Service Club in London, this feeling will gradually die out, and all men of twelve or fifteen years standing, whether in the Civil, Military, Ecclesiastical or Medical profession, may be expected to patronize the Steamers, and to take the Pyramids on their way home. The patronage which those vessels receive will therefore be continually on the increase; and no dearth of passengers will be felt after the lapse of a year or two.

Far be it from us to say that Government is bound to keep up steamers on the direct line for the benefit of passengers, in the expectation that a sufficient predeliction for the shorter route will grow up to render much farther assistance from the public funds unnecessary. Still, we maintain that the support derived, or to be derived, from passengers, is a necessary ingredient in the question of Steam intercourse, and that if Government will help to keep up the Steam vessels for the present for the conveyance of packets, such a habit of using them will grow upon the community as to render the next contract Government may be called to make for the use of steamers to convey the mails, less burdensome on the public funds.

But this is only one of the collateral advantages of direct steam communication. The propriety of assisting it from the revenues of India rests upon other and higher grounds. It is impossible that the public in general at the Presidencies of Calcutta and Madras and at Ceylon, and the rising commercial community of the Straits and China can receive all their letters and communications from England as rapidly across the country, with our present roads or with any roads that can be made in the next four years, as they will by Steamers direct from Suez. Steam communication, to be kept up at all, must receive support from the funds of the State. Whether the large Steamers start from Calcutta or from Bombay, the expenses they incur will not be met entirely by passengers; but there will be more passengers from Calcutta than from Bombay, and for the same number of Steamers, Government will therefore have more to make up from the latter than from the former port. The sum now paid by Government for Steam communication which dissatisfies every one is more than would be required for a communication which would satisfy all parties, and equally meet the wishes of all the Presidencies. Therefore, it would be unwise in Government to patronize the exclusive route to Bombay and throw overboard the essential interests of the other Presidencies.

The Cabul Relief Fund.—Among our advertising columns will be found the scheme devised by the General Committee of the Cabul Relief Fund for the final distribution of the subscriptions placed at their disposal by the generous sympathies of the Indian community. The plan has now been communicated to the public through the newspapers of the North West for many weeks, yet such is the general apathy which has succeeded the warm interest once taken in the subject, that not a single line of approbation or dissent has been obtained from any body of contributors; and no communication has been received except from the Committees of Calcutta, Madras, and Agra, confirming the principle on which the scheme is based. The fact is, that the feelings in which this, the largest and noblest subscription which has ever been raised in India originated, have passed away, and cannot be revived. The Cabul disasters have been transferred to the province of the Historian, and are seldom alluded to, but as a peg on which to hang a little political vituperation. But as those who are to benefit by the fund are in a state of destitution which cannot be too soon relieved, and as the Committee at Kurnaul cannot sit for ever, we think they have acted with much discretion in fixing the 1st of January next as the period for receiving communications and suggestions, and in determining to proceed to a distribution of the funds after that date. The scheme which they have devised appears to evince much consideration and judgment. We are sure it has been framed in a spirit of impartiality, and with the single hearted desire to dispense the beneficence of the public with equity. It is not improbable that the general principle of distribution which has been adopted, may be open to some objection, as involving individual cases of hardship; but perhaps no plan which human ingenuity could have devised, would have been altogether free from some such imputation. It is certain however that to detain the funds any longer, in the vain hope of receiving communications from the subscribers, would be an act of injustice towards all those who are looking forward with anxiety to the relief it is to afford them.

The funds now remaining in the hands of the Kurnaul Committee, amount to 306,000 Rs. This is exclusive of 50,000 Rupees raised at Bombay, which has not been united with the general fund, but remains with the local Committee, who have made no communication relative to its disposal to the General Committee. This silence it is not easy to account for, especially after the Bombay Committee had been informed that a distribution would be made of all the funds on the 1st of January, and the administrative Committee dissolved. When that event takes place, there will cease to be any agency for the application of this large portion of the subscription to the object for which it was raised, and to which it ought to be sacredly applied. No distribution of it by a local Committee at Bombay, with their imperfect knowledge, can well be effected with justice and impartiality. Some have been led to ascribe the backwardness of the Bombay Committee on this occasion to an intention to divert the funds to another design, the connection of which with the object for which they were given, is but remotely perceptible,—we allude to the erection of the proposed Church at Colaba, in memory of those who fell. But we cannot bring ourselves for a moment to admit the idea that any body of men can be found at that Presidency to sanction so gross a violation of trust, and to lay out on brick and mortar, funds given from the noblest motives for the relief of the survivors of that great calamity, and for no other object. We hope these fears will be entirely removed by the union of the Bombay funds with the general fund, before the beginning of the coming year.

The document we now publish states that the number of maimed does not exceed 185. If a greater number existed in our own provinces, there is little doubt they would make themselves and their claims known. This account does not tally with the reports which were circulated on the advance of our army in 1842, of hundreds of maimed camp followers having crowded into the camp. The Committee state, however, that from all the information they can gather, there are more than three hundred Hindoostanees in Affghanistan, who, from their maimed condition are unable to find their way back. Dost Mahomed is known to have placed himself again in communication with the Governor General, and some have gone so far as to conjecture the nature of the reply which has been sent to him. We hope his Lordship has not allowed the opportunity to escape of impressing on the Ameer that the most acceptable service he can render to the British Government will be to provide for the conveyance of these unfortunate men back to our own provinces.

CHINA.—It may probably be in the remembrance of the reader that soon after the successful termination of hostilities with China, it became a matter of enquiry to whom the credit of advancing up the Yang-tze-kiang, and occupying the head of the great canal, was due. It was sufficiently apparent that the Chinese Cabinet, which had not been cowed by the appearance of our hostile fleet off the Coast of Pekin, or by the bombardment of Canton, or by the occupation of Amoy, Chusan and Ningpo, felt that this masterly movement had struck a blow at the heart, which paralyzed the powers of the empire, and rendered peace on any terms indispensible to its preservation. Some gave the credit of this measure to Lord Auckland, others to Lord Ellenborough, and some traced it up to the experience and counsels of Sir H. Gough. The last number of the Bombay Courier publishes some official correspondence between Lord Stanley, the Colonial Secretary, and the President of the Board of Control, and between Sir Hugh Gough and the Admiral, which appears to set this important historical question at once at rest, and enables us confidently to bestow the praise of that measure, which obliged the Emperor so humbly to sue for peace, in the right quarter.

From Sir Hugh Gough's despatches we find, that so late as the 22d of November, 1841, he continued to cherish the same opinion which had been simultaneously put forward by some of our journalists here, that the war could not be brought to a termination, before our army had advanced to the neighbourhood of Pekin. His Excellency says, "Considering the importance laid on the expedition to the Peiho, next spring, I would suggest the expediency of husbanding the troops, as well as the naval force this winter, as much as possible, to prepare them for the ensuing campaign to the northward."—Again, "this reinforcement with the force that I can collect during the winter at Chin-hae, will enable us to proceed at the very first change of the monsoon, to the entrance of the Gulf of Pe-che-lee, and to take up some defencible position where the reinforcements from India could join us."—Thus it appears that the plan of the campaign on which the Commander-in-Chief rested his hopes of success consisted of a march upon the capital of the Chinese empire.

Lord Stanley, however, in a letter addressed to the President of the Board of Control on the 31st of December of the same year, developes those views with regard to the object of the war, which became the basis of the treaty, and suggests, perhaps for the first time, those plans for the conduct of the campaign, which appear to have been implicitly followed by the Commanders. The passage runs thus:

"It is, I am persuaded, unnecessary to impress upon the Governor General of India, who is charged with the general superintendence of the wars that the only objects which Her Majesty desires to obtain are, satisfaction for the injuries to which her subjects have been exposed, and for the insults which have been offered to Her Crown, and the establishment of peaceful and friendly commercial relations with China, upon such footing as shall afford permanent and effectual security against the recurrence of similar misunderstandings for the future. Her Majesty desires no acquisition of territory, nor any advantages for her own subjects which should not equally be shared by other nations; and to the attainment of these objects, and these alone, the efforts of Her Majesty's forces are to be directed. Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the most probable means of obtaining these objects would be, the occupation of a position which would enable them effectually to control the internal commerce of the Chinese empire, and thus render the moral pressure upon the Court of Pekin irresistable.

Such a position, they think, would be attained by ascending the Yang-tse-kiang with a sufficient force to take and retain possession of the island which lies at the intersection of that river with the grand canal of China; and, as at present advised, it is to that object that the principal efforts of 1842 should be directed; but beyond this general intimation of intentions, which are themselves liable to be altered by information, which we have shortly received, I should deem it inexpedient to fetter the discretion of the Governor General by attempting at present to give him any precise instruction."

It appears therefore that this masterly movement up the Yang-tze-kiang, which was so signally, and we may also say, so unexpectedly crowned with success, originated with Her Majesty's Cabinet, if not with Lord Stanley himself; and not with the Governor General of India. We believe the future historian will consider it a mark of no ordinary sagacity in the Cabinet of London, to have devised a scheme of operations, without any aid from the experience of former success or failure in similar circumstances which, in the course of three months, brought the haughty ruler of three hundred millions of subjects to seek for reconciliation with those whom he had been accustomed to treat with such supercilious contempt.

But while we indulge a just feeling of exultation in the view of that combination of wisdom and energy which brought the war to a speedy termination, we must not ungratefully forget the manifest interposition of Divine Providence in our favour, in inclining the Chinese Authorities to a pacific councils, just at the precise juncture, when they proved all important to us. Notwithstanding our sagacity and our courage never perhaps was an expedition so absolutely on the brink of failure, from causes which no human power could control. It is no dubious fact that if the Chinese had not entered into negotiations at the time they did, we must have retired with humiliation from the scene of our triumphs. The Yang-tze-kiang differs little in character from the Indus, and at the season of the year in which our troops entered it, its banks are equally fatal to the European constitution. Sickness had made its appearance among the troops while they lay off Nankin to so alarming an extent, that in a short time the energies of the army must have been paralyzed; and if the Emperor had postponed the negotiations to the coming year, Nankin would probably have presented the same lamentable spectacle of an army in hospital, as Sukkur now does; the expedition must have retired from the river without accomplishing its object. Our eventual triumph under the able Commanders who conducted its movements was apparently certain; but if we had been obliged to retire from Nankin without success, the arrogance of the Court would have been inflamed, and, it is difficult to calculate what farther time must have elapsed, or what additional millions must have been sacrificed before peace was concluded. It was when these melancholy forebodings were beginning to fill the minds of men, that the Chinese Plenipotentiaries most providentially made their appearance and proposed terms of peace and friendship; and never was the advent of any messengers of peace more welcome. While therefore we pay a just tribute of honour to the discernment of the Ministry, the ability of the Generals, and the bravery of the troops, we must not forget those higher obligations under which, as a nation, we were laid by the gracious interposition of Providence, without which our triumph might have been turned into mourning.

There is one sentence in the extract we have made from Lord Stanley's letter, which deserves particular attention. "Her Majesty desires no acquisition of territory, nor any advantages for her own subjects which should not equally be shared by other nations." There is a noble spirit of disinterestedness in these sentiments, above all praise. While the nations of Christendom are upbraiding us, unjustly, for our exclusive, monopolizing commercial spirit, we are enabled to answer their reproaches triumphantly by pointing to our conduct on this grand occasion. Though we took up arms in our own national quarrel, and invaded China for the redress of our own individual wrongs, yet, so far was our Government from cherishing that narrow spirit with which it is charged, that it determined, from the very first, that all the nations of Christendom should participate equally with ourselves in the benefit of our success; and that our object should be to open the markets of China, not to our own national manufactures alone, but to the enterprizes of the whole civilized world. In our last article we stated our conjecture that the provision in the Supplementary Treaty which granted this equality of privileges to all foreign nations, originated with the Imperial Commissioner, and was intended to obviate the necessity of repeated references by foreign Envoys to Pekin. Now, however, we are rather disposed to adopt the conclusion, that it was suggested by our own Plenipotentiary, with the view of carrying out the large and enlightened views embodied in Lord Stanley's dispatch.

THE SUDDER DEWANNY ADAWLUT.—It is always with particular diffidence that we venture to question the propriety of any decisions passed by the Judges of our Sudder, or Supreme Native, Court. A feeling of official respect for the Judges who have been selected for their legal experience to preside in the final Court of appeal in this country naturally induces a mistrust of our own judgment; and there is always a fear lest the interference of a public journalist in any legal case should be construed into an attempt to control the opinions of those who ought to be left to the influence of their own unbiassed views of right and wrong. But there may be cases in which the independent opinion of the press will be found beneficial in securing such a reconsideration of a cause, as may lead to the correction of a harsh judgment, and subserve the substantial interests of justice. It is under this impression that we submit the following particulars of a suit which has recently been determined in the Sudder Court.

In the year 1823, Mr. Courjon, one of the most enterprizing landholders in the district of Comillah, rented an old ruinous Bungalow from the Raja of Tipperah, at 20 Rupees a month, on condition that he should occupy it as long as he continued in the district. He laid out a considerable sum in order to render it habitable. Four years after this transaction, at the recommendation of Mr. G. P. Thompson, the Collector, he undertook the management of the Raja's landed estates, which had become embarrassed; but finding that he was thwarted by the Raja's underlings, who were fattening on his spoils, he relinquished his post. On this they persuaded the Raja to serve him with a notice to quit the Bungalow, and Mr. Courjon brought an action against the Raja for his salary. But the Raja soon found it necessary to invite his assistance again, and an amicable arrangement was made by which both suits were quashed, and it was agreed that the agreement under which Mr. Courjon held the Bungalow, should stand good. But he soon found it impossible to promote the interests both of the Raja, and of his amlahs, and was obliged a second time to throw up his post of Mooktar. Again was he served with a notice to quit the Bungalow under pain of being obliged to pay ten Rupees a day for rent if he refused. With this injunction he did not think fit to comply. An action was then brought against him in the Zillah Court, which Mr. James Shaw, the Judge, threw out as malicious. The Raja appealed to the Sudder, who issued an order to Mr. Pringle to review the case. Mr. Pringle confirmed Mr. Shaw's decision. A second appeal was made to the Sudder who issued an order to the Principal Sudder Ameen to take up the case de novo. That officer decided that the Raja had a right to serve the notice; but his decision gave satisfaction to neither party, and the case came up in appeal again before the Sudder Court, when Mr. Barlow was of opinion that it should be decreed in favour of the Raja. The cause then came before Mr. Tucker, who confirmed the decision of the two Zillah Judges, Mr. Shaw and Mr. Pringle, and voted for reversing Mr. Barlow's decision. This brought the case before a third Judge, Mr. Reid, who dissented from Mr. Tucker, when Mr. Gordon, a fourth Judge was called in and sided with Mr. Barlow and Mr. Reid, admitted the right of the Raja to serve the notice, and decreed rent for three months—the period included in the action—at the rate of ten Rupees a day, or 300 Rupees a month.

There is of course no Regulation which supplies any principle on which the merits of such a case can be decided, and the Judges are consequently thrown upon their own resources, and are obliged to regulate their decision by the principles of "justice, equity and good conscience." But it seems difficult to conceive how a decree can be given in favour of the Raja for fifteen times the rent of the Bungalow upon any principle of equity, or how Mr. Courjon can be called on to pay the value of the Bungalow in a single month's rent. We know that on such occasions the Judges are sometimes in the habit of having recourse to the principles of equity as embodied in English law; but if we are not mistaken, there is an English statute which enacts that in similar cases no sum greater than twice the amount of the rent can be decreed. The decision is singularly unfair and injurious to Mr. Courjon, for on the strength of his lease he has continued to occupy the house till within the last two or three months, that is, during the six or seven years in which this case has been travelling so repeatedly from the town to the country, and from Judge to Judge. If the Rajah has a right to exact 10 Rupees a day during the first three months after the notice was served, he has an equal right to make the same exorbitant and iniquitous charge for the subsequent period. The Raja requires no prompting to bring his action in the local Court for the remaining term; and the Principal Sudder Ameen in Tipperah must in that case either reverse the principle on which the Sudder Court has founded its decision, or decree rent for Six years at the rate of 300 Rupees a month, to the extent of nearly 20,000 Rupees, for a mat Bungalow, not worth the fiftieth part of the sum.

It is generally surmised that the Judges of the Sudder were led to this apparently extraordinary decision by an impression that Mr. Courjon had used his authority as the Raja's Mooktar, to obtain a good house at a trifling rent, whereas the fact is that he had been in possession of the house four or five years before he accepted the office of Mooktar. If these premises be correct, it appears to be the duty of the Court, both from a regard for its own honor and dignity, and from the necessity of securing public confidence in its decisions, to review the case in all its bearings, for it will be impossible to convince the public that a decision which obliges a man to pay 20,000 Rs. rent for a house, for six years, instead of 1500 Rs.—the sum expressed in his agreement,—is consonant with the principles of "justice, equity and good conscience."

INLAND STEAM NAVIGATION.—Several weeks ago we fell into a controversy with some of our Editorial brethren, relative to the charge which the Assam Company had determined to make of Two Rupees for the freight of each cubic feet of tonnage on their vessel, while the charge on the Government steamers was only a Rupee and a half, if no auction took place. We pointed out at the time that this increase of price must necessarily diminish the value of that competition to which the public looked for a reduction of the present exorbitant price of freight. Our object was not to injure the Assam Company, but to benefit the community; and we subsequently acknowledged with gratitude that the Association had resolved not only to lower their charge to a Rupee and a half, but had even exceeded our expectations by determining to register applications for freight, in the order in which they were received, so as to remove the necessity of putting the freight up to sale; and also to make no discriminating charge between books, stationary and the like, and any other description of goods, metals excepted.

Upon the same principle on which we deprecated the augmentation of charge proposed by the Assam Company, do we now notice with particular satisfaction the great advantage which these judicious modifications are likely to secure to the community, and illustrate it by a pregnant example. In consequence of the time for the next despatch of the Assam Steamer having been necessarily fixed for the first week of January, an individual was under the necessity of employing the Government Steamer for the conveyance of three cases of stationary to Allahabad. The sum of their cubic contents amounted to Twenty-three feet, and the charge by the Assam Steamer, would consequently have been 34 Rs. 10 annas. The charge levied by the Government vessel, was Rupees 109-15-3!!—three times that of its competitor. We think it a matter of justice to bring this fact prominently before the public, and to found on it a strong recommendation of the enterprize on which the Assam Company has now embarked. The difference between the two charges is so extraordinary; the demand on the Government vessel appears so wantonly, so unnecessarily exorbitant, that it may possibly attract the attention of the public Authorities. But whether it does so or not, is no longer a matter of any great consequence. It will undoubtedly attract the attention of the public at large, who furnish the freight for these Steamers, and whose remonstrances have hitherto been treated with little consideration.

We rejoice that the days of this monopoly are numbered. When it was discovered three or four years ago, that the tonnage of the existing Steamers was inadequate to the demands of the country, and that in order to obviate a charge of favoritism, it was necessary to put up the freight to auction, by which process Government became large gainers at the expense of the public interests, it was clearly the duty of the public Authorities, either to have relinquished the task to private enterprize, or to have laid on such a number of additional vessels as would have reduced the charge within reasonable limits. Neither course was adopted; and thus an undertaking originally established with the noblest views, and which had materially benefited the country, became a source of public injury, by standing in the way of those improvements which the progress of commercial intercourse required. For a long time capitalists were deterred from entering on any competition with vessels backed by the resources of the State, but the Assam Company at length determined to start a rival steamer, and they have succeeded in conveying goods at a cheaper rate, and, generally speaking, in less time than the Honourable Company's vessels, and they will find ample and, we hope, also remunerating employment for her. We are happy to learn that two other vessels belonging to another party are about to be placed on this line of river navigation, exclusively of the more powerful vessels which we were led to expect some time ago from the Association with which Mr. Robertson is connected. There will therefore we hope from this time forward be no danger of our being obliged to pay the same exorbitant charge to which we have alluded, for lack of wholesome competition.

THE LATE DISCUSSION REGARDING THE SPELLING OF THE NAME OF JESUS.—Some months have now elapsed since the warm contention which was raised regarding the orthography to be adopted for the name of Jesus, in the Oordoo translation of the Scriptures, subsided; and both parties have been waiting with anxiety for the decision of the British and Foreign Bible Society, from whom the Auxiliary Society in Calcutta derives its main support, and to whom the matter had been referred. We have now been favoured with the copy of a letter from the Editorial Superintendent of the Parent Society, the Rev. Mr. Jowett, which gives a demi-official reply to the reference. The subject is one on which the Committee in London are desirous, if possible, to avoid touching, though their opinions may be clearly discerned from the tenor of this document. They are in hope that this unofficial communication may lead to such an accommodation of views as shall obviate the unpleasant necessity of a more formal discussion of the subject, and an authoritative decision upon its merits.

We recommend the letter to the especial attention, not only of those who have taken an interest in this question, but to all who can appreciate a combination of Christian affection and sound judgement, of the urbanity of the gentleman, and the classic elegance of the Scholar, such as this letter presents. Seldom has it fallen to our lot to peruse an epistle which so eminently deserved to be called in the largest sense of the word, "beautiful." As a mere composition, we think it will stand an advantageous comparison with some of the finest specimens in the language. But it is the genuine spirit of Christian charity and moderation which it breathes, that gives it such paramount importance in reference to the present controversy. Nothing can be more effectual and at the same time more modest than the rebuke it bestows on the fierce spirit in which that controversy was conducted. We by no means intend to exempt ourselves from all share in this rebuke, for although we thought at the time that the tone of our remarks was one of earnestness, rather than of intemperance, yet with this noble model before us, we can scarcely continue to adopt this flattering construction.

We hope the letter will produce the desired effect, and not only bring the present discord to a close, but render the co-operation of all those who are embarked in this sacred cause, more firm and cordial than ever. It is perhaps an unhappy element of the controversy that it does not admit of that reconciliation which is based on mutual concessions; and that one party or the other is required to give up, not in part, but absolutely, the ground which it has occupied. Mr. Jowett has well described the question as "rather a philological than a practical one; one in which concession might be made by either party without any real violation of sound conscience." In these circumstances, we trust the Committee of the Auxiliary Society in Calcutta will reconsider the question in every aspect; more especially in its bearing upon the welfare and progress of the great cause for which they are associated together. We trust they will not deem us presumptuous if we respectfully represent that the concession would come more appropriately from those who are advocating the innovation, than from those who object to it; that, controlling as they do the resources on which the Missionaries depend for the means of printing the Scriptures, a concession on their part would have all the grace of Christian magnanimity, whereas a concession from those whom Mr. Jowett emphatically describes as the "working clergy and missionaries of Northern India," would appear as a submission to the necessity of circumstances, and might not be accompanied by a revival of that cordiality, which is so desirable. Lastly, we would submit, that as the heat and burden of the day, the labour of translating, distributing and expounding the Scriptures falls on the Missionaries, their opinions are apparently entitled to that peculiar deference, which would admit of a concession on the part of the Committee, without any sacrifice of its dignity.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14.

— Amongst the notices of Marriages appears the first celebrated in Calcutta by the Ministers of the Free Presbyterian Church, who have thus taken their place with the Dissenters in asserting their right to marry, even without an extension of the new marriage Act to India.

— A handsome silver cup has been presented by the Assam Company to Captain F. W. Smith of the Seetakoond, in acknowledgment of his services in taking their Steamer twice to Allahabad, so as to establish her character.

— Nine Officers now appear as candidates for the office of Home Agent to the Military Fund. They are Major Colnett, Capt. Doveton, Major Geddes, Major Hough, Dr. R. Loughton, Dr. Lightfoot, Major Payne, Major Thorpe, and Major Turner.

— The Star mentions a rumour as current for some time past, derived from private letters by the last mail, that it is the intention of the Court of Directors at last to grant an increase of European Officers to the Indian Army. The increase is to be made by the formation of a second grade of Captains, giving each Regiment a number of second Captains eventually to equal the present number of Captains, but to be promoted gradually as young officers are sent to occupy the inferior ranks. Opposition to the measure is, however, anticipated from the Home Government, as the Premier is said to be determinedly opposed to any increase of the Indian Army, either in officers or men, because of certain new arrangements intended at the expiration of the present charter.

— A letter in the Star from Sukkur, of the 27th November, gives a list of thirty-four Officers who had been compelled by sickness to leave the station, and two who had died, within the previous two months. The lives of a detachment of European Artillery, three Regiments and the staff were then intrusted to the care of one medical officer. Fever was gradually decreasing; but dysentery was raging as much as ever.

— The Englishman reports that Sir William Nott left Lucknow on the evening of the 5th Instant with his family, to proceed to sea for the benefit of his health; and that Major General Pollock has gone to Lucknow to officiate for him during his absence—rather a singular arrangement certainly.

— The Agra Post Office is to be immediately given into the charge of an Uncovenanted Officer—an arrangement which might be followed elsewhere, and no harm be done.

— The Delhi Gazette of the 6th instant says, that Camp equipage was preparing at Agra for the Governor General, and that his Lordship's Aid, Captain Maclean, with the cook and native doctor reached Agra on the 4th.

— In the same paper there appears a letter from Gwalior, of the 27th November, which states that a meeting of the officers of the Lushkur had been held, at which it was suggested that no opposition should be offered to the British Army crossing the Chumbul, but that feigning a retreat they should get behind the British Force and fall on Agra, Muttra and Delhi. Nothing, however, was definitely resolved on. The last report from Gwalior, to the 3d instant, was that Bapoo Seetoleeah has strongly advised the Tara Bhaee, at the earnest suggestion of the Baeza Bhaee, to give up Dadajee; and that Ram Rao Pholkea, Sumbajee, and other deputies at Agra had been instructed accordingly. The superior officers are anxious to give up the Dada, but the men are urgent against the measure.

— Baboo Dwarkanath Tagore arrived at Delhi on the 1st instant, and is busy sight seeing. The King left his Palace on the 5th instant, for the first time since he was deprived of the harmless homage of his Nuzzurs; and he received the proper salutes both from his own battery, and from the light field battery in garrison.

— So poor is the supply of firewood in Delhi, that the extra demand for funeral piles, in consequence of unusual mortality amongst the Hindoos, has raised the price of the better sort of fuel to a Rupee for two maunds. Government has increased the allowance for planting trees from 1000 to 3000 Rupees, on the Doab canal, and for the past eight months the planting operations have gone on rapidly.

— Letters from Loodiana, to the 3d December, says the Delhi Gazette, give the intelligence that Raja Goolab Singh is likely to assume command of all the Sikh troops on the right bank of the Sutlege, to be stationed opposite Ferozepore; that Lena Singh is to command at Phuloor, and Soochet Singh at Rooper. It is also reported that all the European Officers are to be dismissed from the Seikh service; and that steps are to be taken for putting to death Juwahir Sing, the uncle of the King, who attempted to run off with him.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15.

— The Star reproves us for saying that our contemporaries, who advertize the villainous Lottery Schemes which have replaced the Government speculation, do so, "without any approval whatever on the part of the Editors;" and we think undeservedly. We have but given our Editorial brethren credit for truth in their own protestation. We are at the same time quite agreed with him in thinking, not only that with all their disapproval they encourage the Lotteries, but that they even give them all their life. It is as plain as noonday, that without the circulation afforded to their advertizements by the papers the Lotteries must die at once. It is in the power of the Editors to extinguish these evils; they tell us it would gratify them if that were done; yet they refuse to withhold their assistance in perpetuating them. We put the thing as an inexplicable mystery—and so we must leave it. The Hurkaru's plea, that every man is to be held innocent till proved guilty, in no way explains it.

— The name of Major James Steel is added to the list of Candidates for the Home Agency to the Military Fund.

— The Star reports that the Siege Train now forming at Agra, consists of 50 pieces of ordnance, (6 of them being Iron 24 Pounders, and 10 of them Iron 18 Pounders,) together with several Field pieces.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16.

— An advertizement appears to-day of the appointment of Mr. James Calder Stewart as successor to Mr. Gordon in the Secretaryship of the Union Bank, subject to the approval of the Proprietors at their next general meeting. Mr. Stewart undertakes his office in circumstances that will afford opportunity for exhibiting every qualification he can possess for the discharge of its duties: and we trust he will shew himself equal to the occasion. As it is, he is recommended both by the excellence of his personal character, and his relationship to one of the kindest hearted men ever connected with the commerce of Calcutta, James Calder: and Calcutta has not been poor in such characters.

— At Hickey and Co.'s sale of the 14th, the highest price obtained for Indigo—that of R. C. Bell and Co. Nuddea,—was Rs. 152-8.

— A General Meeting of the Agricultural Society was held on the 13th inst. at which a number of interesting communications were made. We observe a strong recommendation of Messrs. Veitch and Sons, Seedsmen of Exeter, by Major Napleton of Bhaugulpore; who testifies, that their charges are most reasonable, and that their seeds, sent by the overland mail, came up freely the fourth day after sowing. We are happy to second the recommendation both from personal acquaintance with Mr. Veitch, and his gardens, and from experience of the value of his investments to this country.

— We are also happy to see a notice of the near completion of that splendid ornament to the City of Palaces, the Metcalfe Hall.

— The Hurkaru reports the prevalence of cholera and small pox at Akyab, with great mortality amongst the Native population; Lieut. Staples, of the 68th N. I. had also been cut off by cholera.

— The Bombay Government have been under the necessity of advertizing for uncovenanted Surgeons, to proceed to Scinde on temporary employment. We are happy to see it stated in the Gentleman's Gazette, that the sickness in Scinde is not fatal in proportion to its extent.

— The Bombay Geographical Society have received their portrait of Sir A. Burnes, from the easel of Brockedon.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 18.

— The Englishman has done himself honour by publishing his Sunday Paper on Saturday evening; for which he has the reward of a flippant sneer from the Idler of the Eastern Star, and the approbation of all to whom religion is not a jest.

— The Papers are fil ed with rather discordant reports of the Annual Examinations of the High School and the Parental Academy. We imagine the most forward to blame, are the least capable of estimating the diligence and ability, of which they appreciate the fruits so little.

— The Calcutta Trade Association have made a valuable contribution to the advocacy of our Steam Cause, in Memorials to the Board of Controul, and the Court of Directors, which will be found amongst our selections.

— The Governor General reached Allahabad on the 3d instant, and was expected at Agra on the 11th.

— The Delhi Gazette of the 9th contains long communications from Cabul, the most important items of which are the visit of the Meer Wullee of Kheoloom to the Dost with little welcome—the dismissal of Sufter Jung with four Rupees for his travelling expenses, and every mark of contumely, on his way—the rapacity of the Dost in confiscating the property of a merchant at Attock on pretence that he is dead—and the reception of a studiously brief reply from the Governor General, to the communication formerly reported to have been sent him by the Dost. Every thing asked has been refused; yet the Dost has another letter to his Lordship in preparation.

— The late appearance of the Nepaulese in the territories of Oude had occasioned orders to the troops at Cawnpore to hold themselves ready for service on the shortest notice. The orders, however, were soon withdrawn.

— The Englishman gives favourable accounts from South Australia. According to the South Australian Register, the population now amounts to 16,000, possessing 360,000 sheep, 20,000 horned cattle, 2,000 horses, and 21,000 acres of land under cultivation, and exporting last year to the extent of £75,000. The colony is therefore looking up, and may yet afford practical demonstration of the soundness of the principles on which it was formed.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 19.

— The Shipping Report contained the alarming Notification that the mails had missed the Bentinck; which got to sea on the morning of the 16th inst. apparently about 24 hours from Calcutta. It is to-day explained, however, that these mails were only a small packet of stray letters sent after the Steamer: the bulk of the Mail was all safe on board.

— The Bombay Times of the 9th expects the mail by the Berenice on the 14th or 15th, possibly sooner.

— On the 12th instant, the Landholder's Society met to receive Mr. George Thompson on his return to Calcutta, and to form arrangements for his discharging the duties of the Society's Agent in England.

— The Englishman says that the Windsor Castle, the Steamer lately arrived from the Mauritius, is to ply up and down the river, so as to pass our way. We shall be glad to see her at work: but it must be recollected she will be of little use, unless we can go to town in her in the morning, and return home in the evening; moreover she can succeed only by low fares, and must probably lose for a time, before passengers are drawn to her in sufficient number.

— The Madras papers mention the death of Major General Walker, H. M. 21st Fusiliers, of cholera.

— A Bombay Government Notification is published, intimating that from the 1st of March next, Post Masters throughout India will be prepared to receive, at the option of the sender, Steam Postage on all Letters directed to the United Kingdom via Southampton. It will be found amongst our selections.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 20.

— Lord Ellenborough reached Agra, on Monday the 11th instant, and was received with all honour. A division of the army broke ground on the 12th and commenced its march towards Gwalior. The Park, which comprizes no less than 2000 hackeries, and the Engineer Department which musters 500, were expected to follow on the 16th, but the whole would have to halt for some days on the banks of the Chumbul, to await the arrival of the Bridge which has been constructed at Agra.

THE NOVEMBER MAIL.

The November Mail, which we were led by the Bombay Times, not to expect for several days, has come in unexpectedly this morning, and we have received by express, a copy of the London Atlas of the 4th of November. The only intelligence of particular interest is the prohibition of farther Meetings in Ireland and the arrest and prosecution of Daniel O'Connell, for conspiracy and other misdemeanors. We present our readers with the Summary of the Atlas, and subjoin to it some farther items of intelligence gleaned from the Journal.

SUMMARY OF THE MONTH.

The absence of all subjects of public excitement during the month of September has been fully counterbalanced by the political occurrences of the month that has just closed. The mail which bore to India the tidings of our gracious Sovereign's reception in France and Belgium, and was rife with complaints of the inaction of our Government in respect to Ireland and Wales, had scarcely left these shores, when the authorities shook off their lethargy and commenced operations in both quarters. The first measure adopted was to prohibit a great repeal meeting at Clontarf by proclamation—the second, to arrest O'Connell and some of his repeal associates on a charge of sedition founded upon the deposition of a reporter named Hughes.

We have given, in subsequent columns, full details connected with these transactions, whence it will be seen that preparations are making for the trial of the great Agitator, and that counter proceedings had been attempted against the reporter upon a charge of perjury. By a very large class the Government is censured for its present interference, seeing that it has permitted monster meetings to be held, and inflammatory harangues to be delivered, for months past, without let or hindrance, and has therefore in a manner connived at the operations of the repealers. On the other hand, it is argued that effectually to arrest the demonstrations making in Ireland, a large amount of physical force, well organized and judiciously placed, was essential; and as this coercive power could not be mustered at an earlier period, there is no sufficient reason for an imputation of indifference to O'Connell's proceedings. It is confidently asserted that Government will fail to obtain a conviction against O'Connell simply upon the affidavit of a man who has erred in part of his representations. Meanwhile, Ireland is covered with troops, and her coasts watched by vessels of war. Great activity prevails in the law courts of Dublin, and O'Connell divdes his time between preparations for his defence and exhortations to his millions of followers not to violate the public peace.

In South Wales an inquiry, by commission, has been commenced, and some of the "daughters of Rebecca," whose violence was attended with crime, have already come under the cognizance of the law. But here, as in Ireland, commotion has temporarily ceased, pending, as it were, the result of the investigations. The solemn inquiry ordered by Government demonstrates that the grievances of the rustic population have awakened Ministers from their apathy, and riveted attention upon the necessity for soothing measures—and that is something gained.

Next to the affairs of Ireland, no political occurrence has so much agitated the public mind, at least while the issue was uncertain, as the contest for the representation of the City. In our last mention was made of the demise of Sir Matthew Wood, and of the intention of Mr. BARING, in the Tory interest, and Mr. PATTISON, an ardent Reformer, to contest the vacant seat. The election which was decided in favour of Mr. PATTISON, is the most important demonstration which has been made by an electoral body since the passing of the Reform Bill. Interests of the very highest magnitude were virtually staked on the result of this appeal to the greatest commercial constituency in the kingdom—that of the city of London. The contest has been well described by the impartial testimony of the Times, as a fair stand-up fight between the Anti-Corn-Law League and the Ministry. This is perfectly true, with the explanation that the contest was between the principle of free-trade as represented by the Anti-Corn-Law League, and that of monopoly, now for the first time openly and avowedly identified with the cause of the Conservative Government and their candidate, Mr. BARING. Throughout the whole canvass and preparatory proceedings of the election, it was made a question, not of Whig or Tory, but of free-trade or no free-trade. "Will you support a repeal of the corn-laws?" "Will you vote for the admission of foreign sugar?" were the questions put to Mr. BARING, and his answer was—"No, I will not do so; but I will support Sir ROBERT PEEL." His principal supporters all avowed themselves decided advocates of commercial restriction. "Free-trade in the abstract," said Mr. SOAMES, "may be all very well, but it will never do for England." The staple of Mr. BARING's speeches, and of the electioneering addresses and placards with which the walls in the metropolis were covered in his behalf, was the same as that of Mr. FERRAND's speeches last session—denunciation of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and an appeal to old English prejudices against the novel and new-fangled free-trade crotchets of interested cotton-spinners.

On the other hand, the Anti-Corn-Law League threw itself boldly, and without reserve, into the contest, which was in a great measure organized and conducted under the auspices of its members. They appealed to no party recollections, no popular prejudices, none of the usual electioneering clap-traps, but nailed the colours of free-trade to the mast, and told the citizens of London plainly that this was a contest between commercial reform and commercial restriction.

To estimate properly the importance of the victory gained, we must bear several things in view. First, the city of London is, in many respects, the most unfavourable arena upon which the battle of free-trade could be fought. It is the stronghold of many of the most important monopoly interests. The West India interest, for instance, is mainly concentred in the City; the shipping interest, which has always a strong Conservative tendency, is also extremely powerful; the chairman of the East India Company is Conservative member of the City, and the Conservative and official part of this interest is, to a great extent, brought to bear upon City elections. To this we may add that the tendencies of the great private banks and leading old-established mercantile firms, are, for the most part, opposed to free-trade innovations and favourable to the continuation of the old routine system which works so well for them. In fact, Mr. JONES LOYD is the only first-rate City name which we can recal on the Liberal side, to oppose to those of the BARINGS, REID IRVINGS, SOAMES, LYALLS, MASTERMANS, and others who espouse the opposite cause. Add to this the whole weight of Government influence and Conservative feeling and party organization, brought to bear upon an election which was universally felt to be of the most vital importance to the Ministry and Conservative cause. We speak from distinct information when we say that a canvass was never more vigorously conducted, and greater exertions of every sort were never made than by Mr. BARING's friends and committee.

To counterbalance all this, what was there? Simply the Anti-Corn-Law League, and the decided feeling of the middle class of citizens in favour of free-trade. There was, perhaps, never less party excitement, never less enthusiasm for Whig as Whig, opposed to Tory as Tory, but there was a very strong feeling in favour of the principles of free-trade, and a very general disgust at the conduct of Sir ROBERT PEEL's Government in allowing themselves to be arrested in the commencement of the career of commercial reform by the opposition of the landed interest.

It is not long since we warned our readers of the rapid development of this feeling among the middle classes of the county, and of the growing strength of the Anti-Corn-Law League. The result of the city of London election has shown that this progress has been more rapid even than we had anticipated. Ever since 1835 the Conservative party had been steadily gaining ground in the City; their candidate was beaten in 1837 by a majority of six only, and in 1841 they returned two members, polling a decided majority of votes, and only failing to obtain the signal triumph of defeating Lord JOHN RUSSELL by a narrow majority of nine. In 1843 they are decidedly beaten with the best candidate whom they have ever put forward, and with the whole organization of the Carlton Club and Conservative party brought to bear upon the single election. The question forces itself in every man's mind—"If the Liberal party and Anti-Corn-Law League could carry the City, what large constituency or important place could they fail to carry in the event of a general election." Beyond all question, if the leaders of the Whig party come forward frankly and coalesce with the Anti-Corn-Law party on free-trade principles, they could carry in the event of an election to-morrow, all the metropolis, Manchester, and all the Lancashire boroughs; Leeds, Sheffield, and the West Riding of Yorkshire, with its boroughs; Edinburgh, Glasgow, and all the Scotch towns of any importance; Hull, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Sunderland, and all the leading shipping ports; and, in fact, with the exception, perhaps, of Liverpool, and one seat for Bristol, every city and town of commercial and manufacturing importance in the United Kingdom. In the face of this indisputable fact, how can Sir ROBERT PEEL's Government, already enfeebled by the failures of last session, and by the jealousies and divisions in the Conservative camp, assume a bold front against the embarrassments which press it on two sides—from Ireland and from the Anti-Corn-Law League.

The great success of the efforts of the League in the matter of the City election has generated, we repeat, the hope that similar triumphs will attend their labours in the provinces. The vacancies in Kendal and Salisbury, by the demise of the respective members for those places, now, for example, afford additional opportunities for testing the power of agitation, and the result of the issue of new writs is consequently looked for with no common degree of interest.

In Scotland secessions from the Established Church continue to be matters of daily occurrence. It has been announced by Dr. Chalmers that there are now 700 congregations of lay adherents of the Free Church who are destitute of places of worship; and although the subscription in aid of the cause of the seceders is large, not more than 30*l.* per annum each can at present be spared for the maintenance of the free clergy. The intelligence received from India of the adherence of the missionaries of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay has been received with acclamation, as it conveys the strongest evidence of the power of faith and conviction over the suggestions of worldly advantage.

Sir Robert Peel is assailed by no vehement hostility; but neither is he supported by any energetic friendship. Sir Robert Peel aspires to be necessary to all parties, but identified with none. He partly succeeds; the Tories want him to defend them in Parliament against the Whigs—the Whigs to pass Liberal measures in spite of the Tories. He is cautious, candid, impartial, and unpledged. He respects the Church, but refuses to identify himself with it; he approves free trade, but refuses to carry out its principles; he defends agricultural protection but reduces the duties on corn; he acknowledges the hardships of the poor law, but evades the task of curing them; he deprecates Irish agitation, but has shrunk, until last week, almost incomprehensibly, from the shadow of coercion. He is civil to all parties and interests, and satisfies none. He represents no popular principle; and we may add, that personal attachment he seems rather to despise than court. He has the credit and authority of an able Parliamentary leader, who has been in the uniform habit of opposing certain other politicians from a certain direction; and beyond this, men do not very well know where to have him.

Not to make mention of the weather and the Queen would be an impeachment alike of our nationality and our loyalty. We have been blessed with a beautiful autumn, as gentle in its influences upon health and the senses as it has been favourable to the maturity of the fruits of the earth. The farmers are everywhere rejoicing, for, with the single exception of hops, their produce is abundant, and finds a ready market. Her Majesty, inspired, perhaps, by the natural desire of enjoying locomotion while the sun shines, has varied the monotony of regal existence by a visit to the University of Cambridge, where, restraining for a time the mirthfulness ordinarily concomitant with pleasure excursions, she has listened with becoming gravity to the tedious discourses, six in English and three in Latin, which were delivered on the occasion, and witnessed with complacency the assumption by her Royal consort of the habiliments of a Doctor of Laws. The University has done itself honour by the manner of its reception of the Sovereign, and Lord Hardwicke has not the less distinguished himself by the hospitalities of Wimpole, previous to her Majesty's return to Windsor.

Espartero, the Duke of Victory, continues in England, but so many more illustrious people have visited us since his arrival that his movements have ceased to excite any particular interest. The Grand Duke Michael of Russia, the Duc de Bordeaux, the Prince and Princess Hohenlohe Langebourg, have all in their turn attracted notice, and their movements have been faithfully chronicled in the journals of the day. Two other titled, but unfortunate personages, the Duke of Normandy, and Prince Christophe of Hayti, have also rendered us sensible of their presence, but the pretensions of the one and the abject poverty of the other have caused their names to appear more frequently under the head of police reports, than in the niche devoted to the court circular.

Of minor matters we have little to record beyond what will be found succinctly given in subsequent columns. There has been the usual amount of murders, robberies, and suicides. Little Wonder, the winner of the Derby in 1840, has died, and one slight railway accident, the result of design, has occurred to bear out the sagacious prophecy of Vox Stellarum Moore, that something of the kind would happen about the 23rd October. It is a remarkable fact connected with railways, that to such perfection has the security of the traveller been brought, only 1 in 90,000,000 of rail passengers sustained injury during the year 1842.

— Alderman Magnay has been elected Lord Mayor of London by a majority of 700, over his closest competitor.

— The Reverend Dr. Wolff has taken his departure for Bokhara, for the rescue of Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly, if they yet survive, and to gather particulars of their death, if they have been murdered. The subscription to defray his expenses has not reached more than 300*l.*

— Sir Archibald Campbell, so well known in India by his campaigns in Burmah, has paid the debt of nature at a very advanced age.

— The Duke of Bordeaux, the Pretender to the throne of France has arrived in England with a considerable suite. A regular system of espionage has been organized by the French Government, to watch all his movements.

— An attempt is said to have been made to assassinate the Pope by a Physician, a great revolutionist, and greatly in distress for money. He demanded an interview with the Pope, but was arrested, and a loaded pistol found on him.

— The last accounts from Greece represent that tranquillity prevailed throughout the country. Col. Colocotroni, an Aid-de-Camp of the King, had endeavoured to get up a counter revolution, but the King had been compelled to dismiss him. His Majesty had also declared his irrevocable will and determination to adhere to the new system of Government.

— The Rev. Charles Seager, late fellow of Worcester College, Oxford, has joined the communion of the Church of Rome—and the Reverend Mr. Sibthorpe has returned to the bosom of the Protestant Church.

— Mr. Samuel Jones Lloyd, the eminent banker and political economist, has given in his adhesion to the Anti-corn-law league, and sent a subscription of 50*l.*

— The election of the free trade candidate for the city of London, Mr. Pattison, was carried by a majority of 165; the numbers being for Mr. Pattison 6532, and for his opponent Mr. Baring, the advocate of commercial restrictions, 6367.

— Sir James Shaw, Bart. of the county of Ayr, who had by his industry and honesty, raised himself from the humblest situation in a mercantile counting house to the office of Lord Mayor, and Chamberlain of the City, has died at the age of 80.

— Lord Ellenborough's proposal to discontinue the system of advances on goods in India, with the view of effecting remittances to England, has created a considerable sensation in the commercial circles in London; but it appears to be generally approved.

— The Chinese tariff has given general satisfaction—even to the French, who anticipate a wide market for their wines (champaign versus shamshoo) figured silks and other products. A fleet and a numerous embassy is to be sent to China, at the head of which is M. de Langadarée, a man of considerable ability.

NOTIFICATION.

OPTIONAL PRE-PAYMENT OF POSTAGE ON OVERLAND LETTERS.

1. The Home Authorities having finally determined on the introduction of the scheme for permitting the optional pre-payment of the Postage on Letters passing between the United Kingdom and India viâ Southampton, IT IS HEREBY NOTIFIED for general information, that the Hon'ble the Governor in Council has been pleased to fix, as the day on which the new system shall be brought into operation in this Country, the 1st of March next, from which date the several Post Masters throughout India will be prepared to receive, at the option of the sender, Steam Postage on all Letters directed to the United Kingdom viâ Southampton.

2. The following are the British rates of the Steam Postage agreed upon by the Lords of the Treasury, according to which, subject to confirmation by the Right Hon'ble the Governor General in Council, all Letters received "Bearing" from or despatched "Paid" to, the United Kingdom viâ Southampton, will be taxed in addition to the usual Indian Postages, viz:

| | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| When not exceeding .. | ½ Ounce | 1 Shilling | or | 8 | ans. |
| Above ½ oz. and not excdg. | 1 do. | 2 do. | or | 1 | rs. |
| " 1 do. and not excdg. | 2 do. | 4 do. | or | 2 | rs. |
| " 2 do. and not excdg. | 3 do. | 6 do. | or | 3 | rs. |
| " 3 do. and not excdg. | 4 do. | 8 do. | or | 4 | rs. |

And so on, increasing two Shillings or one Rupee for every additional ounce weight or any fraction thereof.

3. As British weights may not be generally available to the Public for regulating the weight of their correspondence, the following scheme for using coins of Indian Currency for that purpose, will be found to afford a very close approximation to the ounce and half ounce weights.

The half ounce avoirdupois—the weight for a single steamer Letter—being equal to Grains Troy 218¾, and one Rupee and one copper Pie of the Co.'s currency being equal to Grains Troy 213⅓, every person confining his English correspondence to the weight of these two coins, will be certain of being within the weight prescribed for a single steamer Letter.

|---|---|
| 1 Rupee ......... | 180 |
| 1 Copper Pie | 33.333 |
| Grains Troy | 213.333 |

The ounce avoirdupois—the weight of a double steamer Letter—being equal Grains Troy 437½, and two half anna pieces, and one copper Pie being equal to Grains 433⅓ every Letter not exceeding the aggregate weight of three such coins will in like manner, be within the weight allowed to a double steamer Letter.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Two half anna pieces of Grains Troy | ..200 each | 400 |
| 1 Copper Pie | . | 33.333 |
| Grains Troy | | 433.333 |

4. The Public will bear in mind that this optional prepayment of the Steam Postage applies only to the route viâ "Southampton," and that Letters sent by "Marseilles" cannot be prepaid in this Country. It applies also only to Letters posted in India addressed to the United Kingdom and vice versa, and does not apply to Letters posted in, or addressed to, places beyond the United Kingdom; i. e. all Letters for America, unless addressed to Agents in the United Kingdom, as well as those addressed to the Continent of Europe, if marked "viâ Southampton," must go "bearing" from this Country. JOHN GORDON, Post Master Genl.

Bombay, Genl. Post Office, 6th December, 1843.—Bombay Times, Dec. 9.

TO THE HONOURABLE COURT OF DIRECTORS OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY.

The respectful Memorial of the Calcutta Trade Association.

SHEWETH,—That your Memorialists, fully participating in the strong feeling evinced in this city on the announcement by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, that they were prepared to run their vessels the Hindoostan and Bentinck between Bombay, and Suez, in furtherance of a proposal for facilitating the transit of the India Mails, beg earnestly and respectfully to intreat the consideration of your Honourable Court to the serious loss and inconvenience with your support of such a measure would entail on your Memorialists and the interests which they represent, in common with the various communities in the extensive Presidencies of Bengal, and Madras; the Eastern Settlements of Penang, Singapore, and Malacca, and Her Majesty's Colony of Ceylon.

The fallacies involved in the proposition of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company as regards an acceleration of the Mail by any line making Bombay the Port for the receipt, and despatch of the Mail for the eastern side of India, will we are assured, be fully demonstrated to your Honourable Court by more able and influential persons than your Memorialists—we do not, therefore, purpose trespassing in the time and attention of the Court on those points; but as others may escape the notice of our more powerful supporters in this matter, as they certainly have done that of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, your Memorialists beg leave to lay before your Honourable Court a few facts bearing strongly on the question of a direct and frequent Steam Mail packet between Suez, Point de Galle, Madras, and Calcutta.

Leaving Hindoos, and Mahomedans out of any calculation connected with the Indian Mails, although a few of the former, belonging to this city do ship to, and transact business with, Ports in Great Britain, it is shewn by a return made by the Superintendent of Police in 1837 the latest at hand, that this city contained at that time:—

|---|---|
| British born inhabitants, ... ... ... ... | 3138 |
| East Indians, ... ... ... ... ... ... | 4740 |
| Portuguese or their descendants, ... ... | 3181 |
| French, ... ... ... ... ... ... ... ... | 160 |
| Armenians, ... ... ... ... ... ... ... | 636 |
| At Howrah across the river—Europeans and East Indians, ... ... ... ... ... | 112 |
| Serampore, .. ... ... ... ... ... ... | 55 |
| Chandernagore, .. ... ... ... ... ... | 77 |
| Chinsurah, Bandel and Hooghly, ... ... | 26 |
| | 12,131 |

The want of a late and accurate census of Calcutta is rather unfortunate at this particular juncture, but going back for 7 years, and deducting the East Indians and Portuguese who are more generally employed as clerks in Government and commercial Offices than engaged in Trade, your Honourable Court will find nearly 4,800 persons in Calcutta and its neighbourhood, who would feel seriously any disappointment in their long cherished hope of a Direct Steam Communication with Suez.

Your Memorialists, on their own particular behalf, desire to bring to the notice of the Court, that they represent a body numbering in this city, upwards of 800 persons, being more than equal to the whole population, European and East Indian in the town and throughout the Presidency of Bombay, other than Civil, Military and Marine, that, as shewn by the latest directory, there are not 50 Tradesmen's and shop keeping establishments in the town of Bombay against 270 in this city and 120 at Madras,—that the whole number of European, or Christian, Tradesmen in Bombay is not more than 45 or thereabouts, there being a preponderance of Parsees in every line of business; whilst the greater number of your Memorialists, those whom they represent, and many of their journeymen, and assistants are Natives of the United Kingdom, to whom a cheap and ready intercourse with friends and ties at home is of the highest importance.

Your Memorialists would also solicit the attention of your Honourable Court to the circumstance of there being upwards of 500 persons, most of them also British born settled in Assam, Bengal, Behar, Allahabad and the Dooab, as planters and manufacturers of indigo, sugar, rum, silk, and tea, or otherwise employed in developing the resources of the country, a few excepted who are shop keepers in Military cantonment—that by far the largest proportion of this enterprizing and useful class of men are located below Allahabad in the districts east of the Ganges, and must ever look to the Calcutta Post Office as the channel for the transaction of their important business, as well as the receipt of their letters to and from home through their Agents in Calcutta.

Your Memorialists beg to add, that with the exception of one person, (Signor Mutti,) whose experiments in the silk line appear to promise well, they are not aware of there being five Europeans, or East Indians engaged in the trade, or manufactures throughout the west of India, save those within the town and precincts of Bombay.

Your Memorialists must not omit referring to the number of Europeans and their descendants settled in the Straits, and solely engaged in Commercial pursuits amounting by the lowest calculation to 1,000 persons, or nearly double the number residing within the limits of the Bombay Presidency but not in the service of H. M. or the Honourable East India Company—any abandonment of a direct communication by steam with Madras and this Port must effect the interests of that large body and living, like your Memorialists, under your Government, they will we hope in due time express themselves accordingly.

Although somewhat beyond the province of your Memorialists, and perhaps a work of supererogation on their part, they cannot refrain from adverting, in this their appeal, to the small number of H. M.'s and the Honourable Company's forces and Civil Servants serving in the Presidency of Bombay, compared with those in Ceylon and the Presidencies of Madras and Bengal; being only as 1 to 4 of the former and 1 to 5½ of the latter. Your Memorialists find in the Bombay

The whole of the Troops and Civilians in Ceylon, and all those of Madras and nearly the whole in Bengal east of long: 78 would gain, as well as your Memorialists and others, by the delivery of the Mails direct at Galle, Madras and Calcutta, and the great disparity of numbers west of the line drawn, would indicate the advantage of abandoning Bombay as the sole Port for the receipt and transmission of the India Mails, until such time at least as the country becomes intersected by railroads. On these grounds your Memorialists would, therefore, earnestly solicit your Honourable Court to refuse your assent to any arrangement by which the largest number of Her Majesty's and your servants and soldiers as well as those engaged in trade in the East Indies, would be cut off from a Direct Steam Cummunication with home, they would also farther intreat, that the Clause in the Charter or Deed of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, by which they are bound to run their vessels from any Port, which Her Majesty's Government in concert with your Honourable Court shall dictate, may be waived or so modified as to secure to this side of India the uninterrupted and direct Steam Communication so much needed and so long desired, for which boon, as in duty bound your Memorialists shall ever pray.

ORTHOGRAPHY OF THE NAME JESUS.

To the Rev. T. Boaz, Calcutta.

Bible Society House, London, August 31, 1843.

MY DEAR SIR,—Several circumstances have concurred to prevent the re-assembling of our Editorial Sub-Committee, since I had the pleasure of addressing you in a short note by the last month's Mail. I have myself been rusticating during the whole interval, for the benefit of my health; and had I been at home, the Society's house has been in such a state of confusion through the operation of a general repair and painting, which it had not undergone for many years, that my official business would have been in a great measure suspended. I do not however regret, that my letter will on this account partake more nearly of a private character: for, to say, the truth, the question that has been mooted between your Committee and "the working clergy" and Missionaries of Northern India, is one of those in which our Committee is always backward to interpose its authority: for it must be regarded as rather a philological than a practical one, one in which concessions might be made by either party, without any real violation of sound conscience; one therefore, in which the desire of either side to control the other would be to endanger Christian unity and Charity without obtaining any adequate remunerating advantage. Such at least (after a careful consideration of all the written and printed documents that have reached us) is my private opinion and such I gather as the individual opinions of Christian men with whom I have conversed on the subject.

I trust that your Committee and especially those members of it who may dissent from the conclusion at which I have arrived, will bear with me, while with all freedom, I describe the impression that the controversy has produced upon my own mind.

Having been a somewhat careful student of theological science, and of the manner in which different minds are influenced by it, my conviction has been increasing year by year that there is no evil by which the Church has suffered more largely than by exaggerated statements and views. As a sexagenarian, I may perhaps without presumption remark, that the most pious and conscientious, have often the greatest cause to guard against this evil: it is therefore without any disrespect to the several parties in this orthographical controversy, that I would take the liberty of asking whether they have not, both of them, needlessly magnified the importance of their case. When, for instance the Auxiliary Committee contend, that their mode of spelling the name of Jesus will alone explain the Angel's reason for giving it to the son of Mary, do they not seem to forget their own admission that the amended word has no meaning at all in the language to which they would introduce it, and that the explanation will therefore still have to be given by the living voice of the Christian Teacher? When they represent their own view of the question as founded upon principle, and that of their opponents as resting upon expediency, is there not something invidious in the contrast, as though scripture had enjoined the retaining of names in their original significancy or at least had set the example, when repeating the names in a new language of preserving both their sense and their orthography? Let us see whether any such demand is made, by the practice of the New Testament writers, upon subsequent translators.

I grant that, when we are for the first time presenting the Christian Scriptures to a country which has never heard of their contents, it would seem desirable that our orthography of its proper names should, be as little different from their original form, as the genius of the original language would admit. A question however soon arises whether some of the more expressive names may not be translated rather than transferred: the rule would seem to forbid this; yet the example of the Greek Testament justifies it. The Messiah foretold under the Jewish dispensation is called Christ—the same in its Greek meaning, but not the literal name—and this was in deference to custom, the change having been long before rendered familiar by the Septuagint version, made at the commands of a Heathen Prince. Another question arises, can it ever be allowable to substitute some conventional term, for a name which in the original scripture is marked with more than usual prominence? Undoubtedly not, we should reply: yet what says the example of the Greek Testament writers? They have not hesitated to adopt the term (superstitiously introduced by the seventy) ὁ κυριος instead of Jehovah, suppressing at once both the real name, and the significant meaning. These two instances may suffice to shew, how loose is the Scripture authority for any absolute rule in transferring Scripture names into another language.

But you found a special argument upon the fact of the Angel's having assigned a reason for giving to the Son of Mary this particular name. Is there any great force in that argument, unless the word, adopted as a representative of the original, should (as in the Angel's address; which was doubtless in the language of the country i. e. the Syro-Chaldaic) immediately explain its meaning to the vernacular reader which is not done in your case? Many allusions of this kind are necessarily obscured, or even lost, in every translation and I think you will concur with me, nevertheless in the general proposition, that a translation is not therefore unfaithful, though the original sense be more or less obscured in it. To give the full meaning, there will be always required a living Interpreter, and even he must verily be "one among a thousand."

As for the supposition that the Mahomedan spelling of the name of Jesus had its origin in an opprobrious design, it is a mere guess of the Lexicographers whom we might as well trust when they give us the immersional interpretation of βαπτιζω. In the absence of historical information, it is surely more natural to presume that the transposition of the letters was accidental, and arose out of the extreme corruption of the Christian Church at the time, and in the countries where Mahomedanism originated. At all events, the word is not now an opprobrious one;—and its true meaning is determined beyond a cavil, by the circumstances under which it first makes its appearance in the Gospel Narrative. He who should save his people from their sins can be nothing less than a Saviour in the highest and most glorious sense of the term. The Angelic Commentary in fact contains much more than the name itself expresses, and though the name be disguised, the commentary remains untouched.

For reasons like these, many of us think that the auxiliary Committee are endeavouring to enforce a resolution which however correct in a literary point of view, is (to say the least) not indispensibly necessary.

But the Missionaries on the other hand, have taken what we no less think to be an exaggerated view, of what they regard as objections to the amended orthography. It may very fairly be doubted, whether the Mahomedans would make such a handle of the innovation as they anticipate. Among native Indians, whether already converted, or seriously enquiring after the truth, no real umbrage could long be taken at the new word; the reasons for a change being duly explained to them, the Missionaries could soon effect the change, if willing to lead it. We think, too, that in proposing other orthographical forms of their own, they surrender their main principles of objection. And I think I may give it, finally, as the general opinion among us that whichever party in this controversy shall first recede from the high ground which has been taken, will have the merit of sacrificing to Christian forbearance, Christian love, and Christian unity, that which (at best) we can only regard as a point of doubtful disputation. The grand principle which has so long held together the Bible Society, is agreement wherever agreement is possible: and surely the present question is scarcely one that should be allowed to "separate chief friends."

It is time that I should release you from this long Epistle. If I have said any thing that may be thought unkind or presuming, set that to my account—and forgive it. Should this unofficial communication lead to an honourable peace among our Indian brethren; our Committee, I am sure will be glad to find that they have been released from the necessity of discussing the subject any further. With every Christian wish and prayers for your success in the great work, wherein we are all engaged, believe me to remain in the "one Lord,"

Your affectionate brother

P. S. Though I have given my official address, I am in fact sitting 120 miles distant from London: and am therefore unable finally to confer with my good friend Mr. Brandram on the contents of this letter: he will see it, however, before it is posted; and I also know that he coincides in my general view of the question:—as does also my friend Mr. Browne, his co-Secretary.

DARJEELING.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—As we have had no notice in the Friend since the flowery production of your worthy correspondent, I begin to suspect that the last of your communicative friends must have taken flight, at the close of last month, or you assuredly would have heard ere this of the doings on the anniversary of St. Andrew's day. At twelve o'clock on one of the most lovely days I ever remember to have seen, the whole of the residents and most of the few visitors now left, assembled to witness the laying of the first stone of the Church. The Rev. F. Fisher officiated. He first read the 84th and 122d Psalms, and then very impressively a most beautiful and suitable prayer (of his own I believe,) after which the first stone was laid by Mrs. Campbell, then Mr. Fisher read the Collect for the 7th Sunday after Trinity, the Collects for St. Andrew's day and for St. Simon and St. Jude, Gloria in excelsis, and the blessing.

The site is most admirably chosen, facing Col. Lloyd's residence, and the building will be a very pretty object from every part of the station. Captain Bishop has the building of it, but as I have not been favoured with a sight of the plan, I can offer no opinion of its merits further than what I glean from various reports as to its simplicity and neatness. I understand Capt. Bishop hopes to get it roofed in before the rains, so as to enable the fittings up to be completed by their close. Mr. Fisher mentioned in the course of the ceremony that when completed it was intended to name the edifice, St. Andrew's.

We have much colder weather this year than at the beginning of December last year, and the snow on the range seems to have extended farther and lower than last year at the same time. The greater part of the visitors have left us, but still some few remain and the pleasing sight of rosy children so rare in the plains is still to be seen at the sanatarium. I advise those who want to see snow to come up forthwith as according to native report, we are to have a severe winter; and if a mild one gave us in 1843 six inches of snow, what may we anticipate in the promise severe one? I have written in a hurry to save the dawk, so make any necessary corrections.

Yours faithfully,
A SUBSCRIBER.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

ARTICLE FROM THE FATHERLAND.—We are sorry to be this day under the obligation of stating, that some persons who superintend the affairs of the police seem to have misunderstood their duty, and this to such an extent as must make our country appear in a very unfavourable light in the eyes of every foreigner, and impart to the nations of civilized Europe a very bad opinion of the humanistic and religious culture of Denmark.

But the fact will speak for itself, and the source from whence we have obtained our information may be implicitly relied upon.

Mr. Oncken, Baptist minister from Hamburg, arrived here on the 31st August, at the request and in company with Dr. Hoby, of Birmingham. The object of their journey was to visit some of the Baptist churches on the Continent, and amongst them the one in Copenhagen. They took apartments at the city of Hamburg hôtel, from which the names of these visitors were in the usual manner sent to the police. Shortly after their arrival they went out to visit Mr. Monster, the Baptist minister of this city, who happened, however, to be from home on a journey. They could scarcely have spoken with Mrs. Monster, when two policemen entered, requiring their attendance at the police-office before Ridder (Sir) Braestrup, who is a councillor of state, and the director or chief of the police. They had accordingly to bend their steps to the police-office, accompanied by the policemen. About three o'clock, Mrs. Monster having become uneasy at their long absence, applied to a person,—a Dane and a Lutheran,—resident in London; but now on a visit to his relations in this place, and who was fortunately at hand, to inquire at the police-office the cause of Mr. Oncken and Dr. Hoby's detention, to which this gentleman willingly agreed. On arriving at the police-office he found Mr. Oncken in a room, and was requested by him to show the stranger minister through the city, and assist him in his affairs. The London Lutheran was not a little astonished to find that Mr. Oncken was a prisoner. Dr. Hoby wished to call first on the British ambassador, and on the way he communicated to his companion what had taken place at the police-office. Long extracts of laws, ordinances, and protocols, were read to them, which were applied to Baptists in general, and to Mr. Oncken in particular. The result of which was, that in consequence of these laws, Baptists, and especially Mr. Oncken, were to be persecuted; but this time they would show to Mr. O. extraordinary kindness and mildness, and allow him to be confined in the police-office until the return of the steamer he came by, which was to depart again the same day; and they were generous enough to order some dinner to be sent in to him, of course at his own expense. Towards Dr. Hoby they were more abundant in their generosity. They offered him permission to remain in Copenhagen, if he would pledge himself neither to baptize, nor administer the Lord's Supper, nor have any communion with the Baptists of the place, nor hold any conversation with any person on religious subjects: but failing to comply with these demands, it was intimated that he also must take his departure in the same steam-boat with Mr. Oncken. With regard to the first of these conditions, Dr. Hoby stated he could not have any objections, as being a foreigner, and unacquainted with the Danish language, he was unable to conduct any religious service in which speaking was required; but to pledge himself neither to speak to any body on religious subjects, nor to promote Christianity in any way he could not consent, and would rather prefer immediate banishment to coming under an obligation of which his conscience disapproved. Several attempts were made to persuade the Englishman to consent to these conditions, which he was told were of an extremely kind and mild nature, but all without effect. In Dr. Hoby's estimation they wanted one essential qualification, he thought they were not Christians. On his arrival in Denmark he was of opinion it was a Christian country, but he had soon reason considerably to modify his opinion, and he was heard to utter with a certain degree of satisfaction that he was now converted from his errors in this respect, and would be enabled to rectify the views and opinions of his Christian brethren on this subject.

With such an impression then the Doctor left Denmark on the same day in which he arrived. Under a police escort he and Mr. Oncken were conducted on board the steamer. During his stay at the police-office the Rev. Doctor occupied his time in writing letters, and amongst these he wrote one to the councillor of state, Braestrup. This letter will be very interesting to read, and will in all probability be printed on the arrival of Dr. Hoby in England.

We beg to remark that, although the ordinance of 27th September, 1842, the second paragraph of which allows the Baptists of this city to have domestic worship and permission to take the Lord's Supper at these meetings, according to their own rites, does not mention anything of foreign brethren who may come to visit them; yet the presumption is natural, notwithstanding the portion of toleration granted to them is only small, that the visit of such friends would not be prohibited—since sects which are unchristian enjoy perfect religious liberty. And it is, besides, well known, that Christian sects whose doctrines and confessions of faith differ much more from the Lutheran creed than the Baptists,—for example, the Quakers,—not only visit Denmark without interruption, but are also received with extreme courtesy and friendship at the Court. Every one who is acquainted with the Lutheran and Baptist creeds, knows that, whilst both are founded on the Bible, there is no difference betwixt them, except that the latter is more strictly scriptural than the former; but the Quaker differs very materially in many points. How can a Baptist, therefore, acquainted with these facts, suppose that on his arrival in Denmark he will be treated as a criminal? He knows that there are no particular laws in Denmark against the Baptists, except the ordinance of 27th September, 1842; and this must be looked upon rather as an edict of toleration than of persecution. He knows that this very law has made the persecution of the Baptists in some degree milder. He knows that every other sect, Catholics, Quakers, and Jews, are at liberty to visit whomsoever they will in Denmark; how, then, could it be supposed that such liberty would be prohibited to a Baptist, when, besides the ordinance already referred to, nothing whatever respecting Baptists exists in any Danish law?

Why do the police in Copenhagen wish to create new crimes, and act against the dictates of humanity and of Christianity, as well as in opposition to the analogy of positive laws? Have the police considered the effect of this new invention of theirs, in consequence of which it has become a crime for a foreign Baptist to speak to any person upon religious subjects?—Faedrelandet, Sept. 4, 1843.

THE NESTORIANS.—CONSTANTINOPLE, AUG. 17.—Lord Ponsonby is said to have observed, on a certain occasion, to the Minister of the Sultan, "that however desirous England might be of sustaining Turkey and maintaining her independence and integrity, it would no longer be possible to do so when Christians were persecuted for their Christianity sake." This opinion, as remarkable for its sincerity as its truth, proceeded from one who was profoundly acquainted with the character of the Turks, and the weight of public opinion in Europe. The advice tendered by Lord Ponsonby, made, it is well known, a deep impression upon the Porte, and the Christians were not long in experiencing beneficial results. Two events, however, have now occurred, which appear to show a disposition on the part of the present Government, or of those enjoying local authority, to turn to the ancient system of religious persecution. You have been informed of the combination between the Pasha of Mosul and several powerful Kurdish chiefs for the extermination of the Nestorian Christians, or Chaldeans. Letters received the day before yesterday contain a deplorable account of the results of the attacks of the united troops. They had penetrated into the centre of the Tryaree district, burnt the villages and churches, destroyed the crops, and put the inhabitants of both sexes to the sword. Three, or according to other accounts, five brothers of the Patriarch have been slain, his mother was cut in half, and his sister horribly mutilated. The Patriarch himself had fled to Mosul, and taken refuge in the British vice-consulate. Thus a sect which had preserved its independence during centuries, and had resisted the persecuting sword of Islam, when wielded by the most powerful and most intolerant of the followers of Mahomed—which, in its simplicity and isolation, had maintained the doctrines and forms of a primitive Church for above fourteen centuries, and which had escaped the corruption of religion, of morals, and of character, so conspicuous in all other Christian sects of the East—has now in the weakness of Mohamedanism, and in the strength of European Christianity, been delivered over to destruction.

Although the Turkish authorities merit the strongest condemnation for the part they have taken in this massacre, yet there are others concerned who are almost equally responsible for the results. The history of the fall of the Nestorians is a new example of the consequences of a system pursued by foreigners in the East, which we cannot contemplate without the utmost indignation. All those who have been the direct or indirect instruments of their destruction, although they may not have anticipated a result of so serious a nature to their intrigues, and although they may now shelter themselves under the cloak of religion, have been guilty of a great crime against humanity. In their mountain fastnesses the Nestorians had retained their independence for centuries. The first western traveller who succeeded in penetrating into them was Dr. Grant, an American missionary. His object in visiting them was the establishment of schools, and other means of instruction. No sooner had Dr. Grant met with some success in the mountains, than the Roman Catholic missionaries at Mosul, supported by French political agents, endeavoured to counteract it. The English High Church was also jealous of American encroachments in the midst of a sect still venerating Episcopacy; and an additional firebrand was thrown into the country, last autumn, in the person of the Rev. Mr. Badger. In a former letter we entered into a long description of the politico-religious intrigues of the French. During last winter, the three parties—the American, the Puseyite, and the Roman Catholic—have waged an open warfare amongst themselves. The Americans, who had been first in the field, only acted on the defensive; the influence they had already acquired amongst the Nestorians enabled them, without much difficulty, to retain their position. The object of the two remaining parties was to eject the Americans, and to establish their own influence. They did not act in concert, for their mutual enmity equalled their hostility to the Americans. No means were left untried to effect their object. The agents of the Church of Rome received the earnest co-operation, in fact became the tools, of the French political agents. Mr. Badger enjoyed the support of the British local authority. A report began to prevail that the Americans were assisting the Nestorians to build forts in their mountains. The ignorant inhabitants of the surrounding districts, and their Governor, the Pasha of Mosul, readily believed the assertion. For some time access to the mountains, from the west, was denied to the American missionaries. Mr. Badger and the Papists renewed their separate attacks. Both had interviews with the Patriarch, and both believed that they had established their influence. The suspicions of the Pasha of Mosul were excited; from both parties he received accusations against their respective adversaries, tending to increase his alarm. Mr. Badger pointed out the danger of Roman Catholicism and French influence in the mountains; the French, in return, the danger of English influence. At length the combination we have described was formed, and those alone who were innocent have fallen victims to the intrigues of men who announced themselves to them as their only saviours—the ministers of Christ and the teachers of civilization.

Are the quarrels of our Church to be transferred even into the East, to our own dishonour, and to the destruction of the peace and happiness of men who have hitherto been unacquainted with schism, and ignorant of religious rancour and intolerance? Before the Bishop of London instructed Mr. Badger, a willing and enthusiastic agent, to proceed to the Nestorians, to eject the Americans, to expose their heresies, and to insist upon the only true orthodoxy of the High Church of England, his Lordship might have received a lesson of Christian charity from those very Nestorians who admit Christians of all denominations to their altars, and receive members of all Christian sects as brothers. But however reprehensible may have been the conduct of Mr. Badger, the conduct of the French politico-religious agents deserves the strongest condemnation. These men may now glory in the extermination of an independent and conscientious sect, whose only crime has been the rejection of the tenets of the Church of Rome and French influence. To gain that influence and to obtain a nominal submission to the Pope, has this sect been sacrificed. Had the Nestorians admitted either the one or the other, they might have been saved. Honour, justice, and humanity are sacrificed by France to obtain an influence which can only add to her pride, without conferring a single benefit upon her own subjects or upon those of any other nation—an influence, as precarious as it is useless. Unable to obtain this influence by honest policy, or by legal means, she assumes the garb of religion and obtains her end by the most unworthy hypocrisy. A recital of the events of the last six months at Mosul would form a worthy appendage to the history of the Inquisition of Goa, or of the Spanish persecutions in South America, modified, however, by the spirit of the age, which, we may thank God, does not permit public torture, or encourage religious slaughters. We allude both to French politico-religious agents and to English High Church intolerance. Strict justice compels us to state that the Americans are, in this instance, without blame. They established themselves first in the mountains, and their efforts were successfully directed to the improvement of the inhabitants, without any ulterior political design. We believe that, had the Church of England co-operated with them as Protestant Christians, instead of opposing them as heretical enemies, the disasters which we have described would not have occurred; as it is, one of the most ancient and most interesting sects in the world—interesting from its origin, from its language, and from the purity of its Christianity—has been sacrificed to the religious quarrels of American Independents, English Puseyites, and French Roman Catholics.

The second event to which we have above alluded, as showing a disposition, on the part of the Porte, to return to the ancient anti-Christian system, is the threatened execution of an Armenian which is hourly expected notwithstanding the most powerful exertions in his favour on the part of the foreign embassies. The only crime of this man is his recantation of a profession of Mahomedanism, said to have been made in an hour of intoxication. Should the Porte persist in his capital punishment, which there is every reason to fear will be the case, the sympathies of all Christians will certainly be enlisted against the Government. Since the unfortunate Servian affair, the Porte has assumed an attitude which may, perhaps, be justified by plausible arguments, but is injudicious in the extreme, and may end in the destruction of this country. Abandoned by Europe in a question which intimately affected her power, her pride, and her independence, Turkey has made a last effort to regain the position she enjoyed a century ago—a position of isolation and defiance. Such are the feelings of the present Ministry and of the Divan. We may talk of Russian intrigues and Russian aggression, but the time may come when the policy of Lord Aberdeen may be recognised as the first great blow to the existence of this empire. It may, perhaps, appear ridiculous to connect a public execution with the Servian question, but those who understand Eastern policy will be able to trace the connexion of these events, when that execution is taking place, to show the contempt felt by the Porte for Christendom and for British influence.—Morning Chronicle.

CRUEL MARTYRDOM AT CONSTANTINOPLE.—Avoakim was the son of a certain Yahia, a slipper-maker, and about twenty-two years of age. A year and a half ago, having quarrelled, during a fit of intoxication, with his Mussulman neighbours, he was condemned to receive the bastinado on the soles of his feet. Almost overcome with the effects of wine and of fear, he made a profession of Mohammedanism, and was immediately released. No sooner had he regained the use of his reason, than, repenting the steps he had been induced to take, he fled to Syra, and resumed his former faith. After the absence of a year he returned to Constantinople, and concealed himself in a Christian quarter. Unfortunately, he was recognised as he passed through the city, by one Mustafa Aga, chief of the guard of the quarter in which he resided before his flight. He was seized and conveyed to the Seraskier's palace. Having formally declared his adherence to Christianity, he was thrown into prison. Threats and torture were used to compel him to retract, and these means failing, he was led out to execution. Intimidation being unavailing, he was re-conducted to prison, and allowed six days to re-embrace the faith of Islam. All access to him was denied, both to his relatives and the priests. On the seventh day he was bound, and dragged to the Balluk Bazaar. The fish market is one of the most crowded thoroughfares of the city, and is consequently usually chosen as a fitting spot for public decapitation. Although thirty Cawasses accompanied the unfortunate man, on arriving at the place of execution they all refused to strike the blow. At length one Ali of Tavok Bazaar, a Cawass, belonging to the Siraskerial, seized the scymetar. The naked weapon was shown to the condemned man, with a last offer of pardon; but he maintained an obstinate silence. The Cawass having compelled him to kneel, raised the sabre, and struck him on the neck, the bone remaining unbroken. Three ineffectual blows succeeded. The sword being too blunt, or the executioner being too inexpert, to sever the head in the usual manner, he was thrown down, and whilst several men knelt upon the body, Ali sawed the neck asunder, the miserable man filling the air with shrieks. The body was thrown upon the stomach into the centre of the street, the head, and by its side the hat, being placed between his thighs. The Turks who stood around spat upon his corpse, and reviled his Christianity. The Cawasses retired to a neighbouring tobacconist's and enjoyed their pipes. On the body was then placed the decree by which he had been condemned, in these words:—

"On the first of Moharrem last year, the Armenian slipper-maker Yahia Ogler Avoakim, being in full possession of his senses, embraced the faith of Islam, and received the name of Mohammed. He afterwards escaped, and became a renegade. Having been invited to re-enter the holy religion of Islam, he absolutely refused so to do. Persisting in his refusal, he was condemned, according to the sacred fetwa, and has suffered death."

The body was exposed during three days to the insults of a fanatic multitude. On the third day it was dragged to the sea-shore, and, having been fastened to a pole, was cast into one of the currents of the Bosphorus.

The Armenian patriarch having presented a petition to the Porte for the corpse, it was torn up and trampled under foot.

This barbarous and inhuman execution has revived feelings which a long intercourse with Europe, and a mild and tolerant government had almost contributed to efface. A similar event has not occurred in the memory of the oldest inhabitant of this city. When a cruel and degrading death has been inflicted upon a Christian for his religion alone, it is a declaration of intolerant warfare against Christendom. The Armenians are already alarmed, and eagerly seek to obtain foreign protection. Had the man who suffered a few days ago been a Greek, he would have been liberated by the Russian embassy. Had he professed Catholicism, France would have declared herself his protector. But in the instance of an unfortunate Armenian, neither a Russian nor a French minister will exert his fluence nor his power! This fact will illustrate a remark we have before had occasion to make, that in this country both France and Russia sacrifice their honour and their humanity to the most insignificant political objects. It was not unknown that Sir Stratford Canning was exerting his influence to obtain the pardon of this man, or at least a remission of the capital punishment; and it was not unknown that the Government manifested a disposition to reject his intercession; yet neither M. Tectoff nor M. de Bourqueney would step forward to support the English ambassador in a demand prompted by the purest feelings of humanity. To both an Armenian was a schismatic and a heretic, and no political end could have been gained by affording him protection. The conduct of both these gentlemen deserves the strongest condemnation. Had they co-operated sincerely in demanding the release of this man, it can scarcely be doubted but that the Turkish Government would have been compelled to yield.

The constancy and courage of this unfortunate man cannot but excite our admiration. However pernicious the effect of his execution may prove upon the fanaticism of the Mussulman population, his example will serve to unite more strongly in their faith the Armenians of Constantinople.

The Sheikh-el-Islam is believed to have been the chief instigator of this murder, and Riza Pacha is also accused of supporting his views. Sir Stratford Canning lost no time in addressing the ministers of the Sultan upon the subject, and in pointing out to them, in firm and dignified language, the abhorrence which would be felt throughout Christendom at this fanatical persecution, and the fatal impression that their conduct would make upon Europe in general. The Turkish Government should be made to understand that a repetition of events of this nature must tend to the downfal of this country.—Chronicle's Correspondent.

FRENCH PROTECTORSHIP OF CATHOLICISM.—Mr. HEATH did not venture out of his depth, we believe, after all, in boldly declaring, that the French Government, the French frigates, and the Romish priests are one great Missionary Society. We have already, and long since, called public attention to this new state of political relations,—a state of things which, if it continue, must, in spite of all the good wishes and well-meant efforts of Peace Societies, bring on a conflict of the widest range, and the most violent character, inasmuch as the moral, as well as the material and political interests of the two countries will have to sustain, not merely a shock, but a vital encounter.

We shall, just for to-day, give some extracts from the publications of a French Society, called, La Société Orientale. We believe the Society to be a speculation; what the French call industrielle; but of course it is fashioned to the taste of the public it is designed to catch. A Mr. A. DENIS, who signs himself orientaliste and député, is President. As to his orientalism, we cannot say much; but as to his deputyship, we know that he vociferated pretty loudly in favour of the Catholic Tahitian missions, during the discussion in the Chamber of Deputies, in which M. GUIZOT was so soundly thrashed by M. LAYSTERIE and M. BILLAULT.

This Society, as its founders announce, is to be distinguished from the "Societe Asiatique" and the "Societe Geographique." "It is a Society of much larger views, and is also a Society of application; scientific, but with a design to promote and defend the particular interests of France,—French interests and those of the Christian people throughout the East. A truly national object. France represents" (how? we should be glad to know—by its infidelity and profligacy?) "the Roman Catholic principle, and the Christian populations, which, since FRANCIS I., have been accustomed to count on the protection of the very Christian King. The Catholic interest and the French interest are one in the East. One of the most distinguished men of our times, M. GUIZOT, Minister of Foreign Affairs, though he professes the Protestant religion, has in the most positive manner recognised that such is the duty of France. We have, said he, in a despatch addressed to the French Ambassador at Constantinople, in June, 1842, to take care that we preserve our position as the protectors of Catholicism in the East. This protection is not only a duty; (and we live in times when we must not too lightly neglect our duties;) it is a right. It is on France, says the budget of the Minister of Foreign Affairs for 1843, that devolves the RIGHT of protecting the Catholic religion in the East; and France ought not to neglect any means of accomplishing her mission. The budget is right. A duty may be neglected, but who would abandon a right? Let us use, then, the right we have."

Precious morality for this scientific, political, Catholic Society to avouch! But what does the East mean? and where is it?

"In our eyes," says the Oriental Review, the organ of the Society, "the East is not circumscribed by the limited ideas of the geographer of the last century. It commences at the line which the meridian of Paris traces from pole to pole, and extends in the Pacific to the last groupes of islands in Oceania, beyond which we find America, the Western region of the Globe. Our East comprehends all the European countries in the basin of the Mediterranean, which are in relation with African and Asiatic countries situate on its shores;—Algiers, Egypt, Russia in Europe (which rules the Black Sea); the whole of Asia, from the Frozen Sea to the Indian Sea, from the Mediterranean to Japan; Japan and its islands; Arabia and the Red Sea, and its steam-boats; the Persian Gulf; Eastern, Central, and Southern Africa, from the Cape of Good Hope to Cape Gardafui, from the Straits of Babelmandeb to the port of Suez; Madagascar, Bourbon, and that Mauritius which we would still call the Isle of France; the whole of Oceania; the Isles of the Sound; Java, Borneo, Sumatra, Dutch; Celebes, Moluccas, and the Phillipines, Spanish; New Guinea; the immense Australia, yet unexplored, where the English have their penitentiaries; Van Diemen and New Zealand; and last, but not least, those numerous islands of Polynesia, where now wave together the banner of the Christian Cross and the tricoloured flag of the French."

All this is very modestly patriotic and philanthropic, no doubt; but it reveals to us the spirit of the Government and of the Church, and shows us, that, in order to damage Great Britain, the lowest of the French Radicals will follow in the train of the most despised of their priests.

It is a little amusing, that, at the head of the list of above a hundred Honorary Members of this noble Society, stands—having, no doubt, been asked, and having given his consent—His Majesty KAMEHAMA III., King of the Sandwich Islands, who has just sent to request Great Britain to save his islands from French buccaneers. Close upon him we find ROUCHOUSE, Bishop of Nilopolis, Vicar Apostolic of the Eastern Oceania; and then comes our friend POMPALIER, Bishop of Maronée, Vicar Apostolic of Western Oceania, who paid a visit to Mr. MOERENHOUT at Tahiti. Hundreds of Titular and Corresponding Members follow, including French Consuls, and agents, and intriguers, all over the world. Christian faith may enable us to see, through this renewal of Catholic Armada projects, the triumph of truth and the downfal of tricoloured flags quartered with the Cross; but wo to our Government and our country, if our Ministers waste their time, and weaken the resources of the nation, by soft dalliance and shameful cajoling with a Court, intent on carrying out its own plans of aggrandizement, by the destruction of Protestant influence and energy in every part of the world.—Pat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE IRISH GOVERNMENT.—The Dublin Evening Mail alleges, on the authority of private letters, that a meeting of the Lord Lieutenant and Sir Edward Sugden took place at Sir Robert Peel's house, on Monday; when the promotion of Mr. Howley, and Sir Edward's absence from Ireland as one of the Lords Justices, were the subjects of "angry discussion" and "strong remonstrance" with the Irish Chancellor.—Pat.

YOUNG ENGLAND.—Sir Thomas Acland has joined this rising party, of which his son is also a probationer, and will be admitted as soon as he is "young" enough, that is, shall have mastered all the leading principles at the school. Sir Thomas gets younger (doctrinally speaking) every day. Should Sir Robert Peel's increasing illness compel him to abandon office, the Tory party will then be split into four several sections, one of which will be the Young England party. We shall be much surprised if Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Baronet of Killerton, doth not come out as the leader of Young England. One of the leading principles of the youngsters is to set authority above argument.—Western Times.

AN ANECDOTE IN FAVOUR OF CORN-LAW REPEAL.—Mr. Langston, M. P., related the following anecdote at the Oxford Anti-Corn-law meeting on Tuesday, as bearing, he said, upon his conversion to Corn-law repeal:—When he was canvassing Oxford some years back, a baker asked him if he would vote for a repeal of the Corn-laws? "Why do you ask?" said he. "Because," responded the baker, "I am deeply interested in that matter. When bread is cheap I sell two loaves for every one that I sell when it is dear, besides which, when it is high I sustain another loss, for my customers sometime forget to pay for it!" (Loud cheers and laughter.) That anecdote had made a great impression on his (Mr. Langston's) mind, and had done much to convert him to the Corn-law repeal.—Pat.

✕ O'CONNELL'S CABINET.—A French gentleman who has recently been travelling in Ireland, M. J. J. Prevost, in giving an account of an interview which he had with O'Connell, in the Constitutionnel, says: He found O'Connell in his cabinet, surrounded by heaps of books, of newspapers, and of scattered papers, even covering the floor: "An image of Christ was suspended from his bureau, and a heavy chain of iron, which I took at first for an Irish antique, was fastened to one of his book-cases. I afterwards learnt that this chain had been taken by an English frigate from a Portuguese slaver."—Ibid.

LIEUT. HOLMAN, R. N., Knight of Windsor, the celebrated blind traveller, took his departure, on the 3rd September, from Malta for Naples. He will afterwards proceed to the Roman States, and thence to Trieste. During the few days of his residence in this island the greatest hospitality has been shown him. The veteran traveller had the honour of dining with his excellency the governor, and very frequently with the admiral, Sir E. Owen. Amidst all the vicissitudes of his perilous life, and increasing age, he still maintains the same unabated thirst for travel, and his mental and bodily faculties appear to grow in activity and strength in the inverse ratio of his declining life and honoured grey hairs.—Malta Times.

THE SLAVE-DEALING CASE.—Our readers will have observed in our last Paper, the proceedings in the Central Criminal Court in the Slave-trading case, "the QUEEN against ZULUETA and others." Application was made for the postponement of the trial;—we will say nothing of the grounds upon which this was asked for, as the Court deemed them sufficient, and directed that the trial should be postponed till the next session. We cannot, however, forbear to remark upon the very extraordinary observations which fell from Mr. Justice ERSKINE, in reference to the delay which had taken place in instituting the prosecution. It was admitted, he said, that the transaction had occurred nearly three years ago. If the prosecutors had intended to go into this matter, they might have taken the defendants before a magistrate, and have had it publicly investigated; but, instead of that, no steps were taken until the present year. Now we must think that, before a Judge ventures to throw out insinuations of this kind, and to attribute sinister motives or vexatious conduct to prosecutors in a case of felony, it would become him to make himself acquainted with the facts of the case. The transaction out of which the present charge arises, is notorious enough, having been made the subject of Parliamentary inquiry; and, most assuredly, the prosecution ought to have been instituted before now. But with whom rests the responsibility of the delay? Why was not Her MAJESTY'S Attorney General directed, long ago, to commence proceedings? Why, with the evidence of Colonel NICOLLS, Captain DENMAN, and Captain WORSLEY in their possession, did Ministers hesitate to submit the facts to a British jury? An answer might possibly be given to these questions at the Colonial Office; but whether a satisfactory one, is another matter. All that we can venture to affirm is, that there has been a very suspicious reluctance manifested in certain quarters, to take any effectual measures to bring to light the hidden things of darkness. Sir GEORGE STEPHEN has done himself infinite honour by having overcome the difficulties, real or imaginary, that lay in the way of instituting the indictment. Upon the issue will greatly depend the fate of our pending Slave-trade Treaties with other countries. How long will foreign nations consent to our seizing their vessels for acts which we allow British subjects to commit with impunity? How can France or America be expected to execute or observe Treaties for the suppression of the Slave-trade, while the British Minister in Downing-street is found throwing the shield of official protection over notorious delinquency?—Pat.

OLIVER CROMWELL.—We have already given publicity to the announcement that "no place is left for Oliver Cromwell amongst the sculptured representatives of the Sovereigns of England, which are to adorn the new Houses of Parliament." Such, we presume, is the determination to which the committee have come, to whom the supervision of all proposed internal decorations and adornments for the most magnificent structure which has been raised in this country since the building of St. Paul's Cathedral, is confided. The authority, however, of a dozen printed parliamentary papers will scarcely convince us that the committee can have, designedly, so "committed" themselves! Such an omission would be a scandal upon the gratitude and liberality of this age; a libel on the veracity and import of all the traditions and written history of the first half of the last two hundred years. It would involve, if practically acted upon, a slavish and preposterous homage to the mere name of royalty. It would proclaim to posterity the disgraceful fact that so overawed were the people of England, in the 19th century, by the prestige which attends—not the right exercise of a kingly power, but—the wearing of a Royal crown, that they thus signally repudiated their own obligations and those of their ancestors to the man, who, uncrowned himself, advanced this nation in the 17th century to the foremost rank amongst the nations of the world, and taught the Crowns of the other European nations to recognise and to revere the paramount authority of his simple protectorate! To leave out Cromwell would be, too, to pass over the most extraordinary creation of that marvellous 17th century, of which he was, as it were, the "salt and concentration."—Sun.

A VOYAGE OF DISCOVERY.—A letter from Stockholm, of September 7, says:—"The Swedish brig the Bull, Captain Warngren, has just returned after a three years' voyage. On her arrival at Port Philip, New South Wales, she was freighted by an English firm to visit the small islands of the Pacific, and obtain for manufactured goods sandalwood and other articles suited to the China market. During this voyage, which lasted about seven months, Captain Warngresn touched at some islands not visited probably since Cook's time, and four others not to be found on the map. The captain took possession of them in the name of King Charles John. The inhabitants were a mild race, ignorant of the use of iron, and ready to give for even a rusty nail a turtle. They were also fond of bits of glass, and would remain for three or four hours shaving themselves with pieces of broken bottles. A single musket shot was sufficient to disperse thousands of them—a proof that they had not before been visited by Europeans. The king of one of the islands presented the captain with his sceptre, made of wood artistically carved, and having a thin circle of jasper on the top. A name was given by the captain to each of those isles after some member of the Royal family of Sweden, and a quantity of plants, and tools made of stone and wood, have been brought home."—Pat.

TRADING WITH THE CROSS.—As one of the symptoms of the growing predilections for the crucifix, which was formerly looked upon as a purely Popish emblem, we observe that the leading booksellers of this city have metal crosses fixed on the covers of the prayer-books. A pencil-case maker has also manufactured a crucifix pencil case, which will either register the notions of the devotee, or serve him as an emblem of his faith.—Western Times.

AUSTRALIA.—An interesting "blue book" has been recently issued, containing papers relative to South Australia, which shows that that colony has overcome its most serious and alarming difficulties, and is on the fair road to prosperity, should it not again meet with any material check. The colonization commissioners, in a report to Lord Stanley, say, that "agriculture is rapidly extending, and the number of sheep and cattle greatly increased; and there are numerous elements of an improving condition, and quite sufficient grounds to expect that this colony will enjoy the prosperity which ought to belong to a community placed in a fine climate and good land, having overcome all the difficulties of first settlement, and situated in a conveniently accessible part of the shores of Australia." Similar satisfactory language is held respecting other of our Australian colonies; and there can be no doubt that, as soon as the "crisis" is over (we believe it is all but over by this time)—as soon as those who have over-speculated, over-bought, and over-done themselves, have submitted to their inevitable fate, there can be little question that Australia will rapidly advance; and emigration to that quarter of the world has but to be exercised with discretion and wisdom, in order to render it as beneficial to the individuals as to the country at large.—Chronicle.

SPAIN.—The Barcelona papers of the 16th announce that the two Carlist chiefs, Zorilla and Moreles, have collected bands, and are devastating the towns of Catalonia, in the name of Narvaez and Christina, who, in their despair, have flung themselves into the arms of the Carlists. Senor Olozaga is said to be charged with making a formal offer of the Queen's hand for one of the King of the French's sons, and, in case of refusal, empowered to enter in terms with Don Carlos for one of his family. The latter may be merely a mode of gentle coercion on the affected reluctance of the King of the French.

A ceremony, at which the whole of the diplomatic body, except the British chargé d'affaires, was present, is described and talked of at much length. This was the presentation of a prize to a Senor De la Vega, for a poem on the resistance of Seville to the Regent. This poem represents the English nation and Government as allies of the Regent, and as defeated and repudiated with him. It is so highly insulting to England, that Mr. Jerningham was obliged to take the marked step of being alone of the diplomatic body, absent. Such is the conduct of the Spanish Government, which Lord Aberdeen recognised.—Pat.

ECCLESIASTICAL FARCE AT MADRID.—On her Majesty and her Highness returning from their evening drive, they met the most holy sacrament in the Calle Mayor, going back to the parish church of St. Gines. The illustrious Princesses immediately got out of the carriage, and, together with the Marchioness of Valverde and the maid of honour, followed the Divine Majesty on foot to the temple, where they remained on their knees until the most holy sacrament had disappeared. The people crowded to the church at the same time, and it soon contained an immense multitude. On her Majesty and her august sister leaving the church, a youth of fashionable manners improvised a sensible harangue, in which he expressed the pleasure with which the Spanish people saw the deep piety of the illustrious Princesses, the idols and the hope of the country. The most enthusiastic acclamations, vivas to the Queen and to the Infanta, drowned his voice, the noble and true interpreter of the sentiments of love and respect, that loyal and monarchical Spain professes to the "august children." I learn (says the Chronicle's Correspondent) that the "sensible harangue" alluded to was in poetry; so that by a fortunate coincidence, not only did the procession happen to cross the most public street in Madrid, just at the moment when the royal carriage was coming up it, but there also happened to be a "fashionable" poet on the spot, to spout verses to the good folks on the wonderful piety of "the august children." Profane people insist, however, that the whole scene was arranged beforehand; the procession appointed "by order," and the verses concocted and got by heart "in due course!"—Pat.

FRANCE AND SPAIN.—The following is from the France:—"We are assured that the financial distress is so great in Spain, that the garrison of Barcelona, which had remained faithful to Prim and the Central Government, has been paid by means of an advance made by the French authorities. This fact, which has a certain political importance, requires explanation. If M. Guizot has placed funds at the disposal of M. de Lesseps, it is still necessary to inform us in what part of the budget this expenditure is to figure. Is it from the secret funds, or from that of the expenditure extraordinary and missions of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs? The fact itself is announced to us positively from Barcelona, and we know, moreover, that the English Consul has communicated it officially to his Government."—Ibid.

A MONSTROUS NEGRO.—We find in the Louisville Daily Advertiser the following account of a giant negro:—"Died, yesterday morning, at the Exchange Hotel, in this city, a negro boy, the property of Mr. Andrew H. Jordan, of Columbus, Mississippi. We visited him after he was shrouded, in company with his master, from whom we received the following remarkable details concerning him. He was four years old in April last, and four feet one inch in height; was born in Mississippi of parents in no respect remarkable for any deviation from the ordinary size and temperament of their respective sexes—nothing unusual in person or mind distinguished him, until he completed his first year; when he began developing in a manner that excited the astonishment of all who saw him. His hair grew with surprising rapidity over his entire body and face, giving him whiskers and beard, as luxuriant as an adult. His body assumed the muscular developments of athletic manhood, his strength enabling him at four years of age to lift 200 pounds dead weight, with ease. His mind was clear and strikingly vigorous, and his character distinguished for integrity and generosity. We examined his corpse, and were astonished at the symmetry and enormous strength of his proportions. A grenadier might have envied the fulness of his whiskers on cheek and chin, and a demagogue consented to be honest with the ingenuous expression of his countenance. His hands and feet were more taper and symmetrical than any of his race we ever saw. He fell a victim to pleurisy, and the eminent medical aid called in to his relief, were fully persuaded of the accuracy of Mr. Jordan's statement of his age."—Ibid.

A similar case was described long ago in Brewster's Edinburgh Philosophical Journal: and a boy of the same sort was seen about twenty miles south of Calcutta, in the direction of Barripore, in 1829.—Ed. Fd. of India.

No. 271 of 1843.—The following para. of a Letter, No. 5, from the Honourable the Court of Directors to the Governor of Bengal, dated 17th February 1841, is published to the Army:

"29. You will clearly understand, that 21 years' service, whereof the last eight years at least, shall have been passed in the rank of Serjeant, are required to entitle Serjeants to retire on a superior rate of Pension, unless, after completing 21 years' service, the Serjeant may be disabled by being wounded on actual service, and also be distinguished for good conduct, both conditions being requisite to give him the claim which he would have had, if his term of service as Serjeant had extended to 8 years."

No. 272 of 1843.—The following paragraph of a Letter, No. 58, from the Honourable the Court of Directors to the Governor of Bengal, dated 20th September 1843, (received 27th November,) is published for general information:

"8. It affords us much gratification to have it in our power to remove the only obstacle which exists to the continued employment of Local Lieutenant James Skinner, and thus to manifest our respect for the memory of his distinguished father—We now accordingly authorize you to grant him an unattached Commission as Captain in the Army, with date of rank from the date of your receipt of this letter."

No. 273 of 1843.—The following Resolution passed by the Right Honourable the Governor General of India in Council, in the Financial Department, under date the 22d November 1843, prescribing the terms on which Leave of Absence on Private Affairs, or on Medical Certificate, will be granted hereafter to Medical Officers holding Civil Appointments, is published in General Orders:—

"Resolution.—Any Medical Officer in Civil Medical employ, who shall proceed on leave of absence from the Station to which he is attached, whether on private affairs or on Medical Certificate, shall forfeit during the period of such absence, the whole of his Civil Salary, and shall be entitled to draw his Military Pay and Allowances only, subject to the Rules in the Military Department: The Medical Officer performing the duties of the absentee shall receive the entire allowances of the situation in which he may be appointed to officiate, unless he be in Medical charge of a Regiment or the Wing of a Regiment at the same Station, in which case he will receive his allowances for such charge, and 100 Rupees a month additional for the performance of the Civil duties.

Any Medical Officer in Civil Medical employ, who shall be absent from his duty, whether on Medical Certificate or on account of his private affairs, for a period exceeding six months at one time, shall not be permitted to return to his Civil Appointment without a fresh nomination thereto, and shall be considered from the date of the expiration of the six months, to be at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief.

By order of the Right Honourable the Governor General in Council,

(Sd.) J. A. DORIN,
Secy. to the Govt. of India."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

KABUL RELIEF FUND.
SCHEME.

THE GENERAL COMMITTEE of the Kabul Relief Fund have much pleasure in laying before the subscribers their schemes for the final distribution of the balance of the Fund amounting to about 306,000 Co.'s Rs.

The delay in doing so has arisen from an earnest endeavour and desire to carry out to its fullest extent and in the most effectual manner the benevolent design of subscribers; they had in consequence to correspond with the Committees of London, Calcutta, Madras, Bombay and Agra, and to communicate with applicants for relief in all parts of England and India; even now, they feel it would be better to postpone for a while the final distribution did not the approaching dissolution of the Committee, and circumstances unnecessary to mention, urge them to pursue an opposite course.

The Committees of Calcutta, Madras and Agra have expressed their approval of the principle on which the scheme, now submitted, is based. That at Bombay, which hold at their disposal Co's. Rs. 50,000, not included in the above available balance, have not yet communicated their opinion on the subject. A further sum of about 11,000 Rs., also not included in the above, remains at the disposal of the Cawnpore Committee, who, since the establishment of the Fund, have disbursed relief without reference to the General Committee.

The distribution herein made is regulated by the Funds actually in hand. In anticipation of receiving the balances now in the hands of the Committees of Bombay and Cawnpore, the General Committee propose to apportion such sums, or parts of the same, to the widows of Company's Officers, being guided in their distribution by the necessities of recipients, and thus the object of subscribers will be fully carried out by the whole amount being devoted to the relief of the sufferers from the Kabul disasters: and to that purpose only.

In drawing up this scheme now published the Committee have borne in mind that the Fund, with the distribution of which they are entrusted, is strictly of a charitable nature, and intended to be applied to the relief of the distressed without reference to the sources whence the Fund originated. With this object in view they have raised the income of widows of Commissioned Officers to about 120£ a year, leaving it to the option of each to receive a permanent annuity or a final bonus at a reasonable valuation. A further sum of small amount has been given to each child of such officers. By the table attached to this scheme, vide Appendix A, it will appear that the distribution to this class has been in the proportion, in favour of the Queen's service, of 8 to 1: had the Committee fixed on a greater income, for instance any sum exceeding £125 and not above 150, the relative proportion of the widows of the services relieved would be in favour of the Company's service of 12 to 9, while the amount of relief, if the incomes of the more distressed were made equal, would still remain as disproportionate as before. The Committee therefore feel that the principle of raising small incomes to a certain amount, irrespective of the sources whence the Fund principally originated, will commend itself to the good feeling and judgment of every subscriber.

The able bodied relatives of deceased camp followers, not entitled to Government pension, have already received as a final donation a sum varying up to 50 Rupees, inclusive of periodical advances.

It will appear by a reference to class 5, consisting of maimed persons, that their number does not exceed 185, this will appear small, but the Committee have reason to fear from the statement of many natives lately returned from Affghanistan, that near 300 Hindoostanees remain there, unable from their crippled condition, to leave. Many of these, of course, are entitled to Government pensions, but the Committee will reserve a small portion of the Fund to meet the wants of these unfortunate people should they survive to reach their own country.

For many months past the Committee have given their earnest and constant attention to the practicability of paying all claimants on the Fund, entitled to permanent relief, their respective donations by a system of life pension or pensions lapsing on marriage, and resumable on the recurrence of widowhood; but they regret to state they are compelled to conclude, that, in the majority of cases, especially with reference to native claimants, any such plan is not practicable. As a general principle therefore, they decide that all claimants receive bonuses in lieu of the above mentioned pensions, but in the cases, more especially of the widows of the officers, it be left to the option of the individual to be relieved, whether she receives that relief in the way of bonus or of a life annuity. The Committee, however, propose to secure to the children of all European claimants any benefit they may receive from the Fund.

The object in submitting this scheme to the subscribers is to receive their sanction to the distribution of the Fund, in accordance with it. The Committee are aware that it is impracticable to convene meetings, at even all the large stations, for the purpose of obtaining a formal assent; they therefore will postpone the final distribution until the 1st January, 1844, on which date, should not a majority of subscribers have formally conveyed their dissent through the medium of public meetings, the Committee will construe silence into approval and proceed at once to pay the bonuses.

In matters of minor detail, the Committee will be most happy to receive and consider any suggestions which may be offered by individual subscribers, and they will consider their best thanks due to any one who will give their time and attention to the subject and favor them with the result.

Claimants on the fund are divided into five classes as follows:—

FIRST CLASS.

Of the widows and children of European Commissioned Officers.

The personal incomes of these widows to be raised to £120, and each child to receive a bonus of Co.'s Rupees 2000, vide appendix A.

SECOND CLASS.

Of the widows and children of European non Commissioned Officers and Privates.

These widows to receive 300 Rupees each subject to the deduction of dowry, when such has been given by the Fund. Each child, the offspring of such deceased husband, to receive 100 Rupees; if orphans to receive 200 Rupees each. Vide appendix B. A communication will be held with the Officers Commanding Regiments under whose supervision these children may be, to take charge of the donations.

THIRD CLASS.

Of the widows and children of Warrant Officers and Subordinate Medical Staff, and others of a similar rank.

These widows to receive 1000 Rupees each for themselves and children. Vide appendix C.

FOURTH CLASS.

Of the widows and children of native writers and others of similar rank and employment.

These to receive a donation of 300 Rupees each for themselves and children. Vide appendix D.

FIFTH CLASS.

Of the maimed.

Government having deemed it inexpedient to grant the Committee's request, that these people be paid by the military pension Pay-Masters, they will receive their respective donations (Vide appendix E) with the exception of a sufficient sum for their expences on the road, when they reach their respective homes.

The classification of these people has been made (under the superintendence of a sub-Committee of which Dr. Dempster is a member) with reference solely to physical disability.

SIXTH CLASS.

Of aged and needy relatives of deceased camp followers.

These people to receive each according to their respective inability to work, a sum not exceeding 250 Rs. and under the same arrangement as the maimed. Vide appendix F.

SEVENTH CLASS.

Of all others not included in any of the above classes. Vide appendix G.

NOTICE.

THE Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's Steam ship Hindostan of 2,000 tons and 540 horse power, Captain R. Moresby, I. N. Commander, and Bentinck 2,000 tons and 540 horse power, Kellock, Commander, will leave Calcutta for Suez, touching at Madras, Point de Galle, and Aden; on the following days:

Hindostan 13th February, 1844.
Bentinck 15th March, .. 1844.
Hindostan 12th May,.. .. 1844.

To parties proceeding to Europe, the advantages offered by the Overland route need no comment as independently of the certainty of arriving in England within two months, they are saved both the trouble and expense of fitting up Cabins and providing a large outfit of clothing which on their arrival at home is quite useless. Any further information can be obtained by applying at the Co.'s Office, No. 11, Strand.

NEW POSTAGE ARRANGEMENTS.

ON the 1st of March will come into operation the new arrangement for permitting the prepayment of English postage as well as Indian, on letters sent per Overland Mail viâ Southampton.

MESSRS. THACKER AND CO. have for sale a few sets of Postage Scales made by the celebrated Mordan, with English and Calcutta weights, the former weighing up to 3½ ounces, the latter to 3½ tolahs, price per set Rs. 14.

The advantages that will attend the possession of these scales is obvious when it is stated, that the overweight of a single grain in a letter, will involve an extra charge of two shillings or one Rupee.

FIRST CONSIGNMENT OF MAPS AND CHARTS, DIRECT FROM MR. WYLD OF CHARING CROSS,

Is shortly expected per Madagascar.

MESSRS. THACKER & CO.

are also instructed by Mr. Wyld to advise the British Indian Public that he has long had in preparation on a large scale, which is so far advanced that he is enabled to guarantee its receipt in Calcutta in the course of the ensuing year, in all probability by June next. Mr. Wyld's talents and experience as a Geographer are too well known to render it necessary to remark upon the authorities and sources of information which have been brought to bear upon this undertaking, and which, it is believed, will cause the New Map to supersede every other hitherto produced, while its price will be exceedingly moderate.

A NEW MAP OF INDIA

 Subscribers' names will be at once registered by Messrs. Thacker and Co.

ACHROMATIC REFRACTING TELESCOPE.

MESSRS. THACKER AND CO. HAVE JUST LANDED FROM THE PLANTAGENET, A SPLENDID TELESCOPE OF WHICH THE FOLLOWING DESCRIPTION HAS BEEN FURNISHED TO THEM BY MR. DOLLOND, THE MAKER.

The magnifying power of the Three and Half Feet Telescope with the eye tube for terrestrial objects is by a change of the two first eye glasses 26 and 45 times. With those for astronomical purposes, the magnifying powers are 40, 80, 120, and 180.

Stained glasses, are applied to all the different eye tubes, to guard the eye in observing the spots on the Sun. These glasses are to be taken off when the eye tubes are used for other purposes.

There is a rack-work intended to move the Telescope in any direction required, and is worked by means of two handles.

For the more readily finding or directing the Telescope to any object, particularly astronomical objects, there is a small tube or telescope, called the Finder, fixed near the eye end of the large Telescope. At the focus of the object glass of this finder there are two wires, which intersect each other in the axis of the tube, and as the magnifying power is only about six times, the real field of view is very large; therefore any object will be readily found within it, which being brought to the intersection of the wires, it will then be within the field of the Telescope.

In viewing astronomical objects (and particularly when the greatest magnifying powers are applied) it is very necessary to render the Telescope as steady as possible; for that purpose there are two sets of brass sliding rods. These rods connect the eye end of the Telescope with two of the legs of the stand, by which any vibrations of the tube will be prevented, and the Telescope rendered sufficiently steady for using the greatest powers. These sliding rods move within one another with so much ease, as to admit of the rack-work being used in the same manner as if they were not applied. With stand, &c. complete Rs. 250.

EDUCATION.
CLAPHAM PARK ACADEMY NEAR LONDON.

IN this establishment a liberal education, in all its branches, is combined with an assiduous Intellectual Training, an ever watchful Moral oversight, Religious culture and the treatment of a Home.

The premises have been recently erected for the purpose, and combine advantages of no ordinary character, conducive alike to health, cheerfulness, and the formation of habits of good order; and the situation, for its salubrity, pleasantness and highly select character, is second to none in the environs of London. Mr. Long aims in all his arrangements and in his whole system of instruction, to extend to his pupils the full benefit of his own experience in teaching during more than twenty years, and to form the character through the instrumentality of his and Mrs. Long's personal attention and influence, and the steady application, by himself and assistants of a discipline equally mild and effective.

Mr. Long has pleasure in referring to the following Gentlemen, to whom he is well known: The Rev. E. Crisp, Bangalore; Rev. G. Mundy, Chinsurah; Rev. A. Lacroix, Calcutta; Rev. M. Hill, Berhampore; Rev. W. Morton, Calcutta; Rev. E. Porter, Vizagapatam; Rev. W. Porter, Madras; also to the Rev. James Hill, Clapham, Surrey, late of Calcutta.

The mildly bracing air of Clapham Park, and the superior accommodations of the house, including warm and cold bathing, are particularly adapted to the reception of pupils from warm climates.—Further particulars may be had of the Rev. E. Porter, Vizagapatam, and the Rev. W. Porter, Madras.

A LADY, the widow of a medical officer well known in the Bengal Service, residing in Regent's Park, London, wishes to receive three or four little girls from India to educate with her own two Daughters, for whom she has a very highly accomplished governess, any children committed to her care would in every respect be treated as her own family, and share the same advantages both in their moral as well as mental cultivation.

For terms and references apply to Messrs. Gisborne, Ainslie, Cowie and Co., Calcutta.

MR. JAMES ANDERSON'S INVESTMENT.

MR. ANDERSON begs to announce that the greater part of his Annual Investment being sold, he in future proposes to make periodical consignments of Goods suited to this market, and for that purpose returns to England in the Bentinck.

Parties desirous to indent for Mr. Anderson's Goods, will please apply to his Agents Messrs. Nichol, Wilkie and Co. who will be ready to communicate all particulars.

Gwalior.—The Governor General reached Agra on the morning of Monday the 11th instant, and was received with great pomp and circumstance. In the course of the week, the Army of Exercise marched towards Gwalior, and was to be followed immediately by the vast train of battering guns. The Commander-in-Chief left Agra on the 16th to take the command of the forces, with Lord Ellenborough at his side. His Lordship now 'makes his first campaign.' We believe this is the first instance in our Indian annals in which a Governor General, not a military man, has taken the field in person, and there will not be wanting those who will ascribe this procedure to his Lordship's fondness for the tented field, rather than to the necessity of the case. They will argue that as Gwalior is within a day's post of Agra, every object which required the presence of the Governor General in the vicinity of warlike operations, might have been equally secured by his remaining in the Palace in that city, in daily communication with the Commander-in-Chief. It is much to be doubted whether his presence can afford any substantial aid to his Excellency sufficient to counterbalance the inconvenience of an arrangement which makes the Commander-in-Chief the second personage in his own camp. There can scarcely be any negotiations on foot which will require to be modified according to the events of the campaign. It has of course been foreseen that the overwhelming force now advancing into the country must overcome all opposition; and that the fortress which yielded to Popham's small band sixty years ago, cannot hold out against our tremendous siege train. For all practical purposes, his Lordship therefore might as well have remained behind. This is, however, perhaps the only occasion which Lord Ellenborough will enjoy of actually taking the field in person and sharing in the excitement of a real fight, and it would be ungenerous to begrudge the gratification of this curiosity.

Those who have been accustomed to consider the union of the Governor General with his Council, as a sure guarantee for peace, will discover in the present measure how entirely they have been mistaken. The war in Affghanistan and the war in Scinde, were both planned and entered upon while the Governor General was separated from the Supreme Council. The present campaign against Gwalior was planned in Council; the army was collected—under another name, but which misled nobody—while Lord Ellenborough sat weekly among his Counsellors; and nothing was left to his Lordship's individual fiat, but to order the troops which had been assembled, to strike their tents and march. Whatever may be the praise or the blame bestowed on the present military movement, it cannot be attributed to the wisdom or waywardness of one man, unless it is discovered that the Council or a majority of them placed their opinions entirely at the disposal of the Governor General. To all present appearances, the Council and the Governor must be considered equally responsible for this measure.

Of the justice of the war, it is not easy to speak with perfect confidence till the Gwalior Blue Book is published by order of Parliament. As the paramount authority in India, our Government cannot allow its wishes to be thwarted, and its power to be defied with impunity. Its dignity and its influence must be maintained unimpaired. Whenever it interferes, it must interfere with effect. The circumstance of its having been mixed up with the internal affairs of any state, or having carefully abstained from all interference, must necessarily create a broad line of distinction in the policy it ought to pursue. The Punjab and Nepaul, therefore, stand on a different footing from the kingdom of Scindea. With the two former our relationship has been simply that of an ally. We have had nothing to say when one faction has subverted another, or even when the Minister has put his own sovereign to death. But Gwalior has long been in a dependent condition, notwithstanding the squeamish delicacy of our non-interference principle. During the last fifteen years, we have interfered in the internal direction of affairs, in so many instances, that the Durbar has considered the approbation of our Government in every measure of importance, quite indispensible. We have a contingent force paid by Scindea to the extent of five lakhs of Rupees a year, which has been employed in repressing domestic opposition, and has served materially to keep the various provinces in a state of subordination. We have interfered in the case of Baeza Baee, and on the recent vacancy of the throne, the concurrence of the Governor General was sought, both as it respects the appointment of the Sovereign and the Prime Minister. The different Courts of India have long been accustomed to identify our government with the politics of Gwalior, and the open defiance of our authority, in the recent insurrection, and the persecution and banishment of the Minister of our choice, seems to create a strong necessity for our interference, upon every consideration of honour and interest.

But in addition to this claim on our interference, it was impossible to overlook the danger to which the peace of our own provinces was exposed from the guilty successes of a lawless soldiery, whom the supreme authority of the state could no longer control. A regard for the safety of our provinces which surround the state of Gwalior, and one of which is far from tranquil, demanded a strong effort to render these combustible materials innoxious. There could be no peace for our dominions while they were exposed to the incursions of an insolent and domineering body of troops, who had recently dismissed their own officers, and besieged their own sovereign. The law of self preservation seems to demand that the only power capable of disbanding these bodies, should at length put forth its strength. And we were in a measure bound by the ties of honor as well as of friendship to preserve the Gwalior state, which we had already taken under our protection, from falling into complete anarchy. It is therefore but reasonable to think that notwithstanding the known hostility of the Court of Directors to our present ruler, and the growing lukewarmness of his Ministerial friends to his personal interests, the march of our troops into the Gwalior state, will be regarded as fully justified by the necessity of circumstances, and will pass without censure, even if it should not be viewed with approbation.

What ulterior measures the Governor General may pursue, after the triumph of our arms has restored tranquillity, remain at present locked up in the vice-regal bosom, and will not be known to the world till we are masters of Gwalior. Whether the wretched rabble of soldiers who now rule at the capital, will disperse on our approach or meet us in the field, has been matter of conjecture; but of the early and complete success of our arms, no one has entertained any doubt, and it is possible that while the reader is perusing this article, the Governor General may be exclaiming, veni, vidi, vici.

The Punjab.—Affairs seem to have taken a new and unexpected turn in the Punjab. Golab Sing who came down from his mountain principality to the aid of his nephew, has been unable to reconcile him with his brother Suchet Sing, and has resolved, so say the news writers, to abandon the Punjab to its fate, and return with his army to Jumboo. He had marched with his troops out of Lahore to the north, but no accounts of his having finally quitted the plains has been as yet received. The course he has now adopted, was one which all those who had studied the affairs of the Punjab, had foreseen and predicted. In the kingdom which this ministerial family has been gradually consolidating in the hills, Golab Sing has no rival chiefs to conciliate or overcome, and no enemy to fear, but his own discontented subjects. In the plains of the Punjab, the spirit of independence which had been controlled in succession by Runjeet Sing and Dhyan Sing, has escaped from "the barrel," and threatens universal anarchy. The wary chief is wise in securing one sovereignty for his family, instead of mingling in perpetual conflicts, and risking both that which he possesses and that which he grasps at. Perhaps he may at no distant period again descend from the mountains, after the rival factions have destroyed each other, and quietly possess himself of the throne of Runjeet Sing, unless the overflowings of factious violence should endanger the peace of our own dominions, and constrain our pacific ruler to march a force to Lahore.

Heera Sing is said to be a youth of considerable energy and tact; but it is well known that his power was on the eve of extinction when his uncle made his appearance with 20,000 men. Their departure will probably be the signal for fresh intrigues, possibly for a second massacre, which will involve the whole country in confusion. It is said that Golab Sing, whose ther had been gradually transferring the hoards of Runjeet to his own coffers, is taking away a farther portion with him, and will thus leave his nephew denuded of the sinews of war. Nothing is more probable, for there is no power to resist the transfer of all that remains of the accumulation, to Raj-ke-kote. There is no present appearance that Heera Sing will long be able to make head against the Sikh Chiefs whose ambition has been kindled by recent events; nor is it safe to speculate on the turn which affairs may take in that unhappy country. Only it appears evident that circumstances are rapidly hastening on the crisis when the intervention of our authority will be rendered necessary.

THE NOVEMBER MAIL reached us on Wednesday last; but we were unable to offer any remarks on its contents, till we had received a sufficient supply of journals. The intelligence brought on this occasion, except in reference to Ireland, is on the whole calculated to soften the gloom which had been produced by so many preceding mails. In Ireland, the Ministry has determined at length to adopt energetic measures for suppressing Repeal agitation. After having allowed a score of monster meetings to be held with impunity, and the public mind to be raised to a pitch of the highest enthusiasm without interference, they have prevented the last assembly which it was intended to hold. After having allowed O'Connel full scope for the diffusion of his own sentiments, till they had taken the firmest root in the minds of the people, he has been arrested, and put on his trial for his misdemeanors. One of the papers which we have received attributes the apparent indifference which had previously marked the conduct of the Ministry to the fact that the Duke of Wellington's military preparations in Ireland were not mature; and that the Government now considered itself prepared for every contingency which might arise, and had accordingly taken the field against the system of agitation. But this can be regarded only as an excuse for their apathy, not as the reason of it; for it would have been easy for the Duke, at any time, to have poured in at once those additional troops, which have been gradually introduced into the country, if any emergency had arisen. We are not likely to know the real cause of this long slumber, and this sudden activity, till the private correspondence of those who are behind the scenes is laid open to the public, which will not be in the days of the present generation. Apparently, the present interference comes too late; for the minds of the Irish are so thoroughly imbued with the idea of Repeal, as a panacea for all the grievances which afflict the country, that even the large body of troops with which Ireland is now garrisoned, appears insufficient to cope with a united and resolute people. And there is apparently much truth in the observation, that the present efforts of Government are likely to prove beneficial to O'Connel, by drawing off public attention from the fact which was beginning to be discerned, that all his magnificent promises had led to nothing, and were likely to end in disappointment. It is possible, that the agitation had begun to flag just at the period when Ministerial opposition stepped in to impart new life to it. As to the prosecution of O'Connel, it is really difficult to say whether it was an act of folly or prudence. If he be [illegible] guilty, he, who is the only man capable [of] restraining the popular ardor within bounds, will be taken from the scene just at the time, when that ardor is converted into fury, and his presence is more particularly required to prevent an outbreak. In all probability he will be acquitted; and Ministers will then have conferred on him—to use an expression of Lord Barrington's in reference to the American agitators—"the palm of martyrdom, without the pain of it, which is the perfection of fanatical beatitude." The proceedings of the Ministry in that case will be found to have provoked instead of having allayed hostility. But we almost feel ashamed to deal in censure of measures, in an emergency, in which no man seems to know what to counsel.

The riots in Wales may be considered for the present extinct. The ringleaders have been brought to trial and convicted, but not before they had forfeited all public sympathy by their lawless proceedings. One of the ablest of the Dissenting Ministers in the disturbed provinces, says, "The meeting is not now what it was at its commencement. Its forms, its spirit, perhaps its aims, have all changed and changed for the worse. And many who were drawn or driven to speak of it with much indifference, at first, must now denounce it as decidedly illegal, immoral and anarchical. This wild organization of physical power for the purpose of restoring or extending local or more general rights, is a great evil." At the same time he remarks, "With the grievances which have occasioned this movement, I have little or nothing to do. I know that they are real, crushing, accumulating; that the people are right; are doing their duty in seeking their direct and entire removal, but I know also, that the means that are now employed can never effect that object. Wicked means cannot—should not—secure good ends." The energy which has been exhibited by the Ministry, has had the effect of checking violence; and we are happy to learn, that the Dissenting Ministers have resolved to "appeal to the moral and religious virtue in the principality to save it from its present evils." They are all powerful in South Wales, where the Ministers of the Established Church are utterly without influence, and their efforts to eradicate this spirit of opposition to the Government of the country will doubtless be attended with the happiest effect.

The improvement of trade and manufactures, which the present mail confirms, is matter of sincere congratulation. Although none of our commercial rivals have modified their tariffs or let out a single reef of privilege, yet the depression in the manufacturing districts which characterized the beginning of the present year, seems to have been materially relieved as it drew to a close. Work was more plentiful and wages a shade higher. From no county does the last mail announce the cry of starvation. The new Tariff has begun to produce a beneficial influence on the means of living. Corn was in some places as low as 47*s.* the quarter; the imperial average was about 50*s.*, yet wages had not decreased in proportion to the fall in the price of wheat, but were more liberal than when it stood at a higher mark. The Income Tax had also been most unexpectedly productive. We have not leisure to refer to our old files, but, if we are not much mistaken, Sir Robert Peel calculated on about three millions and a half as the result of this tax. In the year ending October the 10th, it yielded more than five millions sterling; so that the clear increase of income in the year, after deducting [illegible] more than a million last [illegible] in the department of Customs by the reductions made in the Tariff, was four millions Sterling. The product of the Income tax at successive periods will be apparent from the following statement:

| Realized in the quarter ending | £ |
|---|---|
| 10th October, 1842, .. .. | 313,844 |
| 5th January, 1843, .. .. | 257,212 |
| 5th April, „ .. .. | 1,885,232 |
| 5th July, „ .. .. | 861,709 |
| 10th October, „ .. .. | 2,047,904 |

Yet at the close of the year in which this large sum was raised, the condition of the country is represented as highly satisfactory. The demand for labour had increased, and though plenty had not smiled on old England, yet the gnawing distress of want appears to have greatly subsided. The Income Tax, one of most equitable and least burdensome which can be devised, had thus begun to bring back our finances to a wholesome condition. We call it equitable because it is substantially a tax on the rich, though it may occasionally press heavy on some who are any thing but rich. A tax of equal amount laid on the poor, would have crushed them to the ground, and the pitcher must have come back empty from the cistern. The same tax laid on the really affluent, inflicts on them only the inconvenience of an inquisition which must generally redound to their advantage; when laid on those who are rich only in name, it subjects them to the inconvenience of detection. The disadvantages which it carries with it are infinitely less than the disadvantages which would attend any other mode of raising an equivalent sum. The possession of the large resources which the tax supplies, places Sir Robert on high vantage ground, as respects his commercial negotiations with hostile powers, both abroad or at home.

HINDOO GENEALOGICAL TABLE.—We have been favoured with a copy of a Genealogical Table, which has been drawn up under the direction of one of the most active, zealous and influential native gentlemen in Calcutta, Prusunno Koomar Tagore. It brings into one point of view the mode in which the property of a Hindoo is to descend to the various members and branches of the family, both direct and collateral, and in the ascending as well as in the descending line, according to the doctrines of the School of Bengal. We have not had time to examine it in detail; but we make no question that it will be found to correspond with the provisions of those standard legal works which are regarded as authoritative in Bengal, and to which reference is made. There can therefore be little hesitation in saying, that it will prove of the highest utility to the various Courts in which cases of inheritance are constantly arising. Though the Judges both European and Native are required to submit such cases, when they occur, for the opinion of the Official Pundits, yet it would be a great improvement of our present practice, which appears to belong more to the infancy than the maturity of judicial institutions, if every Court was furnished with a copy of the Table to be suspended in some conspicuous place. This would encourage the Judge to study the subject, of which too many are ignorant, and enable him to form an independent opinion on the questions brought before him. It would also prove highly advantageous to the practitioners in the Court; to its ministerial officers and to the community in general. Although the [illegible] of this clear directory would not supersede the reference now made to the Pundit, it would serve to check any irregularity or partiality in his decision. Before this is done, however, the accuracy of the table should be verified by the Pundits of the Sudder and of the Supreme Court. We throw out this idea under the impression, that nothing which may tend to facilitate the administration of justice, and to impart additional exactness to it, is unworthy the notice of Government. We would also venture to advice the Compiler to favour the public with an English version of this important document.

The view of this Genealogical Table of the succession to property under the Hindoo law, naturally awakens some reflections, which will we trust not appear impertinent. The whole scheme of Hindoo inheritance has for its object to fix the religion of the Vedas and the Poorans for ever in the soil of India, and to prevent any defection from it. The descent of property is regulated, not by the more natural claims of consanguinity, but by the test of an adherence to the creed of the family. All landed property is a perpetual trust, not so much for the advantage of the living as for the spiritual repose of the dead. "The spiritual benefit of the deceased is thus the original foundation of the Hindoo law of inheritance—and the succession is therefore regulated not by nearness of kin, but by the presentation of offerings to deceased ancestors;—and hence those, who cannot, either for a general or a specific cause, or those who will not perform the ceremonies enjoined in the Shastrus, are necessarily excluded from becoming heirs." This provision of the ancient Hindoo sages for the perpetuity of their religion, must be regarded as the result of the most profound reflection. It is the most unostentatious, and perhaps the most efficacious system of intolerance which the genius of man has ever devised. While those sages made the order of priesthood entirely dependent on the religious liberality of the laity, they adopted the most effectual mode of preventing apostacy, by giving the inheritance of those who forsook the national creed to those who continued firmly to adhere to it. The natural operation of this precept must have been to bind the whole community in the firmest bonds of allegiance to the religion they had received from their ancestors. While it continued in operation, and was enforced by the decisions of the Courts, it presented a most formidable obstacle to the adoption of a purer creed by any part of the nation.

We need scarcely point out how repugnant this enactment is to those principles of religious liberty which have been gradually advancing to maturity in England, and may now be considered predominant. It was evident that under the government of Great Britain, such a law could not long be suffered to remain in force. Yet it was upheld with great tenacity by the public Authorities for sixty years after we had established Courts in India on our own model. Although the recognition of this law grew simply out of the spontaneous concession made by our Government, fifteen years after the battle of Plassey, yet our "Civilians,"—using the word in its legal signification,—continued to consider it as part of the original compact, under which we took possession of the country. Colebrooke, and Harington, and Courtney Smith, would probably have resisted the abolition of it as a breach of public faith; and even the enlightened Lord Hastings, who first scouted the idea that ignorance was the parent of loyalty in India, might possibly have hesitated to adopt so startling an innovation. Not that we would censure these enlightened and conscientious men for not having carried out this reform, any more than we would censure Chatham for not having abolished the Slave Trade; for there is a time for all things, and the time had not come for introducing the principles of religious toleration into our Courts. But it did come in the days of that great statesman, Lord William Bentinck. He found that the public mind had been gradually prepared for this happy change, by public discussion; and at length in the year 1832, introduced a clause into one of his Acts, which, without any parade, broke up the whole system of intolerance which had predominated in India since the days of Munoo, and declared that no man should be deprived of his ancestral inheritance for adopting another creed. So silently was this change introduced, that even the Dhurma Subha, which was then in the zenith of its power, dealing out anathemas against all who would not join in reprobating the abolition of Suttees, scarcely noticed the passing of an enactment which destroyed one of the strongest bulwarks of Hindooism.

If the rigid Hindoos are disposed—as some of them may be—to object to this liberal innovation, as they gradually discover its operation in the desertion of their creed, let them remember that it is to our Government they owe it, that the Hindoo law of Inheritance, after having lain in abeyance for nearly six centuries in Bengal, was again endowed with legal vitality. During the whole period of the Moosulman supremacy, no succession to property was adjudged by the Courts, in which none but the conquerors were allowed to preside, but according to the Mahomedan law. The Hindoos doubtless followed the rules of their own Shastrus in the private distribution of their property, but they could not apply to the public tribunals to enforce them, without the certainty of finding that law rejected with scorn, and a rule of partition decreed, altogether foreign to their own. It was our Government that first gave them a right to bring their own laws into the Courts, and demand that the descent of property should be determined by them. For this great boon they are indebted to Warren Hastings. He took his seat at the Council table in April 1772, and within five months after, promulgated the first Code of Regulations bestowed by the British Government on India. In the 23d Section of his Regulations it was ordained, that all decrees regarding the inheritance of the property of Hindoos, should be regulated by the Shastrus. Yet it is much to be doubted whether Hastings himself had any idea of the greatness of the change he was making, by this restoration of legal rights. It would appear from a careful perusal of his correspondence, that he was scarcely aware of the intolerant principle which the Mahomedans had introduced, and which he abrogated in one short and simple sentence, upon the mere impulse of just and equitable feeling. He never alludes to this most important improvement in his letters; he even goes so far as to state that his Code was based upon the existing constitution of things. It was evidently framed in a hurry. The Ministry at home had threatened India with a Supreme Court; and he was anxious to have something like a written law to shew, in order to prevent the inundation of English law. In alluding to this subject he says, "We have been very fortunate in the time which we have chosen for our judicial improvements, for we cannot undo what we have done; and if the Lord Chief Justice should come among us with their institutes, the Lord have mercy on us! We shall be in a complete state of confusion here, and we shall be cruelly mauled at home, especially if the Parliament should lay hold of our Code, for we have not a lawyer among us. Necessity compelled us to form some establishment of justice; we chose the best we could; and if this shall not be found so perfect as more time and more knowledge might have made it, it is yet capable of receiving improvement and is a good foundation for a more complete system of judicature." It was in this our initial code, drawn up without the aid of a lawyer, in the short space of a few weeks, amidst a thousand anxieties and distractions, that the Hindoo population of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, were, for the first time after the lapse of six centuries, permitted to demand the partition of estates according to their own laws.

THE LATE REV. SAMUEL DYER—CHINESE MOVEABLE METALLIC TYPES.—The last papers received from the Straits announce the death of the Rev. Samuel Dyer, Missionary from the London Missionary Society at Penang. He had proceeded to China for the benefit of his health, which was considerably improved by the voyage; but he was soon after attacked by the fever which has been so fatally prevalent at Hong Kong, and carried to his grave. In him the cause of Missions has lost a zealous and experienced labourer, just at the time when the facilities for Missionary labour in China which have been created by recent events, had given him new and enlarged prospects of usefulness.

In addition to his Missionary labours, Mr. Dyer's attention had for some years been directed with much success to the improvement of Chinese printing by the introduction of moveable metallic types. Perhaps there are few of our readers who require to be told that although the Chinese were in possession of the art of printing long before it was known in Europe, they have not made any advance beyond the use of wooden blocks on which each letter is engraved; and have never dreamt of adopting the European improvement of cutting punches of each separate character, and casting types in a mould. Whenever, therefore, a book is to be published, a new set of blocks is required for it. Although these blocks are prepared with great neatness and even elegance, yet, the wood will not preserve the hair strokes of the character to the same extent as metal, and after a limited number of copies has been struck off, the impression becomes coarse and disgustful. This mode of printing moreover must be incompatible with all idea of speed; and although the Chinese artist works with much dexterity and great cheapness, still the balance of economy, after the first expense of punches has been defrayed, must remain with the moveable types.

The credit of having originated the plan of moveable metallic types, on the European model, may we think be fairly challenged for the town of Serampore. It is well known that Dr. Marshman, within five years after his arrival in India, applied to the study of the Chinese language, and, about thirty years ago published his Clavis Sinica. For this work, it became necessary to use Chinese characters. These were at first cut on the face of pieces of wood [illegible] the shape of types; as these little wooden types were very liable to break, metal was at length substituted. But as many characters of the same kind were required at one time in what is technically called the 'form,' the idea suggested itself, that it would be more economical to cut punches of them, and to cast as many exemplars as might be wanted. The idea was then extended to the printing of the Scriptures, and more than twelve hundred Chinese punches were thus cut by the native punch cutter, who served his apprenticeship to the man who had assisted Sir Charles Wilkins in cutting the first fount of Bengalee types. These were, we have reason to believe, the first Chinese punches ever cut, and though they may appear stiff and awkward to a Chinese eye, and will admit of indefinite improvement, yet they do credit to the spirit in which they originated, and to the skill of the native artizan.

The French have also made very considerable progress in the art of Chinese type cutting. Our readers must be familiar with the fact that the large and valuable Chinese Dictionary of De Guine was published in Paris in two folio volumes under the auspices of Napoleon le Grand, to whom the work is dedicated, and whose imperial eagle is emblazoned on the title page. This work required many thousand Chinese characters, which we believe were cut in wood, and it was published at the Imperial Printing Office. Since that period, the enterprising Didot, who has been gradually raising the style of printing in Paris to a pitch of extraordinary excellence, has paid particular attention to Chinese typography, and has cut a fount of Chinese types which is remarkable for the beauty and freedom of its execution. Every Chinese character consists of two parts, one of which is the primitive and the other the key, that is one of the 214 keys which enter into composition of every Chinese character, and is placed sometimes on the right hand, sometimes on the left; and occasionally at the top or the bottom. To cut a separate punch for every character in the Chinese language, the greater part of which are not in ordinary use, would be too expensive an undertaking for the purse of any private establishment. Mons. Didot is therefore said to have adopted the more practicable and economical plan of cutting and casting the primitives and the keys separately. These the 'compositor' unites as they are required, and thus forms the character he is to use. We have heard that a fount of these types has been sent over to Monsr. Callery, now residing at Macao, and is to be employed in printing the translation of the Imperial Dictionary of Kang-hi, on which he is engaged.

Mr. Dyer had long taken a very deep interest in Chinese printing, and may be said to have devoted his time chiefly to the preparation and improvement of a complete set of the Chinese types most commonly in use. He was fully aware that to supply the Chinese Empire with Scriptures to an extent adequate to its wants, a more economical plan than that of the Chinese stereotype must be adopted, more especially as each edition, by receiving improvements, would necessarily require a new series of blocks. He was convinced that this superior economy could be secured only by adopting the European system of using moveable metallic types. His exertions were eminently successful. The Chinese punches which he produced were remarkable for their boldness and beauty, and if his life had been spared, and his resources had increased, he would soon have succeeded in completing punches of all the characters required for the New Testament, which do not much exceed 3000. We hope some individual will be found with the same spirit and capacity, who will take up and carry forward his plan. We consider the possession of a complete fount of types, which shall so exactly correspond with the most beautiful specimens of typography the Chinese can produce, as to become at once acceptable to the Chinese eye, a matter of so much importance, in the present state and prospects of Chinese Missions, that no pains and no expense ought to be spared to secure it.

Whether the Chinese will ever abandon their stereotype system and adopt that of moveable types, is an interesting question. They are, it is true, exceedingly tenacious of old habits and customs. Yet we have seen with astonishment, during the period in which they were for the first time brought in contact with European improvements in the art of war, that they manifested the most eager desire to adopt them. They have learned more in the art of engineering and casting cannon, in this short space of time, and have learnt it more practically and more cheerfully, than the Turks have permitted themselves to learn in a century. We cannot therefore but augur important changes from the friendly intercourse which is likely to grow up between the most ingenious and the most industrious of Asiatics, and the European mind. The stationary character which has so long marked the people of China, there is every reason to believe will be broken up, by the contemplation of European models of excellence, and we think many years will not elapse before the Chinese adopt the European mode of printing, and set their skilful artizans to cut punches in steel, which shall surpass in beauty every thing that the Europeans have yet been able to achieve. Possibly within less than a quarter of a century, Canton may have its Wilson and Figgins and Caslon, and founts of type may become as much an article of traffic in the Empire as they are in England.

THE KHOONDS.—A fortnight ago the Hurkaru published a third rejoinder to our observations on the disposal of the children who had been rescued from the Khoonds, in the same spirit which pervaded his second answer. Our contemporary was evidently exhausting his ingenuity upon the information which he had previously received, without being able to adduce any new facts; and it seemed to be a waste of time to continue the discussion in these circumstances. Having given the statements which were sent to us and examined the validity of the reply with which the Hurkaru had been furnished, we were anxious to suspend the controversy till some farther light was shed on the subject by those who could speak to the facts of the case; we therefore refrained from noticing the remarks of the Hurkaru in our last issue. Having occasion now to return to the subject, we are bound in courtesy not to pass them over in silence. The Hurkaru appears to be offended that we did not at once admit the validity of his statements, and retract our censures. But where was the reasonableness of this expectation? After the Hurkaru has refused to acknowledge the accuracy of statements put forth on our editorial responsibility, with what color of reason could he demand implicit faith from us in the statements which he published on the same responsibility? We have no doubt he believed his authority to be good; but we have no reason for believing our authority to be a whit less valid; and, considering the large admissions which he has made of the truth of our assertions, we must have more direct and convincing proof, before we relinquish the conviction that our informant is substantially correct, however he may have been circumstantially in error.

The Hurkaru in his last article charges us with having suppressed his reply, although he had published all our articles. We happen to consider the suppression of an opponent's reply in the light of a wilful transgression, for which there can be no excuse or palliation. It is an act of editorial dishonesty, which if it can be fairly brought home to an editor, would justly deprive him of all farther claim to public confidence. But why should our contemporary consider it necessary, on this occasion, to put the most unfavourable construction upon an act of simple omission, of which both he and we have been guilty a dozen times, with abundant innocence? We need not remind him how exceedingly we are straitened for room in a weekly journal, and how often we are obliged to omit documents of great moment and value. We think we can appeal to his candid recollections, whether in the whole course of our editorial career he has ever discovered the smallest symptom of such disingenuousness as should warrant so serious a charge. His article was not reprinted, but assuredly not from any fear lest the republication should damage our cause.

But not content with one charge he brings a second. He says, we have endeavoured "to misrepresent his statements and arguments;" that "we have adopted controversial trickery unworthy of ourselves,"—and that "our only refuge is in controversial trickery." Our reply to this rather strong editorial language, will consist in laying before the reader the Hurkaru's own remarks and our reply. We leave it with perfect confidence to the public to determine from these extracts how far the charge of trickery can be sustained.

The Hurkaru had said—

"We know, that so far from thinking the work over, when the victims were rescued, his first care has been to have the boys taught to read, and the girls to spin; that he has taken the utmost pains to have the former placed with respectable people; and that he has employed the latter, as important agents, for the suppression of female infanticide. We must say, with regard to this last fact, that even in a purely Christian point of view, we think the girls put to much better use, than if they had been nominally converted, in the first instance, and turned into Lady's maids—or even native catechists' wives; and that, because we are certain that in the end such agency will more conduce to the uprooting of crime and the subsequent evangelisation of the Heathen. Our contemporary does not allude to this important point; but we are quite sure, that on consideration, he must admit, that the officer, who employs the rescued victims in this good work, is not one to think that his responsibility ceases, when the children are rescued."

To this we rejoined—

"We have only one word more to say on the subject at present. Our contemporary says we have not alluded to the "important point" of the object to which the Agent intended to apply the rescued females. "He has employed them as important agents for the suppression of female infanticide." We think this a most important object, and one on which too much attention cannot be bestowed, but the Hurkaru's information is evidently deficient, and his ideas are therefore any thing but clear on the subject. He tells us that the girls have been taught to spin, and that they are married, or to be married, to Khoonds who practise infanticide. We cannot see how their being simply taught to spin can qualify them for this important vocation; or how the mere circumstance of their being given in marriage among a tribe which practises infanticide, will of itself prevent their husbands murdering their children."

But a truce with these editorial bickerings. We have now the pleasure of introducing a letter from Rev. A. Sutton, one of the two Missionaries who addressed the letter to the Khoond Agent. He has manfully come forward in his own name to explain the circumstances under which the application was made, and we gladly avail ourselves of the opportunity which it affords to relieve this important question from the minor consideration of the Agent's prejudices or predilections, and to appeal anew to the Christian sympathies of the Madras Government to lay down some rule for the intellectual and moral training of these rescued victims. The children have lost caste, and there can be no violation of the principles of non-interference in religious matters, to commit them to the care of the Missionaries, even if at the risk of their being brought up in a knowledge of Christian truth. It does not seem advisable to bestow them in marriage on the murderous Khoonds. It may not reclaim those savages, and it may prove a source of perpetual misery and degradation to the poor victims. Hindoos they can never become; Mahomedans they ought not to be made. Still less proper is it to allow them to grow up in ignorance of all religion. After the discussion which has taken place, it must be manifest that nothing short of peremptory orders from the Government of Madras will be sufficient to secure their being made over to the Missionaries. Unless however the Governor in Council is prepared to adopt some better mode of tuition, under the direction of the public officers, than appears to have been as yet thought of, his Lordship cannot do better than to close with the offer of the Missionaries, though it should involve a small charge on the public funds for the food and clothing of the children.

CANT.—The Eastern Star of Sunday last has the following remarks on a paragraph which appeared in our columns last week.

"The Friend of India says that I rewarded the announcement of the Saturday's publication of Sunday's Englishman with a sneer, and that religion is a jest to me. The abuse even of religion is almost too serious a subject for jesting, much less religion itself. There was no jest in a syllable I wrote, but pure earnest in all. I said, and repeat, that to employ people in delivering papers is as much a violation of the Sabbath is to employ them in printing, and that to employ them in composing Monday's paper on Sunday is so much worse that it requires the labour of many more pair of hands. I said, and repeat, that it is no great earnest of sincerity for people to talk of keeping the seventh day as holy as possible; it is leaving a door ajar which they can push and pull at their convenience. It is nothing but a mockery to pretend there is any religious feeling in operation in the determination that there shall be no work done, say between 2 and 4 o'clock on the Sabbath morning, but that from 10 A. M. until 12 at night of the same day the week's labour shall be going on in every department! Let the Friend of India meet this if he can, and remember that he is addressing himself to men, not children to be imposed upon by a quibble or a trick. The Calcutta Star has noticed the countenance given to the Calcutta Lottery Schemes by the Englishman, among others; schemes which the Friend terms "villainous," and yet has no rebuke for those who he says gives them their life!—perhaps this is not jesting with morality."

We meet the observation, by saying that our objections extend equally to the publication of a paper on Sunday morning, and to the preparation and printing of the Monday's paper on the Sunday. We rejoice when we find any Printing Office relinquishing either of these practices, and should be still more delighted if they would abandon both. We could wish the Monday's paper to be sent to Press on Saturday; and we think that it would not be impossible to effect this without occasioning public disappointment. It is only occasionally that intelligence arrives on the Sunday which it is of any importance to insert in the paper of Monday morning, and any one who entertains a conscientious regard for the Sabbath, would probably find little difficulty in printing a sufficient number of copies of this information very early on Monday morning, in a separate sheet, for distribution with the papers which are issued to the town residents, leaving it to be incorporated in the course of the day with the copies which are sent into the country by the evening's dawk.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21.

— The last accounts received from Lahore which appear in the Delhi Gazette, state that the danger of a collision between Heera Singh and Suchet Singh, his uncle, was very imminent; that Golab Singh had done every thing to prevent it, and that he had at length prevailed on his brother to accompany him to Jumboo; and it seems that the result of Golab Singh's advent is simply this, that he marched down the hill with twenty thousand men, and then marched up the hill again with them.

— Lord Ellenborough reached Agra on Monday morning the 11th instant, without either Chaplain or Council. He is therefore destitute alike of spiritual or temporal advice, and is left to walk after the counsel of his own will, and he has resolved, like his two predecessors Lord W. Bentinck and Lord Auckland, to see Gwalior; only they went thither with the most pacific views, and were cordially greeted. Our present ruler takes an Army of Exercise, and an enormous battering train with him, and is likely to be any thing but welcome.

— An order has been issued by the Durbar of Lahore to confiscate all the jaygeers of Jowaher Singh, the uncle of Duleep Singh.

— The General Orders by the President in Council published in last evening's Calcutta Gazette, contain instructions from the Court of Directors that Chaplains who have served seven years in India are entitled to a pension of £63 17*s.* 6*d.* and their widows to one-half that sum. The widows of Chaplains who have actually served seven years in India will receive pensions as widows of Captains; of those who have completed fifteen years actual service, as widows of Majors.

— Mr. R. N. C. Hamilton, the Secretary to Government for the North West Provinces, has been deputed on a special mission from the Governor General to Sirsa and Bhawulpore.

— The papers of this morning contain a very able remonstrance from the Calcutta Shareholders of the Oriental Company against the abandonment of the direct line. We regret that want of room forbids our giving these documents. It is said that letters received by the last mail, affirm that the Court of Directors and the Queen's Government had rejected the proposal of that Company to take up the line between Suez and Bombay. If we understand the present position of affairs therefore, it is this. The Oriental Company is bound to perform six voyages to Suez and back, in the coming year in consideration of the bonus of 20,000*l.* given by the Court of Directors. In the year 1845, they are not to obtain this bonus, unless they perform twelve voyages, which they can scarcely do, with the few passengers they obtain, and so limited a contribution from the public funds. Unless therefore some arrangement can be intermediately made, there is a chance that the advantage of direct communication will be interrupted at the close of the coming year.

— The Englishman states, that the Assam Steamer now on her way down to Calcutta brings 400 chests of indigo. We believe this is the first instance in which Indigo has had a ride in a Steamer, and we have some curiosity to know the fare.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22.

— We were most agreeably surprized by the arrival yesterday of the first instalment of the Regular Mail from Bombay, in nine days. Such despatch is altogether novel. The Express arrived in eight days.

— The City Article in the Star of this morning states, that at the date of the despatch of the November Mail, only the letters sent by the Hindoostan had been received in London, and the highest estimate of the present crop did not exceed 140,000 maunds. We question whether even this intelligence was in London, during the October sale, which terminated on the 19th of that month, and at which the finer qualities gave way from 4*d.* to 6*d.* a pound, while the middling qualities supported their rate. Of course, when the exuberance of the crop, which will scarcely fall short of 170,000 maunds—the largest ever obtained—is announced in England, the price of all qualities must recede.

— The Englishman of this morning publishes that portion of the Essay on the developement of the resources of British India,—which he has been giving in successive portions—in which the cost of the proposed railways from Bombay to Calcutta, and from Bombay to Madras is given. It is estimated at 15 Millions Sterling, fifteen crores of Rupees. The interest of this sum at four per cent. would be 600,000*l.* a year, six times as much as would give us Steam Communication monthly direct from Suez to each of the ports in India.

— The chief news from Agra given this day, is, that the Gwalior Vakeel had waited on the Governor General, who told him that the terms of peace would be made known under the walls of Gwalior; a reply which would have had a more chivalrous air, if there had been any thing to oppose our march to that fortress.

— The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette has hitherto stood alone in advocating the propriety of lotteries. We are sorry to find, that he has at length found a coadjutor in the Ceylon Herald, the editor of which paper thinks it proper to institute a lottery on the Island for some local improvements. We hope the Legislative Council will not give its sanction to the measure, but if they move at all in the matter, will pass a bill to put down all private lotteries. In reply to some remarks in the Star, we take this opportunity of stating that the Editors both of the Hurkaru and Englishman are understood to disapprove of this kind of gambling altogether. The difference between them, and the other papers, is simply this; they disapprove and advertise; the Star and the Friend, disapprove and do not advertise them.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23.

— The Star of this morning states, that Sir George Pollock was to leave Dinapore on Tuesday the 19th, to assume temporary charge of the Residency at Lucknow. His acceptance of this post, and only in an officiating capacity, is an enigma. The Office is little better than a sinecure, and has been held by Senior Merchants and officers of the rank of Field-officers, but never has it been deemed equal in dignity to the command of a Division of the Army. The Governor General has recently loaded it with the tinsel trappings of a high sounding name, and the Resident has become his Excellency the Envoy, but this has removed comparative insignificance of the post, any more than the Empress of Russia's promoting her gun brigs into frigates, and her frigates into ships of the line, altered their intrinsic value.

— The Englishman has fallen into the error of designating Mr. George Thompson an "ex-Baptist Minister." Whatever Mr. Thompson's sentiments on the mode and subjects of baptism may be, we believe, he never was in any orders, real, or pretended, as they are called. He has been urged by his friend Mr. Cobden, to return to England as early as possible, and, will probably become a Member of Parliament before the Editor of the Star. He will raise his powerful voice in England against a much greater grievance,—that of the corn law monopoly,—than any of which India has reason to complain; and it is probable that his position as Envoy from the Great Mogul, may, by taking off the imputation of his being a "mere political adventurer," give additional weight to his sentiments. Burke was Agent for the Colony of New York; Huskisson for Ceylon; and George Thompson is now the Agent of the Emperor of Delhi.

— The Englishman does not think that the credit of having originated the masterly movement up the Yang-tse-keang which brought the Emperor of China to terms, is due to the present Ministry, or to Lord Stanley. He seems still to give the paternity of it to Lord Auckland, by whom Capt. Bethune was deputed to survey that river. We have given his article elsewhere, and shall be happy if it serves to bring out some decisive information of the origin of the plan. Of course, there will be many competitors for the honour of the idea, after it has so wonderfully succeeded.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 25.

— The sword subscribed for by the Gentlemen of the Civil Service in testimony of their admiration of Sir Robert Sale's conduct at Jellalabad, is now, as we learn from the Star, at Messrs. Hamilton and Co's. The cost was 300*l*.

— The Delhi Gazette states, that his Honour the Lieut. Governor arrived at Meerut on the morning of the 12th, so unwell that even the salute due to him was not given. This paragraph refers of course to the late Lieut. Governor, Mr. Clerk, who is now on his way to Calcutta, to embark for England. We hope the next accounts will be more favourable; and that he may live, not only to reach England, but to return to India, where his profound acquaintance with the politics of Upper India, united with the activity and vigor of his character, will at all times render his services invaluable.

— There is an admirable article in this day's Star on the subject of Temperance in general, and the Calcutta Temperance Sailors' home in particular, which we would recommend to the perusal of all who can lay their hands on the paper. It is pleasing to see a journal, which is usually so much opposed to whatever the Editor deems cant, so powerfully advocating the cause of Temperance.— If the writer will forgive our presumption, we would say that his remarks on "brandy pawy" are not expressed with sufficient brevity. "It was believed twenty years ago that no sailor could be a sailor except he were supported by the stimulus not of grog, but of raw spirits. The allaying of these with a proportion of water was long looked upon as a dangerous effeminacy, not unlikely to sap the vigor of our seamen." We think the pithy remark of the old Engineer who set up the first Steam Engine in Serampore twenty-four years ago, rather more to the point; "Sir, nothing spoils Brandy so much as water."

— The Star states, that Lord Ellenborough was to march with the Army on the 16th, and that, his Lordship retains only one member of his personal staff about him, Capt. Macleod; all the officers being distributed among the several divisions and brigades as extra aides-de-camps to the general commanding officers. Of the public officers, [illegible] will march with his Lordship. Colonels [illegible] and Sanders, and Major [illegible]

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 26.

— The Ceylon papers mention that the Hindoostan arrived at Galle on the 23d of November, a day or two earlier than was expected. She left Calcutta on the morning of the 15th, and has therefore made the voyage to Galle, stopping at Madras, in the very brief space of eight days.

— The Star gives the number of Cooly emigrants, who have been sent to the Mauritius during the month of October and November. It is not less than 4014. The Agents have certainly made the most of the time allowed for their operations. On Monday next all farther exportation of labourers, through the instrumentality of private individuals, will cease.

— We beg to call the particular attention of our readers to the extract which we have made from some of the English papers which came in this morning, which furnishes us with the substance of the evidence given before a Parliamentary Committee by the Editors and managers of some of the leading journals in London, and will be found full of the most interesting information. We would more particularly direct the eye of the reader to the assurance given by Mr. Black of the Morning Chronicle, that the Press cannot injure a public character. "I do not think that I have ever known a public man injured by any one but himself; I do not think it is in the power of the Press to injure him by abuse —I believe that vituperation would often, instead of injuring an individual, rather induce the public to sympathise with him. I know no case where a newspaper has run reckless against a public man, where it has not injured its character exceedingly."

— The Hurkaru says, it is rumoured again that the furloughs are to be stopped. Why, we should ask. Gwalior has by this time fallen, and all the princes of India within the Sutlege are trembling in their slippers lest the next blow should fall on them. And surely Lord Ellenborough will not interfere in the affairs of the Punjab, while the chiefs keep quarrelling with, and weakening each other, and doing our work gratis. There can scarcely be any occasion for another Army of Exercise before the next winter.

— We republish an article from the Agra Ukhbar on the subject of turning the Steamers Hindoostan and Bentinck out of the direct course to Bombay. It is a very impartial and sensible article; but there is one assertion in it which we cannot understand. The Editor says, "At the present moment Calcutta papers come one day in advance of Bombay." How so, when Calcutta is forty-two miles farther from Agra than Bombay is? But we fancy that when the arrangements of Government are completed, and the mails from Calcutta are sent up to Benares and Allahabad by a Mail Cart, as they are now to Burdwan, both Agra, and all the stations beyond it with many of those which lie to the south of it, will receive their letters much sooner by Steamers which come to Calcutta direct, than by those which go to Bombay.

— The Englishman has resolved to discontinue the farther publication of Lottery Advertisements. We are happy the Editor has come to this determination; for as the prizes fall generally, if not altogether, to persons, real or fictitious, who reside in the interior of the country far from the metropolis, it was through the advertisements of the periodical press that this fraudulent delusion was kept up. The Englishman ought to have adopted this determination earlier, and thus relieved itself from the inconsistency of reprobating lotteries in one column, and encouraging them by advertisements in another. At the same time it is but fair to add that the present manager was not here, when that paper attempted to defend the inconsistency. The immediate occasion of this determination is the impudence of the scheme set up by Methold and Co. who announced that a prize of 50,000 Rs. had fallen to the ticket held by General Fast, [illegible] What [illegible] that [illegible] was a gambling transaction! These most disgraceful scenes might have been prevented by one paragraph from the Honourable the Court of Directors, signifying their approval of the abolition of the state lotteries, and their wish that private lotteries should be prohibited by law.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 27.

— The Madras papers state that a spirit of disaffection had been exhibited by the force which lately proceeded from Kamptee to Jubbulpore, consequent on the stoppage of field batta from the date of their arrival at that station. Just as the excitement was becoming troublesome, it was allayed by the following wise resolution which had been received from Madras, "The most noble the Governor in Council observes that the relief of the subsidiary forces contemplated by the Government, was a return within the territories of this Presidency, until which time full batta will be continued to the troops."

— On the 16th of December, the very day on which the Governor General and the Commander-in-Chief left Agra for Gwalior, Gungadhur Bullalee, the ex-treasurer of the Mahratta Raj, commonly called the Dada Khasjee walla, was delivered up to Sir Richmond Shakespear, and was sent on to Agra under an escort. This event however has not arrested the progress of our troops. The Gwalior army may yet have one fight for its bread.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

NEW STRAITS STEAMER.

We congratulate this community, and our friends in the Straits, on the intelligence received by the last Mail, that the new iron Steamer Firefly, of 600 tons and 200 horse power, intended to run between Calcutta and the Straits, was to leave England early in the present month. From the description given of her, we judge that she is a very fine vessel, and well adapted for the purpose for which she is intended. We shall watch the progress of this experiment, for the establishment of a direct and regular steam communication with the Straits, with great interest. It cannot fail to lead to a great increase of intercourse between Calcutta and the picturesque and salubrious islands in the Straits, and most probably China; and we sincerely trust, that the first vessel that establishes this intercourse, will prove a profitable speculation to the enterprising originators of the undertaking. The Firefly will, of course, come out under canvass, as well on account of her not carrying coal enough to steam out, as in consideration of the heavy expense of steaming, for which, in such a vessel intended to carry only a few passengers, there could be no return. The Firefly will probably be a source of additional good to the Peninsular and Oriental Company.—Hurk. Dec. 27.

STEAM COMMUNICATION.

"The Friend of India, in an article on Steam Communication with England, has the following passage: "Of the two plans now proposed, one is to take off the Hindoostan and Bentinck from the present line, and run them exclusively to Bombay, and to transfer the Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta passengers and packets—with the exception of a few letters sent on by express at the rate of five shillings and eight pence—to smaller steamers." What then shall we, in the North West, [illegible] the inconvenience to ourselves, [illegible] to which even small steamers [illegible] our mails? If both lines to Calcutta and Bombay were adequately supplied, we would still be in the back ground—for, either way, we would have not only to wait for our letters and papers, but to pay an extra sum for getting them by driblets. There is but one plan by which justice can be done to all India, and that is by a uniform rate of postage on all letters and papers received from England, as well as on those transmitted to England by steam or by ship. Such a plan, besides being strictly just, would save a vast deal of labour at the port of receiving; one stamp marked ship letter—postage so much, would do for all India, and no one could then complain that he had to pay more than his neighbour, who happened to be nearer the port of receipt, for waiting longer for his letters and papers. The receiving of their letters and papers so much sooner, and, in fact, being able to answer them immediately, should be worth the extra postage they would have to pay. There are but few in the North West who get letters in time to reply to them, even during the fine season,—the very few who get letters by the express may be enabled to do so from Agra, but, generally speaking, the first regular instalment of letters is received after the outward Mail has been two or three days gone, when not even the remotest chance remains for a reply reaching in time for the Steamer.

"It is a little puzzling to us at Agra, which to prefer—Bombay or Calcutta. With the arrangements which we understand, are in progress for extending the convenience of Mail carts on the Grand Trunk Road, we should undoubtedly have a better chance of receiving our letters and papers a day or two sooner viâ Calcutta, than from Bombay, if the first have a monthly communication of powerful Steamers, and the latter do not improve in that respect. But as it is the fashion for every one to look to Number One, we confess that, however much we may wish to see Calcutta with its own line of Steam packets, we should not break our heart if the Hindoostan and Bentinck were to be made over to Bombay—by which we should receive our letters and papers probably four or five days sooner. Or, if the line of communication be turned into one, by supplying Bombay from Aden or Point de Galle, we unquestionably declare for our letters and papers being sent by Calcutta and not by Bombay, for, at the present moment, Calcutta papers come one day in advance of Bombay, and the roundabout passage, which the change would involve, would make the two ports almost on a par as to the time or arrival of the Mails, and we do think the Calcutta Post Office would be more alert than that of Bombay. While thinking of improvements, however, what should prevent a suggestion made so long ago from being carried into effect, viz. to send a responsible agent with the Mail Steamers to assort the letters on the voyage by which an immense saving of time would be secured. But like other changes which suppose an advance beyond the jog-trot of official business, we must wait for the appointment of uncovenanted post Masters (which we are happy to see is becoming the rule in the Northwest) who would naturally feel that the greater the improvements they suggested and carried out, the better chance they had of promotion and higher remuneration in the department."—Agra Ukhbar.

THE ORIENTAL AND PENINSULAR COMPANY.

A letter from London informs us that we may rest assured the impudent attempt of the O. and P. Company has signally failed, notwithstanding the strong advocate they had with the Board of Control in one of their Shareholders, Mr. Emmerson Tennant and Captain Barber, and Mr. Stocqueler befriending them in the Atlas and Monthly Times. Our letter continues :—

"The E. I. Company have now decided to retain the Bombay Mail in their own hands, and to improve it as far as lays in their power by relays of vessels, &c.

This is a death blow to the P. and O. Company's schemes, and they next tried to influence the papers by some articles in the Times, which had published one of three letters——had written them signed "A Calcutta Merchant," and this elicited a reply from their Secretary in the Times, of 17th October, which I enclose and think you had better publish, it is to a certain extent an acknowledgment that they do not intend to complete the monthly communication if they do not get the monopoly contract: it is decided they will not get it, as it is a matter in which the Board of Control and H. M.'s Ministers cannot interfere.

The truth is the P. and O. Company have completely fallen into the trap they laid for the E. I. Company. In offering to establish the communication monthly for £20,000, they obtained a monopoly of all Government aid and then expected to get the Precursor and India on their own terms and with them, having a monopoly of all the vessels expected to be able to force the E. I. Company, to give them £100,000 for carrying the mails."

Another extract is as follows :—

"They have not got the India or Precursor, and will not get the contract for the Bombay Mail and therefore they attempt by every means to assert that they are not bound to complete the monthly communication as there is no deed of contract or penalty for non fulfilment: But this can only defer the time of their throwing it up one year, as with both these vessels they must make six voyages in 1844, to enable them to the £20,000 and then the payment will cease.

And after monopolizing all for three years they will leave the communication where it was in 1841."

And again we are told :—

"My belief is that it will ultimately fall into the hands of the Indian public and subscribers to run their own vessels with Government assistance as respects coals; that the P. and O. Company must give up their two vessels to their Indian subscribers and not meddle with the Indian side of the line.

If the Calcutta shareholders of the P. and O. Company could be induced to call a meeting and ask explanation of their Imperious Board of Directors in St. Mary Axe, they might save themselves much loss by separating from the Peninsular line. The Dublin Company with mail contracts, managed by the same parties, after paying 10 p. ct. now pay no dividend, and the St. George Company have lost all and individual shareholders are made liable."

So much for the O. and P. Company. We are happy to hear an attempt is being made to establish regular Steam Communication between Singapore and China. The same letter says :—

"Mr. Wise has had a proposition before every department of Government, to pave the way. I enclose a copy of his paper on the subject; there are several matters requiring alteration and the reference to the P. and O. Company is merely in reference to their boasting of what they would do if they got the contract and monopoly. There is no doubt the Ceylon route will be completed if it is only for the China and Eastern mails. It is probable H. M.'s Steamers will convey the mails from China to Singapore or the Admiralty may contract for it, but the lines between Singapore and Ceylon, will be open to the India and with Government assistance she would pay."

We have got a copy of Mr. Wise's proposition and will publish it on Monday.—Calcutta Star, December 23.

CREDIT OF THE ADVANCE UP THE YANG-TSE-KEANG.

The Friend of India decides that the credit of the last campaign in China which terminated in peace, is due to Lord Stanley, and that to him must be attributed the plan of operations which cut off the communication of the northern and southern provinces by way of the great Canal. The letter, from which our contemporary's extract is taken, undoubtedly recommends the course subsequently pursued. "Her Majesty's Government," says Lord Stanley, "are of opinion that the most probable means of obtaining these objects, would be the occupation of a position which would enable them effectually to controul the internal commerce of the Chinese Empire, and thus render the moral pressure upon the Court of Pekin irresistible. Such a position they think would be attained by ascending the Yang-tse-keang," &c. &c. So far, so good; Lord Stanley has undoubtedly credit for sanctioning this plan of operations, but so far from having originated with him or Her Majesty's cabinet, as stated by the Friend of India, it was a subject of common conversation long before the present Ministry came into power. If priority of publication, is to constitute a claim to originality, we are entitled to come in for the credit of the campaign, before Lord Stanley or Her Majesty's cabinet, for the same plan was urged again and again in our columns; after the commencement of Captain Elliot's grievous blunders, and when almost all the press united in censuring the warlike operations which that plenipotentiary had undertaken. We know that the plan subsequently adopted, was then under consideration by Lord Auckland, and that Captain Bethune was sent to survey the Yang-tse-keang, a service which he most ably and successfully performed. It is extremely probable that these views were communicated to the Home Government by that of India, and that Lord Stanley's letter to the President of the Board of Controul was either occasioned by the information he had received from the east, or from what he found on record in his office, of the opinions of persons who had been consulted by the Whig Government. We know that two gentlemen who were a very long time resident in China, and whose knowledge of the country was perhaps, superior to that of any others amongst our countrymen, were both consulted by the Whig government at the very beginning of hostilities, and that they concurred in recommending the very plan of operations, which has proved so successful. One of them thought that it would settle the matter in three months, and both urged it, as the most humane course towards the inoffensive inhabitants, as not requiring the capture of large towns or the defeat of armies, but as operating at once upon the Government, by what Lord Stanley is pleased to call moral pressure.

The credit due to this nobleman, then, is merely that of understanding and appreciating the plans laid before him, and of being free from the presumption not uncommon with official men, of thinking that he knew better than his advisers.—Englishman, Dec. 23.

LOTTERIES.

Some of our contemporaries found fault with us for continuing to advertise a species of gambling of which we had declared our disapprobation, and had we been guided by our own judgment alone, we should have refused the projectors the opportunity of making their scheme known in our columns. But we yielded to the wishes of subscribers, many of whom had been accustomed to venture their money in some of the minor lotteries, and who urged the discontinuance of the Government Lottery as an additional reason for seeking information respecting any other that might be in activity. We then stated our wish that the same course might be followed here that was adopted in England, and that on the suppression of lotteries all advertisements might be prohibited. This was not done, and as we knew nothing in the new private lotteries that distinguished them from the old, we continued to permit their announcements in the Englishman. Although we have paid very little attention to the schemes advertised, we could not avoid being struck with the amounts of prizes and the large number of tickets. It appeared a thriving trade at any rate, and as we heard no complaints, we concluded that it went on much as usual, a number of people losing small sums and a few, a very few, gaining large ones. It appears however, that the gain is all on one side, and the loss on the other—the gain for the projectors and the loss for the public. It has become our duty to announce that General Fast purchased a ticket in one of Messrs. Methold's lotteries, which was stated to be drawn a prize of fifty thousand Rupees. Payment having been demanded was refused by the projectors first under one pretext and then another. On this General Fast brought an action to recover the money, and we are informed by his attorney that Messrs. Methold and Co. have pleaded in defence of the action that it is A GAMBLING TRANSACTION.

Of such a defence there can be but one opinion. The plaintiff has fairly paid his money on the terms proposed by the projectors themselves, and they meet his just demand by resorting to a law which ought to have been in the first place applied to their own scheme. As we have suffered our paper to be made the means of informing the public of the existence of these lotteries, it becomes our duty to expose their fraudulent character the instant that we are made aware of it. Perhaps on the whole these schemes have done a public service. They have shewn that no dependence is to be placed upon the most plausible announcements, that however brilliant the schemes, however numerous the prizes in proportion to the blanks, the purchasers are sure to be losers. That they have not only to encounter the risk of a game notoriously in favour of the stake holders, not only to meet the possible occurrence of hidden fraud in the number of tickets, their distribution in the wheel or the mode of drawing, but that if they escape these perils and by some extraordinary chance, some unusual piece of good fortune, should gain a prize, which the projectors have overlooked or neglected to secure for themselves, that then they will be boldly set with the law against gambling, and told that though there may be honour amongst thieves, there is none amongst lottery office keepers.

If after this any person ventures his money in the Calcutta Little-goes, he must be either insane, or he must have persuaded himself that those who would defraud every body else, have such a particular affection for him that they will make an exception in his favour.

No act of the legislature could have given a more fatal blow to this species of gambling. Messrs. Methold and Co. have killed their game. A little snug [illegible] might have gone on for years. Baboo [illegible] Diddler might occasionally have got a [illegible] prize of a lakh, or the whole of the good prizes might occasionally have fallen to the lot of the unsold tickets; or as in the Government Lottery, the buyers might have had old tickets of a drawn lottery delivered to them by mistake. All this might have happened without making any permanent impression, without tending in the least to cure that itch for gambling which seems inherent in human nature. But when the priests of the temple declare their religion to be a fraud, how can they expect worshippers at the shrine. Pay for the tickets as they say, as long as you like, to that there can be no moral objection, but if you ask for a prize you are a gambler; and as such neither protected by good faith nor by the law. The old medical proverb runs, that those who cannot be cured by medicine, must submit to the knife, those whom the knife will not avail, must be tried by fire. The actual cautery is now applied to gambling in the lottery, at least as far as Calcutta is concerned.

We need hardly say that we are determined to admit no more advertisements of the kind. We were unwilling to do it, even when we thought the scheme as fair as such things can be, we gave credit for innocence till guilt was proved. We must now reverse the rule, and insist upon proof not only of innocence but of ability to perform what is undertaken, before we can suffer any further temptation to gambling to be held out to the public through the medium of our paper. At the time when the subject was previously discussed a correspondent informed us that he considered the Act 10, 11, William 3d, Cap. 17 as fully in force in this country. This statute enacts that no person shall either publicly or privately exercise, keep open, shew or exposed to be played at, drawn out, thrown at, or shall play, draw, or throw at any lottery, either by dice, lots, cards, balls, or other numbers of figures, or any other way, and every person who shall do so shall forfeit £3000! Every person who shall play, throw or draw such lottery shall forfeit £20! By the 8th Geo. 1. c. 2, it is enacted, that all plate, goods, jewels, houses, ships or other things exposed to lottery shall be forfeited; this we suspect would be a very small punishment to the ingenious contrivers of our Calcutta Lotteries. But if they have had a good sale for their tickets, they might add to their profits by suing the purchasers for the penalty of £20 incurred by dealing with them. This would complete the defence already resorted to and be perfectly in character with it.—Eng. Dec. 26.

GWALIOR.

Strange rumours are abroad, which I can hardly credit—yet as rumours, I think it right to give you them. It is said that Col. Jacob is at the bottom of all the intrigues, which have taken place hitherto, and that he has been playing into the hands of both parties. A number of native officers of his Brigade have been detected in having received bribes from the Khasgee, and it is reported that he himself has received large sums to protect the Usurper. His sneaking into the city at the time of the fight between Secunder's troops, aided by the Jinsee with the Maharaj Cumpoo first roused suspicion, which his readiness in ordering his Brigade to take part with the latter somewhat allayed—though it was only from a dread of the consequences of a refusal that he gave the order. What has since happened however, tends to shew, that it was only through his intrigues, that the Khasgee is still at Gwalior.

There is no chance of a fight with the British troops as far as I can see, but it depends greatly on the terms which are to be imposed on the durbar whether the troops, who carry every thing their own way, will consent to them. They will not consent to be disbanded as a body, but rather fight it out—at least that is the way they talk just now, though the appearance of the British army may cool their courage somewhat. A very short time now will bring matters to a point, and show whether indomitable courage is yet one of the virtues of a Mahratta Army.—13*th December*, 1843.—Correspondent of the Agra Ukhbar, Dec. 16.

THE ARMY OF EXERCISE.

The following letter, for which we are indebted to a kind correspondent at Agra, gives us the latest intelligence from the Army of Exercise. We understand that a letter has been received in town from a Portuguese O[illegible] at Gwalior stating [illegible] all the troops, with [illegible] exception of a small [illegible] in charge of the trea[illegible], have gone out to [illegible] Chumbul [illegible]

[illegible] suppose a little gap [illegible] this station at present, be not unacce[illegible]le, so I shall give you all I have been able to pick up. Lord Ellenborough came in on Monday morning, and was received by the Commander-in-Chief, accompanied by his Staff and a large force, which was drawn up on the Strand. The 16th Lancers, 4th Native ditto, and his Lordship's Body Guard, together with the 5th Brigade of Infantry, and the 3rd Brigade of Horse Artillery. The sight was very fine; and such as has not been seen in Agra for many a day. His Lordship had hardly been two hours in Agra before he rectified his mistake about General Dennis, by giving him the command of the station, as a post of honour, during the absence of the Army, and General Valiant, continues to hold the division. The latter marched this morning (Tuesday) with the 3rd Brigade—the 1st Light Cavalry, one Rissalah of Skinner's Horse and No. 17 Light Field Battery as the Vanguard of the Army. The remainder, that is to say the 3rd division, the Cavalry and Artillery march in a day or two. One Brigade, Riley's, has been knocked off, and the 51st N. I. escorts his Excellency, who marches on Saturday. The Khelat-i-Ghilzie Regiment escorts his Lordship, who will start on Monday, and Agra is left to be taken care of by the "Illustrious" 35th.

"An article which appeared in the Agra Ukhbar about General Dennis, caused no small stir, and I hear that it really is true, that there was a Shindy at Head Quarters; which, however, is now all laid to rest. It is confidently reported that a proclamation of war has been issued; but I am inclined to doubt the fact, as no cause of war has, properly speaking, been given, which would not equally well have answered the purpose of a proclamation at the time of ordering the Army. What the Delhi Gazette says about the Chumbul being fortified is all bosh. An Officer went to reconnoitre, and saw nothing—he found the Chumbul fordable. Those who think they know best, say that there will be no fight; but in camp it is positively affirmed, that there will be some bloodshed."—Hurkaru, Dec. 21.

LAHORE.

We announced in our last issue what appeared to us some extraordinary movements at Lahore on the part of the chiefs, especially those who, having quarrelled with Heera Singh, were about to leave him in his glory at the capital, and retreat to the hills, there, it was said, to set up an independent sovereignty, and curtail the dominions of the empire which Runjeet Singh had established by long years of toilsome intrigues more than by force of arms. We promised at the same time to endeavour to give a clue to these proceedings, and though we have not succeeded in establishing as facts, their reported cases, we are sufficiently well versed in the intrigues of Lahore to believe in their probability. In the communication from our regular correspondent given below, is the expression of a surmise, entertained by the inhabitants of Lahore, that the enmity between Heera Singh and Suchet Singh, which had, to all appearance, grown to such a height, as to threaten immediate collision, had not Rajah Golab Singh's timely interference prevented it, had been assumed for the purpose of ascertaining the real feeling towards themselves, of the different parties at Lahore, and especially of the Seikhs, properly speaking. Our information from other sources goes far, not only to confirm this suspicion, but to give it a much more colourable appearance, and induces us to place some reliance in the truth of the rumour communicated to us, which is that the late quarrels and disputes between the uncle and nephew, the interference of Goolab Singh, and the ultimate determination to quit Lahore for Ramnugger or the hills, were all the consequences of a preconcerted plan for plundering the state treasury without exciting the suspicions of the Seikhs, and that Goolab Singh and Suchet Singh have succeeded in carrying off with them a vast quantity of jewels and coin, and will probably return within a short period to carry off all that may be left. The surmise is most plausible, and goes the length of adding that the rule of Maharajah Dhuleep Singh will terminate, (possibly in death,) on the return of the Rajahs, and that an illegitimate son of Runjeet Singh's named Kashmeeree Singh, will, most probably, be placed on a throne divested of its power and riches. The Rajahs will thus quietly enjoy the fruits of their crimes, and proceed to enlarge their dominions in every possible direction, and of course chiefly, if not wholly, at the expense of the crippled power of Lahore. These are, of course, as before stated, mere surmises, but who that knows aught of the intrigues and treachery which are ever the main-springs of oriental politics, can deny that they may be converted into a bloody reality, and that another tragedy will ere long have to be recorded in our pages? Taking on other hand the present appearances for granted, and assuming that the quarrel between the Rajahs is such as to have completely estranged Rajahs Goolab Singh and Suchet Singh from all interference in the affairs of Lahore, we cannot arrive at any other conclusion than that Heera Singh will be unable to maintain his footing, and that he will either have to solicit the return of one or other, or both, to support him, or that he will fall a victim with the boy Maharajah to some new intrigue, for which the present state of affairs presents such singular facilities. Whichever may be the result, it is incontestible that the state of Lahore is virtually dissolved by the withdrawal of Goolab Singh from its affairs whether with or without its riches. His presence was, at least, to all appearance, the signal for the submission of the greater number of the sirdars to the authority of Rajah Heera Singh, and a greatly improved discipline amongst the troops, and his absence will afford opportunities for the breaking out of all the passions which were curbed by the view of his army of hill men, during his stay.

We are happy to learn that Baron Schoenberg has returned in safety from Kashmere. Besides the honors shewn him by the Minister on hearing of his return, we learn that he was received in a distinguished manner by Heera Singh, at the durbar on the 6th instant, and presented, the day before, with the customary donations to travellers of the highest distinction, including the sum of 1,100 Rupees.—Delhi Gazette, Dec. 16.

MOOLTAN.

By a letter from the north west frontier, we hear that Sawan Mull is taking rapid strides towards independence. He has taken the affairs of the country completely into his own hands, and effectually prevents the other officers appointed by the Lahore Durbar from knowing anything of, or interfering in, public affairs. His Naib, however, managed to convey intelligence to Heera Sing, stating at the same time, that Sawun Mull was tyrannizing over the ryuts, extorting money on every pretence. Heera Singh, on this, wrote a stern purwanna to the Dewan, which it is not unlikely will blow the embers of hostility into a flame, and we may shortly hear of the Dewan declaring his independence.—Agra Ukhbar, December 16.

'Tim,' of Baugbazar, must excuse our refusing a place to his censures of Mr. George Thompson. Although we think he took up many imaginary grievances and urged them in a spirit which was open to much objection, we cannot make ourselves parties to the publication of a letter, which breathes the spirit of the following paragraph: "It has been also reported that this noble minded man shed many a paternal tear at his last lecture, but to what effect, since he has so heavily loaded himself with Moosulman gold."

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE KHOOND CHILDREN.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

My Dear Sir,—I have not yet appeared in the discussion relating to the Khoond children, and indeed I have been so well satisfied with the general correctness of your views and statements, that I felt no disposition to interfere. As there are however certain statements in your last issue copied from the Hurkaru (and which by the way I think ought not to have been published anonymously,) that may do us harm if allowed to pass uncontradicted, I beg the insertion of this letter.

I shall purposely avoid allusion to certain matters, which fall within the province of my colleague on the spot to notice, if he thinks proper and confine myself to facts which I can attest from personal knowledge. It is however any thing but agreeable to my feelings to appear in opposition to those with whom it is my heart's desire to live in good neighbourhood, and especially to those in whose operations we would gladly share to the utmost of our ability; but we have friends to keep as well as to lose, and our fair fame demands that statements so injurious should not pass as truths.

The history of the Petition is briefly this; being on a kind of official visit to Berhampore in consequence of the decease of a brother Missionary, I heard of the rescue of upwards of a hundred victims from the Khoonds by Capt. Macpherson. This gentleman was living some six or seven miles from Berhampore, and Mr. Wilkinson, my colleague, being there, agreed to go over with me and endeavour to obtain some of them. The fact was, our compassion was greatly excited by the manner in which Capt. M. was disposing of the children and purposed disposing of them. Accordingly we went over, and were kindly invited to stay and take breakfast. We then talked over the matter about these children for two or three hours. Capt. M. refused to make over any number of children to us, saying he could only give them one by one to individuals. This is the origin of those* spoken of as given to different members of the Mission family in that neighbourhood. He however appeared cordially to approve of an application to Government for them, though he disputed long against the clause which expresses the hope that Government might assist toward the expense. The application was drawn up at his table, was read by him carefully two or three times, and corrected to suit his views, and finally copied by me on paper furnished by himself as a bona fide application to the Madras Government through him, their accredited officer. I shall not believe that Capt. M. entertains any other opinion till I see his signature to the assertion that he did not thus receive the petition from us, or at least whatever might be his own mental reservations, that he did not know we intended he should so receive it.

The statement that it was not signed by all the Missionaries is idle. It was signed by the only two within a 100 miles, and by myself as Secretary to the Mission. The style of the petition here attached, shows there is no room for any such subterfuge. No objection as to its being informal or insufficient was made or hinted at. On the contrary, satisfaction was expressed.

That this application would be duly forwarded, and acceded to, we entertained no doubt, and on the strength of it, made an application for the necessary funds to our friends in England, which has probably by this time been returned (printed) to Calcutta. Other measures connected with our own Government were taken to which it may not be becoming farther to advert at present, but which will show that we presented the application in good faith.

Many inquiries after it were made, and I have a letter before me from Capt. M. dated 1st of May, in which he says, he had received no reply to my application. I had made inquiries as to the proper method of addressing the Madras Government direct, but was stopped by the assurance that the children were disposed of, or the great majority of them.

We had to contend long and earnestly against Capt. M. that Government had not performed their last duty toward these poor kidnapped children when they had disposed of the boys to be Mussulmen servants, or the girls to be wives to the murderous Khoonds. These unfortunate creatures had a different claim upon a paternal Government both as a compensation for their loss of home, and their own defective police, of which these children are the victims (many of them being stolen from the immediate vicinity.) They ought at least to place them where their morals would be cultivated and where they would be trained up to habits of industry and comfort. But Captain M. seemed utterly averse to the Government being liable to any expense on their account, and again and again asked why Government should provide for these children more than for as many of the thousands of children every where to be found. My answer is, they are thrown by Providence upon their care, and these children having no cast, Government can provide for them without in any way compromising their pledge not to interfere with the religious education of the people.

There have been several disingenuous hints thrown out that we wanted to make a pecuniary advantage of these children. How this was to be effected does not appear. But let any competent person look at a hundred of these miserable children, boys and girls, some of whom have grown up to the age of 14 and 15 in evil habits, vice and disease, and then say whether any thing but philanthropic motives can induce a Missionary to take upon himself the responsibility of finding funds for their support, and the still more laborious office of training them up in habits of cleanliness, morality and intelligence. The reward in this case must not be expected from man. I shall offer no plea for their being placed in our asylums in preference to any other; only let them be properly taken care of and my end is accomplished.

I deeply regret that Capt. M's. notions of the responsibility of Government towards these wretched victims, and of what Christianity might do for them in contradistinction to Mahomedanism, are so far from what we could have hoped from him, I question his right, or the moral right of Government itself, to dispose of these poor girls to perpetuate a race of murderers, even supposing they should be elevated to the dignity of wives to the infanticides. I do not however believe they will be any thing more than menial concubines. This case will yet come forth to day-light, and I hope for the honour of a Christian Government that Capt. M. will be found to have misunderstood its benevolent intentions, and the just expectation of the Christian public.

Finally, why seeing it is upwards of nine months since the application was handed to Capt. M. has this account of its detention been delayed till the Collector of Ganjam has left the shores of India?

I beg to remain, yours cordially,

A. Sutton.

P. S. There appears to be a wrong idea entertained at head-quarters respecting the extent of Capt. M's. operations. The victims he rescued last year, were all from one small district under the Madras Presidency; I have reason to suppose from reports, that if a European or two aided by a few Chupprasies could be sent into the still larger districts under the Bengal presidency, many victims might be rescued; and perhaps much might be done toward suppressing the horrid rite. This is the season for any such attempts to be made.

AGURPARA CHURCH MISSION SCHOOL.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—Oblige me by publishing the following few lines in a corner of your valuable periodical, which will, I hope, give much interest to the public.

The 4th Annual Examination and distribution of prizes to students, attached to the Agurpara Church Mission School, took place at the school rooms on Friday, the 22d instant, at 11 A. M. before a large and respectable audience, consisting of the Venerable the Archdeacon, Rev. J. Innes, Mr. and Mrs. T. J. DeRozario, Miss Hebren, Baboo Gooroochurn Bose and several respectable Hindoos.

The senior classes were examined in the Bible, History, Grammar, Geography, Mathematics and other ordinary branches of education, and the junior classes underwent an examination in reading and spelling.

Their answers to the several questions put to them were very correct, and on the whole, they acquitted themselves in a style which reflected much credit on themselves and their respective teachers; the above part of the business being over, the successful students of each class were called by name, and presented by the Venerable the Archdeacon with prizes consisting of appropriate books.

Yours,

A Christian.

Augurpara, 23d Dec. 1843.

We are sorry that it is not in our power to afford room for the Programme of the Examination. —Ed. F. of India.

RELIGIOUS.

Ireland.—Simultaneous Preaching in Tipperary.—Extract of a letter from Dublin, dated Oct. 25:—"You may judge of the state in which we are in this country, when I tell you that the priests of a whole district in the county Tipperary preached simultaneously, the other day, upon the following text:—Ezekiel xi. 5, 6, 'And to the others he said in mine hearing, Go ye after him through the city and smite; let not your eye spare, neither have ye pity. Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children and women; but come not near any man upon whom is the mark.'"—Morning Herald.

Mr. Newman's Successor.—The Provost and Fellows of Oriel College, Oxford, have presented the Rev. Mr. Eden to the vicarage of St. Mary-the-Virgin, Oxford, with the chapelry of Littlemore annexed, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. J. H. Newman, B. D. This result (says the Oxford Chronicle) has not been obtained without hesitation, if not opposition, on the part of the Provost of Oriel, on the ground of Mr. Eden's adherence to the new doctrines, and not until Mr. Eden had professed his willingness to discontinue the advocacy of Tractarian opinions.—Post.

The Free Church of Scotland has completed its second Assembly in circumstances highly encouraging and consolatory to its friends, and deeply mortifying to its opponents;—in circumstances, which, although encompassed with great difficulties, afford high promise of eventual success, and this to an extent beyond the previous hopes of its friends, or the fears of its enemies. We think it was Lord Dunfermline (the late Speaker) who was heard to say that the Secession was the most remarkable event of his times. Its successful progress, up to the present moment, exhibits, in our judgment, the most remarkable example of the triumph of genius, mental power, and principle, which the age affords. We do not mean to say that the principle upon which the Free Church separated from the Establishment is correct or scriptural, for the more we consider it, the more we are assured it is not so. But that the principle, erroneous in itself, is honestly and religiously held; is so held, by a man of the buoyant and sweeping genius of Chalmers, by men of the indomitable spirit and rare practical efficiency of Candlish, and by others, viewed by the Church as those whose solidity of mind is only surpassed by the depth of their piety. A phalanx composed of solid materials, thus led, is no doubt fitted to produce an immense impression in any direction into which its powers are energetically thrown. Still, as we have said, and as they themselves have acknowledged, the high position which they have already achieved, is beyond their own most sanguine expectations.

Four Hundred and Seventy Ministers left the Church; and let it be remembered, not only leaving the aristocracy and higher classes of society, generally speaking, behind them, but having to encounter their zealous opposition. And now, in five short months, not 470, but 600 churches are either in the course of erection or immediately about to be commenced; another 100, it is stated, will soon follow; simultaneously with this great effort, the support of the clergy is being provided for; a large building for a College is purchased, and professors are nominated; and the great expenditure of the missionary staff of the Church of Scotland to the Heathen and to the Jews (of which the seceders were the originators and main support) is at the same time zealously and effectually collected. Nothing is allowed to drop. The whole fabric and economy, the appendages and staff, of a well-appointed Christian Church rises on the instant, as in a perfected shape, to view! It is a wonderful spectacle. It is, blessed be God, a "goodly" one too!—Record.

The Rev. Mr. Aldhouse.—It will be recollected that about a year ago the Rev. Stephen Aldhouse, M. A., lecturer of Allhallows, Lombard-street, &c., was convicted at the Central Criminal Court, and sentenced to seven years' transportation. After his removal from Newgate he was placed on board a transport moored off Sheerness, and was there employed as a tutor to the children of one of the officers. He had not filled his post long before an order arrived from the Home-office for the shipment of seven years' convicts for the penal colony of Van Diemen's Land, and Mr. Aldhouse was draughted among them. During the past week a friend received a letter from him, in which he depicts the miseries of transportation in forcible language, the convicts being dreadfully coerced, irrespective of their previous station in life or of the offence of which they were convicted. He states that he is set to break stones, and is to continue at that employment for two years before any portion of his earnings will be applied for his own use. He expresses a hope that his communication will have the effect of convincing his countrymen that transportation is not the light punishment which many of them imagine it to be.—Times.

Bishop Phillpotts and Co[illegible]. Some time ago the bishop met a Rev. rector,—a gentleman of good property, who, although partial to foxhunting, held two preferments in his lordship's diocese, at no considerable distance from Exeter,—dressed as a layman, without even a white cravat to distinguish him from the common herd, or to denote that he was a clergyman. After some conversation, the bishop intimated to him in a very grave manner, that he wished he could catch him in his scarlet coat and white shorts, and he would take away, or suspend him from, his livings. The rector made no reply; but did not fail the next morning to pay his lordship a visit at his episcopal palace in his hunting dress; and said, here I am, my lord, in my scarlet coat; now deprive me of my livings. No, his lordship replied, he would not be compelled to do anything by any one; upon which the rector took his leave. Was he compelled to prosecute, we had almost said persecute, the worthy rector of Feniton?—Pat.

MR. BUDDLE, the agent of the Marquis of Londonderry, has died lately worth the enormous sum of 150,000*l.*, having been a mere pit lad.—Pat.

THE BANK OF MANCHESTER.—There was a meeting, on Thursday week, of the proprietors of the bank, when a report was read as to the present state of the concern. It appears that there are still liabilities to the amount of about 400,000*l.*, and that to meet this a call for that sum was agreed upon. Mr. Burdekin, as it appears, took with him about 10,000*l.* of the money of the bank. The present call is caused by the winding up of several large accounts, much more unfavourably than was anticipated, especially those of Hilton, of Darwin, and Joseph Raleigh, of Manchester, with which two concerns the bank was a creditor for nearly 200,000*l.* The proprietors of this bank will thus lose nearly, if not altogether, one million sterling.—Ibid.

NEW GALVANIC LIGHT IN PARIS.—Galignani's Messenger publishes the following particulars of an interesting experiment, made in Paris last Friday evening, with the galvanic light, proposed by M. Archereau, as a substitute for that of gas, on the Place de la Concorde:—"Several thousands of persons had assembled to witness it. The light exhibited appeared to be about an inch and a half in diameter, and was enclosed in a glass globe of about twelve inches in diameter. In the first instance, the gas lights of the Place de la Concorde, which are 100 in number, were not extinguished. The appearance of those nearest the galvanic light was quite as faint, and had the same dull hue, as the ordinary oil-lamps when near a gas-light of the full dimensions. When the gas-lights of the place were put out, the effect of the galvanic light was exceedingly brilliant, eclipsing even, in the opinion of many persons present, that of the hydro-oxygen light. It was easy to read small print at the distance of 100 yards, and it was only necessary to look at the shadow of the objects in the way of the light, to be convinced of its great illuminating power. The single light exhibited did not replace the whole of the gas-lights which had been put out, but we may fairly estimate it as equal, at least, to twenty of the gas-burners of the Place de la Concorde, where they are larger in volume than in most of the other parts of Paris. It would, therefore, require five of these galvanic lights to light the whole of the place; but the rays of these five lights meeting each other, would, in all probability, give a much more intense light, to say nothing of the superiority in softness and colour, than the present gas-lamps."—Ibid.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The last stone of the tower of this magnificent building was set by the contractor on Tuesday last, on which occasion all the workmen were entertained, and some bottles of champagne were drunk at the top of the scaffold in honour of the completion. All that now remains to be added to the tower will be the supports of the vane and the vane itself, which will all be of gilt copper. The vane will be the same grasshopper (the crest of Sir Thomas Gresham) which for a long time adorned the old Exchange, and escaped the fire almost uninjured. It has been determined that the chimes shall be restored upon a greatly improved plan, the Gresham Committee, upon the recommendation of Professor Taylor, having directed that the peal of notes be increased from eight to fifteen. The first brick of this structure was laid in January, 1841, and the contractors say they do not recollect any public building of the same substantial character having been erected in a period so apparently unequal to its extent. It is positively stated, on the best authority, that it will be finished and open for the use of the merchants by the time originally mentioned, viz. the middle of the summer of next year. The portico is completed, with the exception of the fixing of the sculpture in the pediment. The sculpture will consist of sixteen figures, in high relief, by Mr. Richard Westmacott. The mass, called Bank-buildings, in front of the portico, will be pulled down in the early part of next year. At the east end of the Exchange the improvements of Freeman's-court are proceeding with rapidity. All the houses are p[illegible] down, and a handsome street of ample width, parallel with the new building, will be made.—Pat.

THE LAW OF LIBEL.—The recently published Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords on the law of defamation and libel, contains the evidence of various gentlemen in connexion with the metropolitan periodical press, of which the following are extracts:—

Stanley Lees Gifford, Esq., D. C. L., examined:—I am a doctor of civil law, educated at the University of Dublin. I have been called to the bar of England, and entered, more than thirty years. I am editor of the Standard newspaper. I have been twenty-four years a newspaper editor in this country. I have always been concerned with one establishment, the Standard and St. James's Chronicle. Mr. Baldwin is the actual proprietor and printer of the newspapers with which I am connected. I am the actual editor, and have been for twenty-four years, and he is registered as proprietor, and is sole proprietor. But I believe he is singular in that; I believe he is the only man so circumstanced. . . . Each paper has, I believe, though having several writers, but one editor. It is absolutely necessary for safety that the paper should have one editor; at least that everything should pass under the eye of one person, because that which is innocent by itself, when taken in combination with another article, may constitute a libel. I can mention the case of the St. James's Chronicle—this is thirty years ago, before I had anything to do with it. Two paragraphs appeared, in two numbers of the paper, four days between each other; and for those, harmless by themselves, libellous taken together, Mr. Baldwin, who was in Paris at the time, had to pay 2,000*l.* That shows, not merely that each publication must pass under the eye of the editor, but the whole succession of the papers.

John Black, Esq., examined:—I have been editor of the Morning Chronicle for twenty-three years, and part editor for about twenty-seven years. . . . There was a case occurred to Mr. Perry, when he was editor of the Morning Chronicle. He put in a police case, which was ex parte, in which statements had been made against a butcher at Islington. The man came and said, "You have ruined me." Mr. Perry said, "I think it is a very hard case; here is 50*l.* for you." The man then brought actions against several papers, and got damages. It cost the Courier 800*l.*, and he went against several other papers. . . There was a case lately; it was a private libel, about some case of swindling on the Continent; the defendants (the Times) were put to enormous expense, which was probably inevitable in that case; but a man may put a newspaper to a very heavy expense, and he may be a man of straw; and you may make out your justification in every case, and yet you have no remedy against him. That was not the case there; the Times paid their own costs, but the other parties were obliged to pay their own costs. . . . . The Chronicle was lately prosecuted by Lord Beresford; substantially we made out our case, and his Lordship only got 100*l.* damages against us. We were obliged to go to an enormous expense to bring witnesses over from Ireland, to prove the hardship in the mode of removing the tenants; but there was some little difference about the age of the parties—some immaterial things. Now, it seems hard that so much importance should be attached to those little failures in proving some immaterial issues. . . . It may happen that a man, by turning out tenants in a wholesale way, may put a whole country side in a state of insurrection. It may be said, you are not the judge in such cases; but I apprehend that in this country every thing is brought to the bar of public opinion. The speeches in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords are not addressed to the House, but to the public. I think that what Mr. Wyndham said is quite true, that the press has made this country a democracy. The Members of the House of Commons address their constituents through the newspapers. . . . . The best security the public have with newspapers, in London at least, is, that they generally look to the hazard they run of injuring their character, and of injuring their estimation by dealing in slander. . . . . There is nothing that I, speaking individually, am so anxious to guard against as libels; because with respect to the mass of mankind, the public care very little about what is stated about them, but it is a great deal to the individual himself; and it involves me in a great deal of trouble, for nothing is such an annoyance to an editor as the being engaged in a libel case. Till the thing is decided, he is continually liable to be called off from the most important things he is engaged in, to attend to the progress of it, otherwise, he is in danger of being cast; so that is, from his own interest, guarding continually against libels, and watching against everything that in the least reflects on private individuals; he looks into it to see how it bears, that he may take care to avoid a libel. . . . . I am not sure that a newspaper will sell more copies by reason of making an attack upon a public character. It might formerly have been the result; but newspapers now-a-days do not depend so much upon those accidental attacks; they depend more upon general credit, upon getting news, upon being at great expense, for instance, in reporting the proceedings of the Lords and Commons, and public Meetings, and various things. I doubt whether any attack upon any individual would much increase the sale of a newspaper. . . . . Suppose that I were to attack very unjustly the Duke of Wellington,—a man whose name is very high in the country, and who is believed generally to be an honest man,—a crowd of remonstrances would be poured in against it by persons of the party whose cause I generally advocate, stating that I was doing an immense deal of injury to them. I do not think I have ever known a public man injured by any one but himself; I do not think it is in the power of the press to injure him by abuse. I believe there is a material difference between warm writing—the expression of warm feelings against a man—and vituperation. I believe that vituperation would often, instead of injuring an individual, rather induce the public to sympathize with him. . . . . I know no case where a newspaper has run reckless against a public man, where it has not injured its character exceedingly. In the case of the Morning Journal, when they attacked the Duke of Wellington, nobody cared for what they said. . . . . We have in many cases [as respects foreign intelligence] correspondents, and we have paid agents. We have correspondents at Philadelphia, at Madrid, at Athens, and at many other places, varying from time to time; sometimes we send men, and sometimes we pay men who reside there. As to the police reports, we get them from a channel not the very best frequently. In some courts we station reporters of our own; but in many other cases the reports are supplied by men who volunteer, the penny-a-liners, as we call them; men who send reports to all the different newspapers. Two or three different individuals will send a report, and we take what we think best. Our only check over those individuals is to refuse to take the copy, if they do not state the thing fairly.—Question: Does it come to your knowledge that those persons occasionally raise money, either by threatening to publish, or by agreeing to suppress, the publication?—Mr. Black: The thing has been often attempted, and I believe very often succeeds. I believe, during a great part of the year those individuals, many of whom are men of very bad character, justify it to themselves upon a very bad principle, that they must live, and not finding any room for their accounts during the sittings of Parliament, when the debates and other things fill up the paper, they sell what they call their copy to individuals; but we know nothing about it. If we knew anything of it, we should abstain from employing them. I can suggest no remedy for this; it seems to me inseparable from the thing itself. The only remedy would probably be for each newspaper to have a very large establishment, which it could not afford. . .. There was the case of a man well known to the late Lord Moira—Felix M'Carthy, who was employed as the responsible editor for a newspaper set up in London for the express purpose of libelling; I think it was the Argus. He was a powerful man, about seven feet high; people used to call him the Duke of St. Giles's; he could at any time bring down some 1,000 people from St. Giles's; he was commonly said to be the head of the clan M'Carthy. This man got about three guineas and a-half a-week for being the responsible editor of this paper; and when anybody came in with a horse-whip to ask for the editor, he rose up, and said, "I am," and the party bolted out as quickly as possible.

Albany Fonblanque, Esq., examined.—I am the proprietor of the Examiner newspaper, and have been for more than thirteen years. There have been no proceedings against the paper during that time, either civil or criminal. . . I do not think it is the office of the press at all to interfere in affairs of private life; I think it is beyond its offices altogether, and I would punish a paper very severely for so doing, and I should trust to the punishment to check the offence. I think it is a very unwise thing for a public man to prosecute for a public offence. . . I do not think, in my own time, I have ever known an instance of a public man having been lowered in reputation by the misrepresentation of his opinions. There are as many to defend as to attack. I think a public man would lose more than he would gain by seeking redress for public libels.

Robert Stephen Rintoul, Esq., examined—I am the proprietor of the Spectator newspaper; I have been for ten years the sole proprietor; before that I had some copartners. I was editor of the Atlas before the Spectator began. I have always been the editor of the Spectator, now almost fifteen years. I cannot speak as to the remunerating number of copies of a weekly paper, which is very expensively got up. I pay a great deal to literary men. I should suppose some of the papers might be done at a fourth part the expense of mine. . . . I have several times had actions brought against me, but I have always been successful in the defence of those actions; no verdict was ever given against me. . . . I once had a civil action brought against me by the chief magistrate of Dundee. . . Besides myself, he selected four of the leading people of the town, bankers, merchants, and others. After a litigation of nearly four years it came to be tried by a jury, and the trial lasted about fourteen hours. The damages claimed were 12,000*l.*; and after the trial the verdict was given in our favour. . . There were thirteen issues; it was a very voluminous affair; but its only peculiarity, as bearing upon the present inquiry, consisted in this:—That the Lord Chief Commissioner Adam, who tried the cause, seemed to lay it down that the press had no rights at all. He put it in this way to the jury:—That the other parties associated with me in my defence might possibly, as members of the public bodies—the Town-council, or Guildry—be privileged to make speeches, to inquire and report; but with regard to me, as responsible for the newspaper publications, the jury had nothing to do but to assess the damages. The jury found for us. We got some 800*l.* of costs, and were still, I should think, 400*l.* or 500*l.* out of pocket. . . I had also a prosecution against me by the late Duke of Beaufort, in the excitement of the general election in 1831. I got a verdict. I paid 200*l.* or 300*l.* costs, I suppose. It was by information. I have not had any other criminal prosecution against me.

Samuel Blackburn, Esq., examined.—I am one of the editors of the Globe, and have been nearly five years. I am not a proprietor or registered. Previously I was a proprietor and editor of two papers in the country; one a paper in Kent and the other in Essex. . . A bill of indictment was brought against me with reference to my vote at an election, in which I argued the question before the returning officer. It was before the question was so well settled as it has been since, and for which provision is made in Sir James Graham's Act. I tendered my vote at the hustings, on the supposition, that though I had changed my qualification, I held it substantially, though not identically. I stated this distinctly at the hustings, not on oath; and when I tendered my vote, in answer to the third question, I said, "Certainly not,"—I had wholly changed my qualification,—"I had tendered my vote on the principle that I have the same qualification substantially, though not identically." After an argument of some time, the returning officer received my vote; but they went to the assizes, and preferred a bill of indictment against me, which was thrown out. They then packed a jury in the borough, leaving out every Liberal name that would be found in the ordinary course on the jury, and they found the bill; and then upon that commenced a complete series of litigious proceedings. The last certiorari ever obtained previous to Lord Denman's Act, requiring notice to be given, and so on, was obtained against me, and handed to the sessions. I delivered an address, and published a speech, in which I commented on the conduct of the attorney for the prosecution, whom they selected because he was an insolvent, not having stick or stool, shirt or shilling. They selected him for the purpose, they supplying him with funds. The prosecutor's agent signed a consent, in the Crown Office in London, to try it at the following assizes. When I went up to the assizes, they took no notice of the indictment, but commenced two actions against me for the printed speech; one against the printer, whom I indemnified, and one against me as the author. I justified in both actions; and when I came into court, they having previously offered to withdraw them upon the payment of the costs, I said "I stand upon my plea; and when it came to the point, they withdrew the records, and I was left to pay the costs. I brought down the indictment for trial on proviso, stating that I did so to roll away the reproach. I conducted my own cause without counsel or attorney, and I carried off a triumphant verdict, the Jury declaring there was no ground for the charge. I was more than 200*l.* costs out of pocket. . . . I think, if a man is determined to avoid writing a libel, it is extremely easy to avoid it. I have been writing for the press many years, and I never perpetrated a libel in my life; and my belief is, I never shall.

Alexander Dobie, Esq., examined.—I have been solicitor for the Times newspaper for more than ten years. One point I may mention, which is the great expense which the morning papers are at in getting information to give the public as early as possible in the day. That is not protected to them as a copyright; for the afternoon papers take it from them, and publish it without having the courtesy to say from whence they take it. I know the proprietors of morning papers feel that as a great evil; and they feel that they should be protected till two or three o'clock in the afternoon of the day, exclusive use of that information for which they pay so much; and which frequently does not come till late in the day. . . . . The law is very hard upon the press. We have no power of getting evidence to show cause against criminal informations. We are entirely at the mercy of the prosecutor, and the affidavits he thinks proper to make. . . . . The expenses of the Times were very heavy in the case of the exposure of a great fraud on the Continent. They were upwards of 4,000*l.* The heaviest part of it was the expense of collecting evidence; chiefly arising from the evidence being abroad, and being unwilling witnesses, and having no power to get at their evidence, and bring them to this country; in expectation of the trial coming on, and its being postponed, and the witnesses going back again ten or twelve days' journey. I had to get up the evidence myself, and it took me several months. I had to go into Italy, France, and other kingdoms for the purpose. . . The press have been put to much expense, especially the Times, in defending actions for publishing speeches of Members of Parliament.

Murdo Young, Esq., examined.—I am proprietor of the Sun newspaper. I have been ten years sole proprietor, fourteen or fifteen part proprietor, and more in connexion with it. I have been also manager of it. . . I have had three or four actions against myself; one brought against me by a Noble Lord—a criminal information; that was for imputing to him that despatches, stated to have been written abroad, were written in this country; for that he filed a criminal information against me, but I succeeded. Lord Brougham was my counsel, and boldly avowed the truth, urging that it was for the public good that statements of that description should be exposed.

John Robertson, Esq., examined.—I was editor of the London and Westminster Review, and have been engaged in various literary undertakings for nine years. . . With regard to what the law ought to be, I have thought a good deal. My view can be indicated by two words—the truth and the publication. Let all forms of law open a clear path to going before a jury to ascertain whether the fact published was true; and in the second place, whether, if it was true, the publication of it was justifiable. Let the issue be tried between the parties, first, upon the point, "Has this man published the truth?" This is to be proved to the satisfaction of the Jury. It having been proved that what has been stated was true, "Were there circumstances which called for the publication of it?" Let the jury find that the facts stated was true, and that there was a good public reason, or a number of good public reasons, for publishing it; then, however disagreeable and however painful the fact might be to the plaintiff, let the man who published the fact stand acquitted and honoured. He has done well—he has done a public service. That is the outline of my view of what the law ought to be.—Record.

The Late Gale.—Every day brings intelligence of additional disasters during the late gale. The General Steam Navigation Company's packet the Menai, Captain Goodburn, arrived at Brighton from Havre on Monday, and he brings information of the sinking of a Dunkirk steamer off that town, when all hands perished. Near Beachy-head he spoke the Shepherd, of Glasgow, from Singapore. Yesterday morning the stern of a vessel, bearing the name of "Ann and Laura," was washed on shore at Brighton.—Ibid.

The Gale at Liverpool.—On Friday and Saturday Liverpool and the neighbourhood were visited by a severe gale of wind, attended with heavy showers of rain, which continued with little or no intermission throughout the night. The wind, which had prevailed from the southeast, changed to the west about four o'clock on Saturday morning, when it continued blowing with greater violence than before. The river was very much agitated throughout the day, and passengers by the steamers from Cheshire side experienced much difficulty in maintaining their equilibrium. Our seaward intelligence, on Saturday, wore a serious aspect, and several vessels which had been at anchor outside were obliged to seek refuge in the river. Several wrecks have been reported. Similar accounts have been received from all parts of the coast. The gale having extended from one side of the Island to the other.—Ibid.

Sale of Two Islands.—On Tuesday two islands, named Rasay and Bona, situated in the Hebrides, were sold by auction at the Auction Mart. They were for many years the property of the M'Leods, of Rasay, and comprise about 18,000 acres. The net value of the estate, including the mines and the timber, was about 73,000*l.* There were fifty-two farms, the rent arising from which was about 1,200*l.* They were capable of rapid improvement, in consequence of the facilities of communication from them to the metropolis, the journey now being completed in less than thirty-six hours. The estate was put up at 20,000 guineas, and eventually knocked down at 35,000 guineas.—Ibid.

The Marquis of Waterford.—Lord Waterford has expressed his determination never to hunt the county Tiperary again, but in order that this resolve should not impair the future operations of the club, with a truly generous and sporting feeling, the Noble Peer has signified to the Committee his intention of presenting fifty-two couple (two packs of dogs, and five horses from his own stud, beside an annual subscription of 100*l.* to the hunt. It appears it was not one or two, but a dozen threatening letters his Lordship had received, about persons in his employment, which was sufficient to disgust him with the country, if the stabling had never been fired. A better justification for one of the greatest evils that ever afflicted a country—absenteeism—than is conveyed in the latter portion of this statement could not be well conceived. And if report speak true, much more took place well calculated to "disgust" the Noble Marquis, and thus deprive the country of the benefits accruing from the constant residence of a wealthy and liberal landlord.—Limerick Chronicle.

The Jury in M. Pedro Zulueta's Case.—On Saturday evening, after the postponement of this important trial, until Monday morning, the Jury adjourned to the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill, where they slept for the night. On the following morning (Sunday) they attended Divine worship at the chapel of the gaol of Newgate; and after going through that prison, took recreation in an omnibus, specially provided for them, under the charge of Mr. Hemp, the sheriff's officer. They proceeded to Blackwall, by way of Bow and Old Ford, and at an unfrequented part of the latter place, had half an hour's pedestrian exercise, closely remarking that Mr. Hemp knew all the "sly corners" of the county. They afterwards partook of a plain and substantial dinner at Blackwall, each juryman being allowed a pint of wine with his dinner. Towards evening they returned to the London Coffee-house, where they were supplied with tea and coffee, &c., and passed the remainder of the evening, and breakfasted on Monday morning, previous to attending at the Old Court. Throughout the trial, which ended in M. Zulueta's acquittal, a number of the leading members of the Anti-Slavery Society, amongst whom were a great many of the Society of Friends, crowded the benches and body of the court, and appeared to take great interest in the result. It is estimated that the costs of the defence will not amount to less than from 1000*l.* to 1500*l.*—Morning Herald.

The prefect of Police has just notified to Vidocq to quit Paris, on the grounds that, having been condemned for forgery to eight years' imprisonment, on the 7th Nivose, year 5, he had never since been rehabilitated; and that, though pardoned in 1818, he was not restored to all the rights of citizenship, as he himself pretends. Vidocq, the Gazette des Tribunaux states, has announced his intention of resisting this order, and is waiting for a summons from the authorities, in order to have the matter legally decided.

We find the following from Rome, 14th inst., in the Cologne Gazette:—"We are informed that the new Government of Madrid has manifested a desire to re-establish a good understanding with the Court of Rome, and has commissioned the Primate of Spain to take the first measures. The domiciliary visits and arrests are still continued; but the leaders of the conspiracy at Bologna have not yet been discovered, unless it be true, as stated, that the Neapolitan Government has taken some of them. The rewards offered by our Government have had no effect. The Swiss troops have particularly distinguished themselves in pursuing the insurgents. This has given rise to a report that this force is to be increased. The Austrian Government has promised its support to the Pontifical Government."

The Suabian Mercury states, that the northern Powers will not depart from the principles of legitimacy in the affairs of Spain, that is that Queen Isabella shall marry the eldest son of Don Carlos, and that he, in order to preserve the rights of legitimacy shall assume the title of King of Spain. It is added, that alarming accounts had been received at Vienna from Bosnia. It was said, that the Turkish Governor of that province was surrounded at Boujalinka by 40,000 insurgents.

The National German Gazette states, that a report prevails at Vienna of an intimate alliance having been concluded between Austria, England, and France. "It cannot be denied," adds the Gazette, "that the last events in Wallachia, and particularly in Servia, have singularly irritated the minds of the Austrians against Russia, particularly in Hungary. The Hungarians have seen with terror the supremacy of Russian policy in the Divan, and still more the definitive organization of the Russian Administration which is now developed in Servia, as formerly in Wallachia. They have likewise seen that the Porte is now in a state of vassalage with regard to Russia."

The Dusseldorf Gazette has an article from Berlin of the 18th inst., saying; "Difficulties are still opposed to the marriage of the reigning Duke of Brunswick. Duke Charles continues to refuse to abdicate, and protest that he will also be married as soon as his brother contracts any such union."

The estate of Muskau, belonging to the celebrated Prince de Puckler-Muskau, had been purchased by Count de Redern, Intendant-General of the Privy Purse of the King of Prussia, for the sum of 7,500,000f. The Lordship of Muskau is situate in the circle of Rothemburg (Prussian Silesia), and contains seven villages and a population of 1,800 souls. The Prince will shortly leave for [illegible] where he intends to pass the rest of his life. He is now fifty-eight years of age.

The Austrian Observer announces, that on the 14th inst. the Sultan's berat was published at Belgrade, confirming the election of Prince Alexander. There were present at this solemnity, which took place on the glacis of the fortress, the Governor of Belgrade, Hafiz Pasha, appointed for this occasion Commissioner of the Porte, the Russian General, Baron de Lieven, the Military Commander of Semlin, the Austrian General Haffer, the French and English Consuls, all the superior and subaltern civil officers of the principality, and, finally, the representatives of the people and deputies.—Record.

THE NEW INFANTRY CAP.—The acting Committee of the Board of general officers for the inspection and regulation of the clothing of the army, of which Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Charles Dalbiac, K. C. H., is President, is said in military circles to have approved of the new cap, similar to that worn by the Emperor of Russia's bodyguard, and also by some corps in the Belgian army, which has been made by authority of his Royal Highness Prince Albert and of the Horse Guards, and is to be worn by the infantry of the line instead of the present chako.—Ibid.

We have seldom had occasion to record a more horrible case of destitution than one that occurred here on Friday morning, when Dr. Tait, of the Police-office, was called to attend an old woman who was found lying in a kind of closet at the bottom of the Old Fishmarket Close. She was in a state of utter nudity, and quite dead; and there was every reason to believe that she died of starvation—indeed, it is understood that she has not tasted any food since Sunday last. We believe the wretched woman was addicted to drink; and that one article of clothing after another had been parted with to gratify that propensity, till the melancholy catastrophe occurred, when she was found a corpse without body or bed-clothes, or single piece of furniture in the room. We understand she had no friends in the town.—Edinburgh Journal.

OF THE

Countries adjacent to India on the NORTH WEST.

Comprising Sinde, Affghanistan, Belochistan, the Punjab and the neighbouring Hill States.

Edited by EDWARD THORNTON, ESQ., author of the History of the British Empire in India.

 This work prepared with unusual care and labour, will be a compendium of all the information existing with regard to the Countries, embraced within its plan, a large portion of which being derived from the MS. collection of the East India Company, will be entirely new. Nothing will be neglected that can tend to gratify the extraordinary interest which recent events have excited respecting the Indus and the Countries around and beyond it, and the most assiduous endeavours will be employed to render the work acceptable, alike to the political or military student, to the commercial inquirer, and to the general reader. The arrangement will be alphabetical.

EDUCATION.

CLAPHAM PARK ACADEMY NEAR LONDON.

IN this establishment a liberal education, in all its branches, is combined with an assiduous Intellectual Training, an ever watchful Moral oversight, Religious culture and the treatment of a Home.

The premises have been recently erected for the purpose, and combine advantages of no ordinary character, conducive alike to health, cheerfulness, and the formation of habits of good order; and the situation, for its salubrity, pleasantness and highly select character, is second to none in the environs of London. Mr. Long aims in all his arrangements and in his whole system of instruction, to extend to his pupils the full benefit of his own experience in teaching during more than twenty years, and to form the character through the instrumentality of his and Mrs. Long's personal attention and influence, and the steady application, by himself and assistants of a discipline equally mild and effective.

Mr. Long has pleasure in referring to the following Gentlemen, to whom he is well known: The Rev. E. Crisp, Bangalore; Rev. G. Mundy, Chinsurah; Rev. A. Lacroix, Calcutta; Rev. M. Hill, Berhampore; Rev. W. Morton, Calcutta; Rev. E. Porter, Vizagapatam; Rev. W. Porter, Madras; also to the Rev. James Hill, Clapham, Surrey, late of Calcutta.

The mildly bracing air of Clapham Park, and the superior accommodations of the house, including warm and cold bathing, are particularly adapted to the reception of pupils from warm climates.—Further particulars may be had of the Revd. E. Porter, Vizagapatam, and the Rev. W. Porter, Madras.

MR. JAMES ANDERSON'S INVESTMENT.

MR. ANDERSON begs to announce that the greater part of his Annual Investment being sold, he in future proposes to make periodical consignments of Goods suited to this market; and for that purpose returns to England in the Bentinck.

Parties desirous to indent for Mr. Anderson's Goods, will please apply to his Agents Messrs. Nichol, Wilkie and Co. who will be ready to communicate all particulars.

With reference to the above, we are prepared to give every information required.
